PREFACE.

IN bringing to a conclusion another Volume of "SHARPE'S MAGAZINE," the Editor begs to offer his warmest acknowledgments for the continued support of his Subscribers, notwithstanding the immense number of similar publications which have been lately issued, under the auspices of the most distinguished writers. Far indeed from looking upon these periodicals with a jealous eye, the proprietors rather rejoice that the good example set by themselves and one or two other old established journals, that, namely, of diffusing valuable information blended with harmless amusement, is becoming more extensively imitated, and likely to act as an antidote to the deluge of demoralizing literature, the statistics of which are frightful, and which has for its object the subversion of all religion, morality, and government. In the midst of this crowd of new competitors for public favour, SHARPE'S MAGAZINE has kept the even tenor of its way, distinguished, we trust, for its decided recognition of those principles which have obtained for it the confidence of its numerous subscribers.

We may appeal to our pages as to whether anything of doubtful morality, or of covert antagonism to religious truth, is there to be met with; or whether, in our reviewing columns, we have not used what influence we possess, for the purpose of recommending works distinguished by sound Christian principle; while in the fictions which give life and interest to the pages of our Magazine, is to be met no taint of indelicacy, and no insidious loosening of the moralities of social life. In the same spirit that we have begun it is our intention still to persevere, and thus to earn a continuance of that support hitherto so liberally, afforded to the proprietors of "SHARPE."

GOLDSMITH, AND HIS BIOGRAPHERS.*

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

Of all the labourers in our literary vineyard there is scarcely one whose name has a more familiar, household sound than that of Oliver Goldsmith. There is assuredly no writer of the last century for whom we entertain a stronger feeling of personal-regard. His character is endeared to us as much by its innate goodness as by its amiable weaknesses. "The epithet," says Washington Irving, "so often heard, and in such kindly tones of 'Poor Goldsmith!'" speaks volumes. Few, who consider the real compound of admirable and whimsical qualities which form his character, would wish to prune away its eccentricities, trim its grotesque luxuriance, and clip it down to the decent formalities of rigid virtue. 'Let not his frailties be remembered,' said Johnson, 'he was a very great man.' But, for our part, we rather say 'Let them be remembered,' since their tendency is to endear; and we question whether he himself would not feel gratified in hearing his reader, after dwelling with admiration on the proofs of his greatness, close the volume with the kind-hearted phrase, so fondly and familiarly ejaculated, of 'Poor Goldsmith!'"

We are pleased to number the author of "Bracebridge Hall," and the "Sketch Book," among the biographers of Goldsmith. No man has shown a more lively appreciation or a more exquisite sense of the peaceful virtues and peculiar attractions of English domestic life than the gifted American; and we must add that no modern writer of English prose has more closely resembled the author of the "Vicar of Wakefield," as well in his clear, lucid, and flowing style, as in the genial, gentle, and loving thoughts scattered through his pages. In the preface to the present biography, Mr. Irving has gracefully acknowledged his obligations to Goldsmith, and his early predilections for his writings, by addressing to him Dante's apostrophe to Virgil:—

"Tu se' lo mio maestro, e' l' mio autore;
Tu se' solo colui, da cui io tolsi
Lo bello stile, che m' ha fatto onore."

Mr. Forster's spirited and eloquent sketch, though deformed by certain mannerisms, or rather Carlylisms, which we would rather have seen avoided, is, unquestionably, a valuable addition to our standard literary biography; whilst to the "voluminous and indefatigable" Mr. Prior belongs the undisputed honour of having collected and preserved, from tradition and other sources, nearly all the particulars of Goldsmith's life, which could by possibility be discovered. We do not wish to disparage the patient research and enthusiastic labours of Mr. Prior, when we speak of Mr. Forster's work as readable, valuable and entertaining; for the diligent compiler and the skilful adapter are in our opinion equally entitled to their meed of approbation. Nor will we quarrel with the work of Washington Irving, because it contains no startling fact that is not to be found in the two preceding biographies. "The life of a scholar," says Goldsmith himself, "seldom abounds with adventure; his fame is acquired in solitude . . . but we are fond of talking of those who have given us pleasure, not that we have anything important to say, but because the subject is pleasing."

Goldsmith appears to us to have been the true type of an Irishman. The virtues and frailties of his countrymen distinguished him through life. He had the "happy knack of hoping;" the heedless charity, the thoughtless imprudence, the habit of blundering, for which Irishmen are proverbially famous. He was the descendant of a race who were little learned in lessons of worldly wisdom. "The Goldsmiths," Mr. Prior was informed, "were always a strange family. They rarely acted like other people: their hearts were always in the right place, but their heads seemed to be doing anything but what they ought." The following sketch of his immediate ancestor, which Goldsmith has put into the mouth of the "Man in Black," is, we doubt not, true to the very life:—"My father, the younger son of a good family, was possessed of a small living in the church. His education was above his fortune, and his generosity greater than his education. Poor as he was, he had his flatterers poorer than himself; for every dinner he gave them they returned him an equivalent in praise; and this was all he wanted. The same ambition that actuates a monarch at the head of his army influenced my father at the head of his table; he told the story of the ivy-tree, and that was laughed at; he repeated the jest of the two scholars and one pair of breeches, and the company laughed at that: but the story of Taffy in the sedan chair, was sure to set the table in a roar. Thus his pleasure increased in proportion to the pleasure he gave; he loved all the world, and he fancied all the world loved him." What wonder was it that from such a father poor Oliver should inherit some genial peculiarities and harmless eccentricities at which worldly wise men shook their heads!

"Oliver's education,"—we quote from Washington

(1) The Life of Oliver Goldsmith, M. B. from a variety of Original Sources, by James Prior, 2 vols. 1837. The Life and Adventures of Oliver Goldsmith: a biography, in four books, by John Forster, 1848. Oliver Goldsmith: a biography, by Washington Irving. 1849.

Irving,—"began when he was about three years old; that is to say, he was gathered under the wings of one of those good old motherly dames, found in every village, who cluck together the whole callow brood of the neighbourhood, to teach them their letters and keep them out of harm's way." The name of the old lady, who had the honour of first putting a book into the hands of Goldsmith, was Mistress Elizabeth Delap; but the future poet was a dull boy—in fact, his instructress described him as impenetrably stupid. "At six years of age he passed into the hands of the village schoolmaster, one Thomas (or as he was commonly and irreverently named, Paddy) Byrne," an old soldier, and, who was probably the original of the famous sketch in the "Deserted Village":—

"A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew;
Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face;
Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper, circling round,
Conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned:
Yet he was kind, or, if severe in aught,
The love he bore to learning was his fault."

Encouraged by some signs of juvenile quickness, Oliver's family decided on sending him to the University, and he was accordingly removed to schools of a higher order; but it is admitted that even there his proficiency was not very brilliant. "He was a plant that flowered late," said Johnson to Boswell; "there was nothing remarkable about him when young." "And this," adds Mr. Forster, "was probably true. It is said that the richer a nature is the harder and more slow its development is like to be."

As soon as he had attained the age of sixteen, on the 11th of June, 1745, he was entered as a "sizer," or "poor scholar," of Trinity College, Dublin. At that time many menial offices and derogatory duties were imposed upon the sizer; he was called on to sweep the courts, carry up the dishes from the kitchen to the table where the fellows dined, and wait upon them during their repast. Goldsmith keenly felt these indignities. He had, besides, "a savage brute for a tutor,"—one Wilder,—"a man of violent and capricious temper . . . who abused him in presence of his class-mates as ignorant and stupid; ridiculed him as awkward and ugly; and, at times, in the transports of his temper, indulged in personal violence."¹

When very young poor Oliver had had a severe attack of small-pox, which had shockingly disfigured his originally not very handsome face; his figure was short, thick, and ungainly, and his manners awkward and embarrassed. His personal appearance was, therefore, any thing but prepossessing, and, like many men of genius, he was an irregular and immethodical student. His college career was ultimately pronounced a "wretched failure." On the 27th of February he took his bachelor's degree and his final leave of the University, and returned home to his friends.

His father was now dead; his mother dwelt in a small cottage, "where she had to practise the severest frugality." His brother Henry, seven years his senior, but who had married early and improvidently, with a curacy of 40*l.* a-year, eked out a subsistence by school-keeping. None of his relatives could offer him more than a temporary home. What could Oliver do? His friends recommended the church; but the youth had conscientious scruples. These were, however, at length overruled, and he agreed to qualify himself for his sacred functions. But two years of probation had to be passed before he was able to take orders; and how were they spent?

"It is the sunny time," writes Mr. Forster, "between two dismal periods of his life. He has escaped one scene of misery; another is awaiting him; and what possibilities of happiness lie in the interval it is his nature to seize and make the most of. He assists his brother Henry in the school; runs household errands for his mother; writes scraps of verses to please his uncle Contarine;² and, to please himself, gets cousin Bryanton and Tony Lumpkins of the district, with wandering bear-leaders of genteeler sort, to meet at an old inn by his mother's house, and be a club for story-telling, for an occasional game of whist, and for the singing of songs. First in these three accomplishments, great at Latin quotations, as admirer of happy human faces greatest of all, Oliver presides. Cousin Bryanton had seen his disgrace in college, and thinks this a triumph indeed. . . . Thus the two years passed. In the day-time occupied, as I have said, in the village-school; on the winter's nights at Conway's; in the evenings of summer strolling up the Inny's banks to fish or play the flute, otter-hunting by the course of the Shannon, learning French from the Irish priests, or winning a prize for throwing the sledge-hammer at the fair at Ballymahon. Two sunny years, with sorrowful affection long remembered; but hardly better than his college course to help him through the world."

But when Goldsmith presented himself before the bishop of the diocese for ordination, his usual ill-luck attended him. Whether it was that the bishop was displeased at his unclerical costume, for to do honour to the occasion, the ill-starred candidate had arrayed himself in scarlet inexpressibles; or that he showed himself deficient in theological information, or that reports of his academical irregularities had preceded him—too true it is, that he returned home rejected. After another brief interval, (during which Oliver officiated as tutor in a neighbouring family, and, moreover, overcame by his wandering propensity, with thirty pounds in his pocket, made a ridiculous sally in quest of adventures,) his family again took counsel together, and it was resolved that he should make trial of the law. He accordingly started for Dublin, on his way to London, where he was to keep the usual terms common to Irish students; for which purpose his friends had furnished him with 50*l*. But he spent the money in Dublin—some say he was stripped of it in a gaming-house—and after a few weeks, penniless, dejected, disheartened, and penitent, trudged back to his friends. Physic was the next experiment. For the purpose of studying the healing art he set out for Edinburgh, and arrived there in the Autumn of 1752. "An instance of the habitual thoughtlessness belonging to his character," we are informed by Mr. Prior, "occurred at the moment of first setting foot in the northern metropolis. Having procured a lodging and deposited his luggage, he eagerly sallied forth to gratify curiosity by viewing the city, in which, having occupied the whole of the day, the approach of night reminded him that he had neither inquired the name of the landlady, nor the street in which she lived. In this dilemma, having wandered about in a search which might have been useless, an accidental meeting with the cawdy, or porter, whom he had employed in the morning in removing to his new abode, obviated a difficulty that might have occasioned inconvenience." Having passed two winters at Edinburgh, Goldsmith made up his mind to finish his medical education on the continent. After some of his usual mishaps, he made his way to Leyden, (his good-natured uncle, Containe, providing the funds,) where he remained about a year; and attended the lectures of Gaubius on Chemistry, and Albinus on Anatomy. From Leyden he is supposed to have set out on his famous continental tour, which he commenced in February, 1755,¹ furnished, it has been said, "with one spare shirt, a flute, and a single guinea."

We shall not attempt to follow him in his wanderings. He passed an evening in the society of Voltaire at Paris; at Geneva he became travelling tutor to "a mongrel young gentleman, son of a London pawnbroker;"² and at length, after a variety of adventures, returned to England in 1756. It seems quite true, that the greater part of his journey was performed on foot, and that he was often indebted to his flute for lodging and a meal. "Countries wear a very different appearance," he says, in his "Enquiry into Polite Learning," 1759, "to travellers of different circumstances. A man who is whirled through Europe in a post-chaise, and the pilgrim who walks the grand tour on foot, will form very different conclusions. Hand incipertus loquor. And the well-known lines in the "Traveller," are doubtless as true as they are expressive and beautiful:—

"How often have I led thy sportive choir,
With tuneless pipe, beside the murmuring Loire!
Where shading elms along the margin grew,
And freshened from the wave the Zephyr flew;
And haply, though my harsh touch, faltering still,
But mock'd all tune and marr'd the dancer's skill,

Yet would the village praise my wond'rous power,
And dance forgetful of the noontide hour."

On his arrival in England, Goldsmith appears to have found himself worse off than whilst vagabonding on the continent. But poverty made him fertile in shifts and expedients. It is rumoured that about this time he became a strolling player. Then he went to London; called at the apothecaries' shops, and asked for employment to run with their medicines, spread their plaisters, and, in the language of advertisements, make himself generally useful. Homeless and friendless, he wandered about the streets at night with a few halfpence in his pocket. "Ten or twelve years later," writes Mr. Forster, "Goldsmith startled a brilliant circle at Sir Joshua's, with an anecdote of 'When I lived among the beggars in Axe Lane,' just as Napoleon, fifty years later, appalled the party of crowned heads at Dresden, with his story of, 'When I was a lieutenant in the regiment of La Fère!'" At last he became an usher in a school, a miserable, browbeaten, worried, and despised drudge; where he was "up early and late," and was the "laughing-stock of the boys." He soon quitted this wretched vocation, and was houseless and penniless again. In his dismal poverty he was found out by an Edinburgh fellow-student, who furnished him with funds to commence the practice of medicine, in a small way, among the poor in Bankside, Southwark. Among his patients was a journeyman printer, who worked for Mr. Samuel Richardson, the author of "Pamela," and then a flourishing publisher. The printer introduced him to his master, who offered him employment, and Goldsmith was enabled to make a fresh start as reader and corrector of the press.

He did not probably remain long in this situation. At Edinburgh he had formed an intimacy with the son of a Dr. Milner, who kept a large classical academy at Peckham; and young Milner, having found out his old acquaintance, made him a liberal offer to assist in the management of the school. He was here kindly treated, but his habits were not those of the pedagogue. The scholars entertained little respect for him; and, though he spent his money in buying them sweetmeats, played all sorts of tricks upon him. "His small supplies," says Mr. Prior, "were thus exhausted, frequently before the stated salary became due, when Mrs. Milner would say to him with a smile, upon application for an advance, 'You had better, Mr. Goldsmith, let me take care of your money, as I do for some of the young gentlemen;' to which he would reply, in the same spirit of good-humour, 'In truth, madam, there is equal need.'" At the table of Dr. Milner, he frequently met with one Griffiths, the proprietor of the "Monthly Review." Griffiths, a shrewd, hard man of business, saw that Goldsmith was clever and very poor, that he was just the animal for hack authorship, and might be had cheap. He accordingly offered him a permanent engagement as a contributor to the Review, with board and lodging, and a small fixed salary. Poor Oliver suffered the bookseller to make his own terms, and, "in his twenty-ninth year," in the words of Mr. Forster, "sat down to the precarious task-work of Author by Profession." This literary vassalage lasted five months. Even to poor spirit-broken Goldsmith it was too humiliating to be long endured. Mr. and Mrs. Griffiths both exerted the privilege of patching, altering, and (in their own eyes) amending his reviews. They kept him constantly at the desk, and when he tried to assume a spirit of independence, they accused him of being above his situation. The connexion with Griffiths was dissolved, but Oliver was now fairly embarked in the profession of authorship. He had become a bookseller's hack and a Grub-street scribe; and for many years to come, he was destined to the hardest species of garret-toil and mental drudgery.

We have hitherto traced his fortunes somewhat minutely; but we cannot pretend to follow him in every stage of his literary career. That career is now commemorated as one of the world's great facts. It commenced in poverty and obscurity, and terminated in triumph and celebrity. His privations at first were great, but his ultimate success was splendid. Though he had fallen upon days when literature had to fight its own battles, and the man of letters was left to struggle for himself, he indulged in no repinings or regrets. He did not lament that the age of patronage had passed away, and that guineas were no longer given for dedications and birthday odes. On the contrary, like a good and sensible man, he rejoiced at the change which, by insuring the independence, raised the character of the literary man. When he had obtained some degree of consideration, and while the memory of his early struggles was yet fresh in his recollection, he calmly and truly observed in one of his "Chinese Letters,"—"At present, the few poets in England no longer depended on the great for subsistence; they have now no other patrons but the public; and the public, collectively considered, is a good and generous master. It is indeed too frequently mistaken as to the merits of every candidate for favour, but to make amends it is never mistaken long." And again,—“A life of independence is generally a life of virtue. It is that which fits the soul for every generous flight of humanity, freedom, and friendship . . . Serenity, health, and affluence, attend the desire of rising by labour; misery, repentance, and disrespect that of succeeding by extorted benevolence. The man who can thank himself alone for the happiness he enjoys is truly blest; and lovely, far more lovely, the sturdy gloom of laborious indigence, than the fawning simper of thriving adulation.”

It is not uninteresting to trace the gradual change in Goldsmith's circumstances, as shown in the character of the habitations which he successively occupied. He tenanted at first a mean apartment "somewhere in the vicinity of Salisbury Square, Fleet Street," but, in order to appear more like a gentleman, he directed his letters (or "hailed," as it is termed), from the "Temple Exchange Coffee-house, near Temple Bar." He probably at this time adopted the notable expedient of a poor countryman, in going abroad to pay visits on clean-shirt-days only, but on other occasions wisely keeping within doors. His next place of residence was "on the first floor of the house, No. 12, Green Arbour Court, between the Old Bailey, and what was lately Fleet Market."

Washington Irving, who many years since visited this locality on a literary pilgrimage, says, that "it then existed in its pristine state, and was a small square of tall and miserable houses, the very intestines of which seemed turned inside out, to judge from the old garments and frippery that fluttered from every window. It appeared to be a region of washerwomen, and lines were stretched about the little square, on which clothes were dangling to dry." It may be as well to add, that all traces of this singular shrine of poverty-stricken genius have long since disappeared. "Green Arbour Court," says Mr. Forster, "is now gone for ever; its miserable wretchedness was replaced by the decent comfort of a stable. The houses, crumbling and tumbling in Goldsmith's day, were fairly rotted down some twelve or fifteen years since; and it became necessary, for safety sake, to remove what time had spared."

The present Green Arbour Court in the Old Bailey must not, therefore, be confounded with the locality tenanted by Goldsmith. It was whilst residing here that abject poverty betrayed him into an act of indiscretion for which he afterwards bitterly suffered. Before leaving his old lodgings, Dr. Milner had procured him an appointment as physician to one of the factories on the coast of Coromandel; and the poet was suddenly dazzled with visions of oriental splendour. But it appears that he failed to take the necessary steps to secure the magnificent prize, and it was transferred to another. Disappointed in his Indian scheme, he turned his attention to the navy, and probably, as Mr. Prior observes, "induced by the example of several acquaintances, and the remembrance of Grainger and Smollett, who, in the spirit of adventure, or for a more extensive observation of mankind, pursued a similar course in early life," he resolved to present himself to be examined at the College of Surgeons for the humble situation of an "hospital mate." His difficulty was to procure a decent suit of clothes for the occasion, and in this dilemma he applied to Griffiths, who, on being furnished with four articles for the "Monthly Review," undertook to become his security to a tailor. In the books of the College of Surgeons there is an entry which we quote without remark, for it is too expressive to require comment. "At a court of examiners held at the theatre, 21st December, 1758 . . . James Bernard, mate to an hospital. Oliver Goldsmith found not qualified for ditto."

The hack author returned to his drudgery, and four days afterwards—on a Christmas Day!—pawned the clothes in which he had stood his examination, for the immediate purpose of paying some small arrears of rent to his landlady, whose husband had been arrested for debt. He was now in the hands of Griffiths, who peremptorily demanded the return of the unlucky suit. When it was not forthcoming he accused Goldsmith of dishonesty. There is something touching in the unhappy man's reply:—"Had I been a sharper—had I been possessed of less good-nature, and native generosity, I might surely now have been in better circumstances. I am guilty, I own, of meanness, which poverty unavoidably brings with it; my reflections are filled with repentance for my imprudence, but not with any remorse for being a villain."

But better days were now in store for him. In March, 1759, he published his "Enquiry into the present State of Polite Learning in Europe," and his reputation among the booksellers being now established, and his circumstances continuing to improve, "about the middle of 1760," says Washington Irving, "he emerged from his dismal abode in Green Arbour Court, and took respectable apartments in Wine Office Court, Fleet Street."

It was here, on the 31st of May, 1761, he received his first visit from Dr. Samuel Johnson. The commencement of their acquaintance was most characteristic. Goldsmith had invited a large party to a literary supper, and he requested Dr. Percy, as a mutual friend, to bring Johnson with him to the repast. On calling for the great literary potentate, Dr. Percy was surprised at his extraordinary smartness, and could not help inquiring the reason of his paying such unwonted regard to his personal appearance. "Why, Sir," replied Johnson, "I hear that Goldsmith, who is a very great sloven, justifies his disregard of cleanliness and decency by quoting my practice, and I am desirous this night to show him a better example."

It is almost impossible to avoid making a comparison between the literary career of Goldsmith and Johnson;—and by the eloquent pen of Washington Irving, that comparison has been admirably drawn. "Both had struggled from early life with poverty," says the American biographer, "but had struggled in different ways. Goldsmith, buoyant, heedless, sanguine, tolerant of evils, and easily pleased, had shifted along by any temporary expedient: cast down at every turn, but rising again with indomitable good humour, and still carried forward by his talent at hoping. Johnson, melancholy and hypochondriacal, and prone to apprehend the worst, yet sternly resolute to battle with and conquer it, had made his way doggedly and gloomily, but with a noble spirit of self-reliance, and a disregard of foreign aid Goldsmith's poverty was never accompanied by bitterness; but neither was it accompanied by that guardian pride which kept Johnson from falling into the degrading shifts of poverty. Goldsmith had an unfortunate facility at borrowing, and helping himself along by the contributions of his friends, no doubt trusting, in his own hopeful way, of one day making retribution. Johnson never hoped, and therefore never borrowed. In his sternest trials he proudly bore the ills he could not master. Though, like Goldsmith, an immethodical student, he had imbibed deeper draughts of knowledge, and made himself a riper scholar. While Goldsmith's happy constitution and genial humour, carried him abroad into sunshine and enjoyment, Johnson's physical infirmities and mental gloom drove him upon himself, to the resources of reading and meditation; threw a deeper, though darker enthusiasm into his mind, and stored a retentive memory with all kinds of knowledge." We might add, that in the buoyant temper of Goldsmith, and the sturdy spirit of Johnson, we discern something of the inherited and inherent peculiarities of race. The patient Saxon and quick-blooded Celt appear in striking contrast; their virtues and failings were marked and prominent; upon each of them the stamp of the national character was firmly impressed. But they were attracted together by strong sympathies, and difference of temper served, as it has done in many other instances, to attach them more closely to each other.

Goldsmith had long felt the want of a monitor and guide. His yielding, gentle nature needed support, and in his weakness he felt that it was good for him to lean in confidence and reliance on the strong-minded Englishman. A memorable scene occurred one morning at Wine Office Court, which forcibly illustrates the characters and position of the two men. The story is well known, and has been made the subject of a graphic painting by a modern artist. We cannot do better than give it in Dr. Johnson's own words. "I received one morning," he says, "a message from poor Goldsmith that he was in great distress, and, as it was not in his power to come to me, begging that I would come to him as soon as possible. I sent him a guinea, and promised to come to him directly. I accordingly went as soon as I was dressed, and found that his landlady had arrested him for his rent, at which he was in a violent passion: I perceived that he had already changed my guinea, and had a bottle of Madeira and a glass before him. I put the cork into the bottle, desired he would be calm, and began to talk to him of the means by which he might be extricated. He then told me he had a novel ready for the press, which he produced to me. I looked into it and saw its merit; told the landlady I should soon return; and, having gone to a bookseller, sold it for sixty pounds. I brought Goldsmith the money, and he discharged his rent, not without rating his landlady in a high tone for having used him so ill."

The novel was the "Vicar of Wakefield," and the bookseller to whom it was sold was Mr. Francis Newbury. Strange to relate, the purchaser kept the manuscript by him more than a year and a half before he ventured to publish it. But the work was destined to an extensive and enduring popularity, of which the fortunate bookseller never dreamed. "It came out," says Washington Irving, "on the 27th of March, 1766; before the end of May a second edition was called for; in three months more a third; and so it went on, widening in a popularity that has never flagged. Rogers, the Nestor of British literature, whose refined purity of taste, and exquisite mental organization, rendered him eminently calculated to appreciate a work of the kind, declared that of all the books, which, through the fitful changes of three generations, he had seen rise and fall, the charm of the "Vicar of Wakefield" had alone continued as at first; and could he revisit the world after an interval of many more generations, he should as surely look to find it undiminished." We shall not attempt to inquire into the secret of this wonderful popularity. It is enough to say, that the work has been a blessed instrument in disseminating principles of mercy, tolerance, and kindness. The loving disposition and winning gentleness of spirit which characterised its author shine forth in every page. "Simple to very baldness," says Mr. Forster, "are the materials employed. But Goldsmith threw into the midst of them his own nature; his actual experience; the suffering, discipline, and sweet emotion of his own chequered life; and so made them a lesson and delight to all men." Who will not recognise in the common qualities of mind attributed to the pastor's family, the leading peculiarities of the gifted writer? "In short," he says, at the conclusion of the first chapter, "a family likeness prevailed through all; and properly speaking, they had but one character, that of being all equally generous, credulous, simple, and inoffensive." The scope and objects of the tale have been eloquently summed up by Mr. Forster, in a few terse and expressive sentences, which we transfer with pleasure to our pages. "Good predominant over evil is briefly the purpose and moral of the little story. It is designed to show us that patience in suffering, that persevering reliance on the providence of God, that quiet labour, cheerful endeavour, and an indulgent forgiveness of the faults and infirmities of others, are the easy and certain means of pleasure in this world, and of turning pain to noble uses. It is designed to show us that the heroism and self-denial needed for the duties of life, are not of the superhuman sort; that they may co-exist with many follies, with some simple weaknesses, with many harmless vanities; and that in the improvement of mankind, near and remote, in its progress through worldly content to final happiness, the humblest of men have their places assigned them, and their parts allotted them to play."

Apart from its moral teachings, the "Vicar of Wakefield" is also valued as the most delightful picture of English domestic life in the language. All the tenderesses, virtues, and endearments of home—its pure enjoyments, and tranquil pleasures are beautifully set forth. It is a picture that could only have been drawn by one who himself deeply appreciated the ties of family affection. "And yet," observes Washington Irving, "how contradictory it seems that this, one of the most delightful pictures of home and homefelt happiness should be drawn by a homeless man; that the most amiable picture of domestic virtue, and all the endearments of the married state should be drawn by a bachelor, who had been severed from domestic life almost from boyhood; that one of the most tender, touching, and affecting appeals on behalf of female loveliness, should have been made by a man whose deficiencies in all the graces of person and manner seemed to mark him out for a cynical disparager of the sex."

Before the "Vicar of Wakefield," however, had made its appearance, Goldsmith established his reputation as a poet by the publication of the "Traveller." With many misgivings, on the part of its author, this charming poem was ushered into the world, and its success was most triumphant. Goldsmith now felt that he was rising in the world, and "accordingly," says Washington Irving, "emerged from Wine Office Court, and took chambers in the Temple." It is true they were but of humble pretensions, situated on what was then the library staircase, and it would appear that he was a kind of inmate with Jeffs, the butler of the society. Still he was in the Temple, that classic region rendered famous by the Spectator and other essayists, as the abode of gay wits and thoughtful men of letters; and which, with its retired courts and embowered gardens, in the very heart of a noisy metropolis, is, to the quiet-seeking student and author, an oasis freshening with verdure in the midst of a desert. Johnson, who had become a sort of growling supervisor of the poet's affairs, paid him a visit soon after he had installed himself in his new quarters, and went prying about the apartment, in his near-sighted manner, examining everything minutely. Goldsmith was sidged by this curious scrutiny, and apprehending a disposition to find fault, exclaimed, with the air of a man who had money in both pockets, "I shall soon be in better chambers than these." The harmless bravado drew a reply from Johnson which touched the chord of proper pride. "Nay, sir," said he, "never mind that. Ni le quesiveris extra,"—implying that his reputation rendered him independent of outward show." To this anecdote of Johnson and Goldsmith we must add another equally characteristic of the two men. At the Literary Club, of which both were members, the merits of the "Traveller" were warmly discussed—many of the members could scarcely believe that a man like Goldsmith could have written such a poem. Some of them suspected that Johnson, who had contributed a few lines, was the author of the whole. Accordingly, Mr. Chamier, one of the members, on the first occasion that presented itself, undertook to sound the author on the subject. He boldly commenced with the question, "Mr. Goldsmith, what do you mean by the last word in the first line of your 'Traveller'—

'Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow'—

Do you mean tardiness of locomotion?" Johnson was there watching his flurried friend, and thus reports his reply. "Goldsmith," he says, "who would say something without consideration, answered 'Yes.' I was sitting by, and said, 'No, Sir, you did not mean tardiness of locomotion; you mean that sluggishness of mind which comes upon a man in solitude. 'Ah!' exclaimed Goldsmith, 'that was what I meant.' Chamier," continues Johnson, "believed then I had written the line, as much as if he had seen me write it."

No doubt—and yet how natural was the thoughtless, off-hand reply from the lips of the inconsiderate Hibernian. "No man," truly remarked the great lexicographer, on another occasion, "is more foolish than Goldsmith when he has not a pen in his hand, or more wise when he has."

It was Goldsmith's fortune to achieve success late in life. He was nearly forty when the publication of the "Traveller" raised him to distinction in the world of letters. "Beginning," observes Mr. Forster, "with not even the choice which Fielding admits was his, of hackney writer or hackney coachman, he has fought his way at last to consideration and esteem. But he bears upon him the scars of his twelve years' conflict; of the mean sorrows through which he has passed, and of the cheap indulgences he has sought relief and help from." Again:—"His reputation had been silently widening, in the midst and in despite of his humble drudgery; his poem, his novel, his essays, had imperceptibly enlarged the circle of his admirers; and he was somewhat suddenly subjected to the social exactions that are levied on literary fame." As we come to the last period of Goldsmith's life it is necessary to bear all this in mind, because it accounts for most of the foibles, follies, and indiscretions that have been laid to his charge. In his days of penury he had not been very scrupulous about his acquaintances. As his fortunes improved he continued easily accessible, fond of conviviality, and careless of the world's opinion. As soon as he obtained a footing in polite society he did not discard his old associates, or forsake his former haunts. His delight was in free-and-easy clubs; particularly in a certain club meeting on Wednesday evenings at the Globe Tavern in Fleet Street. A countryman named Glover once accompanied him to this congenial resort, and was shocked to hear the familiar tone in which Goldsmith was addressed by some of the humbler members. A wealthy pig-butcher, especially, was singularly free and easy. Raising his glass, with a familiar nod, he pledged the poet in the hearing of the whole company, "Come, Noll, here's my service to you my old boy." We quote the sequel of the story from Washington Irving. "Glover whispered to Goldsmith that he should not allow such liberties. 'Let him alone,' was the reply, 'you'll see how civilly I'll let him down.' After a time, he called out, 'Mr. B. I have the honour of drinking your good health.' Alas! dignity was not poor Goldsmith's forte; he could keep no one at a distance. 'Thank'ee, thank'ee, Noll,' nodded the pig-butcher, scarce taking the pipe out of his mouth. 'I don't see the effect of your reproof,' whispered Glover. 'I give it up,' replied Goldsmith, with a good-humoured shrug; 'I ought to have known before now there is no putting a pig in the right way.'"

Already distinguished as a novelist and poet, Goldsmith's next triumph was in the drama. After having been subjected to many vexatious delays his comedy of the "Good-natured Man," at length made its appearance; and though but partially successful on its first representation, it justified the expectations of his friends, and has since kept possession of the stage. But the author (who had gone to the theatre in a new suit of clothes, manufactured for the occasion, value 8*l.* 2*s.* 7*d.*) was mortified and disappointed. Concealing his chagrin, he went to the Literary Club, and chatted to some of its members; but he afterwards confessed that when all were gone, except Johnson, he burst out a-crying, and protested he would never write again. It is characteristic of Goldsmith that he afterwards, in his guileless simplicity of heart, told this story to a large company at dinner, when Johnson was present, who cried out in astonishment, "I thought all this had been a secret between you and me, and I am sure I would not have said anything about it for the world." "It is singular, however," observes Washington Irving, "that Goldsmith, who thus in conversation could keep nothing to himself, should be the author of a maxim which would inculcate the most thorough dissimulation. 'Men of the world,' says he, in one of the papers of the Ber, 'maintain that the true end of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them.' How often is this quoted as one of the subtle remarks of the fine-witted Talleyrand!

"The Good-natured Man," however, had a tolerable run, and produced its author no less a sum than 400*l.* He now felt disposed to launch out into a more luxurious style of living, and he accordingly invested his money in the purchase of the lease of a set of chambers on the second floor in No. 2, Brick Court, Middle Temple. This was his last residence—the last of the local habitations, which his genius has hallowed to all posterity. Sir William Blackstone, the author of the Commentaries, had chambers immediately under him, and it is said, often complained of the rackets and revels overhead. Although, like Johnson, fond of town life, Goldsmith appears to have had a true taste and relish for country scenery. He occasionally took strolls in the neighbourhood of London, (which he called making "a Shoemaker's holiday;") and when hardly pressed by the booksellers, he would take a quiet cottage a few miles from town, for the purpose of uninterrupted labour. It was thus that the "Deserted Village" was written. Strolling among the green lanes and hedgerows in the environs of London, he relieved his "prosaic toils," by the composition of this charming poem. When we recollect the circumstances under which it was penned, we need not wonder at the melancholy tone that pervades it. It was written under the influence of a sacred sorrow; in those moods of melancholy which called forth all the poet's tenderness, and imparted a more than wonted softness to the delineations of his pen. His brother Henry, the supposed original of the village preacher, was just dead. If his poetical portrait be correct, he was a genuine Goldsmith—a true scion of that gentle and generous race.

"Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And e'en his failings lean'd to virtue's side:
 But in his duty prompt at every call,
 He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all;
 And, as a bird each fond endearment tries
 To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
 He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
 Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way."

While the memory of such a brother was yet fresh in his heart, and his grief was green, it no doubt occurred to Goldsmith to hand down his blameless career to posterity, as a graceful tribute of fraternal affection. And we further agree with Washington Irving, "that the whole character seems traced, as it were, in an expiatory spirit; as if, conscious of his own wandering restlessness, he sought to humble himself at the shrine of excellence which he had not been able to practise."

About this time an interesting episode enlivened Goldsmith's literary life. At the house of Sir Joshua Reynolds he made the acquaintance of a Mrs. Horneck—a widow lady, with a son in the Guards, and two beautiful, amiable, and accomplished daughters. The whole family took a decided fancy to the whimsical poet, and he in return was not insensible to the charms of the daughters. The elder of these young ladies was known among her friends by the name of Little Comedy, and the younger (whose heart by the way was still unengaged) had received the sobriquet of the Jessamy Bride. It has been hinted that the poor author, to whom nature had denied the fascinations of person which are said to form the principal recommendation to the favour of the fair sex, was surprised into an attachment to the Jessamy Bride, which, though commenced in sportive familiarity, at length assumed a serious aspect. It is certain that his intimacy with the Hornecks had an effect upon his tailor's bills, and that to render his awkward figure more attractive, he arrayed it in the costliest raiments of the day. In the summer of 1770, he made an excursion with his new friends to Paris. The following anecdote, which has been related of Goldsmith, whilst sight-seeing in the French metropolis, will provoke a smile, especially if we consider that the Jessamy Bride was probably present and beheld his discomfiture. "Being with a party at Versailles, viewing the water-works, a question arose among the gentlemen present, whether the distance from whence they stood to one of the little islands, was within the compass of a leap. Goldsmith maintained the affirmative; but, being bantered on the subject, and remembering his former powers as a youth, attempted the leap, but, falling short, descended into the water, to the great amusement of the company." With the Hornecks he must have spent many delightful days. He was a frequent guest at their country seat at Barton, in Suffolk; they appreciated his character, and he was ever ready to add to their fund of harmless amusement. We may form some idea of the playful badinage and humorous sallies that enlivened this intercourse by perusing the following lines which occur among others, in a humorous letter indited by the poet to Little Comedy, (then become Mrs. Bunbury.) The ladies, it appears, would often invite him to play at loo, the fashionable game of the day, and affecting to be his advisers, get him into all sorts of difficulties:—

"Now, ladies, I ask, if law-matters you're skilled in,
 Whether crimes such as yours should not come before Fielding:

For giving advice that is not worth a straw,
 May well be called picking of pockets in law;
 And picking of pockets, with which I now charge ye,
 Is, by quinto Elizabeth, Death without Clergy.
 What justice, when both to the Old Bailey brought!
 By the gods, I'll enjoy it, though 'tis but in thought!
 Both are placed at the bar, with all proper decorum,
 With bunches of fennel and nosegays before 'em;
 Both cover their faces with mobs and all that,
 But the judge bids them angrily take off their hat.
 When uncovered, a buzz of enquiry runs round,
 'Pray what are their crimes?' 'They've been pilfering found.'

'But pray who've they pilfered?' 'A doctor, I hear.'
 'What yon solemn-faced odd-looking man that stands near?'

'The same.' 'What a pity, how does it surprise one!
 'Two handsomer culprits I never set eyes on.'

Then their friends all come round me with cringing and leering,

To melt me to pity, and soften my swearing.
 First, Sir Charles advances, with phrases well strung,
 'Consider, dear doctor, the girls are but young.'
 'The younger the worse,' I return him again;
 'It shews that their habits are all dyed in grain.'
 'But then they're so handsome, one's bosom it grieves.'
 'What signifies handsome, when people are thieves?'
 'But where is your justice? their cases are hard.'
 'What signifies justice? I want the reward.'

This was society for which Goldsmith was adapted, and in which he felt himself at home. He had no taste for stately grandeur; nor did he particularly distinguish himself in highly intellectual circles. Above all things he loathed the pompous Pecksniffs of the world, who, by dint of assurance and assumption, sometimes succeed in raising a commanding reputation. In the "Citizen of the World" he has given us a graphic picture of "a great man," from the mouth of his Chinese philosopher, which is worth quoting:—"I was yesterday invited by a gentleman to dinner, who promised that our entertainment should consist of a haunch of venison, a turtle, and a great man. I came, according to appointment. The venison was fine, the turtle good, but the great man insupportable. The moment I ventured to speak I was at once contradicted with a snap. I attempted, by a second and third assault, to retrieve my lost reputation, but was still beat back with confusion. I was resolved to attack him once more from entrenchment, and turned the conversation on the government of China; but even here he asserted, snapped, and contradicted as before. Heavens! thought I, this man pretends to know China even better than myself. I looked round to see who was on my side; but every eye was fixed in admiration on the great man; I therefore, at last, thought proper to sit silent, and act the pretty gentleman during the ensuing conversation."

To all his literary friends Goldsmith's blundering simplicity was a source of infinite amusement. His want of tact was everywhere apparent. He would tell stories in the wrong place, and retail jokes of which he had forgotten the point. We find one or two amusing instances in Mr. Irving's biography. "Beaumont was extremely apt to circulate stories at his expense, founded perhaps on some trivial incident, but dressed up with the embellishments of his sarcastic brain. One relates to a venerable dish of peas, served up at Sir Joshua's table, which should have been green, but were any other colour. A wag, suggested to Goldsmith, in a whisper, that they should be sent to Hammersmith, as that was the way to turn-em-green (Turnham-Green). Goldsmith, delighted with the pun, endeavoured to repeat it at Burke's table, but missed the point. 'That is the way to make 'em green,' said he. Nobody laughed. He perceived he was at fault. 'I mean that is the road to turn 'em green.' A dead pause, and a stare; whereupon, adds Beaumont, 'he started up disconcerted, and abruptly left the table.' . . . On another occasion, the poet and Beaumont were seated at the theatre, next to Lord Shelburne, the minister, whom political writers thought fit to nick-name Malagrida. 'Do you know,' said Goldsmith, to his lordship, in the course of conversation, 'that I never could conceive why they call you Malagrida, for Malagrida was a very good sort of man.'"

In 1773 the comedy of She stoops to Conquer; or, the Mistakes of a Night, was produced with triumphant success. It must have been written nearly two years before, but many perplexing circumstances had prevented its appearance. Johnson, Burke, and Reynolds, and a host of Goldsmith's distinguished friends were present, and joined in the hearty laugh which was kept up throughout the performance. Johnson's criticism on this brilliant production will be long remembered for its truth, as well as for its kindness to the sensitive author; "I know of no comedy for many years," he said, "that has so much exhilarated an audience; that has answered so much the great end of comedy—making an audience merry."

In the commencement of the year 1774, Goldsmith was surrounded by an accumulation of work, that would have tasked the energies of the strongest mind. He was behindhand with the booksellers, and deeply in debt. His constitution was undermined partly by town dissipation, partly, perhaps, by early privations. He was over-worked and ill at ease; but he would not give way. He rallied himself as well as he could, and gave some entertainments in his chambers to Johnson and other friends. At length, on the 25th of March, he was taken ill. With characteristic impudence, he persisted in dosing himself with James's powders, (a medicine he had been in the habit of taking,) notwithstanding the expostulations of his medical attendants. He continued to grow weaker, and about half-past four on Monday morning, the 4th of April, 1774, he expired, in the forty-sixth year of his age.

One affecting incident remains to be narrated.

"There was one mourner," writes Washington Irving, "whose enthusiasm for his memory, could it have been foreseen, might have soothed the bitterness of death. After the coffin had been screwed down, a lock of his hair was requested for a lady, a particular friend, who wished to preserve it as a remembrance. It was the beautiful Mary Horneck, the Jessamy Bride. The coffin was opened again, and a lock of hair cut off which she cherished to her dying day. The lady," continues the biographer, "survived almost to the present day. Hazlitt met her at Northcote's painting room, about twenty years since, as Mrs. Gwyn, the widow of a General Gwyn of the army. She was at that time upwards of seventy years of age. Still, he said, she was beautiful, beautiful even in years. After she was gone, Hazlitt remarked how handsome she still was. 'I do not know,' said Northcote, 'why she is so kind as to come to see me, except that I am the last link in the chain that connects her with all those she most esteemed when young,—Johnson, Reynolds, Goldsmith,—and remind her of the most delightful period of her life.' " Mrs. Gwyn, so well known as Mary Horneck, and the Jessamy Bride, died in 1840.

Having accompanied the biographers of Goldsmith through the principal scenes of his chequered life, we may, perhaps, be allowed a concluding remark. There are few writers, it will be admitted, who have achieved a wider popularity, or who have exercised and maintained a more general and permanent influence on the English intellectual character than the author of the "Deserted Village." At every stage of life he is a friend and monitor. If, as his biographers have suggested, he was the author of "Goody Two Shoes," and other nursery rhymes published by his frequent employer, Mr. Francis Newbury—and there is nothing unreasonable in the supposition that these drolleries, slight and trivial as they may appear, were really written by wise and thoughtful men—his sportive productions amuse our earliest infancy. His histories of England, Greece, and Rome, still form the basis of the historical knowledge communicated in hundreds of our schools; and if these histories are not remarkable for any deep research, their clear and lucid style admirably adapt them for the purposes of instruction. His selected essays, the "Vicar of Wakefield," and the "Citizen of the World" are among the first volumes of English classics which, in youth and early manhood, are commended to our attention, and they never fail to leave a permanent impression on the mind. In maturer years they are resorted to with pleasure, and maxims and observations in daily use are taken from them. And when the meridian of life is passed, when the poetry of passion has lost its charm, and the mind is more readily attracted by sedate images and tranquil beauty, the "Deserted Village," and the "Traveller," are welcomed as favoured friends, and referred to as models of all that is pure, correct, and good. To every stage and condition of life we maintain that Goldsmith has been a liberal benefactor. But, above all, he has left us the example of a life which, though defaced and deformed by many errors, was redeemed by so many virtues that we should be justified in rejoicing that he had lived even if he had not written a line.

THE MAIDEN AND MARRIED LIFE OF MARY POWELL,

AFTERWARDS MISTRESS MILTON.¹

A HONEYMOON cannot for ever last; nor sense of danger, when it long hath past;—but one little difference from out manie greater differences between my late happie fortnight in St. Martin's-le-Grand, and my present dailie course in Barbican, hath marked the distinction between lover and husband. There it was "sweet Moll," "my heart's life of life," "my dearest cleaving mischief;" here 'tis onlie "wife," "Mistress Milton," or at most "deare or sweet wife." This, I know, is masterfulle and seemly.

Onlie, this morning, chancing to quote one of his owne lines,

"These things may startle well, but not astounde,"—he sayd, in a kind of wonder, "Why, Moll, whence had you that?—Methought you hated versing, as you used to call it. When learnt you to love it?" I hung my head in my old foolish way, and answered, "Sinco I learnt to love the verser." "Why, this is the best of alle!" he hastilie cried, "Can my sweet wife be indeede heart of my heart and spirit of my spirit? I lost, or drove away a child, and have found a woman." Thereafter, he less often wifed me, and I found I was agayn sweet Moll.

This afternoon, Christopher Milt on lookt in on us. After saluting me with y^e usuall mixture of malice and civilitie in his looks, he fell into casie conversatiou; and presentlie says to his brother quietlic enough, "I saw a curious pennyworth at a book-stall as I came along this morning." "What was that?" says my husband, brightening up. "It had a long name," says Christopher,—"'I think it was called 'Tetrachordon.'" My husband cast at me a suddain, quick look, but I did not see much as change colour; and quietlic continued my sewing.

"I wonder," says he, after a pause, "that you did not invest a small portion of your capitall in the work, as you say 'twas soe greate a bargain. However, Mr. Kit, let me give you one small hint with alle y^e goode humour imaginable; don't take advantage of our neare and deare relation to make too frequent opportunities of saying to me anything that would certainlie procure for another man a thrashing!"

Then, after a short silence betweene alle, he suddainlie burst out laughing, and cried, "I know 'tis on the stalls; I've seene it, Kit, myself! Oh, had you seene, as I did, the blockheads poring over the title, and hammering at it while you might have walked to Mile End and back!"

"That's fame, I suppose," says Christopher drylie; and then goes off to talk of some new exercise of the press-licenser's authoritie, which he seemed to approve, but it kindled my husband in a minute.

"What folly! what nonsense!" cried he, smiting the table; "these Jacks in office sometimes devise such senselesse things that I really am ashamed of being of theirs party. License, indeed! their license! I suppose they will shortlie license the lengthe of Moll's curls, and regulate the colour of her hooode, and forbid the larks to sing within sounde of Bow bell, and the bees to hum o' Sundays. Methought I had broken Mabbot's teeth two years agone; but I must bring forth a new edition of my Areopagitica; and I'll put your name down, Kit, for a hundred copies!"

Oct.—Though a rusticall life hath ever had my suffrages, nothing can be more pleasant than our regular course. We rise at five or sooner: while my husband combs his hair, he commonly hums or sings some psalm or hymn, versing it, maybe, as he goes on. Being drest, Ned reads him a chapter in the Hebrew Bible. With Ned stille at his knee, and me by his side, he expounds and improves y^e same; then, after a shorte, heartie prayer, releases us both. Before I have finished my dressing, I hear him below at his organ, with the two lads, who sing as well as choristers, hymning anthems and Gregorian chants, now soaring up to y^e clouds, as 'twere, and then dying off as though some wide echoing space lay betweene us. I usuallie find time to tie on my hooode and slip away to y^e herb-market for a bunch of fresh radishes or cresses, a sprig of parsley, or at y^e leaste a posy, to lay on his plate. A good whenten leaf, fresh butter and eggs, and a large jug of milk compose our simple breakfast; for he likes not, as my father, to see boys hacking a hugh piece of beef, nor cares for heavie feeding, himself. Onlie, olde Mr. Milton sometimes takes a rasher of toasted bacon, but commonly, a basin of furmity, which I prepare more to his munde than y^e servants can.

After breakfast, I well know the boys' lessons will last till noone. I therefore goe to my closett duties after my Forest Hill fashion; thence to market, buy what I neede, come home, look to my maids, give forth the needefulle stores, then to my needle, my books, or perchance to my lute, which I woulde faine play better. From twelve to one is the boys' hour of pastime; and it may generallie be sayd, my husband's and mine too. He draws aside the green curtain,—for we sit mostly in a large chamber shaped like the letter T, and thus divided while at our separate duties: my end is y^e pleasantest, has the sun most upon it, and hath a balcony overlooking a garden. At one, we dine; always on simple, plain dishes, but drest with neatnesse and care. Olde Mr. Milton sits at my right hand and says grace; and, though growing a little deaf, enters into alle y^e livelie discourse at table. He loves me to help him to y^e tenderest, by reason of his losse of teeth. My husband careth not to silt over the wine; and hath noe sooner finished the cheese and pippins than he reverts to the viol or organ, and not onlie sings himself, but will make me sing too, though he sayth my voice is better than my ear. Never was there such a tune-fulle spirit. He alwaies tears himself away at laste, as with a kind of violence, and returns to his books at six o' the clock. Meantime, his old father dozes, and I sew at his side.

From six to eight, we are seldom without friends, chance visitants, often scholarlike and witty, who tell us alle y^e news, and remain to partake a light supper. The boys enjoy this season as much as I doe, though with books before them, their hands over their ears, pretending to con the morrow's tasks. If the guests chance to be musicalle, the lute and viol are broughte forth, to alternate with roundelay and madrigal: the old man beating time with his feeble fingers, and now and then joining with his quavering voice. (By the way, he hath not forgotten to this hour, my imputed crime of losing that song by Harry Lawes: my husband takes my part, and sayth it will turn up some day when leaste expected, like Justinian's Paudects.) Hubert brings him his pipe and a glass of water, and then I crave his blessing and goe to bed; first, praying ferventlie for alle beneath this deare roof, and then for alle at Sheepscoote and Forest Hill.

On Sabbathis, besides the publick ordinances of devotion, which I cannot, with alle my striking, bring myself to love like y^e services to which I have beene accustomed, we have much reading, singing, and discoursing among ourselves. The maids sing, the boys sing, Hubert sings, olde Mr. Milton sings; and trulie with soe much of it, I woulde sometimes as lief have them quiete. The Sheepscoote Sundays suited me better. The sabbath exercise of the boys is to read a chapter in the Greek testament, heare my husband expounde the same; and write out a system of divinitie as he dictates to them, walking to and fro. In listening thereto, I find my pleasure and profit.

I have alsoe my owne little catechising, after a humbler sorte, in y^e kitchen, and some poore folk to relieve and console, with my husband's concurrence and encouragement. Thus, the sabbath is devoutlie and happilie passed.

My husband alsoe takes, once in a fortnight or soe, what he blythelie calls "a gaudy day," equallic to his owne content, the boys', and mine. On these occasions, it is my province to provide colde fowls or pigeon pie, which Hubert carries, with what else we neede, to the spot selected for our camp dinner. Sometimes we take boat to Richmond or Greenwich. Two young gallants, Mr. Alphrey and Mr. Miller, love to joyn our partie, and toil at the oar, or scramble up the hills, as merrilie as the boys. I must say they deal savagelie with the pigeon pie afterwards. They have as wild spiritts as our Dick and Harry, but withal a most wonderfull reverence for my husband, whom they courte to read and recite, and provoke to pleasant argument, never prolonged to wearinesse, and seasoned with frolic jest and witt. Olde Mr. Milton joyns not these parties. I leave him alwaies to Dolly's care, firste providing for him a sweetbread or some smalle relish, such as he loves. He is in bed ere we return, which is oft by moonlighte.

How soone must smiles give way to tears! Here is a letter from deare mother, taking noe note of what I write to her, and for good reason, she is soe distraught at her owne and deare father's ill condition. The rebels (I must call them such,) have soe stript and opprest them, they cannot make their house tenantable; nor have aught to feede on, had they e'en a whole roof over their heads. The neighbourhoode is too hot to holde them; olde friends cowardlie and suspitious, olde and new foes in league together. Leave Oxon they must; but where to goe? Father, despite his broken health and hatred of the foreigner, must needs depart beyond seas; at leaste within y^e six months; but how, with an emptie purse, make his way in a strange land, with a wife and seven children at his heels? Soe could mother with a "Lord have mercy upon us!" as though her house were as surelie doomed to destruction as it it helde y^e plague.

Minde eyes were yet swollen with tears, when my husband stept in. He askt, "What ails you, precious wife?" I coulde but sigh, and give him the letter. Having read y^e same, he says, "But what, my dearest? Have we not ample room here for them alle? I speak as to generalls, you must care for particulars, and stow them as you will. There are plenty of small rooms for the boys; but, if your father, being infirm, needes a ground-floor chamber, you and I will mount aloft."

I coulde but look my thankfulnessse and kiss his hand. "Nay," he added, with increasing gentlenessse, "think not I have seene your cares for my owne father without loving and blessing you. Let Mr. Powell come and see us happie; it may tend to make him soe. Let him and his abide with us, at the leaste, till the spring; his lads will studdy and play with mine, your mother will help you in your housewiferie, the two olde men will chirp together beside the Christmasse hearth; and, if I find thy weeklie bills the heavier 'twill be but to write another book, and make a better bargain for it than I did for the last. We will use hospitalitie without grudging; and, as for your owne increase of cares, I suppose 'twill be but to order two legs of mutton insteade of one!"

And soe, with a laugh, left me, most joyfulle, happy wife! to drawe sweete out of sowre, delighte out of sorrowe; and to summon mine owne kindred aboute me, and wipe away their tears, bid them eat, drink, and be merry, and shew myselfe to them, how proud, how cherished a wife!

Surelie my mother will learne to love John Milton at last? If she doth not, this will be my secret crosse, for 'tis hard to love dearelie two persons who esteeme not one another. But she will, she must, not onlie respect him for his uprightnessse and magnanimitie, coupled with what himselfe calls "an honest haughtinesse and self-esteemee," but like him for his kind and equal temper, (not "harsh and crabbed," as I have hearde her call it,) his easie flow of mirth, his manners, unaffectedlie cheerfulle; his voice, musicall; his person, beautifull; his habitt, gracefull; his hospitalitie, naturall to him; his purse, countenance, time, trouble, at his friend's service; his devotion, humble; his forgiveness, heavenlie! May it please God that my mother shall like John Milton!

THE INNS OF COURT AND CHANCERY.¹

THE inns of court and their inhabitants have ever been a fruitful and favourite theme with English writers. Poets and historians, novelists and essayists, have severally sung their praises. In the sixteenth century Spenser commemorated—

“Those brickie towers

The which on Temmes' brode aged back doe ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowers,
There whilom wont the Templar Knights to bide,
Till they decay'd thro' pride.”

Two centuries earlier, Chaucer, himself a Templar, drew a portrait of his brother students; later, Shakspeare made the Temple gardens the scene where the rival factions of York and Lancaster first assumed their respective badges of the white and red rose. Ben Jonson wrote, and Beaumont and Shirley inscribed verses to their honour; while, in our own day, Charles Lamb pronounced the Temple “the most elegant spot in the Metropolis,” and never lost an opportunity to testify his affection for the gardens of Gray's Inn and the cloisters of the Temple. In short, hardly a British author of repute can be cited, from Chaucer to Scott, or rather down to Dickens and Leigh Hunt, who has not spoken kindly and enthusiastically of the quiet groves and monastic buildings of the four inns of court.

“All these inns of court and chancery,” says Lord Coke, “do make the most famous university for the profession of the law only, or of any human science, that is in the world, and advanceth itself before all others quantum inter viburna cupressus.”

A still earlier authority, Sir John Fortescue, writes, “And to speak uprightly, there is in these greater inns, yea, and in the lesser too, besides the study of the law, as it were an university or school of all commendable quality. But after what manner and sort,” he continues, (Sir John, be it remembered, is addressing a royal pupil,—the unfortunate Henry VI.) “the laws are learned in these inns, thereof here to make rehearsal it is not needful, forasmuch as it is not for your estate, most noble prince, to put the same in use; yet know ye this, that it is pleasant and delectable, and in any wise expedient for the learning of the law, and worthy with all affection to be embraced. But one thing there is that I would have you know,—that neither at Orleans, where as well the canon as the civil laws are taught, and whither out of many countries scholars do repair, nor at Angers, or at Cane, nor any university of France, (Paris only excepted,) are found so many students past childhood, as in this place of studies, notwithstanding that all the students there are English born.”

Under the Lancastrian and Tudor princes, the inns of court formed one of the first legal universities in the world; at present they are only entitled by courtesy to be denominated “schools of law.” There is, however, every reason to believe that they will gradually re-assume their ancient character; the recent establishment of lectureships at the Inner and Middle Temple, and most meetings and examinations at Gray's Inn, are evidences of the existence of such an intention.

Of all the inns of court, the two societies of the Temple, both from position and association, have long held the first place in public estimation; not that the other two inns would admit, or the Inner or Middle Temple assert, any superiority over Lincoln's or Gray's Inn. Beaumont, who knew well the jealous feeling with which the several societies viewed any one of the societies claiming precedence over the other, in dedicating a masque to two of the four inns of court, hit upon the ingenious expedient of inscribing it “to the anciently allied houses of Gray's Inn and the Inner Temple, the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn,” and thereby avoided the heinous offence of preferring one society above the other, even in a play bill. Shirley, too, equally conscious of the delicate ground he was on, dedicated his “Triumphs of Peace” to the “four equal and honourable societies of the inns of court.” Nevertheless, though the Temple may not be able to show a scutcheon bearing more honourable names than the other two houses, or can justly claim a superior antiquity, “the halls, courts, gardens, and terraces of the Temple, that maintain, in the heart of a great city, in the nineteenth century, so much of the grace, romance, and picturesque decorum of our past manners,” as Disraeli has happily said, will ever impart a greater interest to the Temple than to the other inns. Great names still hold their sway, gainsay it who may, and the successors, legitimate or not, of the ancient Knights Templars, reap the advantage of their heritage.

Formerly, the inns of court were only accessible to sons of the nobility and men of rank; the inns of chancery being the hospicia or hostels, where the sons of merchants and traders studied: Fearné writes, “Nobleness of blood, joined with virtue, counteth the person as most meet to the enterprising of any public service, and for that cause it was not for nought that our ancient governors in this land did, with a special foresight and wisdom, provide that none should be admitted into houses of court, being seminaries sending forth men apt to the government of justice, except he were a gentleman of blood; and that this may seem a truth, I myself have seen a calendar of all those which were together in the society of one of the same houses about the last year of King Henry V., with the arms of their house and family marshalled by their names; and I assure you the selfsame monument doth approve them all to be gentlemen of perfect descents.” Our modern governors have learned to think less proudly and more wisely, and the humblest equally with the highest member of society may become a student of either of the four inns.

Tradition assigns the reign of Edward III. as the period when the lawyers first settled in the Temple.

The order of the Knights Templars was suppressed in Edward the Second's time. That king bestowed the possessions of the Knights upon Thomas Earl of Lancaster; he afterwards, on Lancaster's rebellion, gave them to the Earl of Pembroke, and on Pembroke's death they fell to the lot of the younger Despencer. After Despencer's attainder, the Temple and its dependencies were, in obedience to a decree of the Council of Vienna, transferred to the Knights Hospitallers of St. John, who in their turn demised the same to their present tenants for the yearly rent of 10*l*. So long as the order of the Knights of St. John remained in existence, the lawyers remained their tenants; but, upon its dissolution in Henry the Eighth's reign, the two societies of the Inner and Middle Temple became tenants of the crown. King James I. at the request of the two societies, who felt naturally anxious that their domiciles should not become the property of any of the hungry Scotchmen who had followed their countryman to England, (one of whom had already had the modesty to demand a grant of the Temple,) granted the "hospicia et capitania messuagia cognita per nomen de le Inner Temple et le Middle Temple, sive uni Templi," London, to Sir Julius Caesar, and the treasurer and teachers of the two houses and their successors for ever, for lodging, reception, and education of the professors and students of the laws of this realm, in consideration of a yearly rent of 10*l*. paid by each society to himself, and his royal successors.

The lawyers' university flourished from the first. The four houses were in full vigour so early as Henry the Fifth's time. The town and gown contests which have been immortalized by Scott, seem to have commenced immediately on the advent of the new inhabitants of the Temple. Perhaps it was some recollection of the haughty tone the younger students displayed towards the shopkeepers and their apprentices, that prompted one of Cade's followers to propose to "kill all the lawyers," whilst the mighty demagogue himself bade his friends, "Now, go some and pull down the Savoy; others to the inns of court; down with them all."

Chaucer, during his residence in the Temple, where his acquaintance with Gower began, appears to have shared in the pugnaciousness of his brother Templars, inasmuch as it was on record in Elizabeth's time that "Geoffrey Chaucer was fined two shillings for beating a Franciscan friar in Fleet Street."

In the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, it was as much a matter of course for the younger members of the nobility and gentry, to spend a portion of their time at one of the inns of court, as it is now thought indispensable to pass three or four terms at Oxford or Cambridge. The young Templar was then in London as noisy a being as the student of the Sorbonne at Paris. In the nineteenth century the inns of court would be considered the last place in the world where a youth would run wild; his wild oats have been sown at Oxford or Cambridge; in the sixteenth and seventeenth, it was otherwise. The Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn, were then the safety-valves where the high spirits of youth were thrown off; Oxford and Cambridge at that period partaking more of the character of preparatory schools, the youthful Oxonian and Cantab being then subjected to the discipline of the ferule; the undergraduates of the twin universities were principally boys of fifteen or sixteen. The inns of court, situated only a reasonable distance from the court, adjacent to the residences of the nobility, the young noble's first introduction to life was as a student of the lawyers' university. All the better entertainments of the town were especially devised for the pleasure of the Temple students. For whom were the masques, then in their perfection, composed, if not for the delectation of the young gentlemen of the inns of court? Who were the real patrons of the theatre, and to whom did the play-writers inscribe their comedies? Where were the Christmas revels most religiously kept, and where were the town gallants to be found? The Sir Walter Raleighs, Cecils, and Leicesters, all came from the inns of court. In the days of the Pitts and Walpoles, the minister looked to Oxford and Cambridge, to supply the state with efficient servants; in Elizabeth's time such material was furnished by the "estate of Templaria." The rise of Sir Christopher Hatton, which appears to us a matter of surprise, was then a mere matter of course. The queen was aware that the young men performing in the masque before her were all men of birth or mark; their reputations for ability were well known; no censure, therefore, attached to her for preferring to her service a man who added the graces of person to those of intellect. Hatton's legal judgments were none the worse from his having in the hey-day of youth assisted in the composition of "Tancred and Gismunda," and in the performance of sundry other plays and masques.

"Tancred and Gismunda" reminds us, that the earliest English tragedy extant, "Ferrex and Porrex," was the work of two barristers of the Inner Temple, and was represented before bonnie Queen Bess by the gentlemen of that Society. Perhaps the most elegant of the masques of Elizabeth's day was "The Inner Temple Masque," written by William Browne, a Templar. The story of Ulysses and the Syrens furnished its subject matter. Mr. Pearce has wisely extracted the opening song, and, for the benefit of those of our readers who may not see his book, we follow his example:—

"Steer, brother, steer, your winged pines,
 All beaten mariners,
 Here lie Love's undiscovered mines,
 A prey to passengers:
 Perfumes far sweeter than the best
 Which make the Phoenix wine and nest
 Fear not your ships,
 Nor any to oppose you, save our lips,
 But come on shore,
 Where no joy dies till Love hath gotten more:
 For swelling waves, our panting hearts,
 Where never storms arise,

Exchange and be awhile our guests,
 For stars gaze on our eyes.
 The compass, Love shall hourly sing,
 And as he goes about the ring,
 We will not miss
 To tell each point he nameth with a kiss."

This is very charming poetry, and worthy of the bosom friend of Drayton and the companion of Beaumont. The dedication of this masque is so excellent, and withal so modest, that we insert it:—"To the Honourable Society of the Inner Temple—Gentlemen, I give you but your own: if you refuse to foster it, I know not who will. By your means it may live. If it degenerate in kind from those other the Society hath produced, blame yourselves for not seeking a happier man. I know it is not without faults, yet such as your lore, or at least poetical license, (the common salve,) will make tolerable. What is good in it, that is yours; what is bad, mine; what indifferent, both; and that will suffice, since it was done to please ourselves in private by him that is always yours, W. Browne." The Temple had no reason to be ashamed of the bantling committed to its protection: it has lived to do honour to its foster father.

Beaumont and Fletcher's masque of "The Inner Temple and Gray's Inn; Gray's Inn and the Inner Temple," is generally known. Its principal author, Francis Beaumont, the son of a judge, and himself bred to the law, did not forget, when he left that calling for the "idle trade" of play-writing, his old companions of the Temple. Beaumont was early in life bitten with the cacoethes scribendi; at fifteen, he published a metrical translation of Ovid's fable of "Salmacis and Hermaphroditus;" and before he was twenty had addressed his celebrated "Letter to Ben Jonson," whose friendship he had acquired. Beaumont appears to have been of a most affectionate disposition. All his contemporaries speak kindly of him; and when we remember the bitter spirit which was manifested by some of the wits of that day towards Ben Jonson and Shakspeare, this is no slight praise. Most of our readers will recall Ben Jonson's lines to his youthful friend:—

"How I do love thee, Beaumont, and thy muse,
 That unto me doth such religion use!
 How I do fear myself, that am not worth
 The least indulgent thought thy pen drops forth!
 At once thou mak'st me happy, and unmak'st,
 And giving largely to me, more than tak'st:—
 What fate is mine, that so itself bereaves?
 What art is thine, that so thy friend deceives?
 When even there, where most thou praisest me
 For writing better, I must envy thee!"

Dryden tells us that Ben Jonson was accustomed to submit all his plots to this young poet,—no trifling mark of confidence. Michael Drayton's apostrophe to Francis Beaumont, his elder brother John, (the author of "Bosworth Field,") and his brother Templar, Browne, is further evidence, were further evidence wanting, of the affectionate regard in which our Temple poet was held by his brother wits and dramatists:—

"Then the two Beaumonts and my Browne arose,
 My dear companions whom I freely chose,

My bosom friends, and in their several ways
 Rightly-born poets; and in these last days
 Men of much note, and no less nobler parts,
 Such as have freely told to me their hearts,
 As I have mine to them."

Beaumont died at nine-and-twenty. What he might have done had he lived, it is impossible to say; but when we remember that Shakspeare's, Scott's, and Milton's most glorious works were written late in life,—that their more finished writings were the productions of their maturer years,—it may reasonably be conjectured, judging from the magnificent legacies he left, that by his premature death England lost works immeasurably beyond any of the Elizabethan writers, Shakspeare alone excepted. Beaumont, unlike Fletcher, was of a reflective disposition; it is only necessary to look upon his noble, though somewhat melancholy image, to be assured of that; he possessed, too, greater judgment (greater industry were impossible) than his poet brother. The quaint and facetious Bishop Corbet, who was contemporary with Beaumont at Broadgate's Hall, Oxford, (now Pembroke College; a college, by the way, which has produced its fair quota of distinguished men;) and where the future divine and dramatist probably first engaged in the wit combats, so popular in those days, lived to write his friend's epitaph:—

"He that hath such acuteness, and such wit,
 As would ask ten good heads to husband it;
 He that can write so well, that no man dare
 Refuse it for the best, let him beware:—
 Beaumont is dead, by whose sole death appears Wit's a disease consumes men in few years."

Enthusiasm for the Temple poet, par excellence,—no ignoble distinction when it is recollected that Congreve, Wycherly, Rowe, Ford, Southerne, Marston, Sheridan, Cowper, and Moore, were all Templars,—has made us almost forget his masque. This time the scene was Whitehall; the occasion, the marriage of the Count Palatine and the Lady Elizabeth; a marriage which was destined to be of greater importance to these isles than could then have been foreseen. It must have been a brilliant spectacle to behold the masquers with "divers other gallant young gentlemen of both houses as their convoy," in the royal barges, attended and followed by galleys and barges innumerable, filled with noble dames and courtiers, decked out in all their bravery, sailing down the river: musical instruments, bells and cannons, announcing their approach. At Whitehall, the king, who dearly loved such shows, preferring them infinitely to the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, awaited the arrival of the gallant company. A few years later, one Floyd, a barrister of the Inner Temple, underwent an ignominious punishment for saying, "What has now become of your good man, Palgrave, and your good wife?—they had, I think, as much right to the kingdom of Bohemia as I have to the principality of Wales." Was this "one Floyd" a masquer at the nuptial feast?—or "were it," as Horatio says, "to consider too curiously to consider so?"

The most memorable of these masques was the one given in 1633 by the four inns collectively, partly to commemorate the birth of the Duke of York, but principally to testify to the king and queen the disapprobation with which the Templars viewed the violent and unjustifiable conduct of Mr. Prynne, who had dedicated his celebrated "Histriomastrix" to the benchers and students of the four inns of court, and especially of Lincoln's Inn. In the getting up of the masque, Lincoln's Inn took the initiative. Elaborate pains were taken to make it the most splendid of its kind, and the different inns appointed a committee formed of their most distinguished members. The attorney-general, Noy, and Mr. Gerling, represented Lincoln's Inn; the renowned antiquary Selden, and Sir Edward Herbert, the Inner Temple; the Queen's attorney-general, Finch, Gray's Inn; and Edward Hyde and Bulstrode Whitelocke, the historians, the Middle Temple.

This masque has found its historian in Sir Bulstrode Whitelocke, who describes it evidently con amore. We fear, however, our readers would not care to know that Mr. Darrell of Lincoln's Inn was an extraordinary proper gentleman, and was mounted on one of the king's best horses and richest saddle; and that his own (Sir Bulstrode's) habit was exceedingly rich and glorious. Nor would the fact that, "then came the first chariot of the grand masquers, which was not so large as those that went before, but most curiously framed, carved, and painted with exquisite art, and purposely for this service and occasion," inspire greater interest. "In this chariot," the knight continues, "sat the four grand masquers of Gray's Inn in their habits, doublets, trunk hose, and caps of most rich cloth of tissue, and wrought as thick with silver spangles as they could be placed; large white stockings up to their trunk hose, and rich sprigs in their caps,—themselves proper and beautiful young gentlemen."

To the curious in such matters we therefore commend Sir Bulstrode, who rivals Pepys in his admiration for fine clothes; it may, however, be satisfactory to add, that, on the arrival of the masquers at Whitehall, "the king and queen, and all their noble train, being come in, the masque began, and was incomparably performed in the dancing, speeches, music, and scenes. The dance, figures, properties, the voices, instruments, songs, airs, the word and the actions, were all of them exact, and none failed in their parts of them, and the scenes were most curious and costly. The queen did the honour to some of the masquers to dance with them herself, and to judge them as good dancers as she ever saw; and the great ladies were very free, and civil, in dancing with all the masquers as they were taken out by them." In fact, as we moderns would say, the affair went off with great éclat, no accident befalling, excepting to Mr. May of Gray's Inn, the translator of Lucan, who had the lord chamberlain's staff broken over his shoulders. However, as his majesty apologized the next day for his chamberlain's error in judgment, and presented the unlucky poet with fifty pounds, wherewith to purchase a salve for his aching back, no great harm was done.

The Temple revels were as famous as the Temple masques. They took place four times in each year, and no where, perhaps, were the feasts of Allhallow-tide, Candlemas, and Christmas, kept with greater spirit than in the halls of the astute old lawyers. Decker, who never missed an opportunity to aim a shaft at his rival Ben Jonson, says, "You shall swear not to bombast out a new play with the old lining of jests stolen from the Temple revels." The Christmas revels of 1597 were celebrated with more than ordinary splendour. This year Lord Robert Dudley, then a student of the Inner Temple (Scott's Earl of Leicester), was elected high-constable and marshal by the grandiloquent title of "Pallaphilos, Prince of Sophie, High-constable Marshal of the Knights Templars, and Patron of the honourable Order of Pegasus," and from the account Gerard Leigh has left, fooled to the top of his bent in glorious style. He had for a colleague another of Elizabeth's favourites, our old friend, Sir Christopher Hatton, who, although designated "master of the game," seems to have played in it but a secondary part. Amongst other rare things, his Highness, the Prince of Sophie, held a court in the Inner Temple Hall, and conferred the honour of knighthood upon twenty-three chosen gentlemen, and after severally arming them with the breast-plate of courage, delivering to them the targe of Pallas, girding them with the mantle of Pallas, and hanging round their necks the collar of Pallas, they were dismissed; not, however, without an exordium, which ran thus:—

"Wisdom, the guide of armed strength,
Uprise your knightlie name:
By force of prowess hunt to climb
The lofty tower of fame.
Advance your honours by your deeds,
To live for evermore
As Pallas' knightie, by Pallas' helpe, Pallas serve ye therefore."

Pallas, of course, typified the immaculate Elizabeth, her majesty never objecting to incense, either in small or large quantities.

Gray's Inn, in her majesty's time, distinguished itself by the greater number of its revelries, if the Gesta Grayorum is to be believed; in the year 1594, it determined to outdo, if possible, all former revellings. The appointment of a Master of the Revels was an important matter on these occasions, and after due deliberation, Mr. Henry Holmes, who is described as a "very proper man, and very active in dancing and revelling," was elected master, with the title of Prince of Purpoole. The prince was at once invested with absolute authority; guards, officers, and gentlemen-pensioners assigned to him; and the better to enable him to support his state, monies were raised by benevolence. Next, letters were addressed to the society of the Inner Temple, inviting the attendance of its members. On St. Thomas' Eve the prince was enthroned in the great hall of Gray's Inn, his nobles, marshals, law officers, and courtiers being in attendance. The trumpets having sounded thrice, the prince's king-at-arms stood forth and proclaimed his matter after the following fashion:—"By the sacred law of arms, and authenticated ceremonies of the same, (maugre the conceit of any malcontent,) I do pronounce my sovereign liege lord, Sir Henry, rightfully to be the high and mighty Prince of Purpoole, Archduke of Stapulia and Bernardin, Duke of the High and Nether Holborns, Marquis of St. Giles and Tottenham Court, Palatine of Bloomsbury, and Knight of the most honourable Order of the Helmet, and sovereign of the same."

The prince's reign seems to have been a glorious one. On the 3d of January, the Lord Treasurer Burghley, the Earls of Shrewsbury, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Essex, Lords Buckhurst, Windsor, Sheffield, Compton, &c., were present at the revels. The mayor and aldermen, hearing of the fame of the prince, entertained him and eighty of his suite, whilst the queen invited his highness to visit her the following Shrovetide, at Greenwich, and there perform a masque before her. Her majesty was so satisfied with the entertainment the Grayians gave her, as to offer her royal hand for the prince and his merry men to kiss. At the same time, the maiden queen declared that "Gray's Inn was a house she was much indebted to, for it did always study for some sports to present unto her." The day's entertainments closed with a species of tournament, in which the Earl of Essex and his company engaged the Earl of Cumberland and his friends, amongst whom was the Prince of Purpoole. The prince behaved so gallantly as to win the prize—a jewel set with seventeen diamonds and fourteen rubies, which was presented to him by the queen's own hand.

The revels at the Middle Temple and Lincoln's were, of course, similar in character to those held at the other inns, with the exception, that whilst at the Temple a Lord of Misrule presided, at Lincoln's Inn a King of the Cockneys, or Monarch of Christmas-day, ruled supreme. Lincoln's Inn, however, seems to have entered less heartily than the two Temples into these sports. The puritanical spirit of the times penetrated to Lincoln's Inn sooner than to the other houses. We read, that in the seventh year of King James I. a number of the outer barristers of Lincoln's Inn were put out of Commons for example's sake, for refusing to dance before the judges at Candlemas; and a threat was superadded, that the next offence would be punished by the infliction of a heavy fine. The celebrated "Histriomastrix" proceeded from the pen of a Lincoln's Inn man, and it was the dread that the opinions broached in that remarkable book, which was dedicated more especially to the benchers and students of Lincoln's Inn, should be thought to represent the sentiments of the society, that induced the inn to get up the masque Whitelocke has immortalized. Similar thoughts had extended to the other inns, but do not seem to have taken the same root. Sir Simon d'Ewes, returning from one of the revels held in the Middle Temple Hall, writes in his diary, "I began seriously to loathe it, though at the time I conceived the sport of itself to be lawful." D'Ewes' opinions, however, represented those of the great party who were so scandalized by the plays and masques then in vogue. In 1623, D'Ewes had written, "At night I came in to commons at the Temple, where there was a Lieutenant chosen, and all manner of gaming and vanity practised; as if the Church had not at all groaned under those heavy desolations which it did." The licence permitted at the Temple revels attracted the indignation of the virtuous Evelyn, who, appointed a comptroller of them, precipitately left the scene of tumultuous revelry, and buried himself in his favourite Wotton. He doubtless thought, with the Prince Hamlet, that though he was a Templar, and therefore native and to the manner born, 'twas a custom more honoured in the breach than in the observance, inasmuch as, writing in 1668, he speaks of the revel as the "remains of an old and riotous custom, having relation neither to virtue nor policy." "When the cap and gown was off, liberty reigned," says old Ben Jonson, in one of his dedications to the inns of court; and if liberty reigned somewhat obstreperously in his day, the goddess was not likely to have grown soberer in that of the merry monarch.

The glory of the Temple masques and revels departed with the Stuarts. During the reign of the phlegmatic Dutchman and the earlier Brunswicks, they gradually dwindled into insignificance. Occasionally the presence of some European sovereign, such as that of Peter the Great, in 1697, revived them for the moment. But the giant race of the Beaumonts, Jonsons, Fords, Inigo Jones', and Vandykes, that had been fostered by a Charles and an Elizabeth, had disappeared: princes now ruled, who knew not Shakspeare; masques had succumbed to cards; and the tasteful magnificence that had so scandalized a large portion of free Britons had passed away. Was the country, was morality, benefited by the change? Was the court of Queen Caroline purer than that of the unfortunate Henrietta Maria? Were the mimic shows at Whitehall, produced with all the skill and care that an Inigo Jones and a Jonson could bestow, more prejudicial to the morals of the nation than the card tables at St. James's, and the assembly rooms at Bath? It cannot be denied, that when the Stuarts made way for a new dynasty, art and literature lost the only real royal friends they ever had in England. Let those who fondly cling to the notion that religion gained by the advent of the Georges, turn to the pages of Walpole and of Pope's Lord Hervey. There they will read the daily history of a court where gross hypocrisy, irreligion, and intrigue, reigned preeminent, without one particle of grace, feeling, or elegance, to atone for its unrelieved profligacy.

The last of the revels in the inns of court took place on the 2d of February, 1733, and a dreary revel it proved. Instead of a poetical masque or play, written for the occasion by some sprightly Templar or renowned poet, and performed by the students and barristers of the inn, was presented the prose comedy of "Love for Love," written, it is true, by a Templar, but a piece which was doubtless familiar to the majority of those present. The players were from the Haymarket theatre. When the dramatic entertainment—which, consisting as it did of a lengthy five-act comedy and a two-act farce, (the famous "Devil to Pay,") was none of the shortest—had terminated, the Master of the Revels took the Lord Chancellor (Talbot) by the right hand, and he with "his left took Mr. J. Puge, who, joined to the other judges, sergents, and benchers present, danced, or rather walked, round about the coal-fire, according to the old ceremony, three times." The Chancellor and his companions were "aided in the figure of the dance by Mr. George Cooke, the prothonotary, then sixty, and all the terms of the dance, the ancient song, accompanied with music, was sung by one Toby Acton, dressed in a bar-gown." After his honour and the reverend benchers had duly gone through this exquisite performance, country dances commenced—the ladies now descending from the gallery, where they had hitherto remained, the witnesses of the saltatory feats of the barristers and benchers. The historian of this last of the revels closes his narrative with "the whole day's entertainment was generally thought to be very genteelly and liberally conducted." Vastly genteelly indeed! and with this inane exhibition terminated the famous Temple masques.

From the Inner Temple we naturally turn to its ancient ally, Gray's Inn, in compliment to whom the Gray's Inn griffin still mounts guard over the Temple garden. This inn was in existence, as a school of law, in Edward the Third's time, and takes its name from the Grays of Wilton, whose property the inn originally was. The Gray family sold the manor of Portpole (otherwise Gray's Inn) to a certain Hugh Dennys, in Henry the Eighth's time. Subsequently, the prior and monks of Sheen purchased the inn, who, in their turn, demised it to its present tenants. Upon the general dissolution of the monasteries, Henry VIII. granted the monks' estate to the society in fee-farm. If the Temple can boast of having had for members or inmates such men as Raleigh, Evelyn, Hawkins the navigator, Gower, Chaucer, Beaumont, Johnson, Goldsmith, Clarendon, Ireton, and Hampden, Gray's Inn can exhibit a list no less distinguished. Here lived the author of Hudibras, who has been thought by some to have been a member of the house. The gallant Sir Philip Sidney, that true gentleman, was a student of this school, as also were the renowned antiquaries Camden and Dugdale. Here, also, dwelt Shirley the dramatist; and here Chapman, the translator of Homer, "spoke out loud and bold." In Gray's Inn, too, lived Arthur Murphy, the playwright, whom the Society refused to admit as a student, on the ground that, as a young man, Murphy had been an actor. Lincoln's Inn, to its honour, opened its doors to the translator of Tacitus. Philip Wharton the wit, the Presbyterian general Fairfax, and Bradshaw the regicide, also studied here.

But the man that Gray's Inn more especially delights to honour is—Francis Bacon. As a lawyer and a politician, Bacon cannot compare with his contemporary, Coke, the glory of the Inner Temple. What history is more melancholy than that of Bacon the lawyer? In obsequiousness, subservency, jealousy, meanness, and ingratitude, he seems to have distanced all mankind. As a judge, a friend, and an advocate, his conduct was equally contemptible. In the first capacity, he condescended to barter for gold the justice he had sworn to administer; in the second, he assisted to procure the condemnation of the patron, the friend, to whom he owed his very existence as a public man; and, in the third, he stooped to the publication of anonymous pamphlets, to obtain a step in his profession. The character of Coke is not attractive; the virulence and coarseness with which he attacked such men as Raleigh and Essex in their hour of trial, and the abjectness which distinguished him in his own, render him sufficiently repulsive. What man does not turn with disgust from the being who could so forget himself as to taunt a fallen spirit like Raleigh's with such vile trash and foul-mouthed language as—"Thou art the most vile and execrable traitor that ever lived. Thou art an odious fellow; thy name is hateful to all the realm of England for thy pride. I will make it appear to the world that there never lived a viler viper upon the face of the earth than thou. Thou art a monster; thou hast an English face with a Spanish heart. 'Thou viper! for I thou thee, thou traitor!'" Or what amount of learning and honesty can inspire respect for a lawyer who, as attorney-general, in the midst of an argument, falls into a violent passion, and advises a brother barrister, and that barrister Francis Bacon, "if he has any tooth against him, to pluck it out; and that he (Coke) scorns to stand upon terms towards one who is less than little—less than the least?" Intemperate language, like this, produces disgust; it does not engender contempt. Contempt remains for that solicitor-general, who, in the quiet of his chamber, prepares a memoir under the title of—"Reasons why it should be exceeding much for his Majesty's service to remove the Lord Coke" (then Chief Justice of the Common Pleas) "from the place he now holdeth, to be Chief Justice of England, and the Attorney to succeed him, and the Solicitor the Attorney."

Any solicitor-general of our day who acted in this wise, would be scouted from society; but the worst feature in the transaction remains to be told. The high-spirited Essex, it will be remembered, had used all his influence, to the rebuking of the Lord Treasurer's son, to obtain for his friend Bacon the attorney-generalship, but without success. Since then, that impetuous spirit had fallen into disgrace, and the counsel for the prosecution was the individual for whom Essex had risked the prime minister's enmity—the man whom Essex, in the ardour of his generous friendship, had presented with an estate worth 2,000*l.* as some compensation for the disappointment his friend had sustained. This act of Essex was the more graceful, as, at the time of the gift, Bacon was in such pecuniary distress, that, upon one occasion, he was arrested for debt at a goldsmith's instance. With the broad acres of Twickenham to remind Bacon of the exertions the friend he had brought to the scaffold had made in his behalf, it would have been presumed, that the attorneyship had now lost its attractions. Low as Bacon had fallen, could heart of man have conceived that the greatest thinker of the age could have descended to the petty arts of memoir-writing to obtain what his own high talents and the persuasive eloquence of Essex had failed to command? Coke, with all his bigotry, all his obstinacy, all his intolerance, all his violence, if only for the intrepidity he displayed at a time when to oppose the will of an arbitrary sovereign was an act of danger, commands our esteem. On the other hand, is one action of Bacon known to us, which bespeaks a manly and feeling heart. It is his literary character, the incalculable obligations we are under to him, as a thinker and a writer, that impart a fresh charm to Gray's Inn, as the spot from whence emanated the thoughts of the greatest of modern philosophers, and in the gardens of which he walked and studied, planted and meditated. But, as a judge and an advocate, the name of Bacon might advantageously be blotted from the list of the great lawyers of Britain.

Robert Cecil, the young gentleman who answered Essex's arguments for advancing his cousin to the attorneyship with the common-place that "Francis was too young," though, at the time, (still younger than his cousin,) he was intriguing for the secretaryship of state, was a student of Gray's Inn. We learn from Pepys, what otherwise we should never have dreamt, that the wily Robert, despite all the schooling of his sagacious father, was in his hot youth not much wiser than his neighbours. Let Pepys tell the story. "A mad companion having enticed Cecil to play, in a short time he lost all his money, bedding, and books, to his companion, having never used play before. And, being afterwards among his other company, he told them how such a one had misled him, saying, he would presently have a device to be even with him. And with a long trouke he made a hole in the wall near his play-fellow's bedstead, and in a fearful voice spake thus thro' the tronke. 'O mortal man, repent! Repent of thy horrible time consumed in play, cozenage, and leudness; or else thou art damned, and cannot be saved.' Which, being spoken at mid night, when he was all alone, so amazed him, as drove him into a sweat for fear. Most penitent and heavy, the next day, in presence of the youths, he told, with trembling, what a fearful voice spoke to him at mid night, vowing never to speak again; and, calling for Mr. Cecil, asked him forgiveness on his knees, and restored him all his money, bedding, and books. So, two gamesters were reclaimed with this very device, and never played more."

Not the least remarkable of the Gray's Inn students was Bradshaw, the president of the court that tried and condemned Charles I. He was called to the degree of Sergeant-at-law during the Commonwealth.

Bradshaw, though a violent partisan, was an honest politician; and, as he opposed the tyranny of Charles, so he protested against the dictation of Cromwell. If Gray's Inn has enrolled in its list of members the names of the regicides, Bradshaw and Ireton, the same list contains, also, those of the royalist Duke of Ormond, and the kingmaker, Monk.

Gray's Inn Hall is a noble building, and dates back from the reign of Philip and Mary. The beech tables in the hall were presented to the inn by Queen Mary's successor and sister. For this and other favours bestowed by her majesty upon the Society, the benchers, barristers, and students, solemnly drink, each grand day, to the glorious, pious, and immortal memory of Queen Elizabeth. Remembering that Sir Francis Walsingham, the Cecils (father and son), the Sidneys, and the Bacons, were all members of this house, it is but right that the society should reverence the memory of the sovereign who convinced her sense of the high character of Gray's Inn, by selecting from amongst its members her chief councillors and statesmen. In our own day, Gray's Inn has had the honour of producing three of our most distinguished lawyers: Curran, Romilly, and O'Connell. A book recently published by one of Mr. O'Connell's personal friends, informs us, that the great Irish agitator was wont, in his declining years, to revert with pleasure to the time when he was an unknown Gray's Inn student.

It is now time to speak of the largest of the four inns. Lincoln's Inn is built partly on the ruins of Blackfriars' House, Holborn, and partly on the spot where, in the days of Henry III, stood the episcopal palace of Ralph Nevil, Bishop of Winchester. In Henry the Seventh's time, Richard Sampson, the then Bishop of Chichester, passed the inheritance to William and Eustace Sularde, two of the benchers of the inn, who forthwith conveyed the same to the rest of the benchers in fee, who have held it ever since.

Of the masques, revels, and other customs that were common to Lincoln's Inn as to the other houses, we have already spoken; there only remains for us to mention a few of the many great men that here commenced their study of law and jurisprudence. None of the inns is so rich in names of political renown as Lincoln's Inn. The other houses may have sent forth greater lawyers, more renowned writers, but none other can show so proud an array of statesman-like names as Pitt, Addington, Canina, Peel, Brougham, Mackintosh, Perceval, Walpole, Shaftesbury, &c. The greatest of English advocates, Erskine, and the most high-minded of Chancellors, Sir T. More, studied here. We use the word "studied" advisedly—at least, inasmuch as regards Sir Thomas More; for in that chancellor's time the student did something more than eat, or pay for, so many dinners—(Lincoln's Inn, we believe, does not require, as do the other inns, that the dinners be actually eaten)—and perform imaginary exercises. As was common with all but the apprentice nobiliores in those days, he remained some time at one of the Inns of Chancery before he was admitted at Lincoln's Inn. More, early in his career, was appointed lecturer at Furnival's Inn, a real honour at a period when the best men contended for the lectureships, and when theses were required from every student. Little could this great man have foreseen that a day would come when the Society to which he belonged should refuse to one of their own members, and moreover one of the most elegant and philosophical writers of his time, the use of Lincoln's Inn Hall as a lecture-room. Less, still, could the victim of royal tyranny have foreshadowed that two or three centuries after his death the grand objection to the delivery of the lectures in question was the fact, that the embryo lecturer had published a volume (the Vindiciæ Gallicæ) in answer to one written by the greatest political writer then living. The unanimity which prevailed amongst the benchers on the subject of Mackintosh's lectures is not the least disgraceful feature in the matter. The most remarkable was that a Tory Chancellor, a member of another house, (the Inner Temple,) should be the man destined to save the character of Lincoln's Inn. The crowd of eminent persons, Whigs and Tories, Parliament-men and Westminster-men, who flocked to these lectures, must have convinced the benchers that they had stood upon the brink of a precipice. The issue, too, must have proved satisfactory to Lord Loughborough, but for whose interference, Sir James Mackintosh's lectures had never been delivered in Lincoln's Inn Hall; the public acts of the wary Chancellor were not always such as he could look back upon with pride.

Lord Thurlow, on being asked the probability of a certain young barrister's success in his profession, recommended that the young gentleman should be allowed to run through his own fortune, then marry, and when he had spent his wife's, there might be a reasonable chance of his attaining eminence. The late Lord Abinger, one of the most successful of modern advocates and the worst of modern judges, is reported to have said, on the other hand, that he would have a property qualification for barristers as for members of parliament. What would be the effect of Sir James Scarlett's proposed measure, we do not pretend to say; we only know that it would disqualify half of the present generation of barristers. Of the wonderful effects pride and necessity have severally and collectively produced, we have numberless instances. Lord Ellenborough is one of the most memorable. The son of a Bishop, a wrangler at Cambridge, an eminently proud man, perfectly conscious of his intellectual superiority, young Law resolutely submitted to all that drudgery without which no man yet ever became a great lawyer, though many may have been known as great advocates. His letter to his college-friend, Archdeacon Coxe, the biographer of Marlborough and the Walpoles, and the historian of the House of Hapsburgh, is, in our opinion, one of the most affecting that ever was penned.

"After holding a pen most of the day in the service of my profession, I will use it a few minutes longer in that of friendship. I thank you, my dearest friend, for this and every proof of confidence and affection. Let us cheerfully push our way in our different lines: the path of neither of us is strewed with roses, but they will terminate in happiness and honour. I cannot, however, now and then help sighing, when I think how inglorious an apprenticeship we both of us serve to ambition, while you teach a child his rudiments, and I drudge at the pen for attorneys. But if knowledge and a respectable situation are to be purchased only on these terms, I, for my part, can readily say, Illic mercede placeat. Do not commend my industry too soon; application wears for me, at present, the charm of novelty; upon a longer acquaintance, I may grow tired of it."

He did not tire of it, for he possessed an indomitable will; and when distaste, disinclination, or weariness crept over him, as they will, at times, over the most resolute, he would write and set before his aching eyes, "Read, or starve!" three monosyllables which have effected as many miracles as even the magic word "Failure!"

Sir William Grant, like Lord Ellenborough, had to struggle against the res angusta domi, that spur to a proud and ambitious man. Before he had kept all his terms at Lincoln's Inn, he sailed for the Canadas, and while there obtained the appointment of Attorney-general; but in those days the Canadian attorneyship was productive neither of glory nor wealth. Young Grant, longing for a wider field, returned to Europe; but so little did the high position he had held in the Canadas assist him, that he went the western circuit four times without obtaining a single brief. By the way, what a glorious band at that period went the western circuit! Pitt, Jekyll, Dundas, and Grant, not to mention the lesser giants. Pitt evidently looked back with pleasure to his circuit journeyings, and, many years after he had left the bar, annually met his legal friends at Greenwich. At their meetings the Chevalier, as Grant was called by his familiars, was a constant attendant. To show the kindly feeling that characterised these Greenwich reunions, we cite that when Lord Redesdale, an Inner Temple worthy, was unable, by reason of his appointment to the Irish chancellorship, to attend, the whole party sent every year an address to him, dated from Greenwich, written by Jekyll, and signed by all present at the dinner.

The history of the Calamities of Authors has been written by one of the craft, and forms a goodly though melancholy enough tome; but we question much whether as sad a story does not remain to be told of successful and unsuccessful barristers. The author's wretchedness is chronicled, not so the advocate's; he dies and makes no sign. The one, when in the most abject condition, finds a melancholy pleasure in exposing his sores to a hard-hearted world; the other only trusts that his may escape notice. The prevailing vice of the genus author is vanity; that of the barrister, pride. We place the two professions in juxtaposition because they assimilate more than any other. There is much sympathy, though, perhaps, also some jealousy, between the authors and barristers of England, little or none between British authors and doctors of divinity and physic. Who can read in Steeven's Life of Horne Tooke, of Dunning, afterwards Lord Ashburton, Tooke, and Kenyon dining together out of term time, at an eating house near Chancery Lane, where their meal was supplied to them at the charge of 7½d. a head, without recalling Johnson's relation to Boswell of a similar scene in his own life. "Dunning and myself," Tooke was wont to add, "were generous, for we gave the girl who waited on us a penny a-piece; but Kenyon, who always knew the value of money, rewarded her with a halfpenny and sometimes with a promise." The two stories agree in the minutest details.

Again, the story of poor Fearné involuntarily suggests that of Savage. The story goes, that an attorney passing through the Temple observed, at one of the windows of the uppermost story of a set of chambers, a pale emaciated man with overhanging brows and meagre looks; in fact, just such another as Shakspeare's apothecary. Struck by the man's appearance the lawyer inquired his name, and received for answer that it was a Mr. Fearné, a hard-working, erudite, but briefless barrister. "He then is the very man I seek," cried the attorney, who forthwith ascended the rickety staircase, and laid before the astonished Fearné a case requiring great attention and research. A brilliant career now opened to Fearné. Had he been but commonly assiduous, he might quickly have realized a competency, if not a fortune; but, alas! like Savage, he was one of those mortals whom only dire necessity will induce to work. No sooner had he gained by his professional exertions sufficient to provide for his present wants than, bidding farewell to papers, solicitors, and chambers, away he started for the seaside. Here he would pass whole days in sailing; his fondness for boats and boating amounting to a passion. Careless of the future, confident in himself, it was in vain his friends remonstrated; his absences at last became so frequent that little or no account was taken of them. One day a friend received a letter; it was dated from a Provincial gaol; to this pass had poor Fearné's irregular habits brought him. His friends hastened from town, paid the debt, and effected his liberation; but the disgrace rankled in Fearné's sensitive breast, and he died soon afterwards broken-hearted.

We had intended saying a few words respecting the eminent men who have at various periods been masters of, or preachers to the four houses; but this, time will not admit of. At present it only remains for us to express the hope, that the "four equal and honourable Societies of Lincoln's Inn, the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, and Gray's Inn," in introducing into their constitution any changes which the spirit of the age seems to require, will act with care and circumspection, ever remembering that it is easier to destroy than to reconstruct. To one of them, (the Inner Temple,) we add with Charles Lamb, "so may the winged horse, your ancient badge and cognizance, still flourish; so may future Hookers and Seldens illustrate your church and chambers."

A TEMPLE STUDENT.

THE DEATH OF FRANCIA.

BY W. BRAILSFORD.

"WHEN Raffaele sent his famous St. Cecilia to Bologna, it was entrusted to the care of La Francia, who was his particular friend, to be unpacked and hung up. La Francia was old, and had for many years held a high rank in his profession; no sooner had he cast his eyes on the St. Cecilia, than, struck with despair at seeing his highest efforts so immeasurably outdone, he was seized with a deep melancholy, and died shortly after."

Diary of an Ennuyée.

As the long shadow falls
At fading eve, when some soft note recalls
The old home voices happy childhood heard,
Upon a heart that fame's high impulse stirr'd,
The presence of the beautiful appals,
And casts all old day-dreams to Lethe's brim,
As fancies vague and dim.

O weary heart of thine,
High genius! wherefore shouldst thou grieve, yet pine,
The laurel crown and votive wreath to wear?
Why falter in your path, and fear to share
One guerdon of the soul-fed art divine:
It is not thus that man's declared intent Should lapse in banishment.

What has thy spirit bow'd
In this thy winter?—what majestic cloud?
Vision!—which hides thy proud heart's dearest dream,
Which makes reality unearthly seem,
And the true efforts of thy life dost shroud.
Thus fall the flowers that bloom'd so fresh and fair,
All perishing in air.

Ah the sad verity
That overcomes men's minds, and wills to be
The shadow o'er their paths of love and life,
The slayer of the fame whose ways are strife,
Where legions run the race in company.
Oh certain light of truth, thy rays dispel Hopes erst invincible.

Thus fled the mystic faith
That is art's incense and its vital breath,
Thus died La Francia as some star outshone,
Over whose sphere a brighter light had grown,
And in the full eclipse had welcomed death,
Dimm'd by the lustre of another's sheen,
And fading all unseen.

Yet is it well to die?
To let life's purpose yield the victory
To die, and leave each passionate desire,
As some new tones half trembling on the lyre,
Or bud that folds its cup all silently
To die, and pass away like some frail flower
Or wonder for an hour.

Faint not upon your way
You who would hold o'er human hearts time's sway,
Is it not meet that those who yearn to wear
Fame's immortality, should fairly bear
The cares and turmoils of life's working day.
That thus when night proclaims her sable reign,
Their wishes prove not vain?

Droop not with craven fear,
Or falter darkly in thine high career ;
The music of that threshold thou wouldst gain,
Sounds ever free from human cares or pain,
Or voice of grief to daunt the faithful ear ;
The tones are all of love's most loving part,
And bless the trusting heart.

STORY OF A FAMILY.¹

BY S. M.

AUTHORESS OF "THE MAIDEN AUNT," &c.

CHAPTER XVIII.—THE CLOUD GATHERS.

IDA finished her history ;—tremblingly, and scarce intelligibly had she entered on the narration ; she dared not look towards her friend, but sat with averted eyes, breathing short, and waiting in a kind of terror for her answer. Madeline was silent so long that Ida, dreading she scarcely knew what, rose at last and went to her, putting her arms about her, and praying forgiveness as though she had committed some grievous offence. Then Madeline laid her pale weary face upon that kind bosom, and answered her very gently, "Did you think dearest that this would be new to me?"

"New! how, what do you mean?" rejoined Ida, astonished.

"I was prepared," replied her friend, "but I am so weak that I cannot speak of it as I ought. How should you guess what has been burning in my heart during these last few terrible days! From the moment in which I first recognised—" She stopped, and was for a moment overcome; then she resumed hurriedly, in an altered unnatural voice, "From that moment I knew what must be; I knew that the time was come, that the trial was at hand. You have seen the struggle, Ida, but I have brought my will to the altar, and the sacrifice shall be completed. No martyrdom; no, no! This poor tardy atonement may have the agony of martyrdom, but God forbid that I should claim the glory. That is reserved for such as have fought well; but the repentant traitor who is suffered to die for his sovereign has no fairer hope than that his name may be forgotten. I will act to God, not to man; yet from man comes my punishment. Oh, for a heart to forget earth and life altogether! Oh, for eyes blind to everything save the vision of the great white THRONE!"

There was so much excitement in her manner, that Ida was terrified and knew not how to answer her. In a moment she perceived this, and taking Ida's head caressingly between her hands, as if she were a little child, she said, tenderly kissing her forehead, "Don't be frightened, darling; it is hard indeed that you should have aught to do with these troubles and sins, my own timid, tender bird! I am quite calm and composed; there is no fear of the fever returning—you must make allowances for me. Even you, little as you know of the wayward disobedience which makes duty agony, must feel that it is hard for me now to do right, and I know you pity me. But it should be done at once, should it not? I must not lose time. I will go to him directly. Where is he?"

She rose as she spoke, but paused ere she moved towards the door. "Is his feeling all anger?" asked she, turning away her face.

"No; indeed I do not think so," replied Ida, eagerly; "of course he was amazed and agitated; of course he felt himself injured; but I do not think he spoke with bitterness, and he repeatedly said that no constraint should be put upon your wishes. Ah! dear Madeline, will you let me act for you? Indeed, indeed, you have not strength for this interview! Will you trust to me—will you give me leave to do what I think best?"

Madeline sat down again and buried her face in her outspread hands. "What do you want to do?" murmured she.

"I want to show him the book which you gave me," replied Ida, kneeling beside her and again winding her arms round her waist; "I want him to understand the past, to know you as you are. It is due to him; he has a right to demand it; he can do justice neither to you nor to himself now. And how could you show yourself to him, either in a letter or in conversation? You could not, you know you could not; pride, shame, grief, everything would be against you. He would still see you disguised, masked, an involuntary counterfeit of what you are not. You would fulfil the letter of your duty only to violate its spirit."

Madeline rose impatiently. "Never!" cried she, "never! you ask what is impossible. I cannot do it; no woman could. What! appeal to his pity, lay bare the shrinking wounds of my heart; beg as an alms what he withheld as a gift. At this moment he believes me as indifferent to him as—as he was to me, and I would sooner slay myself than suffer him to think otherwise. Nay, if I believed that I were capable of betraying myself by a glance or a gesture, I would hide myself in the depths of the earth sooner than encounter him. I am still a woman, though a most erring one, and the last poor lingering virtue of shame is still left me. Oh, Ida!"

All Ida's courage and self-possession seemed to have returned. She fixed her clear, deep, loving eyes upon Madeline's face, all glowing as it was with unsubdued passion and bitterness of soul, and asked earnestly and timidly, "What is it that you mean to do then?"

"I mean," replied her friend, vehemently, "to do right, much as it costs me. I mean to submit myself to—to—his will; to confess that I have done grievous wrong, to give up the disposal of my future life into his hands."

"And if," said Ida, still in the same soft, deprecating, peaceful tones, "if he asks you, as he surely will, what it was that led you to leave him, how will you answer the question?"

"I shall say," answered Madeline, hastily, "that it was a fit of passion; a character so undisciplined and self-willed as mine then was is capable of everything."

"Will that answer be true?" inquired Ida.

"True! yes, was it not an act dictated by the wildest passion?"

"Will it be THE TRUTH?" reiterated Ida, her voice faltering with earnestness. There was a long silence which was at last broken by Madeline, who, dropping upon a chair, gave way to a sudden outburst of unconquerable tears. Her powers seemed to be mastered in a moment by the agony which had so long vainly struggled against them, and she wept and sobbed like a child. Poor Ida dared not speak, but weeping too, she repeatedly kissed her friend's hands; that silent expression of mere love was the only consolation she could offer. She listened eagerly for the first words, and at length they came abrupt, resolute, inexorable.

"It is useless—I CANNOT do it!"

And Ida ceased to urge the impossible; not that she ceased to think it right, but she felt that she had gone as far as she could—as she ought. With undiminished tenderness she soothed the agitated Madeline, and again offered to go to Mr. Tyrrell, to speak for her, to do anything, everything she might, to spare or to serve her.

"Tell him that I am ready to see him—now—directly, if he so pleases."

"Dearest Madeline, are you fit? have you strength?"

"I am as strong as I shall ever be," replied Madeline, sharply, almost peevishly, "nothing can hurt me so much as delay or remonstrance."

Ida was at the door in an instant; she would have paused to express her fear of having given unnecessary pain, to ask forgiveness; but she felt that it was not a time to think of herself, or to expect Madeline to think of her, so she was withdrawing quietly and quickly when her friend's voice checked her in an accent whose very feebleness made it the more impressive, "Ida!—stop—you are to do what you think right. Leave me—quick—and say nothing!"

The injunction could not be disobeyed, for there was a pale and awful anguish in the face of her who gave it which it would have been profaneness to contemplate. Once again, however, she recalled the departing Ida, hurrying after her with a momentary strength, the result of vehement agitation, and saying, rapidly, "Tell him that I place myself entirely in his hands, and only supplicate that he does not ask to see me!" She turned and flung herself on her knees, almost on her face, prostrate upon the floor, while Ida, merely bowing her head, in token that she understood and would fulfil the request, went from her even as she had come to her—trembling, tearful, and speechless. She hurried in search of Mr. Tyrrell, feeling as though half an hour's unnecessary delay would be guilt. She found him awaiting her in the vestibule with a countenance from which he vainly sought to banish the signs of anxiety and emotion. Silently she placed the volume in his hands; he looked wonderingly and inquiringly at her.

"I was to give you this," faltered she, "and to say —that—that she will submit to your determination in everything, but that she earnestly beseeches you—" Ida hesitated.

"What?" exclaimed he quickly.

"Not to insist upon seeing her," added Ida, in a low, abashed voice.

"A true woman's submission," observed Mr. Tyrrell, bitterly. "She will do whatever I demand, and then she restricts my demands to whatever she pleases. I understand perfectly."

"Indeed, you do not understand!" cried Ida. "You never have understood, and I believe you never will understand her. You have thrown away a treasure of true affection, and you would not even stoop to pick it up when it lay at your feet. Wrong as she may have been in the past, if her husband had understood her, if he had loved her, if his thoughts had not been exclusively centred and entirely occupied in himself, she might have been now a happy, honoured wife. The ruin of a heart, the wreck of a life is your work; at least the guilt is half yours. The wrong which you did her in making her believe that she was beloved, though less palpable and less definite, perhaps less capable of being sentenced, less sure to be avenged, was full as deep and far more irreparable than that which she afterwards did you."

She paused, breathless, and, as soon as she paused, felt ashamed of her impetuosity, and afraid of its result. There is no truer nor more universal law of woman's nature than that which gives fire to the gentlest, and boldness to the most timid, in the cause, not of herself, but of her affections; but it is a fire whereat the very hand which kindles it, trembles in sudden amazement.

"I beg your pardon," said Ida, humbly.

Mr. Tyrrell did not do as he ought; very few men do in difficult circumstances. He did not take Ida by the hand, and say warmly, "For what? for speaking the truth to me?" It was, perhaps, quite as much as could be expected of him that he felt something like this in his heart, and that he demonstrated it outwardly by smiling kindly at her, as if he quite forgave her. He looked as though the eloquent rebuke were a specimen of not unamiable childish petulance, and this manner of patronising and indulging the Truth gave some small inexplicable satisfaction to the Man in him; at least, I suppose it must have been so, because this is such a common masculine habit. The frank avowals, the stately candours, the noble self-forgettings which we meet with in books, are very seldom met with anywhere else. When they are, let us guard them jealously, for they are the jewels of life; they should be the zone of the heart in its secret retirement, for it would seem that the air of heaven, or the gaze of man may tarnish the delicacy of their brightness. There is a kind of allowable, and even necessary churlishness, so to speak, in true affection; we like to keep our friends not only for, but to ourselves. But to return.

"And I am to read this!" said Tyrrell, musingly. He put the book in his pocket, and stood still, looking strangely and awkwardly. "Is she alone?" asked he at last.

"She wished to be left alone," replied Ida; "I shall go to her in a little while; but just now I think it is better for her—she is terribly agitated."

He was silent; then, with a courteous little bow which seemed almost grotesque, so suddenly did it introduce the formalities of daily conventionalism into the presence of those powers and passions by which conventionalism is shattered in fragments—he left her. Ida sought her own room, and sat down to think—not of Madeline, but of herself.

So rapidly had events crowded upon each other that not till now had she leisure of thought for reviewing her last strange and painful conversation with Godfrey. It was there in her mind as a thing suppressed, shut up, not to be looked at for the time, yet undoubtedly existing and importunately present. She had only thrust it a little below the surface, and the moment the actual pressure was withdrawn it arose, and she could not shun the encounter. She recalled his tone, his look, his gestures, and the intense reality of them all was terribly convincing. It seemed strange that they should be more impressive in memory than in actual occurrence, but so it was. She hated and despised herself for her slowness of perception; she accused herself of cruelty, of coldness, of idiocy. Alas! she was only guilty of innocence. It is wonderful how soon, the first shock being over, the mind accustoms itself to the contemplation of new and terrific forms; it is still more wonderful how soon the heart learns to veil, to disguise, to beautify them with fair excuses. Ida had received, almost unconsciously, the idea of the dark truth which lay in Godfrey's narration, and she was now far more occupied with condemning herself as pitiless than with thinking of him as criminal. Indeed she consigned the crime to some far unseen hiding-place. She took it for granted before the beginning of the history, and she began with the misery and the repentance. How intelligible was now all that wayward variableness, which had so often wounded her in him; how touching an aspect did the close union between the brothers now assume! It was the seal of a perpetual pardon, ever besought, never withheld. She went through, in fancy, the life of both; identifying herself with the struggles, the pangs, the keen and silent sufferings of Godfrey, with that vivid force so natural to an imaginative heart when the subject under contemplation is a friend, too proud, too shy, or too self-governed to ask for sympathy. The undemanded, often unsuspected tenderness which we lavish upon the woes of such an one, is, by some strange yet precious perverseness of our nature, a thousand-fold more liberal, more delicate, and more vigilant than the compassion which is charmed from us by tears or wrung from us by entreaties. We create anew for ourselves each trial that he has undergone, and assert a partnership in all; and with an involuntary reserve, different from his own and yet the counterpart of it, we delight in thinking that we feel far more for him than he suspects or would believe—more even than he would ever confess that he has felt for himself. In love, yet more than in charity, it is more blessed to give than to receive.

Ida was growing rapidly familiar with the face of evil; sin and sorrow had started up before her, yet did the last so shelter and embrace the first that condemnation was lost in pity. The puritan spirit which brands the offences of others is as different from the Christian spirit which watches tremulously for its own, as darkness is from light. Innocence, like Him from whom she comes, is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; it is hers not only to suffer long and be kind, but to be strong and patient in belief, prodigal and inexhaustible in hope. Ida's heart said no hard words to her either of Madeline or of Godfrey. She was, however, still too young, too unused to the business of life, to be able thoroughly to realize to herself what had happened. It seemed to her a mournful and pathetic vision, which brightened as she gazed upon it. She thought how dear she must be to Godfrey, since he had chosen her as the depository of his secret, and then she wept bitter tears of self-reproach in remembering that she had given him pain instead of consolation. But if it was in her power to wound, it must be in her power also to heal, and this poor logic comforted her greatly. Only she felt impatient to apply the balm at once; to let Godfrey know, without an instant's delay, that he had mistaken mere surprise and unconsciousness for horror, and that she was still the sister whom he had chosen for himself. Her heart beat quick, she felt feverish and confused; it was the natural result of the agitations of the day, yet she was almost afraid of meeting Godfrey till she should have become a little more composed. Twice she rose, moved to the door, and twice returned to her seat, spreading her hands over her lovely, troubled face, and striving by a strong effort of will and an earnest self-commendation to God to subdue the tumult within. Then she began once more to build for the future; a happy family-picture grew up before her eyes, a group of many well-known and well-loved figures. Hand-in-hand with Godfrey she sat at the feet of her father, whose presence was as the presence of an angel, sanctioning and consecrating their affection; kind, gentle aunt Ellinor looked tenderly upon them, and dear uncle John peeped smiling from behind a screen. Some one else, too, was looking at them; some one who said, in low and thankful voice, "Oh! how can I ever use these restored eyes, except in looking at faces so beautiful and so beloved?" A fairy's wand had done it—the fairy of youthful, hopeful fancy. Those visions of earthly happiness are very puzzling; so pure, so perfect are they, and yet so different from all we dare conceive of the happiness of heaven. It seems strange that, in the greater number of human hearts, there should be faculties which find no occupation, cravings which obtain no answer, conceptions to which there is no responding reality throughout Eternity. True, they will be all absorbed in the loftier capacities of risen and purified humanity; yet does it seem mysterious that they should have been, so to speak, created only to cease.

More than an hour glided away unperceived, and by degrees she began to feel the necessity of exchanging her dreams for action. She could not yet quite resolve to encounter Godfrey, so she went in search of Frederick, to whom she always felt that she could speak with far less restraint. She found him in the library alone; a rare, but just now a most fortunate occurrence. She felt embarrassed—she did not know how to begin the subject, nor how far she could let him know what had happened, without giving him pain; she had a kind of persuasion that he knew of Godfrey's intended confession, yet she could not feel sure of this, and so she hesitated, and doubted whether to speak of it or not. She sat down by his side, put her hand into his, and asked him, with forced playfulness, of what he was thinking?

"Of you, dear Ida," was his immediate reply, but the words were uttered in a tone so full of melancholy that she directly felt sure he knew all, and was secretly reproaching her.

"Oh, Frederick!" she replied, her eyes overflowing with tears, "do not be angry with me! I did not mean the least unkindness. I was so astonished, so pained, so shocked that I really did not understand—and so I—I—I do so want to be friends with Godfrey! Do tell me where I can find him."

"With Godfrey!" answered Frederick. "I have not seen him since the morning. I was not thinking of him."

"But I am thinking of him," rejoined Ida, quickly.

"It would make him very happy to hear that. But, dear Ida, let us forget him for a few moments. I have been wanting to speak to you about—were you listening to me?"

"Yes, dear Frederick, I will listen," cried she, summoning up her attention, which, to say the truth, was not a little inclined to wander. "Only, Godfrey—"

"Nay," interposed he, "it is a very grave matter of which I have to speak. Dearest Ida, you have known but little sorrow, and if I could fix the course of your future life, it should all run through pleasant pastures and under sunshiny skies; but God knows what is good for you better than I do. And in His eyes it has seemed good that you should taste affliction. Nay, do not look so terrified," (pressing her hand earnestly between his own,) "no irrevocable blow has been struck—no irreparable misfortune has befallen you—there is still hope."

"Papa!" said Ida, trembling violently. She could articulate no more.

"I have a note for you from him," replied Frederick, speaking very gently and deliberately. "He gave it to Mr. Tyrrell who was charged to communicate it in the first instance to Mrs. Chester, and afterwards, if necessary, to you. It is now necessary, and the task has fallen upon me. God knows, Ida, every tear you shed, seems wrung from my own heart. What shall I say to comfort you?"

She took the letter from his hand without speaking, and read, compelling herself to do so, as it were, by main force, the following words:—

"MY DARLING IDA,—When I parted from you I would not pain you by telling you what I then well knew myself, namely, that I was affected by a disorder which is—I must not conceal it—of dangerous, though not of hopeless character. I wished to save my precious child the anxiety of these months of separation, but there is a point after which concealment becomes unkindness and distrust; and that point is now reached. I have confidence in your courage; I have faith that God will support you. I am myself quite calm, and I feel sure that you will aid me in maintaining my calmness; I know you are capable of such an effort. Come to me, then, my darling; I owe you this confidence. Come to me, remembering those who out of weakness were made strong, remembering also whose strength it was that was perfected in their weakness. It is vouchsafed to us also to suffer somewhat for our Lord. Come, and I shall at least have the happiness of watching and wiping away such tears as you cannot help shedding. Mr. Tyrrell will tell you all particulars, for I am not allowed to write at great length. God bless you.

Your affectionate father,

PERCY LEE.

Let us pass over in silence the hour which followed the reading of this letter. At its close Ida was ready and the carriage was at the door. As she issued from her room, her face pale and haggard, her eyes full of that desolation which knows not the softness of tears, little Arthur ran to meet her, buoyant and uproarious in his childish glee. "I am going to see poor sick Mrs. Chester," cried he; "papa sent me, and he says I am to be very gentle to her." Ida passed on without heeding him, or even understanding the import of his words. Unused to aught but tenderness from her, the little fellow stood still, wondering and displeased; but, speedily forgetting his wrath in eagerness to visit his new acquaintance, he betook himself to the door of Mrs. Chester's bedroom.

On the stairs poor awkward Agnes joined her. "Ida," said she, in a thick, broken voice, "I am going with you. Pray let me; aunt Ellinor cannot leave Frederick, and Mrs. Chester is ill, and you must have a woman with you. I am quite ready; I will give you no trouble, and I will try to be a comfort to you if I can."

A silent pressure of the hand was the only reply, and the two cousins entered the carriage together. Ida did not notice that Alexander took his seat upon the box; she was almost unconscious of uncle John's hearty embrace and faltered blessing as she ascended the steps; she had not remembered to take leave of Madeline; she had even forgotten Godfrey.

She did not know, for it had been thought better not to reveal it to her as yet, the immediate cause of the summons she had received. It was necessary that Mr. Lee should undergo a very difficult and dangerous operation, which might possibly restore him to health, but which, if it failed, would greatly accelerate the termination of his sufferings. He felt that it would, indeed, be a needless and irreparable cruelty disguising itself in the shape of kindness, which, under such circumstances, and at such a time, should seek to separate his child from him. Yet, while he was determined not to allow her presence during the trial, he wished also if possible to keep the knowledge of it from her till it was over, only securing that he should at least see her once more, and that she should be present to close his eyes.

THE INFLUENCE OF BRITISH CITIES ON BRITISH CIVILIZATION.

It is a strange spectacle, and one which instantly suggests its moral,—an old town, the seat, perhaps centuries ago, of some flourishing manufacture which has since been superseded by the progress of modern discovery. The physical decay, the cessation of traffic, the solitude and ruinous desolation make a forcible impression on the most unreflecting mind. But it is very possible to pass through the streets, still crowded with passengers, of many towns in busy England of the nineteenth century, from which their former glory has passed away as completely, though the decay is not visible save to the mind's eye. They were once the capitals of civilization, the renowned seats of letters and of learning; but the civilization, the letters, and the learning have since removed to other quarters, and the places remain, with all their life, the tombs of their former reputation, and serve only to point a moral or adorn an essay.

Oxford and Cambridge, for instance, were once the seats of all the learning, and of all the thought and intellect also, which then resided in the country. In virtue of the authority of Aristotle, the great dictator of the intellectual world, they exercised an absolute dominion over the minds and consciences of all men. On their dogmas kingdoms were ruled, and institutions founded; according to their teaching men thought and acted, prayed and preached, lived and died. We have their works still among us, huge folios and quartos, mighty monuments of commanding intellect and of unwearied research, piled away on the shelves of our libraries and covered with the dust of ages. We have no wish to say aught to their disparagement; we thankfully acknowledge the great debt which we and all mankind owe to these old schoolmen and divines, and we regard with unfeigned admiration the noble institutions where they were reared, the altars, so to speak, where they kindled the torches with which they lighted their fellow-men through those dark ages.

The fertilizing waters of piety and learning, of which the universities were the reservoirs, were carried over the whole country by means of the cathedral-towns, which may be regarded as so many colonies. Instead of tutors and fellows there were bishops and rectors, archdeacons and deans, who occupied and diverted themselves with literature or scandal, with politics or cards. We think it cannot be denied that the presence of a resident clergy exercised a most humanizing influence over the spirit of our English society. A certain cheerful light of piety and intelligence was shed abroad over the whole land. The piety, indeed, was not very fervid; it was not the feeling which recruits "the noble army of martyrs," and on which we look with reverence and awe. Nor was the intellect of the highest order; of that order which produced a Novum Organum, or a Paradise Lost; the works, which issued forth to the world from the parsonages and vicarages and rectories of England, were, with few exceptions, not so much monuments of rare genius, or talent, or learning, as the literary relaxations of accomplished and amiable men. And as such they were every way respectable, nor can it be doubted that the personal influence of their authors and of the class to which they belonged, contributed much to cherish that decorous and domestic spirit which leads to English society one of its greatest charms.

But in this calm, however attractive to the imaginative and the lovers of peace, there was an admixture of evil. There was danger of a perpetual stagnation of intellect. A change was required—and was effected. The other learned professions revolted against the authority which had so long borne undisputed sway. The acute reasoning, the practical sense, and the mental versatility of the lawyer—the cautious and sceptical observation and induction of the physician—began to be prized in books. And then the places where these professions chiefly flourished rose into importance. A city, for example, the number of whose doctors and lawyers has passed into a proverb, began towards the end of the last century, and has since continued, up to quite our own day, to take so prominent a part in letters and philosophy as to have earned for itself the appellation of the modern Athens. The spirit of the literature thus produced does not, at first, present so venerable or attractive an appearance as that of the universities or cathedral towns. There is something very repugnant to the best feelings of our nature in the flippant contempt with which a Scotch philosopher or reviewer treats all that the greatest and best of those who lived before him have agreed in considering to be great and good. Nor will posterity, perhaps, think that his own speculations, however distinguished by acuteness and good sense, are equally remarkable for their profundity. Still the change was beneficial. A more independent tone of thinking and writing was attained. An infusion of fresh blood was made into the national mind.

It was a distinguished member of this school who is the highest authority in the science of political economy. But the doctrines of the wealth of nations have not been received with implicit assent in the places where the wealth of this nation is chiefly acquired. Manchester has rebelled against Smith, as Edinburgh rebelled against Aristotle. The grinding poverty and misery with which the inhabitants of our large manufacturing towns become but too familiar, force upon their minds speculations of a more daring character than those entertained by men who have leisure and means to be philosophical. They acquire the courage of despair. Hence the prevalence among them of socialism and other thorough-going systems. In the literature which they produce the same characteristics are visible, the same earnestness and daring; a mode of reasoning quite independent of the laws of logic, and an eloquence not learned in the schools. No complete works, no fine-wrought essays do they produce, but short hasty productions, rude and inelegant if you will, but valuable as the genuine expression of the ideas that lie fermenting in those heated minds. We do not think that the ideas should be too hastily condemned or despised. The systems of these rude philosophers, their theories of government, or rent, or population, may very probably never gain general acceptance, they may not deserve to do so; but depend upon it, they contain some grains of truth, which it will be for coming time to winnow and separate from the chaff with which they are mixed. In them will probably be found practical suggestions of perhaps no small value on the better division of wealth, and the better remuneration of labour adapted to our state of society.

Why, it may be asked, have you delayed so long to speak of the influence of London? Does not the metropolis of all the world deserve to take precedence of Oxford, or Edinburgh, or Manchester? But in truth the great city is almost the last place where we may expect a great social movement to originate. Its inhabitants might at first be supposed to rival in mental sluggishness those of ancient Boeotia. The truth is, all classes are there so equally balanced that no one can gain a very great ascendancy. There are there divines, and lawyers, and physicians, rich merchants, poor mechanics,—but you cannot say of any class that it altogether predominates, or gives the tone to the spirit of the place. "I have often amused myself," says the biographer of Johnson, in one of the best passages of his work, "with thinking how different a place London is to different people. They whose narrow minds are contracted to the consideration of some one particular pursuit, view it only through that medium. A politician thinks of it merely as the seat of government in its different departments; a grazier as a vast market for cattle; a mercantile man as a place where a prodigious deal of business is done upon 'Change; a dramatic enthusiast as the grand scene of theatrical entertainments; a man of pleasure as an assemblage of taverns, and the great emporium for ladies of easy virtue. But the intellectual man is struck with it as comprehending the whole of human life in all its variety, the contemplation of which is inexhaustible." London is, as it were, a great hall of congress, to which all other places send up their delegates to debate and to consult; a vast representative assembly, where all interests are heard and equally cared for.

The poet Wordsworth has, in a series of sonnets, traced the course of one of the rivers of his native district—the river Duddon. In like manner, though in humble prose, have we endeavoured to follow a noble river—the stream of British civilization. As it flows on, many mighty cities and fair towns spring up along its banks, to which it is the source of fame and prosperity. And as the tourist makes it his business, on coming to any town, to inquire what eminent men it has produced, so have we, though without sharing the confidence with which some philosophical historians have assigned to the various countries of the world, to Greece or Rome, to France, England, or Germany, the part it had played or was to play in the history of civilization, ventured to conjecture what influence some of these towns had exercised in bringing us to our present state of society. We made it our business to inquire what particular form of civilization each had given birth to. We have endeavoured to do justice to all in their turn. We paid homage to the old divinity with its vast learning, its profound thought, and its subtle reasoning. We conceded ready praise to the elegant studies and ingenious speculations with which the inhabitants of our cathedral towns have been accustomed to employ their lettered ease. We admired the value of the accessions which the members of the more temporal professions,—men whose minds had been at once disciplined by a scholastic education and sharpened by much converse with the world,—brought to our national literature. And we have not feared to assert that truths of perhaps no small importance may be discovered in the rude philosophy which has been born into the world amid the din and clatter of innumerable spools and shuttles. One is apt at first, on finding places to which we owe a large debt of gratitude cast into the shade by some younger rival, to share the melancholy of the traveller, when he comes upon a few stores in the desert—all that remains of Babylon or Palmyra! But that is not the right way of viewing the matter. The law of nature is change, and, through change, progress. And, though the outward prosperity of a place may fail, though the halls of its colleges may no longer be thronged by eager students from all parts of the world, though its society may cease to attract strangers to its streets, yet we should remember that its former works do still remain with us, that what it did formerly achieve can never die, but shall live for ever in the grateful recollections of all mankind.

ORNITHOLOGIA POETICA.

BY H. G. ADAMS.

THE NIGHTINGALE. (Motacilla Luscinia.)

"Daylight in its last purple cloud
Was lingering grey, and soon her strain
The nightingale began; now loud,
Climbing in circles the windless sky;
Now dying in music; suddenly
Far scatter'd in a thousand notes,
And now to the hush'd ear it floats
Like field smells known in infancy;
Then, failing, soothes the ear again"

Rosalind and Helen.

NOTWITHSTANDING Coleridge's assertion that it is an "idle thought" to reflect upon the nightingale as "a melancholy bird," for "in nature there is nothing melancholy," we are disposed to agree with the great majority of the poets, and to give to the music of this sweetest of feathered warblers something of a mournful and depressing character. Certain it is, that we never listen to the song of the bird without feeling as though it were the voice of one very dear to us, whom we were never again to behold on earth; and, even while our ears are delighted with the rich music which it pours forth, our eyes are ready to overflow with tears, and our breast is thrilling with emotions which partake more of the nature of grief than of gladness; and yet there is in them a mingling of both. Like the twilight shadows which steal over the landscape when the last golden streak has disappeared from the west, they are essentially gloomy, although something of the light of day yet lingers in and about them,—memories and recollections of departed brightness, which cheer us even amid our sadness, and induce that state of feeling under the influence of which the Gadie bard exclaimed, "Pleasant is the joy of grief!" It is like the shower of spring, when it softens the branch of the oak, and the young leaf lifts its green head."

No doubt the effect produced by the song of the Nightingale upon any individual mind will depend very much upon the general temperament of that individual, and more especially upon the particular state in which his mind may be at the time when it is brought under the influence of the "dulcet jargonings" of Philomela. There are some who are "never merry when they hear sweet music," and this must be the case, we imagine, with most thoughtful and sensitive persons, such as poets, et hoc genus omnes; but to endeavour to explain why this is the case would involve us in a metaphysical disquisition, for which our readers perhaps would scarcely thank us. Plato has denied that grief can be the exciting cause of song in any feathered creature, and we are disposed to agree with him; for however much of truth there may be in the saying, with regard to poets, that—

yet do the feathered creation invariably give expression to their anguish and distress in piteous and discordant cries, and not in pleasing and harmonious strains, like that of the nightingale, which, with its fellow-warblers of the woods and fields, is no doubt excited to sing by the tenderest and most rapturous emotions that can fill and emanate the breast, either of bird or man. What then becomes of the old poetic fable of Philomela, related by Pausanias and Strabo, amplified by Ovid, and alluded to by almost every master of the lyre, from Homer downwards;—that terrible and pathetic story of a great wrong, and of a fearful retribution, which comes to us through the lapse of many centuries from the misty regions of myths and fables; which follows the nightingale wherever it goes, and makes it a bird of mournful interest, and of melancholy associations? Must we no more, with Homer, believe that—

"When Spring's approaching steps prevail,
So sweet the tawny nightingale,
Deep in leafy shades complains,
Trilling her thick-warbled strains,
And wakes for Itylus her woe,
Laid by a mother's madness low."

Nor say, with Aristophanes,—

"O come, my mate, break off thy slumbers,
And round thee fling thy plaintive numbers
In a most melodious hymn,
Warbled from thy brown throat dim;
For Itys, our beloved son,
Thine and mine, now dead and gone;
Fill the forest with thy moaning,
Till through the woodbine boughs the groaning
Of thy voice to Jove's seat climb,
And mingle with the starry chime,
Where gold tressed Phœbus soon
Shall answer in as sad a tone,
From his ivory-clasped lyre,
That leads in dance the stately quire;
And from the blest above shall flow
A peal accordant with thy woe."

Must we disregard, or entirely oppose, the prevailing sentiment, which gives a sombre tone and colour to the greater portion of what has been poetically said and written of this—

"Most musical, most melancholy bird," and say that it is all nonsense to suppose, with Lucian, that—

"Through the woods with nightly wail,
And many a tear
For Itys dear,
Laments the Attic nightingale;"

for that her song is one of love and joy, and not of despair and lamentation? Nay, the allegiance which we have sworn to the Muses forbids this, and so, in spite of the old Greek philosopher, and of all matter-of-fact, unimaginative people, and in spite, too, (but this is between ourselves, reader,) of our own convictions, we shall even, for awhile at least, forget that Philomela is other than the transformed daughter of Pandion, the Athenian king,—the beautiful and modest maiden, abused and mutilated by the husband of her sister Procne; that sister who, to revenge the foul and unnatural deed, committed a crime no less repugnant to nature, in murdering her son Itys, or Itylus, and causing his body to be cooked and served up at a feast for his father, Tereus, king of Thrace. How can her song be other than one of anguish and bitterness of heart? she who was so gentle and so affectionate, who so loved her sister that she consented to leave her father's court, the home and friends of her happy childhood, the stately palaces and polished society of Athens, for the comparatively rude and uncivilized home and subjects of the Thracian monarch, in order that she might satisfy that sister's longing desire to see and be with her? Rified on the way of that which is dearest and most honourable to a woman,—deprived, also, of her sweet silvery tongue, and immured in a lonely castle, by the inhuman monster who ought to have guarded and protected her from every insult and injury,—surely her cup of bitterness was full, even before the horrid immolation of her infant nephew by its infuriated mother, when she had become aware of poor Philomela's barbarous treatment and forlorn situation, and had effected her escape. No wonder that, changed to a bird by the pitying gods, she should constantly mourn and lament, and should preserve the memory of her woes and injuries, even through the lapse of so many long ages. No wonder she should still be, as Hood has well termed her,— the passionate complainer and mourner through the still night hours; for, as a writer in Blackwood observes, "However clearly learned twaddlers in the classical journal may have proved that the nightingale is not mute in the day-time, yet, to the whole unsophisticated world, the nightingale is a songster of the night; the only bird, says Ælian, that sleeps not; ergo, to the greater part of us it is a melancholy melodist."

(1) See Cary's admirable Translation of "The Birds."

"The sweet and plaintive Sappho of the dell,"

"One whose music wakes again
Griefs that long have slumbering lain,
And evokes sad memories
Of departed friends and pleasures,
Till we heave regretful sighs,
And count o'er our banish'd treasures."

Let us now cite a few of the poetical authorities in support of this mournful view of the case; Homer, and Aristophanes, and Lucian, have already given their evidence; Hesiod is certainly on the same side, for, although he does not allude to the ancient legend, yet it seems that he must have had it in his mind, when he pictured poor Philomela in the talons of a cruel hawk,—fit representative of the pitiless ravisher Tereus:—

"'Twas when the hawk, marauder fell,
Bore off the dappled Philomel;
On his crooked claws empaled,
Pitiously the poor bird wail'd."

In the "Sapphics" of Æschylus, the nightingale, we recollect, is made a bird of sorrow, as also in "the Agamemnon," where the following allusion occurs—(see Fox's translation):—

CHORUS.

"Thou ravest, with a divine afflatus borne away, and for thyself Weeping, thy hapless song art timing still:

Thus Aïdo, of unwearied utterance, ever mourns,
For Itys, her loved Itys, through an existence
Of woes abounding."

Sophocles in the "Ajax" speaks of

"—the plaintive nightingale
That warbles sweet her tender tale;"

and makes the grief-stricken Electra exclaim:—

"—like the nightingale,
Whose plaintive song bewails her ravish'd brood,
Here will I still lament my father's wrongs,
And teach the echo to repeat my moan;"

while in the "Trachiniæ," he tells us of Dejanira, that—

"Like the sad bird of night alone,
She makes her solitary moan;
And still, as on her widow'd bed reclined
She lies, unnumbered fears perplex her anxious mind."

We are free to confess, however, that this author's testimony is not all given on one side of the question; passages might be quoted from the "Œdipus Coloneus," which do not strictly accord with the above in the character which they assign to the bird, such for instance as that wherein Antigone says:—

"This place is sacred, by the laurel shade,
Olive and vine thick-planted, and the songs
Of nightingales sweet warbling through the grove."

And thus again in the chorus to Act I.—

"Where beneath the ivy shade,
In the dew-besprinkled glade,
Many a love-lorn nightingale
Warbles sweet her plaintive tale."

But Euripides, the sweet, the plaintive, the very nightingale of Attic tragedians,—what says he? We cannot trust ourselves to answer in his own words, but must refer our readers to the "Hecuba," the "Helena," and the "Rhesus." Then, have we not, as representative of the Bæcolic poets, the simply elegant and graceful Moschus, who, lamenting for the death of his brother idylist, Bion, bids

"The Sicilian muse begin the mournful lay!
For ne'er did dolphin in the azure main,
In such pathetic energy complain;
Nor Philomel with such melodious wo,
E'er wailed."

Even the Greek epigrammatists, satirists, and comic writers, become grave and pathetic when they allude to this bird; of the former we might cite Pamphilus, at least, as an example, and of the latter Aristophanes must suffice, whose beautiful lyric we have already quoted. Then for the Latin imitators of the masters of the Grecian lyre, have we not Ovid, who throws all his powers of imagination and pathos into the narrative of Philomela's wrongs and sufferings, and Metamorphose into a bird—

"That to the woodland's shady covert hies?"

And Virgil—but soft; we scarcely think that his Philomel, "piping beneath the poplar shade," is so very melancholy a bird. Horace, however, we may quote, when he says :—

"The luckless bird her nest doth frame,
Bewailing Itys, and the shame
Of Cærop's house, and that so ill
On king's rude lust she wrought her will."

And what say the noble bards of our own age and country,—Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton, and the rest ; do they concur in characterising the nightingale as a bird of sadness and sorrow ? Not altogether, we reply ; although some of them do so, as we shall presently show. With the first named, it is true, our client is the songster of love and ecstatic delight ; he it was who——"Heard the lusty nightingale so sing,

That her clear voice made a loud rioting, Echoing through all the greenwood wide ;"

and he addresses her thus :—

"Ah ! good, sweet nightingale ! for my heart's cheer, Hence hast thou stay'd a little while too long ;"

according to Wordsworth's rendering of the "Cuckoo, and the Nightingale ;" and, again, in the "Flower and the Leaf," as modernised by Thomas Powell, we find the father of English poetry thus describing the effect which the song of this bird had on him :—

"And then the nightingale, to answer him,
Pour'd forth a flood of merry song ; the wood
Stirr'd with the echoes of this glorious hymn ;
As one o'ercome with wonderment I stood
So long entranced, that do whate'er I could
I wist not where I was, for far and near,
Still thrill'd this heavenly music to mine ear."

With regard to Shakspeare, he too, we fancy it must be admitted, does not recognise the bird in its gloomy aspect ; at all events we do not recollect an allusion in his writings, which would authorize our supposing this. When Romeo, fearful of the approaching dawn, fancies he hears the matin song of the lark, Juliet says :—

"It was the nightingale, and not the lark,
That pierced the fearful hollow of thine ear ;
Nightly she sings on yon pomegranate tree :
Believe me, love, it was the nightingale."

And here we have the bird represented in a pleasing, nay, a delightful character ; for, to say nothing of its rich melody, so consonant with the blissful emotions of the hearts of the devoted lovers—aught which gave an assurance that the time of parting had not yet arrived, must have been to them most welcome and joy-inspiring. "Where," says Charles Knight, in reference to this passage, "did Shakspeare learn that the nightingale haunted the pomegranate tree, pouring forth her song from the same bough, week after week ? Doubtless in some of the old travels with which he was familiar. Chaucer puts his nightingale in 'a fresh green laurel tree,' but the preference of the nightingale for the pomegranate is unquestionable. 'The nightingale sings from the pomegranate grove in the day-time,' says Russel in his account of Aleppo. A friend, whose observations as a traveller are as acute as his descriptions are graphic and forcible, informs us that throughout his journeys in the East, he never heard such a choir of nightingales, as in a row of pomegranate trees that skirt the road from Smyrna to Boudjia." No doubt Hafiz, and other of the Eastern poets, would furnish us with allusions to this interesting fact in relation to the habits of the nightingale, if we thought it worth while to refer to them ; its introduction here may serve to show that in our discursive flights through the realms of poetic fiction, we shall not altogether lose sight of the truths of natural history, but place them before our readers, although at times they may afford no support, nay, may even serve to overthrow the fanciful theories and superstructures of imagination, which, with such materials as readily come to hand—poems and legends, old sayings and historic gleanings—we may build up, in a fashion not very shapely, nor artistic, perhaps. This is, however, by the way, and we will now proceed with the main object of our papers, which is to cull out, and place before our readers, such passages from the poets, as may best serve to illustrate their peculiar modes of thought and expression in regard to the various objects of the feathered creation. In the great majority of instances it will be seen how closely they observed nature, and how great was the power they possessed of depicting the haunts, the habits, and changing appearances of the various creatures which came under their observation :—

"From the bright-plumed humming bird, no larger than a butterfly,
That hither gleams and thither, quaffing nectar from the flowers,
Unto the mighty eagle, which on rushing wings doth cleave the air,
And builds his nest amid the crags, and gazeth on the sun.
From twittering swallows, skimming o'er the glassy pool or meadow green,
And cawing rook, and chattering pie, and sparrow with his chirp,
Up to the lyrique lark that trills his matin song at Heaven's gate,
And to the nightingale, that fills the woods with richest melody."

Our last quotation, before we thus digressed, was from Shakspeare ; and it will have been seen that neither by him nor by Chaucer is the nightingale alluded to as a bird of melancholy associations, or of lugubrious note, as it is in the lines which follow :—

"As it fell upon a day,
In the merry month of May,
Sitting in a pleasant shade,
By a group of myrtles made ;
Beasts did leap and birds did sing ;
Trees did grow, and plants did spring ;
Everything did banish moan,
Save the nightingale alone.
She, poor bird, as all forlorn,
Lean'd her breast against a thorn,
And there sang the doleful'st ditty :—
'Fie, fie, fie,' now would she cry,
'Tera, tera,' by-and-by ;
Thus to hear her so complain,
Scarce I could from tears refrain ;
For her grief so lively shown,

Made me think upon my own.
 Ah ! (thought I,) thou mourn'st in vain,
 None take pity on thy pain :
 Senseless trees, they cannot hear thee ;
 Ruthless beasts, they will not cheer thee ;
 King Pandion, he his dead ;
 All thy friends are lapp'd in lead ;
 All thy fellow birds do sing,
 Careless of thy sorrowing :
 Even so, poor bird ! like thee,
 None alive will pity me."

These beautiful lines have been erroneously attributed to Sir W. Raleigh, but there seems little doubt that they are the production of Richard Barnfield, author of the "Affectionate Shepherd," published in 1549. The following lines will show that this author did not always write in so sad a strain, nor look upon his favourite bird with such an eye of gloom :—

"Nights were short, and days were long ;
 Blossoms on the hawthorn hung :
 Philomel, (night-music's king,)
 Told the coming in of spring,
 Whose sweet silver-sounding voice,
 Made the little birds rejoice—
 Skipping light from spray to spray,
 Till Aurora show'd the day."

We are here reminded of Drummond of Hawthornden, who says :—

"The nightingale, forgetting winter's woe, Calls up the breezy morn her notes to hear."

But Drummond seemingly does not know that the bird, which he elsewhere addresses in words like these,—

"Dear chorister, who from these shadows sends,
 Ere that the blushing morn dare show her light,
 Such sad lamenting strains, that night attends,
 (Because all ear,) stars stay to hear thy plight,"— has no "winter's woe" to remember, being migratory, and so passing its life amid perpetual summer. In England it arrives generally in April, and departs in September ; in Italy and the southern parts of the Continent it is a month earlier in its arrival. "If," says Bechstein, speaking of Germany, "by accident a nightingale is met with by the end of September, or in October, it must have been delayed by some peculiar circumstance." It may be a young bird that was hatched late, or an invalid that had not strength for the journey, that in sadness and solitude pines for the chestnut groves of Italy, the rose gardens of Persia, or the spice isles of the Indian ocean, where its erstwhile companions are now disporting themselves ; where—

"The Indian fig with its arching screen,
 Welcomes them to its vista green,
 And the breathing buds of the spicy trees
 Thrill at the burst of their melodies."

Ælian, as we have been already told, says that the nightingale never sleeps, and if we ask how it is she manages to keep from doing so, we find an answer in the lines quoted from Barnfield :—

"She, poor bird, as all forlorn, Lean'd her breast upon a thorn ;"

and another, which more fully explains the matter, in this stanza, by Giles Fletcher :—

"So Philomel, perch'd on an aspen sprig,
 Weeps all the night her lost virginity,
 And sings her sad tale to the restless twig,
 That dances at such joyful misery :
 Nor ever let sweet sleep invade her eye,
 But leaning on a thorn her dainty chest,
 For fear soft sleep should steal into her breast, Expresses in her song grief not to be exprest."

With the paradox embodied in the last line, we have no concern whatever ; neither is it our business to explain how the poor bird found a thorn upon the aspen tree sufficiently keen for its purpose, nor how the twig could be so unfeeling as to "dance" to such "joyful misery." Our present object is to trace the recurrence of this idea of leaning upon a thorn in the downward stream of poesy. We find it in the sonnets of Sir Philip Sidney, where he says :—

"The nightingale, as soon as April bringeth
 Unto her rest a sense a perfect waking,
 When late bare earth, proud of new-clothing, springeth, Sings out her woes, a thorn her song book making ;"

and are not aware that it occurs again, until Young, the poet of the night, gives musical utterance to his sad and solemn thoughts, saying,—

"Grief's sharpest thorn hard pressing on my breast,
 I strive with wakeful melody to cheer
 The sullen gloom, sweet Philomel, like thee,
 And call the stars to listen."

Then again Thompson, not he of the "Seasons," but William, who has sung very sweetly of birds and other country pleasures, in his "Hymn to May" describes how

"The lowly nightingale,
 A thorn her pillow, trills her doleful tale."

But we had almost forgotten Byron, who treats the supposed fact as a poetic fiction :—

"The nightingale that sings with the deep thorn,
 Which fable places in her breast of wail,
 Is lighter far of heart and voice than those Whose headlong passions form their proper woes."

With this moral apothegm, which comes with double force from the lips of the passionate and wayward child of genius, we leave the thorny pillow of our client, and turn back again to some of the older poets, who have immortalized her in their songs :—

"Then on the lower brake the nightingale hard by,
 In such lamenting strains the joyful bowers doth fly,
 As though the other birds she to her tunes would draw,
 And, but that nature (by an all-constraining law)
 Each bird to her own kind this season doth invite,
 They else alone to hear that charmer of the night,
 (The more to use their ears,) their voices sure would spare,
 That moduleth her tunes so admirably rare,
 As man to set in parts, the first had learn'd of her."

It is thus that Drayton in his "Polyolbion" alludes to the sweet songster of the night, making it appear as though from her finely modulated notes, man had learned somewhat of his skill in musical numbers.

In Brown's Pastorals, the bird is represented as the imitator and not the teacher; speaking of one who, like Wordsworth's Ruth, was a true child of nature, the old poet says:—

"——and 'twas her usual sport,
Sitting where most harmonious birds resort,
To imitate their warblings with a quill
Wrought by the hand of Pan, which she did fill Half full with water; and with it had made
The nightingale beneath a sullen shade,
To chant her utmost lay: nay, to invent
New notes to pass the other's instrument;
And, harmless soul, ere she would leave that strife,
Sang her last song, and ended with her life:
So gladly choosing, as do others some,
Rather to die than live and be o'ercome."

We recollect that a similar trial of skill, in which the nightingale poured out her life in her efforts to surpass a human musician, is very beautifully described by one of our old dramatists; but we must not pause to look for the passage, having much more on our hands now, than we shall find space to quote.

But although, as Yarrell observes, "the song of the nightingale has been the theme of writers of all ages, yet few have expressed their admiration in more fervent or more natural terms, than honest Isaac Walton, who loved birds almost as well as he loved fish; he says, 'The nightingale breathes such sweet loud music out of her little instrumental throat, that it might make mankind to think that miracles are not ceased. He that at midnight, when the very labourer sleeps securely, should hear, as I have very often, the clear airs, the sweet descants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above earth and say—Lord, what music hast thou provided for the saints in heaven, when thou affordest bad men such music on earth?'" Truly hers is a miraculous song, and often does it "smooth the raven down of darkness till it smiles;" Milton loved it; witness his sonnet beginning,

"Oh, nightingale, that on yon bloomy spray
Warblest at eve, when all the woods are still;
Thou with fresh hope the lover's heart doth fill,
While the jolly hours lead in propitious May."

We can scarcely wonder at the popular superstition to which allusion is here made, and on which is founded Chaucer's poem, "the Cuckoo and the Nightingale;" wherein the old bard says:—

"But tossing lately on a sleepless bed,
I of a token thought which lovers heed,
How among them it was a common tale,
'Till it was good to hear the nightingale,
Ere the vile cuckoo's note he uttered."

And so he leaves his couch and lies him forth—

"That he perchance a nightingale might hear," unlike the gloomy ascetic Edward the Confessor, of whom the legend says, that when he retired to pray and meditate amid the umbrageous woods of Havering-at-Bower, in Essex, being much disturbed by the music of the nightingales, he sent up a petition, that never more within the bounds of his retirement might the sweet tones of the feathered minstrel be heard. It is said that the petition was granted; we are inclined to hope that it was not; he who made it did not deserve such a foretaste of heavenly joy, but we may well suppose that there were others who dwelt, or wandered in that picturesque neighbourhood, who would feel the want of those melodious strains as a sad deprivation. No doubt—

"The cottar, wending weary to his home,
Linger'd full oft to listen to the song,
And felt 'twas beautiful, and bless'd the strain;
And lonely students, wandering in the woods, Loved nature more because this bird had sung;"

as Charles Mackay has it, in his instructive "Apologue for Poets;" wherein he endeavours to impress the moral, which Conrad of Wurzburg, a minstrel of the thirteenth century, had in his mind, when he said, speaking of the apathy of the world towards poetry:—

"I care not for their gifts! my tongue shall not be silent, since the art itself will reward me. I will continue to sing my song, like the nightingale, who sings for her own sake; hidden in the woods, her notes assuage her cares, nor does she heed whether any stranger listens to her strains." She may well say, in the words ascribed to her by the author of "The Apologue,"—

"Mine is a hymn of gratitude and love;
An overflowing from my inmost heart;
And if men listen and are pleased, not less
My pleasure in administering to theirs;
But if none care to hear my melodies,
Not the less happy would I be to sing."

This is teaching of the right sort, and of such teaching nature, both animate and inanimate, is full; we cannot go abroad,

Of beautiful and well created things,"— that is, if the mind be properly stored and instructed,—without learning some lesson that shall be good and salutary; and if it be asked of us, what particular point of spiritual instruction is illustrated and enforced by the nightingale, we answer—It is humility of heart and of intellect; the richest and sweetest of all the feathered songsters loves best to sing in the silence of night, and in the shadow of the leafy woodlands. But let James Montgomery speak for us here.—

"The lark that soars on highest wing,
Builds on the ground her lowly nest,
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade, when all things rest:
In lark and nightingale we see What honour bath humility;"

and again, to quote William Browne—

"Not from nobility doth virtue spring,
But virtue makes fit nobles for a king,
From highest nests are croaking ravens borne,
While sweetest nightingales sit on a thorn."

But here we have nearly used up our space—too limited by half, at least—and have not yet alluded to the beautiful Eastern fiction, which unites the nightingale and the rose—the bulbul and the attargul—in the bonds of devoted affection; we might quote page upon page on this head alone, but one short passage must suffice, and that shall be prose. Sir Robert Ker Porter, in his travels, describing the rose garden of Nayanvisten, says:—"The eye and the smell were not the only senses regaled by the presence of the rose; the ear was enchanted by the wild and beautiful notes of the multitude of nightingales, whose warblings seemed to increase in melody and softness with the unfolding of their favourite flowers; verifying the song of the poet, who says, 'when the charms of the bower are passed away, the fond tale of the nightingale no longer animates the scene.'"

We find that we have latterly dwelt more especially upon the pleasing influence of the nightingale's melody upon the mind, and thus, as it would appear, contradicted the assertion with which we set out, that its song was essentially melancholy and depressing; but this assertion, it must be remembered, was considerably modified by a reference to individual temperament and state of feeling. And, after all, the great bulk of the poetical authority is in favour of our own view of the matter, as we could easily show, by calling a council of the poets, and putting the question to the vote. This, however, it is scarcely necessary to do. One more witness only shall we call into court, and his evidence must be considered as final and conclusive. This witness is Ippolito Pindemonte, who, as his translator, Mr. H. Rankin, informs us, has been usually considered as par excellence the poet of melancholy: he has written some fine stanzas on night, in which the following occur:—

"But, hark! what soft delicious sounds arise
From yonder thicket's leafy, wild retreat!
Sweet nightingale! thy voice I recognise!
Thy nectar notes were e'er to me most sweet:
I always loved thee, for thy genius is Gloomy and sad. Thee do the muses greet
As their companion: I, too, with my lay,
Have paid my court to thee from boyhood to this day.
Perish the wretch who would thy song remove
From the green copse to an imprison'd cage!
An unbought songstress, in the myrtle grove
Thou art best heard—'tis thy own native stage.
The dusky earth beneath, wide heaven above
In silent gloom, are thy loved heritage;
And the free fluttering from bough to bough,— Oh! ne'er would I the pangs of slavery have thee know!

It is thy wont, when deepest shades prevail,
Nor moon is seen, nor twinkling star's pale ray,
With eloquent discourse, and musical,
To make dull night more exquisite than day.
Both thou and I would fain pour forth our tale
Mid rocks and caves, from mortals far away.
In others praise we seek not happiness;
In our full heart we feel one all-sufficient bliss."

VISIT TO MACINTOSH'S CAOUTCHOUC FACTORY.

To witness on the great scale the actual manipulation of the extraordinary substance, caoutchouc, and its manufacture into the various useful materials now so largely employed for various purposes, was one of our most long cherished wishes. Circumstances having at length occurred to accomplish the gratification of this desire, we are persuaded that an account of our visit to the immense works where these operations are conducted, will interest a very large proportion of our readers. This we shall immediately proceed to lay before them, promising a few general remarks upon caoutchouc itself, so as to render our article complete in the view it will present of the history and manufacture of this invaluable vegetable production.

Have any of our readers in their school-boy days plucked the milky stem of the spurge-wort and rubbed certain inveterate warts with the oozing milk-white juice? In such a fluid caoutchouc exists, and in all milky juices of plants this singular substance may be detected in larger or smaller quantities. The composition of this milk varies as to its chemical constituents, but physically, it is identical in most instances, and consists of a pellucid fluid, holding minute globules of caoutchouc in suspension. On exposure to air, these globules rise to the surface of the fluid, like the cream of animal milk, and these coalescing into one mass, they form that tenacious, elastic, insoluble material of which we are speaking; and by no process of science or art hitherto discovered can they be made to reassume their original condition. It is a remarkable fact that caoutchouc, in itself the most innocuous of all substances, should be principally yielded by a tribe of plants furnishing generally the most deadly products, and numbering in its terrible catalogue the frightful poisons of the Manchineel, Woorari, and Upas. The method by which it is obtained from the trees for the purposes of commerce has long been familiar—incisions being made deeply into the bark, the exuding fluid is collected and spread over moulds of clay to dry, the mould being usually of a pyriform, or bottle shape. The tree from which it is obtained in greatest quantity is the Siphonia elastica, a large tree flourishing in great luxuriance in portions of South America. From the port of Para, in South America, from Guiana, and the regions round about, the principal supply for the European markets, of which England is immeasurably the largest, is derived. Eastern India also sends large shipments for our use. Fifteen years ago, the enormous quantity of about ninety tons of this vegetable extract was imported into England, and since this period the consumption has probably nearly doubled. Dr. Schleiden informs us that in one manufactory in Greenwich alone, eight hundred-weight are daily submitted to dry distillation in iron vessels. By this process a volatile oil is obtained, which possesses the valuable property of dissolving with great facility solid caoutchouc placed in it; the residue is a peculiar greasy substance, admirably adapted and largely employed for rendering cordage impervious to wet. This process is the subject of a patent.

Having passed the threshold, we may now without further delay describe in detail the particulars of our visit. The factory is situated in a densely-populated district of Manchester, its tall form rising in bold prominence from a crowd of human habitations, while the base is washed by the black and reeking waters of the Medlock. Streets of humming cotton-factories form the only avenues to the building, and the muffled roar of toiling engines, driving hundreds of thousands of swift-revolving spindles and looms of ceaseless clack, gives a peculiar impression to the visitor's mind, and prepares him to expect something out of the common from the inspection of one of the great mechanical hives before him. Some difficulty exists in obtaining an entrance, but this being overruled by the introduction of a friend, we met with the utmost kindness and attention from the manager of the works, who was so polite as to accompany us, and enter into a lucid explanation of the various steps of the process from first to last. At the very gates of the factory, and even for some short distance from them, although the heavy air was loaded with odours of no very agreeable kind, that well known and most peculiar naphthaline odour which every owner of a Macintosh abominates, was very distinctively perceptible, and on entering the premises it increased until it became for a little while almost overpowering; the source of this smell we were hereafter to inspect.

The first room into which we were conducted is on the ground-floor of the building, and is the apartment in which the initiatory manufacturing processes are carried on. The casks in which the caoutchouc is imported are brought here and opened. Looking into one of them, we saw the "raw article" in the form of pear-shaped bottles, of no great pretensions as to elegance of shape, and varying much from one another in aspect, fineness of grain, and in colour. The prevailing colour of the outside was grey or black; on a section they were of a cream colour, that is, they retained their original colour, for the blackness is due, as we believe, not alone to the smoke-drying of the bottles, but to the chemical influence of the atmosphere upon the caoutchouc. A similar darkening effect takes place in the case of Gutta-percha, the cognate of the article in question. It was curious to look at one of these bottles in section, for by a little close scrutiny it became easy to detect the number of times it was dipped in the liquid caoutchouc, by remarking the evident layering of the substance, somewhat resembling the annual ring-marks in the cross-cut stem of an exogenous tree. And it became easy to picture the busy scene of the native manufacture; here one makes the clay-moulds and dries them in the sun; there are others hastening to and fro, dipping the moulds in the thick yellow cream which floats in that wooden trough, and then hanging them to the cords stretched between those majestic trees, until the sun has dried them sufficiently for a second or third dip, while, in every direction, behold the bleeding trunks of the noble Siphonia, streaming out into shells or earthen vessels the precious fluid destined to play so invaluable a part in the scheme of human economy. Manchester, however, is one of the most matter-of-fact places in the world, and our reverie was soon interrupted, by a request to observe the manoeuvres of several men who were busily engaged in this room. We must stay to state, however, that, contrary to a preconceived opinion, the number of layers in these bottles is far greater than would have been supposed; thus, there may be perhaps thirty or forty of them, or even more, to be counted in a section of one of these bottles; indicating, of course, that before completed, the patient native must have dipped it so many times into the fluid caoutchouc, and so many times hung it up in the burning sun. In addition to the bottle "rubber," to make use of a convenient technicality of phrase, we were surprised to find it imported also in the form of solid square masses, or cakes; but the finest kind, so far as we were able to perceive and learn, comes over exclusively in the pyriform shape. The finest and purest specimens are all now sorted out, and kept distinct for the various purposes for which India-rubber in its original form is used generally.

Along one side of the room long troughs full of water are arranged, into which steam-pipes enter and keep the water at a pretty high temperature. Several men seated on stools and armed with long knives, sit before these troughs with a cask of rubber at their sides. Taking up the bottles, or pieces, and placing them on a board before them, they slice them with a sawing motion in half, and throw the halves into the hot-water. As we watched this simple process going rapidly forward, we soon discovered the object of it, together with the disagreeable truth that the act of adulteration is, alas! not unknown in the dense and world-removed parts of Guiana. Small stones, lumps of clay, bits of wood artfully concealed in the smooth plump masses, fell from them under the operation of the knife; while in the middle of others was found a curious lump of bad caoutchouc, formed out of the scrapings of the sides of the troughs, and put in to increase the weight. These impurities necessarily become a serious annoyance to the manufacturer, and necessitates the adoption of several processes which common honesty on the part of the savage producer would altogether do away with. After soaking in the hot-water for some time, the clay becomes softened and is washed away, and the other impurities are picked out. The pieces are then collected out of the troughs and conveyed in baskets to another portion of the building.

That it might be truly said we had seen the substance in all its stages, we took a piece from the trough, and were conducted by our clear-headed companion to a lower room. Passing by piles, or stacks of what appeared to be strips of very coarse, thick, sackcloth, we were brought to the end of the room where the purifying machinery was fixed. The construction of this very powerful and efficient engine will be very readily understood. At a convenient height from the ground were placed two cast-iron rollers, the faces of which were cut in a very peculiar manner; these revolved upon strong shafts upheld by a cast-iron frame, and capable of being put in or out of gear with the driving machinery at pleasure. Immediately above them, a jet of water was made to fall so as to wash with some force the revolving surfaces. Below was a complete system of drainage, by which the soiled water escaped. Our piece of rubber was now taken, and the machine being set in motion, and presented to the revolving rollers: as with a giant's grasp they seized the substance and crunched it between their iron teeth, in a manner so energetic as to make one almost shudder, while the water washed over the substance and swept away every particle of foreign matter. This process was repeated several times, and each time the water brought away less and less impurity, until at length it washed through quite clean. The effect of this mangling operation in the rubber was very singular. Instead of tearing into shreds of great minuteness, it actually flattened it out into a firmly coherent mass, deeply indented, it is true, with the tooth-marks of the strong engine, so deeply, indeed, as to wear the appearance of coarse network; yet still forming a tenacious and resisting band of caoutchouc. The aspect of the substance has also undergone a remarkable alteration; it is no longer black externally, and cream-coloured within, but is now uniformly of a greyish tone of colour. Neither any longer can the giddy sensation consequent upon its impure condition be detected in it; in short, instead of being a heterogeneous mass, both as to texture and external character, it is now a soft, smooth-feeling homogeneous substance. The vast amount of impurity got rid of in this simple manner would scarcely be believed; there fell out of a tolerably pure piece of rubber, a little handful of fine gravel, not to take into consideration the large amount of clay washed away as mud during the process. We thus discovered that, what on our entrance we had mistaken for heaps of coarse sackcloth, were actually heaps of rubber in its now greatly altered and purified form.

From the nature of this process it will be evident that when the rubber leaves the purifying engine a large quantity of water must necessarily be included in the masses, locked up, possibly, in little bladders of the substance. This must be perfectly removed, or its presence would interfere to a most serious extent with the success of future processes. The thick bands of rubber are, therefore, conveyed to a stove-room heated by steam-pipes. They are here disposed so as to give the greatest facilities for evaporation, and, after remaining a certain time they are removed, when it is found that every particle of moisture has been driven away.

Following a truck laden with the dried substance, we entered another room, in the centre of which was a massive piece of machinery, the kneading engine. Although not heated artificially the temperature of this room was very considerable, and the cast-iron frame of the engine was in places so hot as not to be touched by the hand with comfort. The source of this heat is very interesting; it arises exclusively from the compression of the rubber by the powerful mechanism into which it is placed. To the reader inconvertant with the laws of caloric this may appear rather inexplicable, but the difficulty is easily removed. It appears that every substance has within it an amount of caloric, which, not being sensible to the touch or thermometer, is called latent. If the body, no matter what it is, undergoes a violent compression this latent heat is (to use homely language) squeezed out, and then it becomes sensible to the touch and thermometer, and may even rise to a considerable degree of temperature. Thus there is a philosophic toy consisting of a piston working in an air-tight cylinder; at the bottom of the piston is a small piece of German tinder. Now, by violent forcing down, with a sharp sudden motion, this piston, so much heat is extricated from the compressed air, and the tinder actually takes light!

The principle in the case in question is precisely similar: the rubber undergoes a degree of compression which would crush the human body into a shapeless jelly; and the result is a very convenient one; for it extricates exactly enough heat to keep the caoutchouc, which, as is well known, is softened by heat, at a proper temperature for working, without the necessity of applying heat by artificial means.

The kneading-engine is, probably, five or six feet high, by eight or ten in length. It consists of a sort of powerful cast-iron box, with four heavy iron lids, counterbalanced by a falling weight. Along the horizontal axis of the box, or chest, is placed a massive roller of cast-iron, with fluted edges, which is in connexion with a system of strong cogs and moving-gear attached to the engine-shaft. It is thus made to revolve slowly, but with invincible force, inside the box, and would, of course, if there were any substance placed between it and the sides of the chest crush or compress it with great power. In order to watch in succession the whole of the stages of the kneading operation, let us suppose the box empty. The four heavy lids are lifted up, an armful or two of the bands of rubber are crammed in, until the customary quantity is stowed away. The lids are then lowered down, and fastened over the contents of the chest by powerful bolts, which prevent their being lifted up by the action of the machinery, and a handle sets the whole ponderous wheel-work and roller in steady motion. A low, muffled, crushing sound escapes from the machine, indicative of the fearful mangling which it is inflicting upon the captive rubber. At the same time, the temperature of the chest rises rapidly, and before long becomes very high indeed. When this has gone on for an hour or so, one or two of the lids are unloosed and partly raised, and now an opportunity is afforded us of inspecting the kneading of the substance. The mass has undergone a striking alteration; it is no longer a hard resisting substance, but is soft and plastic as dough. Its colour is also changed from a greyish cast to a yellowish brown; and its texture is smooth and uniform. Could we compare it to any thing, it resembles just now an oblong flattened mass of brown dough, only that it emits the peculiar caoutchoucine odour to a rather disagreeable extent. Its motion inside the chest is just that of a planetary body; it traverses an orbit bounded by the sides of the box, and it has also a motion of rotation upon its own axis in so doing. This, in fact, as a little reflection will show, is just the combination of movements we should expect from a body placed in such a position and under such circumstances as that in question. In consequence of this peculiar revolution the mass is presented at regular intervals to all parts of the sides of the chest, and is not, as might perhaps have been supposed, spread over all parts of it at once. Thus, at stated times, it presents itself in a body to that part of the chest where the lids are situated, and if the lids were not partly closed it would turn itself completely out of the chest. This fact is taken advantage of when the kneading has gone on for a sufficient length of time; the four lids are then lifted quite up, and the great, soft, hot mass is majestically discharged out of the machine into the arms of a couple of men. When one quantity is removed its place is taken by another, and the process begins, goes on, and concludes as before.

In order to form it into a convenient shape the mass is then taken into another room. Here we saw several presses of various forms, intended to effect this object. The most common mould into which it is placed is one of cast-iron, six feet in length, one in breadth, and one in depth. Another form was that of a solid drum. On the soft mass of rubber being placed in these and covered in, it was placed under an hydraulic press, and by this means was made to take the form of the mould. After remaining under pressure until it was cold, it was then removed and carried up stairs to the cutting department, whither we would beg the reader to follow us.

Every one must have seen, and many must be puzzled about that form of India-rubber which is sold, and is largely used, particularly for chemical and philosophical purposes, in thin sheets, which are commonly about a foot broad and six feet long, the thickness varying from that of paper to that of shoe-leather. If the surface of one of these is closely examined it will be found to present the appearance of cross ridges or marks of a very delicate kind, all perfectly parallel with one another. Under a small Stanhope lens they become very manifest, and exhibit their real character as cuts or furrows. With a little patience from fifty to sixty of these cuts can be counted in an inch of the sheet, making from 600 to 700 of them in a foot. Remembering the form in which caoutchouc was imported—in bottles—it was long a source of the profoundest perplexity to ourselves to conjecture by what human skill a tissue, so to speak, so beautifully uniform in width and thickness could be formed thereout. A part of the difficulties attending the question have been now removed by the preceding observations, and if the reader will consent to give us a little patient attention the rest will vanish also.

Upon the removal of the rubber from the mould it is brought to the cutting room, and placed in an iron case of the same dimensions as the mould; that is, six feet long, one broad, and one deep. This case has double sides, and the partition, being connected with a steam-pipe, is filled with steam, so as always to keep the rubber at a certain degree of softness of texture. This case is arranged so as to move backwards and forwards, carrying the mass of caoutchouc with it. At the further end of the apparatus is a most ingenious little machine, by which the delicate operation of slicing off the rubber in these sheets is effected. Essentially, this consists of a horizontal knife, keener than any razor, placed so as to have a lateral motion of a limited extent, and in connexion with some curious mechanism and a short crank by which its cutting movements are effected. Parts of the machine are so arranged that the thickness of the layer to be cut can be easily determined by screwing the bearings of the knife higher or lower. Just above the knife a little stream of water is continually flowing so as to lubricate the cutting edge, and thus facilitate its action against this tough and most peculiar material. The machine, being set in motion by a driving strap, the knife begins to act with immense rapidity, so much so, indeed, as to cause the ear to lose the impressions of a set of distinct, rapidly repeated noises, the resulting sound being a loud whirl of a peculiar kind. The case, with its contents, moves slowly up to the swift-moving edge, until at length the mass of rubber is in contact with it, and, in a few seconds, a beautiful delicate layer of the material is seen curling up. The end of this is taken by an attendant and partly rolled round a cast-iron roller. The machine then goes on, acting by itself. It draws up the case containing the rubber to be cut; it cuts it of any desired thickness, and, finally, rolls it up in a convenient form for future purposes. All the attention, in fact, this clever contrivance requires is the first adjustment, and the removal of the cut layer when the whole length, six feet, has been cut. The time taken to cut through this length is about six minutes, or a foot in a minute. From this datum we are able to get at the speed of the knife, and, remembering the number of cuts just mentioned in a foot, we find that it makes from 600 to 700 cutting movements in a minute, or about 4,000 for the whole length of six feet. There is a modification of this apparatus in use for cutting the rubber when it is cast into the form of a solid drum. In this case the drum revolves, and the knife acts incessantly until it has sliced off any required number of feet. Where, for any peculiar purpose, a greater width and length of sheet-caoutchouc are necessary than can be produced by one of the above machines it is formed by means of this contrivance. The simultaneous action of several of these engines made this room a very busy and a very noisy scene.

A very valuable application of caoutchouc has been its use in the formation of what are called "elastic webs." These tissues are extensively employed for the manufacture of many of the minor articles of human apparel. Among them are straps for "braces," bandages for surgical purposes, bands for gloves, watch-guards, and such like. If the materials of which such fabrics are composed are subjected to a little scrutiny it will be found that they owe their valued elastic properties to the fact that they contain filaments of caoutchouc interwoven and covered with cotton or silk, the elastic filaments forming the warp, or long threads, and the cotton or silk, in addition to the coating with which they surround the filaments of caoutchouc, forming the cross-threads, or weft. The method by which these delicate filaments of caoutchouc are manufactured, although, apparently, very difficult to comprehend, is, in reality, very easy. Every reader must have seen the pill-machines which adorn our apothecaries' counters, and knows that they are formed of two pieces of brass cut into grooves, and so adjusted that the edges of that piece which is held in the hands and those of that which is fixed in the frame, when the machine is in action, shall just touch each other, thus leaving room for the round body of the pill in the interspaces. The machines by which the elastic filaments are cut are on a precisely similar principle, only that grooves are cut into two rollers, which revolve by power, and on placing a thin plate of the rubber, taken from the last machine between these rollers, they cut it into a number of filaments, all smooth and round, and of greater or smaller size according as the nature of the case demands.

The manufacturing processes connected with unprepared rubber ending here, we quitted this building to witness its treatment by the aid of solvent agents. In passing along a sort of court our attention was arrested by an iron boiler of gigantic proportions. This immense structure was placed in the open air, under a slight roof to turn the wet off. Approaching nearer to it, we at length discovered the main source of the naphthaline odour which met us at the gates. The boiler was a vast reservoir for the naphtha used on the establishment. Some conception of its actual size may be formed from the remark that it was estimated to contain when full about 45,000 gallons of this spirit. Its present contents, as we were informed, were about 18,000. There are several pumps in connexion with it, which either evacuate its contents, or fill it from the vessels in which this fluid is brought to the factory. Inquiring the cause for the adoption of so large reservoir, we were informed that it was necessary for some time at the outset of the manufacture, in consequence both of the enormous consumption of the fluid and the uncertainty of procuring a constant supply.

For a considerable period the preparation of caoutchouc solution was conducted on an erroneous principle. It was made very liquid in the first instance, and then evaporated down to the consistence of a paste. By this means an enormous loss of naphtha was occasioned, the amount evaporated amounting to 2,000 gallons a-week! Experience has shown that much of this was only waste of material, and the proportions now employed of "spirit" to rubber are very different, only enough spirit being used to reduce the caoutchouc to the state of a pretty thick paste, so as scarcely to require evaporation at all. The solvent used, as we have just noticed, is naphtha, a fluid produced in considerable quantities in the gas manufacture, and in other chemical operations; the principal source is, however, the gas works. So large was the consumption at a former period that it was found impossible to meet the demand, and every gas-factory in, and even some out of, the country, were laid under contribution to afford an adequate supply.

The solution of caoutchouc is a very simple operation. Thin sheets of it are laid in proper vessels, covered with the solvent, and submitted to a gentle heat. By this means its solution is quickly effected, and we are then presented with a glutinous semi-transparent fluid, very viscid, and of an intensely powerful odour. For many economical purposes this solution is highly prized, affording as it does a most valuable waterproof varnish, applicable to many fabrics with advantage, and largely used, to quote an instance on the great scale, in the formation of balloons.

From the manufacture of the caoutchouc paste, we were led to a long apartment where this paste is applied to tissues of various kinds. If we examine the section of a piece of waterproof, or Macintosh cloth, we find it consists of three layers, an under and upper one of cloth and an intermediate stratum of caoutchouc. In this apartment we beheld the ingenious and simple processes by means of which this invaluable fabric is prepared. There were about eighteen Macintosh engines disposed in various parts of this department, most of which were in full work at the time, giving a very animated character to the room. The method of manufacturing a Macintosh will be best understood by a description of one of these engines. It consists of a low square frame, in the front part of which is the roll of tissue, a sort of cotton "twill," we believe, destined to receive the caoutchouc layer. Just above this roll of cloth, are placed a pair of long iron rollers in a horizontal position, and set in motion by proper machinery; both these rollers are heated by a steam pipe, which enters at their axes. Over the lower one passes an endless web, intended to carry on its surface the cloth to be "Macintoshed," the upper one, which is the spreader, is smooth and polished. The cloth now enters between these rollers, and just as it enters a mass of tenacious caoutchouc paste is placed upon its upper surface, and spread by an attendant over the breadth of the cloth, in a thick lump. Being drawn onwards by the machine, the cloth goes through the rollers; but, in consequence of their close adaptation the one to the other, it is only able to drag with it a thin, smooth and beautifully even pellicle of the paste. It then passes over a flat iron chest, also heated by steam; the superfluous naphtha is thus evaporated, and by the time the fabric has been drawn to the end of the machine, it is dry enough to bear rolling up, which is accordingly effected by the machine itself.

It is thus seen that the operation is one of remarkable simplicity, the only care requisite being to supply the machine with fresh paste in suitable quantities, and to regulate its uniformity of distribution over the breadth of the cloth. We believe that the apparatus by means of which common diachylon, or sticking plaister, is spread is upon a precisely similar principle. But the tissue thus prepared, although perfectly waterproof, requires another layer of cloth to fit it for most of the purposes to which it is applied. This is effected by merely causing the single tissue to pass between hot rollers, an upper layer of the cloth being applied to its surface, and made to adhere by the heat and pressure. For a length of time the "double" tissue, as it is called, was exclusively manufactured, as it was thought that the shining surface of the caoutchouc would not recommend it as an article of apparel for gentlemen. Latterly, however, matters have undergone a change; the fantastic title of aqua scutum has been fastened upon the single tissues, and a vast number of waterproof garments with glossy black faces, are now worn under the supposition that a beautifully light and novel water-repellant article has just been discovered! In addition to the large demand for the double fabric for clothing, it is used to an immense extent in many of the factories and works of the neighbourhood, particularly by calico printers, as a web upon which the cotton cloth rests in its passage through the cylinder printing engines.

One curious fact in connexion with this room must be mentioned ere we quit it. The odour of the naphtha is so strong as to be distressing for some time to those who have weak or irritable lungs; and remarking upon the fact we inquired whether it produced any effect upon the health of the men constantly exposed to its influence. Our intelligent conductor informed us that the only ill effect he ever experienced was occasionally several of the symptoms of intoxication, and, now and then, the occurrence of intense headaches. He assured us that after a busy day in this part of the factory, he has no sooner emerged into the fresh air than he has commenced staggering and reeling, as if under the potent influence of ardent spirits. But this effect gradually wore off, and his appearance, together with that of the workmen, certainly did not leave any stigma upon the healthiness of the occupation. Some peculiar views regarding the nature and cure of consumption and the remedial influence of naphtha held by certain authors, led us to inquire also, whether there was any immunity from this disease among the men. A satisfactory reply could not be given; but it was stated that some of their former work-people had certainly found benefit from the task; whether they were permanently relieved or not, is another question. As will be readily supposed the risk of fire in this building altogether is excessive, and its occurrence would be likely to signalize itself as a fearful and awful event. Several fires have occurred, some of them doing tremendous mischief, and by the brilliancy of their up-leaping flames, creating a terrible sort of admiration in the vicinity. Every room is now built on a fireproof plan, and the property is therefore as secure from the overwhelming effects of this visitation as its inflammable nature will admit of.

That extraordinary material, the fresh appliances of which meet and astonish us every day, vulcanized India rubber, is also prepared at this factory. This singular substance may be formed in several ways, either by immersion in melted sulphur, or by kneading the rubber with a due proportion of sulphur in the machine already described, and after this process has been completed, heating it to a certain point. But we believe the most common method is to reduce the caoutchouc to the semi-fluid condition by means of naphtha, and then to mix with it a definite quantity of sulphur. A paste is thus formed which may be spread out so as to form a flat layer by means of one of the spreading machines, or it is sufficiently plastic to be moulded in various ways. At this time true chemical union of the sulphur and caoutchouc is not established. After the proper form has been given to the substance it is removed to an oven, where it is exposed to the temperature of 300° Fahrenheit. Apparently a true chemical compound is the result, the material has lost its plasticity, and has entered into the possession of those most extraordinary powers of resisting compression, and of almost insuperable elasticity, which have caused it to take rank among the most valued discoveries of our day. It can now no longer be made to unite with another portion of the same material, as it could before it was heated, and it becomes therefore necessary, whatsoever be the nature or form of the article it is intended to be, that all the manipulatory processes be ended before the substance is put into the oven. We were shown an immense number of articles made of it, of which we can only particularize a few. Tubes of all diameters, bottles of various sizes, springs, straps, rings, washers, bands, diver's clothing, gaiters, boots, gloves, and many more. And in examining the mechanism of a new self-acting mule, for cotton spinning, just erected in a beautiful mill over which we wandered, we found there two strong slips of this all-useful substance performing an important part in the mechanism of the apparatus.

But our lengthening page reminds us that caoutchouc, even as the subject for an article, loses none of its elastic attributes. A number of minor facts could be mentioned, each possessed, it may be, of a degree of interest; but since they are readily supplied by the majority of readers, we feel no hesitation in refusing their admittance into our paper. Within the not unreasonable limits to which we have confined ourselves will be found, we believe, an account of one of the most remarkable of our manufacturing processes, hitherto, in no instance, brought under the notice of the general reader, sufficient to enable him to form a satisfactory conception of the whole, and even of some of the minutiae of the most important parts of the manufacture. As we have gone through the various operations to which human skill has subjected this singular material, and, as we look to the innumerable direct and indirect benefits conferred upon us by the inspissated juice of a tree, can we fail to acknowledge that all these ends were foreseen in its creation, and that it is the Creator's hand which has thus singularly endowed and freely bestowed this blessing upon mankind?

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXVII.

DE GRANDEVILLE MEETS HIS MATCH.

UNPLEASANT as was the situation in which Lewis was left at the end of the last chapter, we can scarcely imagine that any of our readers, however they may be accustomed to look on the "night side of nature," can have coolly made up their minds to the worst, and settled to their own dissatisfaction that he fell a victim to the poacher's gun. We say, we cannot imagine such a possibility,—not because we have any very deep reliance on the tender-heartedness of all our fellow-creatures, seeing that this tale may fall into the hands of a poor-law guardian or a political economist; that a butcher may read it fresh from the shambles, or a barrister after defending some confessed murderer; but, we feel certain, butcher or barrister, lawgiver or guardian must alike perceive, that as we are writing the life and adventures of Lewis Arundel, we cannot commit manslaughter without adding thereunto suicide; or, to speak familiarly, we cannot kill Lewis without docking our own tale; therefore, the utmost extent that our most truculent reader can possibly hope for must be a severe gun-shot wound, entailing a lingering illness and a shattered constitution. But even these pleasant and reasonable expectations are doomed to meet with disappointment, the fact being, that almost at the moment in which "long Hardy" (for he it was) levelled his gun at Lewis's retreating figure, his quick ear had caught a sound betokening the advance of some person through the bushes in his immediate vicinity, and neither wishing to encounter any of the game-keeper's satellites, nor considering the deed he had meditated exactly calculated to be performed before any, even the most select audience, the poacher slowly recovered his gun, and proceeded to convey himself away, after a singular snake-like fashion of his own, reserving to himself the right of shooting his supposed enemy at some more convenient season. In the mean time Lewis walked quietly on, unconscious of the danger he had escaped, until a turn in the road brought him in sight of his companions. During the course of their homeward walk Lewis questioned the game-keeper as to his intentions concerning the poachers to whose proceedings he had that morning gained a clue.

"Vell, yer see, Mr. Arundel," returned Millar, in whose estimation Lewis had risen fifty per cent. since his clever shot at the snipe,—“yer see, it ain't ther fust time as this chap, Hardy, has give us a good deal o' trouble;—we catcted him a poarchin' about three year ago, and he wor in — gaol for six months at a stretch; vell, ven he cum out, he tuk to bad courses all to-gether,—jined thier chartists, them chaps as preaches equalerty, 'cos, being at the very bottom of ther ladder therselves, equalerty would pull them hup and their betters down; vunce let 'em get to ther middle round, and they'd soon give up equalerty,—hit would be the 'haristocracy of talent,' or ther 'shupremacy of physic-all force,' (vich means, power of pitching into somebody else,) vith 'em then. I hates such cant as I hates varmint, so I do.”

Having delivered himself of this opinion with much emphasis, the keeper proceeded to relieve his mind by licking an inoffensive dog for an imaginary offence ere he continued:

"Vell, arter he jined the chartists, he vent to Lunnun as a Delicate, as they calls 'em; and has they found him in wittles and drink, lodgin' and hother parquisites, in course he wor'n't in no hurry to cum back; howsomdever, I suppose, at last they diskivered what I could a told 'em at turst—that he was'n't worth his keep; and so they packed him off home agen. I 'spected vhen I heard he vas arrived vot he'd be hup to. He calls hussell a blacksmith; but he drives more shots into hares and pheasands than nails into 'orses 'oofs, you may depend.”

"And how do you propose to put a stop to his depredations?" inquired Lewis.

"Vy, I should like to catch him in the wery act—nab him vith the game upon him," returned the keeper, meditatively; "then ve could get him another six months; but he's so precious sly, and uncommon swift of foot too, though he ain't fur hoff my age, vich shall never see five-and-forty no more.”

"I wish, Millar," said Lewis, after a moment's consideration, "I wish that whenever you receive information which you think likely to lead to this man's capture, you'd send me word; there's nothing I should like better than to lend you a hand in taking him,—I might be useful to you, for I used to be reckoned a fast runner.”

"And suppose it comes to blows? Them poarching chaps is rough customers to handle sometimes," rejoined Millar, with a cunning twinkle in his eye, as if he expected this information would alter his companion's intentions.

"So much the more exciting," returned Lewis, eagerly; "an affray vith poachers would be a real treat after such a life of inaction as I've been leading lately.”

As he spoke,—throwing off for a moment the proud reserve which had now become habitual to him,—his eyes flashed, he drew himself up to his full height, and flung back his graceful head vith an air of proud defiance. The game-keeper regarded him fixedly, and mentally compared him vith—not the fighting gladiator, for Millar's unclassical education had never rendered him acquainted with that illustrious statue; but he had once been present at a prize-fight, in which a tall, athletic youth, rejoicing in the ornithological sobriquet of "the spicy Dabchick," proved victor, and to that dabchick did he assimilate Lewis. At length his thoughts found vent in the following ejaculation:—

"Well, Mr. Arundel, hif ther's many more like you hup there, that blessed Lunnun can't be as bad a place as I thought it."

Lewis smiled; perhaps (for after all, he was human and under twenty-one), the evident admiration which had replaced the no less evident contempt with which the sturdy game-keeper had regarded him earlier in their acquaintance was not without its charm; at all events, when, after another hour's shooting, Millar went home to dinner, and Lewis and Walter returned to Broadhurst, the young tutor diminished his income to the extent of half-a-crown, and the keeper, as he pocketed the "tip," renewed his assurance that he would send Mr. Arundel timely notice, "whenever there was a chance of being down upon that poaching willain, Hardy."

Charley Leicester, as he did not start for Constantinople, found himself at liberty to escort Laura Peyton and his cousin Annie, to view the ruins of Monkton Priory, which in themselves were quite worth the trouble of a ride; had they, however, been even a less interesting combination of bricks and mortar than the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square, (supposing such a thing possible,) it would not have signified to the party who then visited them. Never were three individuals less inclined to be critical, or more thoroughly determined to be pleased with every thing. The old grey ruins, frowning beneath the clear wintry sky, appeared the colour of strawberry ice to them; every object reflected the rose-tint of their happiness. As for Charley, a change had come o'er him; the indolent fastidious man of fashion, whose spotless gloves and irreproachable boots were the envy and admiration of Bond Street, had disappeared, and in his place arose an honest, genuine, light hearted, agreeable, sensible being, to whom nothing seemed to come amiss, and who appeared endowed with a preternatural power of diffusing his own superabundant happiness amongst all who came in contact with him. The girth of his saddle broke; they had no groom with them. "Grooms were such a bore, he would be groom," Charley had said, consequently, there were no means at hand by which the injury could be repaired.

"Well, never mind; he would get some string at the first cottage, and tie it up; he was rather glad it had happened, riding without a girth was great fun."

But Laura's horse stumbled, and Charley, forgetting his precarious seat, dashed in the spurs, intending to spring forward to her assistance. The horse did spring forward, but the saddle turned round. Mr. Leicester was, however, fated that day to fall on his legs, literally as well as metaphorically, and beyond being splashed up to his knees by alighting on a spot where the sun had thawed the ice into a puddle, he sustained no farther injury. Laura was frightened; he must not mount again till he had been able to get the girth mended.

"Very well," returned Charley; "he would lead the horse then; it was pleasanter to walk than to ride, such a cold day as that; he liked it particularly."

So he marched sturdily through mud and mire, leading his own horse, and resting his hand on the mane of the animal ridden by Laura, for the space of some five miles, laughing and talking all the time so agreeably, that the young lady came to the conclusion that she had never properly appreciated his powers of conversation till that moment. Altogether, despite the broken girth and the mud and the cold, to say nothing of a slight snow-storm which overtook them ere they reached home, each member of that little party felt mentally convinced that they had never enjoyed a ride so much before in all their lives.

"Arundel, where are you?" exclaimed Leicester, putting his head into the study as he passed the door on his way to his apartment. "Can you spare me five minutes' conversation?" he continued, as Lewis, closing a book, rose to receive him.

"Certainly," was the reply, "pray come in."

"I've been wishing to see you all day," resumed Leicester, carefully shutting the door, and glancing round the room; "Where is your charge?"

"He is with the General," was the reply; "he likes to have him for half-an-hour every day before he goes to dress; he talks to him, and tries to instil into his mind correct notions regarding things in general, and his own future social position in particular. Walter sits still and listens, but I'm afraid he does not understand much about it."

"No great loss, either, I've a notion," returned Charley, irreverently. He paused, whistled a few bars of "Son Celoso," entangled his spur in the hearthrug, extricated it with much difficulty, then turning abruptly to Lewis, he exclaimed,—"Arundel, I'm no hand at making fine speeches, but recollect if ever you want a friend, I owe you more than I can possibly repay you. Not that this is such a very uncommon relation for me to stand in towards people," he added with a smile.

"Nay," returned Lewis, "you are reversing our positions; I am your debtor for my introduction to this family, and for an amount of kindness and consideration, which you must be placed like myself in a dependent situation fully to appreciate. But," he added, glancing at his friend's happy face, "I hope you have some good news to tell me?"

"You are right in your conjecture," replied Leicester, "but it is mainly owing to your straightforward and sensible advice that I have gained the prize I strove for. I was within an ace of losing it, though;" and he then gave a hasty outline of his day's adventures, with which the reader has been already made acquainted.

Lewis congratulated him warmly on his good fortune: "You see I was right when I told you Miss Peyton was not so indifferent to you as you imagined," he said, "and that she liked you, not because you were a man of fashion, the admired of all admirers, but because she had sufficient penetration to discover that you were something more,—that you possessed higher and better qualities, and were not——"

"Go on, my dear Arundel," urged Leicester, as Lewis paused, "go on; I like plain speaking when it comes from a friendly mouth."

"The mere butterfly you strove to appear, I was going to say," resumed Lewis, "but you will think me strangely impertinent."

"Not at all," returned Leicester, "it's the truth; I can see it plainly now. I've taken as much trouble to make myself appear a fool as other men do to gain a reputation for wisdom. Well, it's never too late to mend; I shall turn over a new leaf from this time forth, give up dress, restrict myself to one cigar a-day, moderate my affection for pale ale, invest capital in worsted gloves and a cotton umbrella, and become a regular business character." He paused, and drawing a chair to the fire, seated himself, and stretching out his legs, subjected his boots, which bore unmistakable traces of his pedestrian episode, to the influence of the blazing wood. Having thus made himself comfortable, he fell into a fit of musing which lasted till, after gazing vacantly at his extended legs for some moments his features suddenly assumed an eager expression, and he exclaimed, "Confound those blockheads, Schneider & Shears, I suppose if I've told them once, I've told them fifty times, to give more room in the leg for riding-trousers—a horse's back is a wide thing, and of course, when you stretch your legs across it, you require the trousers to fit sufficiently loosely to accommodate themselves to the position: they need not set like a couple of hop sacks either; the thing's simple enough—I know if I'd a pair of scissors I could cut them out myself."

Glancing at Lewis as he spoke, Leicester perceived that he was struggling, not over successfully, to preserve his gravity, and the absurdity of the thing striking him for the first time, he indulged in a hearty laugh at his own expense 'ere he added, "Heigh ho! it's not so easy to get rid of old habits as one imagines; I see it will take me longer to unpuppyise myself than I was aware of. Seriously, however, I don't mean to continue a mere idler, living on my wife's fortune. My father has interest with Government, and I shall ask him to push it, and obtain for me some creditable appointment or other. He will have no difficulty; the Hon. Charles Leicester, husband to the rich Miss Peyton, will possess much stronger claims upon his country than Charley Leicester the portionless younger son. In this age of humbug it is easy enough to get a thing, if you don't care whether you have it or not; but if you chance to be some poor wretch, to whom the obtaining it is life or death, ten to one but you are done out of it.

Poverty is the only unpardonable sin in these days; the worship of the golden calf is a species of idolatry to which Christians are prone as well as Jews; it's rare to find a sceptic as to that religion, even amongst the most inveterate unbelievers."

Lewis, to whom Leicester in his self-engrossment had not perceived that his remarks would apply, bit his lip and coloured; then, wishing to save his companion the mortification of discovering that he had accidentally wounded his feelings, he hastened to change the conversation by observing,

"How will the magnanimous Marmaduke bear the news of your success?"

"Oh! to be sure, I was going to tell you about him, when something put it out of my head," returned Leicester. "The great De Grandeville was greater than ever on the subject—it was such fun—he came up to me after breakfast this morning, and catching hold of my button, began—'Ar—Mr. Leicester—excuse—ar—won't detain you five minutes, but—ar—you see in regard to—ar—the matter we conversed on yesterday, when you were good enough to give me the benefit of your opinion, concerning a certain proposed alliance, if I may call your attention once more to the subject; you will perceive that—ar—the affair has assumed a very different aspect—ar—indeed so completely different, that I feel confident you will agree with me in considering the—ar—in fact the arrangement no longer desirable.' I told him I was quite prepared to think as he did on this point, and begged to know in what the mysterious impediment consisted. 'Well, sir—ar—I don't say it—ar—by way of a boast—ar—such things are quite out of my line, but, you must have yourself perceived the very marked encouragement which my advances met with yesterday evening—ar—in fact the game was—ar—in my own hands!'—I succeeded in repressing a strong desire to kick him, and he continued with bland dignity—'Ar—finding that this was the case, I felt, that, as a man of honour, I was bound—ar—to make up my mind definitely as to my future course, and had—ar—all but resolved to acquaint the young lady with the brilliant, that is—ar—in many points unexceptionable position which awaited her, when fortunately—I might say providentially—it occurred to me to open a letter I had that evening received from my friend in the Herald's College. Imagine my horror to learn, that her actual father, the immediate previous Peyton himself, had—ar—horresco referens, as Pliny has it—upon my word it quite upset me!' 'This dreadful Papa, had he murdered somebody?' inquired I. 'No, sir,' was the answer, 'Lord Ferrers and other men with unexceptionable pedigrees have committed that crime; there is nothing necessarily vulgar about murder; the case was far worse—this intolerable proximate ancestor, who has not rested in his dishonoured grave above half-a-dozen years, was not only guilty of belonging to an intensely respectable firm in Liverpool, but had actually been insane enough to allow his name to be entered as sleeping partner in a large retail house on Ludgate Hill!

fancy a De Grandeville marrying the daughter of 'Plumpstern & Peyton, dealers in cotton goods;' 'pon my word, sir, it took away my breath to think of the narrow escape I'd had!' And the young lady? inquired I. 'Ar—of course it will be—ar—disappointment, as I've no doubt she considered—ar—that she'd made her book cleverly, and stood to win, as the betting men say; but—ar—she soon had tact enough to perceive that the grapes were sour—ar—took that tone immediately,—clever girl, sir, very—ar—I shouldn't wonder if she were to give out, that she had discouraged my attentions—ar—in fact, virtually refused me—ar—I shall not contradict her, I owe her that—ar—with the exception of yourself, Mr. Leicester, her secret will be perfectly safe in my keeping.' It was now my turn; so, drawing myself up as stiffly as old Grant himself, I said, 'Confidence begets confidence, Mr. De Grandeville; so, in return for your candour, allow me to inform you, that Miss Peyton, doubtless driven to despair by your desertion, has done me the honour to accept me as your substitute! One word more,' I continued, as, completely taken aback, he flushed crimson, and began stammering out apologetical ejaculations, 'I have listened in silence to your account of the transaction; I confess I have my own opinion about the matter, but, should you adhere to your intention of preserving a strict secrecy in regard to the affair, I shall do so likewise,—if not, I may feel called on to publish a somewhat different version of these love passages—one which will scarcely prove so agreeable to your self-esteem, unless, indeed,' I added, seeing that he was about to bluster, 'you prefer settling the business in a shorter way; in which case, I shall be quite at your service.' So saying, I raised my hat, bowed, and, turning on my heel, left him to his meditations."

"Which must have been of a singularly unsatisfactory nature, I should imagine," returned Lewis, laughing. "But there is no chance of your fighting, I hope?"

"Not the slightest, I expect," replied Leicester. "De Grandeville, to do him justice, is no coward, but he will have sense enough to see that he can gain no éclat by giving the affair publicity, and will remain quiet for his own sake. Luckily, I'm not of a quarrelsome temperament, or I should have horsewhipped him, or, at least, tried at it, when he was talking about Laura."

"It was a temptation which in your place I could not have resisted," rejoined Lewis.

"Ah, its easy to be magnanimous when one is happy," returned Leicester; "besides, I really was rather sorry for the poor devil, for, as I dare say you've guessed long ago, I've no doubt Laura refused him last night—in fact, she as good as told me so."

"Perhaps it may benefit him," remarked Lewis; "his vanity was too plethoric, and a little judicious lowering may conduce to the general health of his moral system."

"I'm afraid its a case of too long standing," replied Leicester; "such a lamentable instance of egotism on the brain is not so easily to be cured—however, he's had a pretty strong dose this time, I must confess. And now, seeing that my boots have been wet through for the last three hours, the sooner I get rid of them the better."—So saying, Charley Leicester took himself off, preparatory to performing the same operation on his perfidious boots.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE GENERAL TAKES THE FIELD.

THE interview which Lewis had witnessed between Lord Bellefield and the girl, dwelt in his thoughts, and was a source of much doubt and uneasiness to him. The quiet secluded life he had led for the last year, affording ample time for meditation,—the almost total want of society, (for poor Walter was no companion,)—the peculiar position in which he was placed, shut out from all the pleasures and excitements natural to his age and taste—had given an unusually reflective turn to his vigorous mind, and produced in him a gravity and depth of character, to which, under different circumstances, he might never have attained. Thus, in the views he took of life, he was accustomed to look beyond the surface, and deeming it unworthy of a believer in the truths of Christianity to attribute events to the mere caprice of a blind destiny, was rather disposed to trace in such occurrences the finger of a directing Providence, and to consider them opportunities purposely thrown in our way, for the use or abuse of which we should one day be called to account, as for every talent committed to our charge. Holding these opinions, he could not be content to sit down quietly with the knowledge of which he had become possessed, without making some effort to prevent Lord Bellefield from successfully accomplishing the evil he could not doubt he meditated. But what then should he do? The question was not an easy one to answer. The most natural and effectual means to employ, would be to inform General Grant of the affair; he was the person likely (as the father of his future bride) to possess most influence over Lord Bellefield, while as possessor of the estate on which they resided, he was certain to meet with respect and obedience from the parents of the girl. But besides the dislike every honourable man feels to undertake the office of talebearer, Lewis's chivalrous nature shrank from even the appearance of seeking to wreak his revenge on the man who had insulted him, by injuring him in the opinion of his future father-in-law. Again, were he to seek out the girl, and expostulate with her, he felt certain he should produce no good effect—the fact of her being aware of the terms on which he stood with her admirer would render her suspicious of his intentions, and prevent her from paying any regard to his arguments. At last it occurred to him: to mention the thing to Charles Leicester, and persuade him, if possible, to visit the girl, and, at all events, to make her aware of the deceit which had been practised upon her by his brother in assuming his name. Accordingly, he determined to seek an early opportunity of speaking to Leicester on the subject; but good resolutions are always more easy to form than to carry into effect. On the following morning Leicester went to town, as well to acquaint his father with the important step he contemplated, as to bear in person an invitation to an old family friend and ci-devant guardian of Laura Peyton's, to join the party at Broadhurst; nor did he return till after several days had elapsed, so that it was nearly a week ere Lewis found the opportunity he sought for.

There had been a dinner party at Broadhurst, and, as was the custom of the neighbourhood, the guests had departed early. Lewis waited till Leicester had disposed of a lady, whom he was handing to her carriage, then drawing him aside, he made him acquainted with the interview which he had involuntarily witnessed; informing him at the same time of his object in so doing. As he proceeded with his tale, Leicester's brow grew dark.

"It is really too bad of Bellefield," he muttered, "situated as he is in regard to this family; it shows a want of all proper feeling—all delicacy of mind—assuming my name too! Suppose it had come to Laura's ears by any chance—'pon my word I've a great mind to speak to him about it—though, I don't know, it would only lead to a quarrel—Bellefield is not a man to brook interference—I feel quite as you do about it, my dear Arundel, but really I don't see that I can do anything that would be of the slightest use."

"Surely you can find out the girl, and prove to her the truth of my statement, that your brother has deceived her by assuming your name—you owe that to yourself."

"She would be certain to tell him of it the next time she sees him," returned Leicester, uncasily; "it would lead to a quarrel between us, and you don't know what Bellefield's resentment is when it's once excited—it's actually terrific, and that's the truth."

"But for your cousin, Miss Grant's sake, you ought not to let your brother proceed with this affair," urged Lewis; "surely you must see the matter in this light?"

"Ah! poor Annie," returned Leicester, with a half sigh; "I sometimes wish that engagement had never been entered into. I doubt whether they are at all calculated to render each other happy. In fact, I've learned to look upon marriage in a very different light lately—however, it's no business of mine, wiser heads will have to settle it, luckily"—He paused, and after a few moments' deliberation, resumed abruptly, "I'll do as you advise, Arundel. I'll see this girl, and talk to her, and if Bellefield hears of it, and makes himself disagreeable, why it can't be helped, that's all—he should not attempt such things—particularly in this neighbourhood. He ought to have more respect for the General and his daughter; it shows a want of good taste and good feeling; besides, as well as I can judge from the glimpse I had of her in the refreshment room, the girl's not so

"Just fancy my coming out in the character of a virtuous Mentor. I only hope I shall get through my arduous duties without laughing at my own performance. 'Pon my word, though, it's rather serious, when a man feels inclined to scoff at himself for doing his duty from the sheer inconsistency of the thing. I tell you what, Arundel, I believe I've been a very naughty boy without in the least knowing it. I've always considered myself the victim of circumstances, and set all my peccadilloes down to that account;—but I don't see why I need bother you by making you my father confessor?"

Lewis, considering the train of thought into which Leicester had fallen one likely to lead to useful practical results, was about to encourage him to proceed, when a servant approached them, and placed a small, crumpled, and not over clean piece of paper in Lewis's hand. Holding it under the light of a lamp, he was enabled with difficulty to decipher the following words:—

"TO MUSTER ARUNDEL.—Sur, the party as you knows of is hout to-night, and more of his sort along vith him. Ve are safe for a shindy; but being quite ready for ther blackguards, lives in good 'opes hof a capture—him which hif you likes to assist, not minding a crack o' ther head, should sich occur, which will sometimes in ther best regerlated famurlies, pleas to follur ther bearer, as will conduct you to your humbel servaunt to commarnd,

"J. MILLAR."

"That's glorious," exclaimed Lewis, placing the missive in the hands of his companion; "I never did catch a poacher in my life, but I've often wished to do so—the whole scene must be so picturesque and unlike anything one has ever met with—the darkness, the excitement—but you are laughing at my cagerness. Well, I confess to a love of adventure for its own sake; if I'd lived in the middle ages I should have been a knight errant, that's certain. I suppose it's no use asking you to join us? there's nictal more attractive in the drawing room, n'est-ce pas?"

"Why," returned Charley, arranging his neckcloth by aid of a glass placed in the cloak-room for the benefit of the ladies who wished to wrap up becomingly; "really I must own I prefer Laura's smiles even to the delights of a possible rencontre with your friend Mr. Whats-his name the poacher."

"Hardy is the fellow's name," replied Lewis; "he is a chartist and all sorts of horrors, so that I don't feel the smallest degree of sympathy for him. Do you know where the General is to be found? I suppose, as I may be very late, or even obliged to sleep at Millar's cottage, I must ask his sanction ere I start on my expedition."

"I think you'd better," returned Leicester, "he's in the library—I saw him go there after he had seen Lady Ruynymede to her carriage. So good night—I shall be curious to learn in the morning whose brains have been knocked out;" and with this agreeably suggestive remark Leicester ended the conversation, and strolled off to the drawing-room.

Lewis proceeded at once to the library, where he found not only General Grant, but, to his extreme annoyance, Lord Bellefield also; there was, however, no help for it, and he accordingly explained his wishes as briefly as possible. The General heard him to the end without speaking—his first idea was, that such a request was strange, and unbecoming the peaceful gravity that should environ the office of a tutor, and he intended to favour him with a dignified refusal; but as Lewis proceeded, his eager tones and sparkling eyes recalled to the old officer the days of his youth, when the spirit of enterprise was strong within him, and in the wild bivouac, the dashing assault, the hand to hand struggle, "i' the imminent deadly breach," and the many exciting vicissitudes of a campaigning life, he had found a degree of pleasure which his age knew not, and he was fain to accord a gracious assent.

"Your father was a soldier, Mr. Arundel, I think you told me?"

Lewis replied in the affirmative, mentioning some engagement in which he had particularly distinguished himself. The General listened to him with complacency, then exclaimed,—

"That's it, sir, that's it! I confess when I first heard your request I considered it unnatural, in fact, unbecoming in a civilian, but in a soldier's son it assumes an entirely different character. I like to see spirit in a young man." (here he glanced at Lord Bellefield, who, apparently engrossed by a legal document which he was perusing, seemed unconscious of Lewis's presence.) "It's a pity your father was unable to afford you a commission: there's been some very pretty fighting in India lately, and you might have distinguished yourself." He paused, then added, "I know most of the agricultural labourers about here; did Millar tell you any of these poachers' names?"

"Hardy, a blacksmith, was the most notorious character," returned Lewis.

As he mentioned the name, Lord Bellefield started so violently that he nearly overturned the lamp by which he was reading. Seeing the General's eyes fixed on him inquiringly, he rose, and putting his hand to his side, drew a deep breath as he exclaimed,

"One of those sharp stitches, as they call them,—nothing worse. You know I am subject to them; it's want of exercise, producing indigestion. I tell you what," he continued, "I've rather a curiosity to witness Mr. Arundel's prowess, and see what sport this poacher will afford. Man-hunting, in the literal ferre nature sense of the term, will be a new excitement."

"We'll all go," exclaimed the General, springing up with the alertness of a young man; "if these rascals choose to trespass on my land and destroy my property, why so fit to resist them and bring them to justice as myself? I'll make the necessary alteration in my dress, and we'll start immediately."

Lord Bellefield urged the lateness of the hour, the cold night air, the chance of danger to life or limb,—but in vain; General Grant had taken the crotchet into his head, and he was not the man to be easily induced to change his mind. Accordingly Lewis found himself suddenly associated with two as strange companions as ever a man was embarrassed withal. Still there was no help for it; and inwardly pondering what possible reason Lord Bellefield could have for joining the expedition, and why he had started at the mention of Hardy's name, Lewis hastened to wrap himself in a rough pea-jacket, and selected a heavy knotted stick, wherewith he proposed to knock respect for the rights of property into the head of any misguided individual who might be deaf to all milder argument. As he returned to the hall, the General made his appearance, carrying under his arm a cavalry sabre; his bearing was even more stiff and erect than usual, and his eye flashed with all the fire of youth.

"Early on parade, I see, Mr. Arundel," he said, with something more nearly approaching to a smile on his countenance than Lewis had ever previously observed there; "we'll read these poaching rascals a lesson they will not easily forget, sir."

As he spoke, a light footstep was heard approaching, and in another moment Annie Grant bounded down the staircase, her glossy curls streaming wildly over her shoulders, and her cheeks flushed with the speed at which she had come.

"My dear papa!" she began, then turning pale as her eye fell upon the sword, she continued—"Oh! it is really true! I hoped they were only deceiving me in jest. Dearest papa, you will be good and kind, and not go out after these men? Suppose any accident should occur? think how valuable your life is—papa, you will not go?"

"Annie, I thought you were perfectly aware of my extreme dislike to, or I may say, disapproval of all uncalled-for displays of feeling; I am about to perform a duty incumbent on my position, and I need scarcely add that any attempt to induce me to neglect that duty, will not only prove ineffectual but will be highly displeasing to me. Not another word," he continued, seeing she was about to resume her entreaties; "return immediately to the drawing-room, and apologise to our friends in my name for being obliged to leave them."

At this moment a servant announced that his master's shooting pony was at the door, and that Lord Bellefield had already started; so placing his hat on his head with an air of offended dignity, the General marched proudly out of the hall. Lewis was about to follow him, when, glancing at Annie, he perceived that she had sunk into a chair, and covering her face with her hands, had given way to an irrepressible burst of tears. The young tutor paused—wishing to reassure her by promising to use his best efforts to shield her father from danger, and yet fearing to intrude upon her grief. In his embarrassment he accidentally dropped his stick—starting at the sound, Annie for the first time perceived him, and springing up, she came hurriedly towards him, exclaiming—

"Oh, Mr. Arundel! I am so glad you are going. You will take care of papa, will you not?"

As she spoke, she laid her hand on his arm, and gazed up into his face imploringly.

"I will most assuredly try to do so, Miss Grant," returned Lewis, calmly, though that light touch thrilled through him like a shock of electricity. "You need not alarm yourself so greatly," he continued, anxious to soothe her; "believe me, your apprehensions have greatly exaggerated any probable danger."

"You really think so?" returned Annie, doubtfully. "At all events," she continued, "I shall be much happier now I know you are going; I am sure you will try and take care of papa."

"I will, indeed," returned Lewis, earnestly, as, glancing towards the door, he essayed to depart; but Annie, completely engrossed by her anxiety to secure his services on her father's behalf, still unconsciously retained her hold on his arm, and Lewis was obliged gently to remove the little hand that detained him. As their fingers met, Annie, becoming suddenly aware of what Miss Livingstone would have termed her "indiscreet and unpardonable heedlessness," blushed very becomingly; then, with a sudden impulse of gratitude and warm feeling, she extended her hand to Lewis, saying,

"Thank you very much for all your kindness, Mr. Arundel. Mind you take good care of yourself as well as of papa—I shall not go to bed till I hear you have brought him safe home again."

Lewis pressed the fair hand offered to him, repeated his assurances that her alarm was unnecessary, and hastened to follow General Grant. Annie gazed after him with tearful eyes, but his words comforted her. She had begun already to rely on him in moments of difficulty or danger.

BY FRANCIS SCHROEDER.

At twelve o'clock on the fourth, we descended from the mountains of Loja, and passing through a ravine, we entered upon the far-famed Plain of Granada, that vast and beautiful meadow, the garden of the luxurious Moor for almost eight hundred years, and the theatre of more gallant and knightly chivalry than all the crusader battle-fields of Syria.

It is about thirty miles long and sixteen broad, of irregular shape, and on one edge of it is the city of Granada. We entered upon the Vega at a point about fifteen miles from the city, and on each side of us, therefore, as we descended from the Sierra, the valley opened upon us in all its wonderful beauty, set like some perfect and entire chrysolite among the rugged mountain barriers on every side, the rich and thickly-peopled country extending a grand garden of its own various fruits, intersected by the graceful curvings of the Xenil and Darro. Glittering towns are interspersed in all the quaint architecture of the Moors. Mountains encircle the fairy land in the most various outline imaginable, from the rich verdant slope to steeppling crags and precipices of marble, and joining in the north, as at a focus, in the snow-clad summits of the Sierra Nevada. Mulahacen, with three exceptions the loftiest peak in Europe, appears to soar in snowy grandeur far into the blue depths of the sky, and immediately at its base, on a sloping hill side, is seated the crescent city of Granada.

I believe there is no such inland landscape on earth—the pure white city, a glittering half-moon, clothing the ascent of a hill, as if set up to be wondered at; the buildings rising in terraces, and decorated with the most superb foliage, profusion of turrets, and gilded cupolas. The summit of the hill is crowned with the towers, ramparts, balconies, and gardens of the Alhambra; the two rivers, like defensive moats, embrace the feet of the city, and over against all, like the field for this incomparable picture, is the grandeur of Mulahacen. Between the summit of the giant mountain, the outline of which is of the most fantastic group of snows and glacier—between this frigid and unknown region and the beautiful summer and fairy land at its base, the intervening sides are precipices of prodigious height of rock, the colour and almost the quality of porphyry, with enormous ridges and deep ravines, through which the mountain springs tumble in cataracts into the plain. The city is set in the relief of this stupendous ridge, and around us on every side the plain extends away in the contrast of luxurious summer. Such was our first view of Granada across the Vega, every rood of which has been fertilized with human blood; the great scene of Moorish poetry, of the glory of Isabella, and the arena of the most chivalrous deeds of man; for centuries the seat of the splendour, pride, and luxury of the Moorish kings, and of a nation then far more advanced in arts and wealth than all Christendom. Granada even yet lives in the hearts of the Arabs, as the holy city lived in the ambition of the Crusaders. The Moor, however, exhibits the more faithful constancy, for Jerusalem is well nigh forgotten by the Christians, while the recovery of Granada, a city for a few years only consecrated to Mahomet, is still the cherished daily prayer of the Arabs.

Perhaps nothing can be so disappointing as the first view of the Alhambra—a wretched looking range of red structures (Alhambra, in Arabic, meaning red house), with no elegance of exterior, and no apparent order. I was reminded of Sir Walter's description of Monkbarns, "apparently, some hamlet had suddenly stood still in leading down one of Orpheus's country dances." The walls are quite unornamented, being gravel and pebbles, daubed coarsely over with red plaster. But oh! the incomparable fairy world within!

A distant view of some rich opera scene, or the mind's gayest conception of Aladdin's palaces, are all that I can liken to the sudden splendours we found within these unpromising walls.

There are not many things in all the works of man which can compete with this part of the Alhambra in exquisite, minute, and elaborate splendour; and one might fill a carte blanche from passages in the Arabian Nights, multiplied by the brains of all poets and all architects, and still fail to convey the proper impression. The noting of size, extent, and method would seem to encumber the mind, and lead it in a direction which never occurs for a moment to the spectator. I suppose I was three hours in the Court of the Lions and the halls adjacent, and never for a moment did it occur to me to think how big it was. The whole soul of my admiration was steeped in the beauty, the richness, and the fairy-like workmanship, which remains entire and absolute, as though six hundred years had passed over the scene like six hundred straws in a summer breeze.

But to descend to particulars, and not to allow your fancies to roam on too wide a scale, I should think (for I possess no references except my own impressions)—I should think the size of the Court of the Lions to be a rectangular parallelogram of one hundred and fifty by seventy-five English feet, the centre of which is occupied by a fountain which gives the name to the quarto; twelve or fourteen marble lions stand in a circle, their heads fronting out; their backs support a large basin or salver beautifully wrought from a single block of white marble, carved and chased; and in the centre of this stands a huge urn of the same material, and rich workmanship. At present the fountain is not ordinarily in operation, but it was easy to imagine the effect of a single perpendicular jet d'eau mounting from the centre of the urn, the water falling into the salver, and then passing through the mouths of the lions, it runs along beautifully-wrought canals and little reservoirs about the marble pavement. The whole court is surrounded by the most exquisite conceivable colonnade of marble, light and fairy-like, and supporting horseshoe arches; the pillars being irregularly placed, sometimes two or three under one capital, and sometimes single—all of exquisite workmanship, and the very materiality of grace. The shape of the arches, purely Arabic, is delicious; the capitals are most fantastically designed, and the exterior face of the arches, as well as the façade above, is one continued labyrinth of fretwork, lace-work of the most profuse and unceasing richness and carving, that it is possible to fancy. The ceiling of the portico vaults is much more complicated and rich than the communa, and the most extraordinary delicacy of construction prevails throughout: the whole seemed to me like a princess arrayed as for her bridal in the richest laces and embroidery, satins, and whole "stomachers of gems." The ceilings are frosted, filigreed, enamelled blue and gold, looking in some places like an inverted bed of amethysts peppered with gold dust; in others, like some embroidered ten thousand franc mouchoir, imitated in marble; in others, like an illuminated page of the Koran; and again, like a gigantic, hollow cone of lapis lazuli, intersected and studded with frosty stars: fantastic, picturesque, Romanesque, grotesque, arabesque.

Nothing in architectural artifice that I have ever seen approaches the halls communicating with the Court of the Lions, in intricate and mazy beauty. Pure white marble slabs of great size are the universal pavement. At each end of the court project open cabinets or porticoes, of even more elaborate and graceful design, and four enormous double doors of some dark and durable wood, carved with the same extraordinary minuteness, conduct to various apartments, and lead away through corridors, galleries, and stairways to various parts of the palace.

The Court of the Lions! Moorish kings, sultans, and caliphs had not the fictitious magnificence the readers of the Arabian Nights suppose.

We entered, I believe, on the west side, and continuing along the southern colonnade, we passed through one of the four double doors I have mentioned, and found ourselves in a circular apartment enriched in a hundred ways in all the splendours I have attempted to describe to you. The ceiling is a dome decorated with pendant arches, enamelled, embossed, gilded, carved, and moulded in every possible manner; the walls of the curious lace and stucco work; in the centre is the constant fountain, a single jet, and along marble canals the refreshing water ran sparkling into the reservoirs of the court. The floor is of huge slabs of white marble, several of which bear the ineffaceable marks of guilt. This is the world-renowned Hall of the Abencerrages, where a princely race was well-nigh extinguished by the cruel treachery of their king. I wish I could refer to our friend's beautiful Moorish ballads, to trace the poetical story in its appropriate splendour. St. Pierre related it afterwards as follows: One of the Abencerrages (a powerful family in Granada) was the special favourite of Abdallah, or Boabdil, (the proper name being Abou-abdoulah; hence either derivation), and his ruin was accomplished by an envious courtier, who, Iago-like, worked upon the jealousy of the credulous king. Boabdil, in his misery, resolved on the most absolute revenge, and, having invited the whole clan to an entertainment at the palace, he caused each one to be beheaded as he entered this hall. The beautiful and innocent sultana was sentenced to be burned alive, if within a certain period she did not produce four knights to defend her cause in the lists. Many of the Moorish chivalry offered themselves for the trial, but she peremptorily refused to accept them; and the torch was about to be applied to the faggots, when a single bugle blast was heard at the outer gates of the fortress, and four knights rode toward the lists in strict incognito. They fought and defeated the four accusers, one of whom was the villain who had invented the plot. With his dying breath he disclosed his treachery, and the innocent queen was carried to the palace in triumph. She never would see the king again, however, and his anguish from this event may have hastened his surrender. We were afterward shown the cypresses, which the accuser pointed out as the guilty rendezvous; they overshadow an exquisite little stone bower in the gardens of the Jenerallife, most lover-like and secret. But who, think you, blew that "single bugle-blast," which echoed so well-timed from the outer gate? and who, think you, the four champions in mask, who levelled their avenging lances at the false accusers? Christian knights! for the love of honour and of arms! Don Ferdinand of Cordova, Don Alonzo, and I don't know what heroic Dons, were the victors in this "trial by battel."

All this is very captivating, and the romantic heroism of these knights entirely accords with the sober detail of history. In this war the very essence of chivalry was developed, and the Moors were by no means outdone by the Christians in acts of generosity and honour. Instance the anecdote of the Moorish chief, who, in a scouting expedition, encountered several beautiful children of Christian nobles playing with their nurses in the fields. "Get ye home to your mothers, ye prattling vagabonds," said he to the frightened group, and, turning to his bannerman, he said, "How can we harm such innocents?" Such is one of a hundred examples related.

A walk through the Alhambra is like a very intense perusal of such chapters: the picturesque history is matched throughout with appropriate scene.

We descended by a stairway, one of a great many; spiral, twisting, state, and secret. We found an endless range of rooms, the most important being the royal chamber, conforming in all respects with the general elegance. There are two alcoves for the beds, raised from the floor, an exquisite fountain in the centre of the apartment, and their majesties could be lulled to sleep by the tuneful birds in the prison gardens.

For summer luxury, and in adaptation to the climate, nothing could be more admirable. I have seen all the comfortable splendours of the royal private apartments in Windsor Castle, and, remembering the date and the present difference of race, certainly the Moor of 1400 A.D. could match the British princes in all luxury: and when we recall the rich equipage and furniture of the Alhambra as it was four hundred years ago, the precious woods of citron, sandal, aloes, and olive wood, ivory, and Mosaic of pearl; the gold and enamel work; the rich dresses, the costly hangings, the curious works of art, and ingenious toys which abounded; the baths and plentiful luxuries; and the inhabitants of this sumptuous abode arrayed in fine lincos and embroidered native silks, plumes, velvets, glittering with gems and wrought gold, and compare them with the British monarchs of that day, we shall have a striking contrast. At a still earlier period, when the palace floors of Windsor were strewn with rushes and straw, the richest carpets and ottomans were laid upon the superb marbles of the Alhambra.

But there were other and far more important superiorities of the Moor; learning, literature, art, science, and accomplishments of every sort. Their national greatness attained its highest importance in the tenth century, when one of their kings accumulated a library of six hundred thousand volumes. Eighty free schools were established in Cordova, and the best scholars of Christian Europe flocked to the Moorish colleges. Nothing in all antiquity surpassed the means of accomplishments and learning; and philosophers, poets, historians of the Arabs grew great in numbers and in fame. At this period, the last Saxon king was on the throne of England, and ruled over a people described by Hume as "uncultivated, ignorant of letters, unskilled in the mechanical arts, untamed to submission to law and government," &c.

While such was the state of England and of Europe, the single city of Cordova possessed six hundred public temples, and the palace of the king was a great academy to which the students of all nations flocked, and the king himself partook of their learned conferences.

At a later age, when Edward the First was on the throne of England, there were fifty colleges on the Plain of Granada; and in Moorish Spain no less than seventy public libraries. The state of learning and literature at the same period in Christian Europe was yet in its dark period.

The revenue of the Arab sovereigns in the tenth century, derived from commerce, husbandry, mines, and herds, &c. amounted to nearly $30,000,000; and a hundred years later, William the Conqueror was unable to obtain 2,000,000 from his new kingdom by every means of oppression. In short, all Christian Europe was in its dark age, and from the Spanish Moors came one principal impulse for their enlightenment and regeneration. In agriculture, nautical science, and the arts of war, the most important lessons were derived from them. The Arabs were devoted to natural and mathematical sciences; Algebra was their gift to all other Europe; they were the first to manufacture paper; and the application of gunpowder to the military science was due to the ingenuity of this extraordinary people. So great was the thirst for knowledge among all classes of Moors, that we are told blind men were eminent scholars among them five hundred years ago, when at the enlightened period of this present day, we look with astonishment at ingenious methods by which the blind can obtain the most common-place information. Astronomy made vast strides in improvement, and their instruments and observatories were brought to great perfection. Their historians number thirteen hundred writers, and their treatises upon logic and metaphysics, we are told by Mr. Prescott, amount to one ninth of the surviving treasures of the Spanish royal library. The writing of their philosophers, historians, poets, were translated and diffused throughout Europe. In every thing they appear to have quickened the dormant energies of Christians. They even taught them lessons in gallantry and chivalry, and it is not the least interesting item of their great examples, that the famed knightly orders of the Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of St. John, were imitations of Moorish Crusaders against Christian Infidels. The existence of such an order among the Arabs was a century earlier than the first Christian brotherhood of knights. They were distinguished for their austere and frugal habits, and being stationed on the borders, were bound by a vow against the Christian Infidels.

Such are some of the interesting facts for which we have to thank the industry and research of the historian of Ferdinand and Isabella; and to have enjoyed the benefit of his information on the spot most associated with the glories of the Spanish Moors, was no common gratification.

THE EMIGRANT MOTHER TO HER CHILDREN.

BY MRS. TRAILL,

Author of "The Backwoods of Canada."

My children, would you knew the land,
The pleasant land—the free,
Where once a careless child I roved
O'er woodland hill and lea!

There daisies lift their starry eyes
To greet you as you pass,
And there the sweet low violet blows
Unseen amid the grass.

And merry 'tis at matin prime
The joyous lark to hear,
The blackbird with his bugle note
That singeth loud and clear;

The linnet and the mellow thrush,
'The lovelorn nightingale,'
That to the lonely ear of night
Telleth her mournful tale.

And sweet it is on Sabbath morn
The pealing bells to hear,
Oh, sweeter far than song of birds,
'They tell us God is near.

And many a pleasant sight there is,
And pleasant sound to hear.
My children, 'tis my native land,
Oh! would that we were there.

But oh! that loved, that blessed land
Thy mother ne'er will see,
Where the dark woods wave must be her grave,
'Neath the lonely hemlock tree.

THE DEAD SOLDIER.

This is a small, but excellent copy of a very celebrated print. Wright of Derby was an artist famous in his day, rather for bold and striking scenes, and fire light effects, than for the expression of the pathetic. Here is a composition, however, which must come home to every heart, and speak volumes against the inhuman practice of war. It is needless to dilate on what the painter has so well depicted; the agony and despair of the wretched woman, who has followed her husband through the perils and hardships of a campaign, and is now left desolate and unprotected.

The smiles of the unconscious infant heighten by contrast the painful interest of the expression. How many such scenes go to the making up of one campaign!

CURIOSITIES OF SCIENCE.

BY JOHN TIMES,

EDITOR OF "THE YEAR-BOOK OF FACTS," ETC.

ECONOMY OF ELECTRIC LIGHT.

The notion of electricity as a source of illumination was suggested by Davy nearly half a century ago; and the application is, in all respects, practical, save in the matter of expense. Mr. Brande tells us that a mode of procuring cheap electricity must precede the economical use of such illumination; and that, were this obtained, water might be decomposed, and its hydrogen naphthalized, burnt, so as to produce a vivid, bright, and steady flame in its other element, oxygen.

ELECTRICITY OF GRAVE-YARDS.

Sir James Murray recommends the advocates of intramural interments to employ accurate electricians, with delicate instruments, to measure the terrible galvanic derangements of fermenting churchyards as the best proof of the fatality of the practice. Sir James refers to an effervescing golgotha, long kept in active fermentation in Belfast, near the quays, and on a level with low-water mark. During many years, Sir James had proofs demonstrating that persons residing in tenements opening into this Belfast grave-yard could not be efficiently electrified, because the best machines could seldom produce sparks of any intensity. He often noticed that a magnet capable of sustaining fifty pounds with ease in other situations, could not for a moment suspend an iron of ten pounds in the habitations built close to this devastating place of interment. From these and many other observations, Sir James proved that negative electricity pervaded this vast swamp, and drew away the positive electricity from the living creatures in immediate contact with the damp earth and air of that fatal and extended trough, or galvanic pile.

VAST HYDRAULIC PRESS.

The largest of the Bramah's hydraulic presses, (the hoisting apparatus in the construction of the Britannia railway bridge,) is a noble instrument. It has a cylinder eleven inches thick, with a piston or ram twenty inches in diameter, and the lift a span of six feet. The weight of the cylinder is sixteen tons,—of the whole machine forty tons. This one alone has power enough to lift the whole, a weight, it is estimated, equivalent to that of 30,000 men. It would spout the water pressed into its cylinder to a height of nearly 20,000 feet, according to Mr. Clark, the engineer, or more than five times the height of Snowdon, or 5,000 feet higher than Mont Blanc. And yet, any one man can "put a hook into the nose of this leviathan," and, alone with him, with the utmost facility and precision, guide and control his stupendous action.

LAW OF STORMS

Captain Händley, of the Saltany, has recently most successfully tested the truth of the law which regards tropical tornadoes as cyclones, or revolving masses of air travelling along certain curved lines. The edge of the cyclone referred to was thirty degrees, at least, from Bombay, Calcutta, and Aden, and its effects were felt at the distance of 2,000 miles. The course of the ship Sullany was south-west, when, overtaken by the storm, Captain Handley says, in his log, he "furl'd top-sails and fore-sails and rounded the ship to, with her head to the eastward, as I have every reason to believe I am on the edge of a hurricane." The storm passed onward to the south-west; and thus, by laying to, and steering to the eastward, Captain Handley, no doubt, saved his ship and 300 coolies on board. This triumph of scientific observation cannot be too widely known.—Athenæum.

NEW REMEDY FOR DEAFNESS.

Glycerine has been highly successful in its results on diseases of the ear, from its possessing the peculiar property of attracting from the atmospheric air moisture, and consequently, never drying or hardening.

COLOUR OF TREE-FROGS.

In the newly erected Reptile House in the Zoological Society's gardens in the Regent's Park, is a glazed case of the Tree-Frogs of Europe. Although of a bright green when exposed to light, these creatures become almost black in the dark; and for some time after their new location, the specimens in the gardens presented every possible shade between a dark brown and bright green, owing to their having been recently kept in a dark place.

MOLECULAR ACTION.

M. Niepce has discovered that, when a print is held over the vapour of iodine, the iodine is attracted almost exclusively by the ink. By applying an engraving thus saturated with iodine particles to a film of starch spread on a glass surface, he thus obtained, in iodide of starch, a perfect transcript of the original design.—Communicated by Prof. Dumas to Mr. Faraday.

DANGER FROM STORMS.

We are often told that there is no danger if a certain interval of time can be counted between the flash of the lightning, and the report of the thunder; but it is equally true, that if we can count at all, we are safe.

MANUFACTURE OF GLASS.

It is a curious fact in the history of discovery, that the manufacture of glass was, a few years since, unknown at Sidon, where it is reputed to have been first invented.—Pellat's Curiosities of Glass-making.

TO DETECT IMPOSITION IN GOLD-DUST.

Place a little gold-dust in a glass tube or earthenware saucer, and pour nitric acid upon it; then hold the glass or saucer over a flame, or upon a few embers, until red flames (nitric vapours) arise: if it be pure gold, the liquid will not become discoloured; but if pyrites, or brass filings should have been mixed with it, the acid will become turbid, green and black, discharging bubbles of gas. After the ebullition has ceased, the residue should be washed with water, and acid again poured upon it, when the same effect may be observed, but in a less degree; and if the experiment be repeated till all the effervescence ceases, it will finally leave the gold-dust pure.—Professor Ansted, M.A. F.R.S.

CHARACTERISTICS OF GOLD.

Gold can be distinguished by its relative weight or specific gravity, and by its relative hardness, from other bodies which resemble it. It is described generally as soft, completely malleable and flexible, but more accurately as softer than iron, copper, or silver, but harder than tin and lead. It is useful to know facts of this kind, as a simple experiment that can be made with instruments at hand, is often more valuable than a much more accurate examination requiring materials not immediately available. Thus, if it is found that a specimen, (perhaps a small scale or spangle,) is readily scratched by silver, copper, or iron, and scratches tin and lead, it may, if of the right colour and sinking rapidly in water, be fairly assumed to be gold.—Professor Ansted.

THE LARGEST LUMP OF GOLD.

We believe the largest lump of gold ever found, to be that obtained in 1843, in the mines south of Miask, and now at St. Petersburg, the weight of which is no less than seventy-eight pounds avoirdupois—its value, therefore, about 3,000*l*.—Professor Ansted.

GUN COTTON IN WARFARE.

It is stated that gun cotton was used, for the first time, in actual warfare, at the storming of Mooltan, in the Punjab. The brilliance and breadth of the flash from the guns are described as of great intensity.

ALL THE UNIVERSE IN MOTION.

If, for a moment, we imagine the acuteness of our senses preternaturally heightened to the extreme limits of telescopic vision, and bring together events separated by wide intervals of time, the apparent repose which reigns in space will suddenly vanish, countless stars will be seen moving in groups in various directions; nebulae wandering, condensing, are dissolving, like cosmical clouds; the milky way breaking up in parts, and its veil rent asunder. In every point of the celestial vault, we should recognise the dominion of progressive movement, as on the surface of the earth, where vegetation is constantly putting forth its leaves and buds, and unfolding its blossoms. The celebrated Spanish botanist Cavanilles, first conceived the possibility of "seeing grass grow," by placing the horizontal micrometer wire of a telescope, with a high magnifying power, at one time on the point of a bamboo-shoot, and at another on the rapidly unfolding flowering stem of an American aloe; precisely as the astronomer places the cross wires on a culminating star. Throughout the whole life of physical nature—in the organic as in the sidereal world—existence, preservation, production, and development, are alike associated with motion as their essential condition.—Humboldt's "Cosmos."

HOW CHRONOMETERS ARE TRIED AT GREENWICH.

Chronometers offered to government for purchase are placed at the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the first or second week in January, where they are ranged upon shelves round "the Chronometer Room," and each is daily compared with an astronomical clock, and its rate carefully noted. This is continued until the middle of July, during which time the temperature of the room is considerably varied: the windows are thrown open during six or seven of the coldest weeks, and for about an equal period the heat is raised 80° or 90° by fires, which are attended at intervals of two hours night and day; for the rest of the time the Chronometers remain in the ordinary temperatures. This constitutes the usual trial: but for such Chronometers as are subjected to the extreme trial, an iron tray is provided over the stove, the mean temperature of which may be taken at about 100 Fahr.; and for the cold, they are placed outside a window on the north side of the building. The severity of both the ordinary and extreme trials with regard to the cold will, of course, vary in different years, according to the severity of the season.—Mr. Soreby.

INSECTS AS REMEDIES.

Insects once occupied a place as important as herbs in the list of sovereign remedies. To take a Woodlouse or Millepedes, perhaps, alive, and conveniently self-rolled for the occasion, was as common as to take a vegetable pill. Five gnats were administered with as much confidence as three grains of calomel. In an alarming fit of cholic, no visitor with a dram of peppermint could have been more cordially welcomed or swallowed than a lady-bird. Fly-water was eye-water, and even that water-shunning monster, Hydrophobia, was urged to lap aqua pura by the administration of a dry cockchaffer. Like other dogs and drugs, these have all had their day in the world of medicine, but have left behind them that salutary biter, the Cantharides, or Spanish flies of Europe, and the Meloe Chicorei, used by the natives of the Celestial empire for the same purpose of drawing off terrestrial humours.—Episodes of Insect Life.

IMITATIVE GALVANISM.

Galvani, in the last century showed that convulsions ensued in a limb by simply bringing into connexion the muscles and nerves. In the muscles we have a nitrogenized material, which is acid; in the blood we have a nitrogenized material, which is alkaline; the connecting part or nervous fibres are neutral. Mr. Smee, F.R.S. says: "We may imitate such a combination, by using a solution of ferrocyanate of potash, a compound of iron, nitrogen, carbon, and potash, with a little alkali for one side, a solution of the red ferrocyanate for the other side, and connect the two with a solution of chloride of sodium, or common salt.—Elements of Electro-Biology.

REMARKABLE ACCUMULATION OF ICE.

When Captain Parry's ships, Hecla and Griper, were on their Arctic voyage, the month of March set in mildly, (at their retreat in Winter Harbour,) so that the solid ice, which for some time had lined the ship's sides, began to melt. It therefore became necessary to scrape off this coating of ice, on which occasion Captain Parry observes—"It will, perhaps, be scarcely credited, that we this day (March 8) removed above one hundred buckets full, each containing from five to six gallons, being the accumulation which had taken place in an interval of less than four weeks; and this immense quantity was the produce chiefly of the men's breath and of the steam of their victuals during meals."

ANTIQUITY OF MAN ON THE EARTH.

M. Paul Jervais has lately discovered in the upper tertiary stratum of Montpellier a species of fossil ape, probably belonging to the Macaque genus. On comparing this discovery with that of M. Lartet, in the Gers, and those made in the environs of London, it appears that fossil apes have been discovered in the three principal tertiary strata of Western Europe; that is to say, in every part of the level of sedimentary earths in which the bones of mammalia abound. If man had existed at the period when these strata were deposited, the non-discovery hitherto of the slightest trace of human skeletons, or remains attesting human industry, would be very astounding. The discovery of these fossil apes is, therefore, an additional indirect proof of the very inferior antiquity of man on the earth.

STATISTICS OF LONDON MORTALITY.

The average mortality of England at the present time may be stated at 350,000, and that of London 47,000 per annum. As the population of England and Wales is nearly sixteen millions, and that of London 1,900,000, this gives an annual average mortality of one out of every forty inhabitants for the metropolis, and one out of every 45 for the whole country. This is an astonishing decline in the rate of mortality, compared with the experience of former ages; and it presents, at the same time, a most favourable picture of the value of life in this as compared with other countries. The annual mortality in England, in the year 1700, was about one in twenty-five. About the middle of the last century, from causes not well understood, it increased to one in twenty. From that time to this it has slowly but steadily declined. In 1801, it was 1 in 35; in 1811, 1 in 38; and now it is 1 in 45; so that in the space of about eighty years, the chances of existence have been exactly doubled in London, a progress and final result which may fairly be considered as without a parallel in the history of any other age or country.

In Paris, about the middle of the last century, the mortality was 1 in 25; at present it is about 1 in 32; in Rome the annual deaths are as one in 25; at Amsterdam, as 1 in 24; at Vienna, as 1 in 22. The inhabitant of London, therefore, has twice as good a chance of living as the burgher of Vienna.—George Gregory, M.D. &c.

SCIENTIFIC COOKERY.

Liebig, in his Chemistry of Food, recommends the following method of cooking meat on scientific principles. Put the joint into water in a state of fast ebullition; allow it to remain in this state for a few minutes, and then add so much cold water as to reduce the temperature to about 160 degrees, in which state it is to be kept for some hours. By the application of boiling water at first, the albumen is coagulated, so as to prevent the water from penetrating the meat, and extracting the soluble juices.

THE COURT AND REIGN OF FRANCIS I. KING OF FRANCE.¹

THE century extending from 1450 to 1550 forms a historical study of profound and universal interest; for it was the period of transition from the "Middle Ages" to modern times; and in the events and characters of greatest mark then may be discovered, in their rudimentary and nascent state, or else in their necessary causes, the most expressive features of our own days.

It would be a source of unalloyed satisfaction to us to engage our readers, or, at least, the young men amongst them, to make themselves acquainted with that age. Beside the general charm of history—which Sir Bulwer Lytton, in his discourse in "The Caxtons," on "The Hygeinic Chemistry of Books," and Carlyle, in his "Letter on Studies," published in all the newspapers a few years ago, have so eloquently described—this particular portion has attractions of its own. Its loftiest lessons not only "acquaint us with the nature of man," which, according to our English philosopher and poet, Coleridge, is "the great use of history;" but immediately relate to men and things, as we know them by common daily experience. And thus, not only may these too familiar matters be invested with new significance, but we also, who toil amidst them, be enabled so to direct our labours that men of far-distant generations shall look back on our times as we do on the achievements of the men who lived three hundred years ago.

Happily, we can support our counsel by the mention of some of the best and most fascinating historical works; such as Robertson's Charles V.; Benvenuto Cellini's Autobiography; Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella; Washington Irving's Life of Columbus; Lord Bacon's Henry VII.; Roscoe's Lorenzo the Magnificent, and Leo X.; and Merle D'Aubigné's History of the Reformation; and to these we may now add Miss Pardoe's Francis I.; all of which, in various degrees, and some with eminent success, have converted what might else have proved to the most enthusiastic a dry and wearisome task, into a most refined and intellectual pleasure, by the enchantment of their style, and the philosophical method on which their works are based.

Before we proceed, however, to the particular notice of Francis I. and of this, his latest biography, we must caution the student of these times against the danger of misapprehension respecting them, arising from the transference of the feelings associated in the present day, with social movements which began then, to the days when they were but beginning; and in some cases too had hardly taken a determinate direction.

For us, the characteristics of those times are the revival of learning, the fine arts, and science; the invention and perfecting of the art of printing; the extension of commerce by the great geographical discoveries; the general employment of gunpowder in war; the contest between absolutism and traditional constitutionalism; the establishment of the "Balance of Power" in Europe; and the translation of the Scripture into the vulgar tongues, with all the ecclesiastical and religious innovations that followed from it. But we, who see around us schools for the poor, arts and sciences universally taught, and applied to popular uses, a free press, commercial interests ruling the world, national disputes settled far more frequently by diplomacy than by war, constitutions and republics, and the Bible in the hands of all, cannot, without an effort, look upon those times so as to see them as they actually were; still less, so as to see them as they appeared to the men who lived then. What, for example, can be so astounding at first sight, as that a statesman as sagacious as Machiavelli should be so ill a diviner as to predict the speedy disuse of firearms, and the resumption of bows and arrows, catapults, and mangonels, as far superior? If, however, we go to the study of the dawn of the sixteenth century, with the instruction, but without the emotion, that our nineteenth century can give, we shall find ourselves more able to trace the first appearance, and more interested in watching the early struggles, of these movements, which are the true "signs of the times;" whilst the satisfaction with which we contemplate the inextinguishable position they have now achieved, will be most abundantly enhanced.

It is in the lives of the great actors of this, as of every other epoch of history, that its peculiar signs may be best discovered. The splendour of many events seems to overshadow their actors; but when the biographies of these men are put before us, we seem to gain a new knowledge of the events themselves. They serve as diagrams, or cabinet specimens, by which not only the multiplied and obscure relations of facts, else isolated and worthless, are set before us, but also the varied impulses and motives, the expectations and aims, that animated those by whom the results that we contemplate were effected; and thus we can more clearly and fully apprehend the events themselves. It is for this reason that Coleridge would resolve all history into biography; after stating that "the great use of history is to acquaint us with the nature of man," he proceeds: "This end is best answered by the most faithful portrait; but biography is a collection of portraits. At the same time there must be some mode of grouping and connecting the individuals, who are themselves the great landmarks in the map of human nature;" and concludes that "the most effectual mode of attaining the chief objects of historical knowledge" is "to present history in the form of biography, chronologically arranged."

Fortified by such an authority, we may without fear speak of the biography of Francis I. as one of the best helps that can be found for studying the history of the first half of the sixteenth century. And as we cannot spare sufficient space for an attractive sketch of the life of this prince, we will carry this hint out into some detail; and confidently leave Miss Pardoe's work with our readers.

"Francis I." says Heeren, "belonged peculiarly to his own nation. In him France saw an epitome of itself; and therein, although he knew it not, lay the secret of his power." But it was just because he was so eminently the ideal of France, that he may be studied as the ideal of his times; for, of all European people, the French are most mobile and impressible, and the most frank in the manifestation of their impressions and motives; and thus the spirit of the age not only acted more powerfully in France than elsewhere, but found also a more complete embodiment. Beside which, Francis I. was connected with more of the movements of the times, and more intimately, than any other sovereign of Europe; neither Charles V. nor Henry VIII. were so many-sided as the "First Gentleman of France;" and thus we may get more nearly to the centre, whence all the characters and events of the period appear in their true position, by studying his life than by studying that of any contemporaneous monarch.

The first aspect under which Francis I. appears is that which is familiar to most of our readers, from its being the one which popular histories present. He is regarded as embodying in himself the spirit of chivalry, and the spirit of diplomacy; and as being rather more knight than statesman.

An extract or two from the work before us will do more to exhibit the predominant features of this sovereign's character, than anything we could advance. Take this scene. Francis has resolved, after his splendid victory at Marignano, before creating knights with his own hand, to receive knighthood himself at the hand of Bayard.

"The ceremony must have been an imposing one, as the young king stood upon the battle-field where he had subdued his enemies, in the midst of the brave and devoted chivalry of a great nation; the dead, who had fallen in his cause, yet unearched; the living, who had fought beside him, still at their post; the gallant men who survived the conflict marshalled about him, girding with their strength the proud group clustered about their youthful, and fearless, and victorious sovereign; the banners of their beloved France streaming upon the air, and the weapons which had so well and so recently done their duty, gleaming on all sides; feathers streaming, proud war-horses champing the bit, and the artillerymen leaning upon their guns, now dark and silent.

"Mistaken as the act may have been, and worse than supererogatory in a powerful monarch, the scene must, nevertheless, have been one to make high hearts leap and bold brows flush, as Francis called Bayard to his side, and with the noble and endearing courtesy familiar to him, declared his intention of being there and then knighted by the hand of a warrior esteemed one of the most renowned, not only of his own nation but of all Christendom; and, despite the disclaimers of his astonished subject, he persisted in his determination.

"'In good sooth, Sire,' then exclaimed Bayard, who would have held further objections to the command of his sovereign as discourteous and irreverent, 'since it is your royal pleasure that this should be, I am ready to perform your will, not once, but many times, unworthy as I am of the high office to which you have appointed me;' and grasping his sword proudly and firmly, he continued, as the young king bent his knee; 'May my poor agency be as efficacious as though the ceremony were performed by Oliver, Godfrey, or Baldwin; although, in good truth, you are the first prince whom I have ever dubbed a knight; and God grant that you may never turn your back upon an enemy!' Then brandishing his good weapon, and glancing sportively at it, as the last rays of evening flashed upon its polished blade, he apostrophized it as though it were a thing of life, which could participate in his own hilarity of spirit, exclaiming, 'Thou art fortunate indeed to-day, that thou hast been called upon to confer knighthood upon so great and powerful a monarch, and, certes, my trusty sword, thou shalt henceforth be carefully guarded as a relic, honoured above all others; and shalt never be unsheathed again, save it be against the infidel!' Then, lowering the point with reverence, he thrust it back into its scabbard, amid the enthusiastic shouts of the exulted army.

"Many of the French officers, among whom one of the most distinguished was the gallant young Marquis de Fleuranges, then received the honour of knighthood in their turn by the hand of Francis himself; and three days having been consumed in these ceremonies, and in the burial of those who had fallen upon that memorable field, the French struck their tents, and marched towards Milan."

We should have been glad to add, as a further proof of the chivalric temper of Francis, the famous letter, after his defeat and capture at the battle of Pavia; but the relentless truth of his biographer has shown that the letter he actually wrote was "as wordy and diffuse as his ordinary epistles." The expiring cry of chivalry came, not from the lips of Francis, but from those of "the good knight," Bayard,—sans peur, et sans reproche,—in whom, in fact, and not in the king, ancient knightly honour was, for the last time, incarnated. Indeed, there can be no doubt, that, but for Bayard, Francis would never have enjoyed his chivalric renown; for the commonest historical truth would have been outraged, had there been no such hero as Bayard to illustrate the reign and the wars of a monarch who regarded no oath as binding, to whom female honour was a thing of naught, and whose service to God was not the defence of the weak and the succour of the oppressed, but the cruel persecution of the Lutherans, and the burning of those very men whom his own invitations had induced to settle in his kingdom. The death scene of Bayard is too typical of the times of which we are speaking, to be omitted. It is not merely the death scene of the last knight of France, but of knighthood itself; for how could the old spirit of personal heroism continue to exist, when it was opposed, not by the like personal prowess, but by shot from hacquebouses and all kinds of artillery?

In the disastrous rout at Sessia, Bonnivet, being disabled by a musket-ball, gave up the command to Bayard and the Count de Vandenesse; but the latter had hardly taken his place at the head of the gendarmes, when a stone from a hacquebouse struck him, and inflicted a mortal wound.

"As he fell, Bayard turned upon the enemy, and made so vigorous a charge, that he compelled them for a time to retreat upon their main body; but, as he was about to rejoin his own force, he was in his turn smitten by a similar missile, which struck him across the loins, and fractured his spine. As he felt the blow he reeled in his saddle, exclaiming; 'Jesus, my God, I am killed!'

he then, with some difficulty, raised to his lips the hilt of his sword, which was in the form of a cross, kissed it, recommended his soul to God, and fainted. In an instant a dozen hands were outstretched to support him; and while he was led into a place of safety, he rallied, and besought those about him to set him with his back against a tree to which he pointed, and to place him with his face towards the imperialists.

"'I feel,' he gasped out, 'that I have but a few moments to live, and I will not, for the first time, turn my back upon the enemy. Comrades, to the charge! the Spaniards are advancing. Let me once more see the gleaming of our lances!'

"The sobs of his maitre-d'hôtel, who was supporting his head, again recalled him to himself. 'Jacques, my friend,' he murmured affectionately, 'be comforted. It is the will of God that I should now leave this world, in which he has blessed me far beyond my deserts. His will be done!'

"As no priest was on the field to receive his confession, he sent to summon the Seigneur d'Alegre, the Provost of Paris, whom he entreated to act as his chaplain, and to whom he humbly declared his sins; after which he besought him to bear his last vows of fidelity to the king his master, and to assure him that the most bitter pang which he experienced in dying, existed in the consciousness that he could not again wield a lance in his service.

"'And now,' he said, glancing around upon the soldiers who were thronging about him, regardless of the peril by which they were momentarily threatened; 'and now, my friends and comrades, leave me, I entreat you; and do not let me suffer the misery of seeing you fall into the hands of your enemies; your care can avail me nothing:—go, and pray for my soul!'

"For the first time, however, he was disobeyed. Still the imperialists advanced, and still the weeping soldiers stood motionless, gazing upon their expiring idol. Not another blow was struck by the French; and as the enemy came up they heard only one long wail of grief, coupled with the name of Bayard.

"Pescara was in the van of the army, and at once apprehending the truth, he made his way to the spot where the good knight was still struggling with the death-agony. As his eye fell upon him, the Spanish general dropped his sword; and then bending down, he raised the hand of his erstwhile enemy respectfully to his lips.

"'Would to God, my good lord of Bayard,' he said; 'that at the cost of a quart of my own blood, so death had not ensued, I might have met you in good health, and as my prisoner, that so I might have proved how much I honour the exalted prowess that is in you; knowing as I do that the emperor, my master, has never had a braver or a bolder enemy; and, may God be my help! I would rather have given half of all that I am worth than that this should have chanced.'

"During this brief interview [with the Duke de Bourbon, who came up after the imperialist general]; Pescara had caused a magnificent marquee to be pitched upon the field, and the wounded man was conveyed upon the crossed lances of some of his own followers to a camp bed beneath it, beside which he found a priest, to whom he once more confessed himself. The imperialist general then took up his station beside him, and remained at his post, until slightly raising himself upon his pillow, the dying man once more pressed his sword to his lips, and faintly murmuring his war-cry of 'God and my country!' sank back and expired."

The honour paid to the good knight's remains by his enemies, and by every town in Savoy, Piedmont, and Dauphiny, as they were borne to their last resting-place in his family tomb, stands in noble contrast with the more than half selfish exclamation of the vo- disant chivalric monarch, when the death of his famous knight was told him—"Alas! I have lost a great captain. He carries with him into the grave many of the brightest jewels that might have been added to my crown." Bayard was indeed the chevalier of the age; and thus the spirit of chivalry departed.

Let us just glance at the diplomacy of Francis. We shall find that his reputation for statesmanship, such as it is, is utterly void of foundation. Indeed, as we ascribed his knightly fame to the fact of his having a Bayard amongst his nobles; so must we ascribe to the astute intelligence of his mother, who exercised the most powerful ascendancy over his sensual and frivolous mind, the fact that his name has ever been associated with the thought of state-craft at all. The recklessness with which he disregarded treaties; and the shameless and studied effrontery with which he denied his own acts, may perhaps be charged in part upon the loose political morality of his age; but the way in which he was duped by all he attempted to cajole, whenever he met them in diplomatic conflict, gives us the meanest opinion of his own skill in the delicate strategy of the cabinet. Such a prince could ill cope with a Charles V., or a Wolsey, or a Clement VII. But let us turn to a strange scene in the annals of diplomacy,—the negotiations which ended in the famous Paix des Dames.

Louise de Savoie on the part of her son, and Marguerite d'Autriche on that of the Emperor, have met at Cambray, to arrange the conditions on which Francis's two sons, who had been given to Charles as hostages for the observance of a treaty that Francis never meant to keep, should be liberated.

"The two princesses were lodged in contiguous houses; but not content with this arrangement, and anxious to confer together without interruption, they caused a communication to be opened between their respective dwellings, in order that they might meet at all hours without witnesses, or the irksome ceremonial attendant upon an official conference. The prudence and judgment of this measure soon became manifest; for, thus released from the conflicting arguments of interested individuals, they were enabled to effect a peace, which was, owing to their agency, known as La Paix des Dames. Equally anxious to effect their object, they made mutual concessions; and, on the 5th of August, the articles were drawn up, and the treaties signed by both parties; the duchess-mother agreeing, on the part of her son, that he should relinquish Artois and Flanders to the emperor, withdraw his claim to Italy, espouse, without further delay, the Queen Eleanor, and secure to their male issue the contested duchy of Burgundy. He was, moreover, to pay, as ransom-money for the young princes, the sum of 2,000,000 of golden crowns, and to discharge the debt of the emperor to England, as well as to reverse the attainder of the Duke de Bourbon, to authorize the succession of his heirs, and to reinstate in their possessions all the French subjects who had been involved in his rebellion. While Charles, on his part, was engaged to recognise the claim of Francis to the duchy of Burgundy, with the solitary exception of Charolois, which was to remain the property of Madame Marguerite, and was, after her demise, to become a life-tenure of the Emperor, at whose death it was again to revert to the French crown.

"The characters of the two contracting parties were strikingly exhibited in this treaty. In renouncing Italy no attempt was made on the part of Louise de Savoie to secure favourable terms for the states of Florence and Venice, which had during so long a period been the faithful allies of France; but, on the contrary, she engaged that within the space of four months, the former should swear allegiance to the emperor, and the latter make restitution of all the territory of which they had possessed themselves within the kingdom of Naples; or, in default of such restitution, be compelled by force of arms to fulfil the obligation. The interests of the Duke de Gueldres were also abandoned, as well as those of Robert de la Mark; and, in fine, the king was pledged to desert all his allies upon his northern frontier, not even excepting Henri of Navarre, the husband of his sister. Thus, the brave men who shared his dangers, and to whom he owed the success of many a well-fought field, were recklessly left to the mercy of the sovereign against whom they had so often appeared in arms; while Marguerite d'Autriche refused to accede to every suggestion which threatened to involve the safety of the emperor's foreign adherents, and made the restitution of Bourbon's honour one of the salient features of the treaty."

The splendid fêtes and ceremonious pomp of "the Field of the Cloth of Gold," when Francis I. and Henry VIII.,

"Those suns of glory, those two lights of men, with such magnificence that—

and such displays of knightly skill and prowess, that—and when, hidden behind all this royal pageantry of amity, there were carried on diplomatic negotiations, that were an emptier pageant still; might well delay us, as embodying both the characteristics usually ascribed to Francis; but it would be impossible to compress the narrative, and our great poet has summed up its meaning in a few of his words of power:—

"What did this vanity
But minister communication of A most poor issue!"

The alliance formed, to the scandal of Christendom, by Francis with Solymán, and that with the Protestant League of Germany, whilst he was persecuting with the fiercest fanaticism the Protestants of France, (an inconsistency he had the meanness to excuse by a lie, that brought on him the fearless exposure and rebuke of Calvin, in the dedication of his "Institutes,") might also be adduced to show the character of his state-craft, of his religion, and of his morality, at once. And in the same way we might illustrate the claim we have made on his behalf of being regarded as the representative of his age, by referring to his friendship for Lionardo da Vinci, and his liberal patronage of professors and proficient in arts and letters,—to his foundation of his Royal College, and to his planning the Louvre. While, as if to emphasize this fact, and to prepare us for such a study of his reign as we have recommended above, Lefevre made the first translation of the Bible into French at this time; and Ignatius Loyola received, at the siege of Pampeluna by Francis's troops, the wound that turned him from an undistinguished soldier into an enthusiast and a genius, that shook the whole world, and well-nigh subdued it to his idea; and Catharine de' Medici perfected her detestable character, whilst she adorned his court as the youthful wife of his second son.

One other aspect under which this reign presents itself to the student of history we must advert to. It is known now, and generally believed, that the fearful outbreak at the end of the last century, called the FRENCH REVOLUTION, the closing scenes of which we seem not even now to have reached, was the result of causes that had been in operation for ages before; and that it was not because Louis XVI. was a bad king, but because he stood in the place that had been occupied by so many atrocious characters, and was to the people the symbol of the secret source of all that they and their fathers had suffered, that that unfortunate prince lost his life beneath the glaive of the guillotine. The most cursory perusal of this "Life of Francis I." will disclose the beginnings of many of the ills that during three centuries grew to be intolerable. It was Francis who established the plan of disposing of official places by purchase; which while it raised up a body of men of intelligence and of influence independent of the court, at the same time set them at variance with the people, and made it inevitable that in the first earnest collision between the ruled and the rulers, they should be, by both parties, marked for destruction. It was Francis who remodelled the game-laws, and introduced many of those provisions which, as much as anything else, fed the flame of discontent in the rural districts, and threw them heart and hand into the track in which the cities, and Paris especially, had set out. It was Francis, too, who, first of all French monarchs, in defiance of right and custom alike, made himself the state and his will the law, and set the fatal example of coercing the Parlement to the register his edicts, which was the signal for the attack on the monarchy itself when Louis XVI attempted to imitate it. And it was in the court of Francis, and by his own conduct chiefly, that that profligacy which made not only the monarchy, but the nobility, and even the hierarchy, abominable in the eyes of all, was first systematized, and made so essential a feature of a royal household, that so putrid a story as that of "the Diamond Necklace," could play no mean part in bringing about the fearful doom of the ill-starred Marie Antoinette.

A passage from Miss Pardoe's preface will be welcome to our readers for its own sake; while it will furnish a complete picture of this famous monarch, and justify the view we have taken of him and of his reign:—

"The glorious day of Marignano saw the rising, that of Pavia the setting of his fame as a soldier; so true it is that the prowess of the man was shamed by that of the boy. The early and unregretted death of one of his neglected queens, the heart-broken endurance of the other, contrasted with the unbounded influence of his first favourite, and the insolent arrogance of his second, will sufficiently demonstrate his character as a husband. His open and illegal oppression of an over-taxed and suffering people to satisfy the cravings of an extortionate and licentious court, will sufficiently disclose his value as a monarch; while the reckless indifference with which he falsified his political pledges, abandoned his allies in their extremity in order to further his own interests, and sacrificed the welfare of his kingdom and the safety of his armies to his own puerile vanity, will complete a picture by no means calculated to elicit one regret that his reign was not prolonged.

"Despite this drawback, however, the period was one of great and absorbing interest. The fierce and continual struggle for power between Francis and Charles V.; the well-earned renown of the several generals on both sides; the names of the Connétable Duke de Bourbon, Bayard, Pescara, De Leyva, Doria, Gaston de Foix, Lautrec, and a host of others equally brave; the bright galaxy of beauty which adorned the court; the fair and gentle Madame de Châteaubriand; the haughty and voluptuous Duchess d'Etampes; the magnificent Diane of Poitiers; the mature, but still attractive Louise de Savoie; the strong-minded and intellectual Marguerite de Valois; and the beautiful Catharine de' Medici; all combine to invest the age with a charm and a romance totally independent of the personal character of the monarch; while the fact of its having been the period of the mission of LUTHER, and the crowning work of the REFORMATION, suffices of itself to render it the greatest landmark on the whole highway of history.

"Never, perhaps, did the reign of any European sovereign present so many and such varying phases. A contest for empire, a captive monarch, a female regency, and a religious war; the poisoned bowl and the burning pile alike doing their work of death amid scenes of uncalculating splendour and unbridled dissipation; the atrocities of bigotry and intolerance blent with the most unblushing licentiousness and the most undisguised profligacy;—such are the materials offered to the student by the times of Francis I."

Miss Pardoe's work is admirably adapted to make her readers familiar with "the old times before them." Compiled with great care, and evidently in good part from the original sources, although not overloaded with quotations and marginal references; written in a serious, but lively style; abounding in artistic delineations of character, and graphic sketches of incidents; not concealing, nor excusing, but not obtruding the worst parts of the story; it deserves to rank with historical compositions, while it cannot fail, we apprehend, to be welcomed by the general reader, and especially by the large circle of admirers secured by the former works of this amiable and excellent authoress. A copious index, brief biographical notes respecting the illustrious characters that appear on the scene, and an introductory sketch of the foregoing reign of Louis XII., add greatly to its historical value; and the portraits which embellish it, and the quaint ornament of its binding, copied from a design by the famous Diane of Poitiers herself, possess a value which readers of all classes will readily appreciate.

THE ROMANCE OF THE PEERAGE.¹

WE have already introduced the two previous volumes of this work to the notice of our readers; and we have given, as well as our limits would allow, some idea of the real nature of this "Romance of the Peerage;" showing that it does not belong to the class of ephemeral literature, but that it will in all probability become a standard work, which no student of English history can safely be without. Its title, as before intimated, is calculated to mislead; not that it is untrue in itself,—for it is perfectly correct and true,—but that the reading world have been accustomed to find similar titles, such as the "Romance of History;" "The Romance of Biography;" "Stories of the Peerage;" "of the Aristocracy;" &c. given to books of an entirely different order of literature; and thus, judging merely from an advertisement, many of those persons who would most enjoy, and are most capable of appreciating the value of the "Romance of the Peerage," would be likely never to take it into their hands at all, if it were not for the enduring nature of the book, which will make it out-last all misapprehension caused by the title. It is, perhaps, to be regretted, on this account, that its secondary title, "Curiosities of Family History," did not stand first; there could have been no misapprehension about that. A list of the names given to the different sections of the present volume will show its importance to scholars and students in the history of our own country.

To persons interested in the biography and literature of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in England, we may safely recommend a careful perusal of the whole work; and we now proceed to the business in hand,—viz., that of giving the general reader some account of the contents of this third volume.

The first chapter, on "The Hereditary Principle," is a very remarkable one, and deserves particular attention, both on account of the matters treated of, and on account of the succinct and masterly way in which the pith of them is condensed and set before the reader. The hereditary principle, not only as applied to the succession of the crown, but also as it bears upon the whole political and social system of a state or nation, is here considered philosophically as well as practically. The sentiment or idea of family is shown to be of vital importance in a state; and all that our author says upon this subject, as well as upon property, will be found to contain a quiet but very decided overthrow of socialist and communist doctrines as the basis of a political system. Not that he attacks them directly; on the contrary, he seems hardly to consider them worth an attack. He deals them heavy blows in the course of his argument, because the limbs of his argument strike out in their direction. In like manner, while discussing the nature of the aristocratic and democratic elements in the government of a state, without any direct reference to Red Republicanism or Chartism, he shows the practical absurdity of ultra or pure democracy. Perhaps we cannot do better than give an extract or two from this short treatise on the Hereditary Principle.

"In the earliest forms of society nearly everything was arranged upon the hereditary principle. The government was hereditary; the priesthood was hereditary; the commonest professions were hereditary; honours and rewards, punishments and degradations, were all hereditary. There was scarcely any respect in which a man was regarded as standing alone, and was left to act without reference to his family position and on his own sole responsibility. He could not marry and continue his race except according to the narrowest limitations of tribe and pedigree. People were scarcely looked upon as individuals at all. This was the absolute tyranny of the sentiment or idea of Family. The gradual development of the antagonistic element of Individualism makes an important part of the history of civilization and human progress. But it does not follow, because the hereditary principle was at one time allowed too great and general an ascendancy, that it is entitled to no place in a wise political system, or that it would be either possible or desirable to get rid of it altogether.

"Within a certain range it may be said to have a natural claim to be allowed some influence and operation. In society, indeed, natural rights no longer exist; every social arrangement is an affair of convention, either formal or implied, the fundamental principle of which is the surrender by every man of his natural rights. Natural rights, as such, are only for the woods. But, on the other hand, the more of the natural rights of individuals the social convention can preserve untouched, or, to speak more correctly, can give back under a new name or a new sanction, the better. This is only a repetition, with a different application, of what has been already observed, that, in every kind of arrangement, natural forces are always to be taken advantage of as far as may be, or interfered with as little as possible. It is thus only that any moral arrangement, in particular, can ever be made to work smoothly or satisfactorily. The rights of nature are not extinguished when they are surrendered under a social compact in exchange for certain other artificial rights. They are eternal and cannot die. Their action is only suspended for a season. Like the ocean which is kept back by the dykes of Holland, there they roll behind all your artificial regulations with the same force that they had before your institutions and laws were set up. The salvation of your social system depends altogether upon its proving stronger than they. It is only a contest between the hillow and the embankment. The moment the latter gives way, the former is as ready to overwhelm and devastate the land as ever. As far as it is possible, therefore, natural rights and natural feelings must be respected, and as it were taken into confederacy, by every scheme of society or polity that would have either a tranquil or an enduring existence. The fewer of them that are put down,—the more of them that are built into the fabric of the scheme and made available among its forces or supports,—the better chance it has both of lasting long and of working beneficially."

What is said concerning the elective as opposed to the hereditary principle in general is well worthy the attention of politicians. We extract the following short paragraph:—

"No mode of appointing to offices by selection, or election, indeed, is or can be other than a very imperfect expedient, or unattended with heavy drawbacks. Even if you could always be sure of the honesty of the electors, you never can be sure of their sagacity. With the best intentions in the world, they may be deceived in various ways. No faculty short of omniscience in the electors could make elections always what they ought to be; and even only that would do if to the universal knowledge were joined absolute freedom from corruption, from passion, from interested views, and from every other bias. In how far any body of electors, great or small, that the world has ever known, have approached this standard, needs not to be set forth. Election or selection, then, has not, after all, so much to boast of that it should claim to be preferred as of course to the hereditary principle, or to any other principle, at least in so far as its superiority is to be tested by the superior quality of the appointments for which we have been indebted to it. It may have answered other purposes; but its professed purpose, of finding generally the fittest man for the office to be filled or the work to be done, has not been answered at all. Probably we should not have been much worse off in that respect if such a thing as election never had been heard of. It has served, indeed, as a way of settling the matter in the case of a competition among several claimants or their partisans. It has done what a dice-box might have done more quietly. Now the hereditary principle has also this same recommendation of pronouncing a clear and incontrovertible decision; or, if its decisions are sometimes disputable, they are not more frequently so than those of the method of election. In some cases that method may have its peculiar advantages; in other cases, the rule of hereditary succession is certainly entitled to the preference."

We know not what the gentlemen who set up and knock down governments on the other side of the channel will think of the following observation concerning Equality, but we believe most of our readers will find no fault with it.

"The element, however, of the democratic and modern republican spirit which is most pointedly and irreconcilably opposed to all effective political organization, is the manna for what is called Equality. The notion is the product of a verbal trick. What is now designated political equality was originally introduced to the world under the less startling phrase of political justice; but the term justice is synonymous with equity, and equity is etymologically identical with equality; whence political justice and political equality were easily made to appear to be the same thing. It was assumed that there could be no justice in any political system under which all the people were not of equal rank. Yet the two things have in reality no connexion whatever. To make one of the great ends of the union of men in society the preservation among them of a perfect equality of rank, even if it were nothing more and worse, would be as puerile as if a similar importance and dignity were to be assigned to the making them all wear coats of precisely the same cut and colour. Viewed in itself, and as an ultimate object, uniformity here does not seem to be at all necessarily preferable to variety, and it is not obvious why the cry of the regenerators of mankind should not be 'Liberty and Inequality,' as well as what it is. Uniformity is doubtless proper in some things,—in weights and measures, for example; in other things a little variety is more desirable. A passion for equality in the abstract is a mere lunacy. And among fanaticisms this of political equality is surely one of the most unimaginative and basest. Perhaps in the ordinary case it is not so much an impatience or hatred of all superiority, as an incapacity to conceive or to believe in anything greater or higher than itself;—as the mistake of the unhappy frog in the fable was mainly, that, if he only took pains and did his best, it was not possible that any other animal roar should excel his own croak. He too, in his emptiness of head, and destitution of all sense or suspicion of anything above or beyond his own insignificance, had evidently adopted the simple creed of Equality and Fraternity with an exceedingly ardent zeal. Often, however, the immense vanity is combined with as immense an envy. Some of the enthusiasts of the doctrine, again, seem to be inspired not so much by either envy or egotism as by a disinterested delight in the low and the flat. Anything rising above the common level, anything eminent or noble, offends their moral sense."

"Charles Brandon's Widow and her Second Marriage," contains much curious and interesting matter concerning one of the many noble and pious ladies who adorn the history of great families. She was the fourth wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, whose third wife was Henry the Eighth's sister, Mary. She was born, our author tells us, in 1518 or 1519. Her father was the eighth Baron Willoughby d'Eresby, who died in 1525. She was his only child, and thus became baroness in her own right, at the age of six or seven. About three years later, the Duke of Suffolk was appointed guardian to the young heiress, and she thus had the advantage of being brought up in his household under the eye of Mary Tudor. About a year after the death of that princess, her widower married his young ward, then about sixteen years of age. "Brandon must, in all probability have numbered considerably more than three times the years of his bride." This, however, seems to have been no impediment to their domestic happiness. After the duke's death, "according to the common account, in 1545," the young duchess devoted herself to the education of their two sons, then probably under ten years of age, though, "according to the common account," the young duke must have been ten years old at his father's death. The young mother seems to have been admirably fitted for her important task, and to have fulfilled it well. The eldest boy she sent up to court, to be brought up with Prince Edward. The famous Sir John Cheke taught them both, and when the latter came to the throne, the young Duke of Suffolk still remained with him until his mother "thought it right that he should have a separate tutor for himself." Some time after this he joined his brother at Cambridge. At this time the celebrated Martin Bucer was professor of divinity there. The duchess had become a Protestant since her husband's death. Her love for her sons, and her "desire to witness their daily improvement," made her remove to Cambridge, where "she may almost be said to have joined them in their academic life." She seems to have been a woman of enlarged views on most subjects, and the following extract from one of her own letters stamps her as a person of first-rate sense, and true womanly feeling.

"The most genuine representation we have of her is that given in her own letters; both in the sentiment, and even in the style, they often anticipate a later time. A portion of one of them which has been preserved will illustrate her character, and also indicate something of her position at this period of her life. It is dated in May 1550, and relates to a scheme of the Earl of Warwick's, for making a marriage between her eldest son and a daughter of the Duke of Somerset. Nothing could well be more foreign to the established feelings and usages of the age than the way in which she views this proposal. The letter is addressed to Cecil, with whom she lived in much intimacy. She trusts, she begins by saying, that the friendship between his Lordship of Somerset and herself hath been so tried, and hath so good assurance upon the simple ground of their good will to one another, that they do not need to do anything rashly or violently in order to give the world a better belief of it; nor, to make the one think well of the other, can any unadvised bond between a boy and a girl do so much as what has already passed between them; on the contrary, if this marriage were now to take place by their command, the parties to the contract being as yet without judgment to give such a consent as ought to be given in matrimony, she cannot tell what greater unkindness the one might show the other, or how they might work more wickedly, than by bringing their children into the miserable state of not being allowed to choose according to their own likings those to whom they must profess so strict a bond and so great a love for ever. 'This,' she proceeds, 'I promise you, I have said for my lord's daughter as well as for my son; and this more I say for myself, and I say it not but truly, I know none this day living that I rather wish my son than she. But I am not, because I like her best, therefore desirous that she should be constrained by her friends to have him, whom she might peradventure not like so well as I like her. Neither can I yet assure myself of my son's liking, neither do I greatly mistrust it; for, if he be ruled by right judgment, then shall he, I am sure, have no cause to dislike, except he think himself disliked. But to have this matter come best to pass were that we parents kept still our friendship, and suffer our children to follow our examples, and to begin their loves of themselves without our forcing. For, although both might happen to be obedient to their parents and marry at our pleasures, and so find no other cause to dislike but that by our power they lost their free choice, whereby neither of them can think themselves so much bounden to the other, that fault is sufficient to break the greatest love. Wherefore I will make much of my lady's daughter without the respect of my son's cause, and it may please my lord to love my son for his mother's sake: and so I doubt not but, if God do not dislike it, my son and his daughter shall much better like it to make up the matter themselves. And let them even alone with it, seeing there can no good agreement happen between them that we shall dislike; and, if it should not happen well, there is neither they nor none of us shall blame another. And so, my good Cecil, being weary, I leave you to the Lord.'"

Her two boys, who seemed to have been as highly endowed by nature as they were by fortune, were both attacked by the sweating sickness on the 16th of July, 1551, and died within six hours, the younger surviving the elder half an hour. Henry (the duke) was sixteen, Charles fourteen. Their poor mother felt this blow severely; but the strength of her religious principles enabled her to bear up against it after a time. We find the following passage in one of her subsequent letters to Secretary Cecil. "I give God thanks, good master Cecil, for all his benefits which it hath pleased him to heap upon me; and truly I take this, his last (and to the first sight most sharp and bitter) punishment, not for the least of his benefits, inasmuch as I have never been so well taught by any other before, to know his power, his love and mercy, my own wickedness, and that wretched estate that without him I should endure here." About two years after the loss of her sons, the Duchess of Suffolk, then only thirty-four years of age, married Mr. Richard Bertie, a gentleman of an ancient Kentish family. Soon after this event King Edward VI. died, and the restoration of the Roman Catholic religion brought the duchess and her husband into trouble. Fox, the martyrologist, relates the remarkable story of their escape from the revengeful malice of Bishop Gardiner, and their romantic adventures beyond seas. There is also an old ballad, entitled, "The most rare and excellent history of the Duchess of Suffolk."

"According to that version of the story, the Duchess and her husband, with their child and its nurse, each by a different road, made their way to Billingsgate; thence they got to Gravesend in the common barge; from Gravesend they walked to the sea-coast; landing in Flanders, as they were travelling on thence into Germany they were attacked by thieves, when not only were they robbed of all their money, and had their horses killed, but

"The Nurse amidst of all their fright
Laid down the child upon the ground;
She ran away out of their sight,
And never after that was found."

That is, the nurse ran away and was lost, not the child. At last, sometimes the one, sometimes the other carrying the infant through the pitiless rain and hail, they came to a town, which proved to be Wesel. But the people here were all as pitiless as the weather; no one would give them shelter; so that they were obliged to take refuge in the porch of the great church of St. Willebrode, where, procuring a few coals, the husband kindled a fire, beside which his wife sat down with her child in her lap while he prepared some food for it. Speedily, however, the sexton came upon them, and proceeded to drive them away; on which Bertie, wrenching from him the keys of the church, struck him till he made the blood flow all down his head, and his cries brought the town officers about them, by whom the strangers were forthwith carried before the governor. The ballad is ornamented with a woodcut representing the belaboured sexton, with the blood spouting out from his head in eight distinct streams, two descending symmetrically on each side, the other four rising into the air, while Bertie is still laying on with the keys, and the Duchess, seemingly unconcerned, sits dandling her baby beside the fire.

"According to the Martyrology, Bertie only thought he should be obliged to take his wife to the porch of the great church, 'and so to buy coals, victuals, and straw for their miserable repose there that night, or at least till by God's help he might provide her better lodging.' But while he was on his way thither he overheard two boys talking Latin, and making up to them, and addressing them in that language, he offered them two stivers if they would conduct him to some Walloon's house. They were the first of the inhabitants to whom he had been able to make himself intelligible; for he could as yet speak but little German, and he had met with nobody till now that understood either Latin, English, French, or Italian. As it fortunately chanced, the house to which the boys led him was one where his friend Perusel, the Walloon clergyman, was then supping. The details of their meeting must be sought for in the Acts and Monuments, or left to the reader's imagination; but of course the wanderers had a warm reception and a comfortable lodging for that night; 'and within few days after, by Mr. Perusel's means, they hired a very fair house in the town, and did not let [refrain] to show themselves what they were, in such good sort as their present condition permitted.' Here, on the twelfth of October, 1555, the Duchess was delivered of a son, who two days after was baptized by the name of Peregrinus, or Peregrine, 'for that,' to translate the terms in which the event was recorded at the time in the Register of the City, 'he was given by the Lord to his pious parents in a strange land, for the consolation of their exile.'"

This child is the famous Peregrine Bertie, Lord Willoughby, of the reign of Elizabeth. His parents meet with more remarkable adventures during their exile, which are well described by our author; but on the accession of Elizabeth their troubles are ended, and they return to pass the rest of their days peaceably in their native land. The duchess survived till the 19th of September, 1580.

The story of Sir Robert Dudley, the son of the great Earl of Leicester, by Douglas, Lady Sheffield, the daughter of the first Lord Howard of Effingham, is a very extraordinary one. Whether he were legitimate or illegitimate, is a point not easy to be settled. The lady declared that he was legitimate; and yet behaved as if he were not; for during Leicester's lifetime, she married Sir Edward Stafford. The father is equally inconsistent on this subject, for he styles him in his will, "my base son, Robert Dudley," while he leaves him heir of Kenilworth Castle, and the bulk of all his other lordships and lands, after only a life occupancy by his brother the Earl of Warwick. The whole affair of Leicester with Douglas Howard, from the beginning to the end of it, when to oblige him, or probably to save herself from being poisoned by him, she consents to become the wife of Stafford, is one of those strange sixteenth century tales which astonish the nineteenth century folks, and make them wonder of what strange stuff the sixteenth century folks were made. However, the career of the son is as extraordinary as that of his parents. He began life very early, on coming into possession of an immense fortune after the death of his father and his uncle the Earl of Warwick. He seems to have been what we in these days call an extremely clever person, if not a man of great talent. His first great object of interest was the New World. His uncle had been a patron of Froisher; Drake, Cavendish, and Raleigh, were his contemporaries; and his ardent and ambitious spirit first sought distinction in voyages of discovery. He seems to have spent his money very freely in fitting out expeditions, and when he was scarcely one-and-twenty, he took the command of one in person. He seems to have borne all the hardships of this undertaking with great cheerfulness and fortitude. He was three times married. He had no children by his first wife, a sister of Cavendish the navigator; by his second he had five. He suddenly ruined all his prospects in England by deserting his wife and children, and eloping to the continent with a beautiful young lady, Miss Southwell, a cousin of his own. His large property was soon the prey of the various persons interested in his outlawry, and he then had to begin life anew, after having passed his thirtieth year. He established himself at Florence, and there rose to power and importance at the court of the grand duke, Ferdinand I. He at first assumed the title of the Earl of Warwick, and was afterwards created a duke, when he was generally known as Duke of Northumberland. The following passage will show the public and private position of Dudley at Florence.

"What it may have been that began the alienation between Dudley and the wife whom he left behind him in England, we have little or nothing to guide us in conjecturing. Possibly Dame Alice may have failed to sympathise very ardently with the great scheme of ambition in the pursuit of which, as it turned out, he was prepared to put to hazard or to throw away all that he possessed in the world; she may not have quite taken her husband's view even of his right to the status that he claimed. In his fair cousin he may have found a readier believer in the marriage of his father and mother, and a more eager zeal to vindicate the honour of her aunt. But, however it may have commenced on either side, the guilty love that had sprung up between Dudley and Elizabeth Southwell probably soon grew to a hurricane of passion, which would leave to neither much power of resistance or reflection. And so it tore away both from all detrainments, him from lands and revenues, from wife and children, as her from father and mother, brothers and sisters, and all else that she had ever known of either love or respect—plunging them together into an abyss, where yet each had in the companionship of the other what made up for the loss of all else. Nor did their attachment prove the less lasting for its first headlong violence. Dudley and Elizabeth Southwell, beginning together a new life in their new country, and forgetting their previous existence, or looking back upon it as an unreal dream or as something from which they were for ever separated, wanted for the remainder of their days neither honour from those around them, nor affection from each other. Lord Herbert of Cherbury saw them, as he tells us, at Florence, in the year 1614. His lordship speaks of Dudley as having already 'the title of Earl or Duke of Northumberland, given him by the Emperor,' and of the lady as 'the handsome Mrs. Sudel, whom he carried with him out of England, and [who] was there taken for his wife;' but in expressing himself in this manner he both antedates Dudley's dukedom, and designates his wife by a name by which she was known only in England. In Italy, and throughout the continent, Mrs. Sudel, or Southwell, was now the Countess of Warwick, and at a later date the Duchess of Northumberland. 'I was invited by them to a great feast,' continues Herbert, 'the night before I went out of town. Taking my leave of them both, I prepared for my journey the next morning; when I was ready to depart, a messenger came to me, and told me that if I would accept the same pension Sir Robert Dudley had, being two thousand ducats per annum, the Duke would entertain me for his service in the war against the Turks. This offer, whether procured by the means of Sir Robert Dudley, Mrs. Sudel, or Signor Loty, my ancient friend, I know not, being thankfully acknowledged as a great honour, was yet refused by me, my intention being to serve his Excellency [the Prince of Orange] in the Low Country war.' At a later date we have Dudley and his wife thus mentioned by another English traveller:—'At the City of Florence there liveth Sir Robert Dudley, who styleth himself Duke of Northumberland, who left England because he could not be suffered to enjoy a second wife, his first wife then surviving. This Dudley now enjoyeth his second wife by a dispensation from his Holiness, and is in great esteem with the Duke of Florence, in regard of his art in contriving and fabricating of ships and galleys; and hath obtained of the Emperor to be declared Duke of Northumberland, who hath given him the title already, and the land when he can catch it.' This is the splenetic language of a convert from popery, which religion Dudley had, of course, embraced. The Duchess of Northumberland died some years before her husband, and was interred within the church of St. Pancras in Florence, where he caused a sumptuous marble monument to be erected over her grave, in the intention that, when his own funeral came to be celebrated, his remains should be deposited beside hers."

Our space will not admit us to give any particular account of the remainder of the volume, but all the stories are full of curiosities, historical, biographical, and moral. The two most interesting are "Bess of Hardwick and the Talbots," and "The Earldom of Montcith;" and we very much regret that we cannot give a detailed account, with illustrative extracts of each of these, for they are done in Mr Craik's best style. We hope his recent appointment to the Chair of history and literature at the New College in Belfast, will not be the means of delaying the publication of the next volume of the "Romance of the Peerage." The portrait of Sir Robert Dudley, prefixed to the present one, is after a miniature by Lilliard at Penshurst. It is a sharp, clever face; but indicates little depth of mind and less feeling.

LONGFELLOW'S "KAVANAGH." 1

THIS is a graceful little tale of love, poetic reverie, and sadness. It has no plot, and little incident; its charm is one of feeling rather than of passion; and its evident design is to give an interest to common and familiar objects and events, and to illustrate an admirable article of the modern poetical faith,—

"A man's best things are nearest him."

Common human life, with its daily joys and sorrows, the simple feelings and aspirations of human hearts, are the natural and acceptable materials whereof the story is constructed. And yet the persons and characters introduced are by no means common sort of people, but, for the most part, pure-minded, generous, and cultivated men and women, in whom the mystery and intelligence of life is hallowed and exalted by high and holy aims and purposes. A poetic sanctity pervades the narrative, which flows on softly and gracefully, like a gentle stream through rural places.

It is a Saturday afternoon; and Mr. Churchill, the schoolmaster of a certain village in New England, is preparing to go forth and enjoy a ramble in the country. He is a "dreamy poetic man," whose wife considers him "equal to great things." Inward intimations also lead him to contemplate the glory of some distant day, when his name shall be honoured with the homage which is paid to them that achieve literary distinction. He is conscious of a power of which the outward world around him has at present no suspicion or conception. "To the people in the village, he was the schoolmaster, and nothing more." They saw him daily toiling in the common path; his visible labours were earthly, and tending only to earthly and temporal results; and they knew nothing of the latent capacity which made him yearn to participate in a higher ministry. Nevertheless, he had seasons of personal satisfaction, of the influx of conscious inspiration, and of a high and poetical delight, which carried him beyond the thralldom of irksome and material impediments, into regions of spiritual and universal beauty. On this particular Saturday afternoon, as on Saturday afternoons in general—those welcome and ever pleasant schoolmaster's sabbaths—he was revelling and inwardly rejoicing at his temporary deliverance from the ordinary cares and vexations of his calling.

"With a feeling of infinite relief, he left behind him the empty schoolhouse, into which the hot sun of a September afternoon was pouring. All the bright young faces were gone; all the impatient little hearts were gone; all the fresh voices, shrill but musical with the melody of childhood, were gone; and the lately busy realm was given up to silence, and the dusty sunshine, and the old grey flies, that buzzed and bumped their heads against the window panes."

He went forth, and with a light step he speedily entered the "solemn avenue of pines that led to the margin of the river :—"

"At first his step was quick and nervous; and he swung his cane as if aiming blows at some invisible and retreating enemy. Though a meek man, there were moments when he remembered with bitterness, the unjust reproaches of fathers, and their insulting words; and then he fought imaginary battles with people out of sight, and struck them to the ground, and trampled upon them; for Mr. Churchill was not exempt from the weakness of human nature, nor the customary vexations of a schoolmaster's life. Unruly sons, and unreasonable fathers did sometimes embitter his else sweet days and nights. But as he walked, his step grew slower, and his heart calmer. The coolness and shadows of the great trees comforted and satisfied him, and he heard the voice of the wind as it were the voice of spirits calling around him in the air. So that when he emerged from the black woodlands into the meadows by the river's side, all his cares were forgotten."

Here he lay down under a sycamore, to enjoy the visitation of exalting thoughts, and to catch impressions and pleasing images from the scenery.

"Nature had made Mr. Churchill a poet, but destiny made him a schoolmaster. This produced a discord between his outward and his inward existence. Life presented itself to him like the Sphinx, with its perpetual riddle of the real and the ideal. To the solution of this dark problem he devoted his days and his nights. He was forced to teach grammar when he would fain have written poems; and from day to day, and from year to year, the trivial things of life postponed the great designs which he felt capable of accomplishing, but never had the resolute courage to begin. Thus he dallied with his thoughts and with all things, and wasted his strength on trifles; like the lazy sea, that plays with the pebbles on its beach, but under the inspiration of the wind might lift great navies on its outstretched palms, and toss them into the air as playthings.

"The evening came. The setting sun stretched his celestial rods of light across the level landscape, and, like the Hebrew in Egypt, smote the rivers and the brooks and the ponds, and they became as blood.

Mr. Churchill turned his steps homewards, and, on entering his study, found the lamp lighted, and his wife waiting for him :—

"The wood fire was singing on the hearth like a grasshopper in the heat and silence of a summer noon; and to his heart the chill autumnal evening became a summer noon. His wife turned towards him with looks of love in her joyous blue eyes; and in the serene expression of her face he read the divine beatitude, 'Blessed are the pure in heart.'"

In pleasant converse and communion with this "help meet for him," and in playful intercourse with a fascinating little boy, whom she had borne to him, and who, as is usual, was the pride and solace of the household, the schoolmaster poet passed a cheerful and happy interval of recreation. And when at length the rosy fellow, and a speechless little brother, something younger, had been sent respectively to bed, and the room was still, and tea was over, and Mrs. Churchill had seated herself to needle work, and with her quiet and sympathetic face seemed ready to listen and respond to any thing her husband had to say, the latter rose up from his seat, and, "as was his custom," paced to and fro about his study :—

"And as he walked, he gazed with secret rapture at the books which lined the walls, and thought how many bleeding hearts and aching heads had found consolation for themselves, and imparted it to others, by writing those pages. The books seemed to him almost as living beings, so instinct were they with human thoughts and sympathies. It was as if the authors themselves were gazing at him from the walls, with countenances neither sorrowful nor glad, but full of calm indifference to fate, like those of the poets who appeared to Dante in his vision, walking together on the dolorous shore. And then he dreamed of fame, and thought that perhaps hereafter he might be in some degree, and to some one, what these men were to him; and in the enthusiasm of the moment he exclaimed aloud—'Would you have me be like these, dear Mary?'

"Like these what?' asked his wife, not comprehending him.

"Like these great and good men,—like these scholars and poets,—the authors of all these books!'

"She pressed his hand and said, in a soft, but excited tone,—

"Oh yes! like them, only perhaps better!'

"Then I will write a Romance!'

"Write it!' said his wife, 'like the angel.' For she believed that then he would become famous forever, and that all the vexed and busy world would stand to hear him blow his little trumpet, whose sound was to rend the adamantine walls of time, and reach the ears of a far-off and startled posterity."

But Mr. Churchill dallied with the subject, and went on talking with his wife about the desirability of making mathematics more poetical, and how, as Pythagoras and other ancients taught, "there is something divine in the science of numbers :—" all which Mrs. Churchill declared herself unable to understand, since, in her opinion, there was no manner of poetry in the matter. An old translation from the Sanscrit is thereupon produced, namely, the "Lilawati of Bhascara Achargu," a book said to have been written more than seven hundred years ago, to perpetuate the name of the author's daughter, of whose history and matrimonial mischances a certain legend is there reported. The book contains likewise many arithmetical and geometric problems, all fancifully and somewhat mystically stated; and in the effort to solve one of the questions, the schoolmaster makes a very decided blunder, and loses, on the whole, a considerable space of time.

"But," at length said he, "I am now going to write. I must really begin in sober earnest, or I shall never get any thing finished; and you know I have so many things to do, so many books to write, that really I do not know where to begin. I think I will take up the romance first."

"It will not make much difference, if you will only begin."

"That is true. I will not lose a moment."

"Did you answer Mr. Cartwright's letter about the cottage-bedstead?"

"Dear me no! I forgot it entirely. That must be done first, or he will make it all wrong."

"And the young lady who sent you the poetry to look over and criticise?"

"No; I have not had a single moment's leisure. And there is Mr. Hanson, who wants to know about the cooking-range. Confound it! there is always something interfering with my Romance. However, I will despatch those matters very speedily."

And he began to write with rapidity and haste.—

"For awhile nothing was heard but the scratching of his pen; then he said, probably in connexion with the cooking-range,—'One of the most convenient things in housekeeping is a ham. It is always ready, and always welcome; you can eat it with anything and without anything. It reminds me always of the great wild boar, Scrimner, in the northern mythology, who is killed every day for the gods to feast on in Valhalla, and comes to life again every night.'

"In that case, I should think the gods would have the night-mare," said his wife."

There was little further said; and meanwhile Mr. Churchill proceeded with his letters. There were half-a-dozen of them altogether, and some of them were not very easily disposed of, particularly that to the poetical young lady. Finally, however, they were finished and sealed; and the writer looked up to his wife:—

"She turned her eyes dreamily upon him; slumber was hanging in their blue orbs, like snow in the heavens ready to fall. It was quite late, and he said to her,—'I am too tired, my charming Lilawati, and you too sleepy, to sit here any longer to-night; and as I do not wish to begin my Romance without having you at my side, so that I can read detached passages to you as I write, I will put it off till to-morrow or the next day.'"

He watched his wife as she went upstairs with the light. It was a picture always new and always beautiful. As he followed her, he paused to look at the stars, and the beauty of the heavens made his soul overflow.—

"How absolute," he exclaimed, "how absolute and omnipotent is the silence of the night! And yet the stillness seems almost audible! From all the measure-less depths of air around us comes a half-sound, a half-whisper, as if we could hear the crumbling and falling away of earth and all created things in the great miracle of nature—decay and reproduction, ever beginning, never ending—the gradual lapse and running of the sand in the great hour-glass of Time!"

That same night the Rev. Mr. Pendexter, the parson or pastor of the village, was preparing his farewell sermon. His parishioners had become dissatisfied with his preaching, and, through manifold annoyances and disquietudes, he had been driven to resign his ministry. The next day the sermon was delivered to an unusually enormous congregation, and on the day following, the old gentleman departed. A few persons regretted the loss of his counsel and his presence, though the generality were immeasurably relieved, and the young ladies more particularly were excited with pleasing expectations respecting his successor.

"The winter came on with its affluence of snows, and its many candidates for the vacant pulpit. But the parish was difficult to please, as all parishes are, and talked of dividing itself, and building a new church, and other extravagances, as all parishes do. Finally, it concluded to remain as it was, and the choice of a pastor was made."

This honoured individual was the Rev. Arthur Kavanagh, who, as a school girl of the period described him in a letter to a bosom friend, was "tall, very pale, with beautiful black eyes and hair!" Several weeks elapsed before he got permanently into residence. At length, however,—

"The spring came, and brought the birds, and the flowers, and the new clergyman, who was ordained with all the pomp and ceremony usual on such occasions. The opening of the season furnished also the theme of his first discourse, which some of the congregation thought very beautiful, and others very incomprehensible.

"Ah, how wonderful is the advent of spring!—the great annual miracle of the blossoming of Aaron's rod, repeated on myriads and myriads of branches!—the gentle progression and growth of herbs, flowers, trees,—gentle, and yet irrepressible, which no force can stay, no violence restrain, like love, that wins its way and cannot be withstood by any human power, because itself is divine power. If spring came but once in a century, instead of once a year, or burst forth with the sound of an earthquake, and not in silence, what wonder and expectation would there be in all hearts to behold the miraculous change! But now the silent succession suggests nothing but necessity. To most men only the cessation of the miracle would be miraculous, and the perpetual exercise of God's power seems less wonderful than its withdrawal would be."

"Such was the train of thought with which Kavanagh commenced his sermon; and then, with deep solemnity and emotion, he proceeded to speak of the spring of the soul, as from its cheerless winter distance it turns nearer and nearer to the great Sun, and clothes its dry and withered branches anew with leaves and blossoms, unfolded from within itself, beneath the penetrating and irresistible influence."

While delivering the discourse, Kavanagh had not succeeded so entirely in abstracting himself from all outward things as not to note, in some degree, its effect upon his hearers. As in modern times no applause is permitted in our churches, however moved the audience may be, and, consequently, no one ventured to signify his approval or disapprobation; and, moreover, as no one after church spoke to him of his sermon, or of any thing else, the young preacher felt doubtful about the impressiveness of his oration, and went home with rather a heavy heart and a feeling of discouragement. Yet one thing had cheered and consoled him. "It was the pale countenance of a young girl, whose dark eyes had been fixed upon him during the whole discourse with unflinching interest and attention." This was Alice Archer, the poor, but gentle and affectionate daughter of an aged woman now blind. "Ah! could he have known how deeply sank his words into that simple heart, he might have shuddered with another kind of fear than that of not moving his audience sufficiently."

Arthur Kavanagh, we are told, was descended from an ancient Catholic family. His ancestors had an estate "lying upon that wild and wonderful sea-coast of Maine, which, even upon the map, attracts the eye by its singular and picturesque indentations." Here, in the bosom of the solemn forests, they continued the practice of their ancient faith, the little church where they worshipped being still standing, "though now as closed and silent as the graves which surround it, and in which the dust of the Kavanaghs lies buried."

"In these solitudes, in this faith, was Kavanagh born, and grew to childhood, a feeble, delicate boy, watched over by a grave and taciturn father, and a mother who looked upon him with infinite tenderness, as upon a treasure she could not long retain. She walked with him by the sea-side, and spoke to him of God and the mysterious majesty of the ocean, with its tides and tempests. She sat with him on the carpets of golden threads beneath the aromatic pines, and, as the perpetual melancholy sound ran along the rattling boughs, his soul seemed to rise and fall, with a motion and a whisper like those in the branches over him. She taught him his letters from the lives of the saints, a volume full of wondrous legends, and illustrated with engravings from pictures by the old masters, which opened to him at once the world of spirits and the world of art; and both were beautiful. She explained to him the pictures; she read to him the legends, the lives of holy men and women, full of faith and good works,—things which ever afterwards remained associated together in his mind. Thus, holiness of life, and self-renunciation, and devotion to duty, were early impressed upon his soul. To his quick imagination the spiritual world became real: the holy company of saints stood round about the solitary boy; his guardian angels led him by the hand by day, and sat by his pillow at night. . . .

"Of all the legends of the mysterious book that which most delighted and most deeply impressed him, was the legend of St Christopher. . . . It related that St Christopher, being of huge proportions and immense strength, wandered long about the world before his conversion, seeking for the greatest king, and willing to obey no other. After serving various masters, whom he in turn deserted, because each recognised by some word or sign another greater than himself, he heard by chance of Christ, the king of heaven and earth, and asked of a holy hermit where he might be found, and how he might serve him. The hermit told him he must fast and pray; but the giant replied that if he fasted he should lose his strength, and that he did not know how to pray. Then the hermit told him to take up his abode on the banks of a dangerous mountain torrent, where travellers were often drowned in crossing, and to rescue any that might be in peril. The giant obeyed; and, tearing up a palm-tree by the roots for a staff, he took his station by the river's side, and saved many lives. And the Lord looked down from heaven, and said, 'Behold this strong man, who knows not the way to worship, but has found the way to serve me!' And one night he heard the voice of a child crying in the darkness, saying, 'Christopher, come and bear me over the river!' And he went out, and found the child sitting alone on the margin of the stream; and taking him upon his shoulders he waded into the water. Then the wind began to roar, and the waves to rise higher and higher about him, and his little burden, which at first had seemed so light, grew heavier and heavier as he advanced, and bent his huge shoulders down, and put his life in peril, so that when he reached the shore he said, 'Who art thou, O child, that hast weighed upon me with a weight as if I had borne the whole world upon my shoulders?' And the child answered, 'Thou hast borne the whole world upon thy shoulders, and Him who created it. I am Christ, whom thou by thy deeds of charity wouldst serve. Thou and thy service are accepted. Plant thy staff in the ground, and it shall blossom and bear fruit!' With these words the child vanished away."

"There was something in this beautiful legend that entirely captivated the heart of the boy, and a vague sense of its hidden meaning seemed at times to seize him and control him. Later in life it became more and more evident to him, and remained for ever in his mind as a lovely allegory of active charity and a willingness to serve. Like the giant's staff, it blossomed and bore fruit."

At a proper age Arthur was sent to a Jesuit's college in Canada, where he "distinguished himself by his zeal for study, by the docility, gentleness, and generosity of his nature." When his college days were ended, he returned home, "full of youth, full of joy and hope; but it was only to receive the dying blessings of his mother, who expired in peace, having seen his face once more. Then the house became empty to him. Solitary was the sea-shore, solitary were the woodland walks. But the spiritual world seemed nearer and more real." For affairs he had no aptitude, and he therefore devoted himself to theological and philosophic studies. In continued reading and meditation he passed many weeks and months. And, mingled with his daily thoughts and ponderings, continually and ever with more distinctness arose in his memory from the days of childhood the old tradition of Saint Christopher, the beautiful allegory of humility and labour. He and his service had been accepted, though he would not fast, and had not learned to pray. It became more and more clear to him, that the life of man consists not in seeing visions and in dreaming dreams, but in active charity and willing service.

"Moreover, the study of ecclesiastical history awoke within him many strange and dubious thoughts. The books taught him more than their writers meant to teach. It was impossible to read of Athanasius without reading also of Arius; it was impossible to hear of Calvin, without hearing of Servetus. Reason began more energetically to vindicate itself; that Reason which is a light in darkness, not that which is 'a thorn in Revelation's side.' The search after truth and freedom, both intellectual and spiritual, became a passion in his soul; and he pursued it till he had left far behind him many dusky dogmas, many antique superstitions, many time-honoured observances, which the lips of her alone who first taught them to him in his childhood, had invested with solemnity and sanctity.

"By slow degrees, and not by violent spiritual conflicts, he became a Protestant. He had but passed from one chapel to another in the same vast cathedral. He was still beneath the same ample roof, still heard the same divine service chanted in a different dialect of the same universal language. Out of his old faith he brought with him all he had found in it that was holy and pure, and of good report. Not its bigotry, and fanaticism and intolerance; but its zeal, its self-devotion, its heavenly aspirations, its human sympathies, its endless deeds of charity. Finally, his own vocation became manifest to him, and he entered upon its many duties and responsibilities, its many trials and discouragements, with the zeal of Peter, and the gentleness of John."

So nurtured and educated, and inspired with feelings and principles so little in unison with the ordinary notions and sentiments of worldly life, Kavanagh might perhaps be pardoned for manifesting a few occasional "eccentricities." One of his whims was to take possession of a chamber in the old church tower, and have it fitted up for his uses as a study. To enliven a little this sombre house of contemplation, he goes one day to a bird-fancier's to purchase a canary. Here the destinies had ordained that a certain young lady of the neighbourhood should be at the very instant, intent on buying a charming carrier-pigeon, which she designed to employ as a private daily post, for conveying the voluminous correspondence that was continually going on between herself and a female friend, residing in the village. The lady, indeed, was Miss Cecilia Vaughan, who lived in a very respectable country mansion, "a little out of town," and whose father was a person of some eminence and consideration in those parts. He is described as being "a kindly old man; a judge in one of the courts; dignified, affable, and somewhat bent by his legal erudition, as a shelf is by the weight of the books upon it." The young lady's mother had been many years deceased, and she had been left very much to herself, both in the choice of her amusements and pursuits, and in the selection of her friends. Her beloved associate at school was the before-mentioned Alice Archer. "After they left school, the love between them, and consequently the letters, rather increased than diminished." It was to facilitate this intercommunication that the carrier pigeon had been provided. "He was to be the flying-post; their bed-rooms the dove-cots, the pure and friendly Columbaria."

"Endowed with youth, beauty, talent, fortune, and, moreover, with that indefinable fascination which has no name, Cecilia Vaughan was not without lovers, avowed and unavowed; young men who made an ostentatious display of their affection; boys, who treasured it in their bosoms, as something indescribably sweet and precious, perfuming all the chambers of the heart with its celestial fragrance."

All her lovers, however, had hitherto found little favour in her sight, but she, like most of the young ladies of one's acquaintance, had in her time refused a reasonable multitude of "offers," excellent or otherwise. She held her gentle heart quite free, and cultivated a Platonic friendship with Alice Archer, waiting doubtless unconsciously for the time when a more earnest and tumultuous passion should disclose to her something of the height and depth of the mystery of a profounder love. And now it came to pass that this pale and intelligent stranger—this poet-priest, and elegant preacher of the everlasting word, was to pass, like a marvellous mesmeric hand, before her eyes, and dissolve her soul in a dream of ecstasy.

On first beholding her, Kavanagh himself had been charmed with her form, her goodly lineaments, her voice; and her "fair and beautiful face, shaded by long, light locks, in which the sunshine seemed entangled, as among the boughs of trees," had shed a glory in his heart, which no after-time could render dim. Whether Miss Vaughan became simultaneously "attracted," the story is not careful to inform us. There is reason, however, to conclude otherwise. On the particular morning in which she purchased the carrier-pigeon, she went straightway to call upon Miss Archer, to explain to her the plan she contemplated. Alice is more than commonly delighted to see her friend: she has that in her heart which she would fain tell, but for which as yet she has no word.

"I have just been writing to you," said Alice; "I wanted so much to see you this morning!"

"Why this morning in particular? Has any thing happened?" asked her friend.

"Nothing; only I had such a longing to see you."

"Alice was not aware that, in the words she uttered, there was the slightest shadow of untruth. And yet, had nothing happened? Was it nothing that among her thoughts a new thought had risen like a star, whose pale effulgence, mingled with the common daylight, was not yet distinctly visible even to herself, but would grow brighter as the sun grew lower, and the rosy twilight darker? Was it nothing that a new fountain of affection had suddenly sprung up within her, which she mistook for the freshening and overflowing of the old fountain of friendship, that hitherto had kept the lowland landscape of her life so green, but now, being flooded by more affection, was not to cease, but only to disappear in the greater tide, and flow unseen beneath it? Yet so it was: and this stronger yearning—this unappeasable desire for her friend, was only the tumultuous swelling of a heart that as yet knows not its own secret."

As the time speeds on, Kavanagh becomes sufficiently acquainted with his parish. In a few months he had completed the first great cycle of parochial visits.

"He had seen the Vaughans, the Archers, the Churchills, and also the Hawkinsses and the Wilmerdingses, and many more. With Mr. Churchill he had become intimate. They had many points of contact and sympathy. They walked together on leisure afternoons; they sat together through long summer evenings; they discoursed with friendly zeal on various topics of literature, and morals, and religion."

"The study in the tower was delightful. There sat the young apostle and meditated the great design and purpose of his life, the removal of all prejudice, and uncharitableness, and persecution, and the union of all sects into one Church universal. Sects themselves he would not destroy, but sectarianism; for sects were to him only as separate converging roads, leading all to the same celestial city of peace. . . . From this tower of contemplation he looked down with mingled emotions of joy and sorrow on the toiling world below. The wide prospect seemed to enlarge his sympathies and his charities; and he often thought of the words of Plato: 'When we consider human life, we should view as from a high tower all things terrestrial; such as herds, armies, men employed in agriculture, in marriages, divorces, births, deaths; the tumults of courts of justice; desolate lands; various barbarous nations; feasts, wallings, markets; a medley in all things, in a system adorned by contrarities.'

"On the outside of the door Kavanagh had written the vigorous line of Dante,

'Think that to-day shall never dawn again!'

that it might always serve as a salutation and memento to him as he entered. On the inside, the no less striking lines of a more modern bard—

"Lose this day loitering, 'twill be the same story
To-morrow, and the next more dilatory.
The indecision brings its own delays,
And days are lost, lamenting o'er lost days.
Are you in earnest? Seize this very minute!
What you can do, or think you can, begin it!
Boldness has genius, power, and magic in it!
Only engage, and then the mind grows heated:
Begin it, and the work will be completed."

Meanwhile, things had gone on very quietly and monotonously in Mr. Churchill's family, when—

"One evening, as he was sitting down to begin, for at least the hundredth time, the great Romance,—subject of so many resolves and so much remorse, so often determined upon, but never begun,—a loud knock at the street door, which stood wide open, announced a visitor. Unluckily, the study door was likewise open; and consequently, being in full view, he found it impossible to refuse himself; nor, in fact, would he have done so, had all the doors been shut and bolted—the art of refusing oneself being at that time imperfectly understood in Fairmeadow. Accordingly, the visitor was shown in."

He announced himself as Mr. Hathaway; and he had come to enlist Mr. Churchill as a contributor to a new gigantic magazine, which was then on the eve of being established. There is a long talk about American literature, in the course of which Mr. Churchill discourses rather sensibly, and indulges himself in some judicious criticism. It appears, however, he is only indifferently acquainted with the great authors of his country.

"By the way," says Mr. Hathaway, 'do you know Honeywell?'

"No, I do not," replies the other. 'Who is he?'

"Honeywell, the poet, I mean."

"No; I never heard of him. There are so many poets now-a-days!"

"That is very strange indeed! Why, I consider Honeywell one of the finest writers in the country,—quite in the front rank of American authors. He is a real poet, and no mistake. Nature made him with her shirt sleeves rolled up. . . . Honeywell is going to write for the magazine; he is to furnish a poem for every number, and as he succeeds equally well in the plaintive and didactic style of Wordsworth, and the more vehement and impassioned style of Byron, I think we shall do very well."

"And what do you mean to call the new magazine?" inquired Mr. Churchill.

"We think of calling it 'The Niagara.'"

"Why, that is the name of our fire-engine! Why not call it 'The Extinguisher?'"

"That is also a good name; but I prefer 'The Niagara,' as more national. And I hope, Mr. Churchill, you will let us count upon you. We should like to have an article from your pen for every number."

"Do you mean to pay your contributors?"

"Not the first year, I am sorry to say. But after that, if the work succeeds, we shall pay handsomely."

Mr. Churchill is induced to promise his co-operation in the scheme, and agrees to write "a series of papers on Obscure Martyrs—a kind of tragic history of the unrecorded and life-long sufferings of women, which hitherto had found no historian, save now and then a novelist." Spite, however, of all its brilliant pretensions and prospectus, the magazine never was got out. Still the dream of gaining a wide celebrity, by means of its promised extensive circulation, was enough to occupy Mr. Churchill's thoughts, and to withdraw them entirely from his romance for many weeks together.

But now, for the sake of change and coolness, let us go, in the summer weather, with a cheerful party into the woods, and where the murmur of running waters sends a charm into the shady places.

"Every state," says our author, "and almost every county in New England has its roaring brook,—a mountain streamlet, overhung by woods, impeded by a mill, encumbered by fallen trees, but ever racing, rushing, roaring down through gurgling gullies, and filling the forest with its delicious sound and freshness; the drinking-place of home-returning herds; the mysterious haunt of squirrels and blue jays; the sylvan retreat of school-girls, who frequent it on summer holidays, and mingle their fair imaginings with its restless, exuberant, and rejoicing stream."

To such a spot did Mr. and Mrs. Churchill, with their little son Alfred, Cecilia Vaughan, Alice Archer, and Kavanagh, repair on a certain day in the mid-summer vacation, carrying with them "a large basket, containing what the squire of the grove in 'Don Quixote' called his fambreras—that magniloquent Castilian word for cold collation. Over warm uplands, smelling of clover and mint; through cool glades, still wet with the rain of yesterday; along the river; across the rattling and tilting planks of wooden bridges; by orchards; by the gates of fields, with the tall mullen growing at the bars; by stone walls over-run with privet and barberries; in sun and heat, in shadow and coolness,—forward drove the happy party on that pleasant summer morning."

In the course of the day, there was a pleasant little catastrophe.

"Ere long, they were forced to cross the brook, stepping from stone to stone, over the little rapids and cascades. All crossed lightly, easily, safely; only Cecilia lingered behind, as if afraid to cross. Cecilia, who had crossed at that same place a hundred times before,—Cecilia, who had the surest foot and the firmest nerves of all the village maidens; she stood irresolute, seized with a sudden tremour, blushing and laughing at her own timidity, and yet unable to advance. Kavanagh saw her embarrassment, and hastened back to help her. Her hand trembled in his; she thanked him with a gentle look and word. His whole soul was softened within him. His attitude, his countenance, his voice, were alike submissive and subdued. He was as one penetrated with tenderest emotions."

The reader perceives whither matters are now tending. Kavanagh and Cecilia have entered on the turnpike road to matrimony. This fact comes home shortly afterwards, with startling effect, to Alice Archer. She, however, was resigned. "She made the heroic sacrifice of self, leaving her sorrow to the great physician, Time—the nurse of care, the healer of all smarts, the soother and consoler of all sorrows. And, thenceforward, she became unto Kavanagh what the moon is to the sun, for ever following, for ever separated, for ever sad!"

The summer and the autumn pass away, and the wild winter comes forth howling, and casts his mantle over the earth.

"The first snow came. How beautiful it was! falling so silently, all day long, all night long, on the mountains, on the meadows, on the roofs of the living, on the graves of the dead! All white save the river, that marked its course by a winding black line across the landscape, and the leafless trees, that against the leaden sky now revealed more fully the wonderful beauty and intricacy of their branches. . . . All day long, all night long, the snow fell on the village and on the churchyard; on the happy home of Cecilia Vaughan, on the lonely grave of Alice Archer! Yes; for before the winter came she had gone to that land where winter never comes. . . . She was dead; and with her had died her secret sorrow and her secret love. Kavanagh never knew what wealth of affection for him faded from the world when she departed; Cecilia never knew what fidelity of friendship, what delicate regard, what gentle magnanimity, what angelic patience had gone with her into the grave; Mr. Churchill never knew that, while he was exploring the past for records of obscure and unknown martyrs, in his own village, near his own door, before his own eyes, one of that silent sisterhood had passed away into oblivion, unnoticed and unknown."

When the fair spring came round, Kavanagh and Cecilia were married. They went away from the village, and rambled over many lands, spending a three years' period of honeymoon! They saw the towns and cities of highest note in Europe, loitered on memorable shores, and among the ruins and great attractions of renowned and honoured places; and finally returned to the "old house at home." Calling in on Mr. Churchill, Kavanagh was greeted with all the olden fervour, and welcomed with cordiality and earnestness. But Kavanagh found Mr. Churchill precisely where he left him. He had not advanced a single step in any of the great concerns and undertakings that were to have rendered his life famous.

"The same dreams, the same longings, the same aspirations, the same indecision. A thousand things had been planned, and none completed. While he mused, the fire burned in other brains. Other hands wrote the books he dreamed about. . . . So far as fame and external success were concerned, his life certainly was a failure. . . . All his defects and mortifications he attributed to the outward circumstances of his life, the exigencies of his profession, the accidents of chance."

But, in reality, they lay, wherein all failures of activity lie generally,—within himself.

"He wanted the all controlling, all subduing Will. He wanted the fixed purpose that aways and bends all circumstances to its uses, as the wind bends the reeds and rushes beneath it."

Alas, for the irresolution and infirmity of man!

"'Nothing, nothing done,' exclaimed Kavanagh, as he wended his way homeward, musing and meditating as he went. 'And shall all these lofty aspirations end in nothing? Shall the arms be thus stretched forth to encircle the universe, and come back empty against a bleeding, aching breast?'"

"And the words of the poet came into his mind, and he thought them worthy to be written in letters of gold, and placed above every door in every house, as a warning, a suggestion, an incitement:—

"'Stay, stay the present instant!
Imprint the marks of wisdom on its wings!
Oh, let it not elude thy grasp, but like
The good old patriarch upon record,
Hold the fleet angel fast until he bless thee!'"

This, gentle reader, is a shadow of the substance and the beauty of Professor Longfellow's "Kavanagh."

"The Family Economist." Vol. 2. Price 1s. Groombridge & Sons.—This we do not hesitate to qualify as one of the best shilling's worth that ever was produced even in these days of cheap literature. Such books are indeed a boon to the community, and a blessing to the poor. The information communicated is surprising in amount, and given in a plain, downright, practical, yet pleasing manner. It is a book of reference on domestic matters, that no family should omit to procure. Moreover it is interspersed with much amusing and instructive reading. The tone of the book is eminently sound and healthy; religious and moral precepts—shrewd hints upon conduct and manners, are unobtrusively and pleasingly interwoven. Those, above all, who have at heart the improvement of the lower classes, should endeavour to give increased circulation to publications such as these, of which the good effects are incalculable. We wish every person in the kingdom had a copy, as a New Year's gift.

"Stories for Summer Days and Winter Nights,"—1s. also published by Groombridge,—is a collection of cheap and good fictions, all marked by their religious and moral tendency. When the country is deluged with demoralizing trash for the poor, it is pleasant to see an issue of books of a class which may at once please and inform their minds. A little poem on "William Tell," is well worthy of insertion in more ambitious publications.

"Cottage Cookery" is a little manual extracted from the "Family Economist," which will be found useful to the middle as well as the lower classes.

"The Triumph for Salamis." A Lyrical Ballad. By W. C. Bennett.—Mr. Bennett has been for the last few years establishing himself as a favourite with the public. His songs, sonnets, and other poetical compositions, have a decided superiority over those of our "thousand living poets." They all contain evidence of genuine taste and feeling. This "Triumph for Salamis" is a longer poem than any we have yet seen from his pen. It is written after the manner of Greek Choruses, and has considerable merit.

CALIFORNIA :

ITS PAST PROGRESS, PRESENT CONDITION, AND FUTURE PROSPECTS.

MORE than three hundred and twenty years have elapsed since Hernan Cortez discovered that long narrow peninsula which outlies the coast of Mexico, and forms the Gulf, then known as the Purple or Vermilion Sea. He was more attracted by its position than its aspect; for it appeared a situation where he could concentrate his forces and spread his power over the golden continent. It presented few attractions to the eye, but the voyager's experience taught him to expect that, where the plains and hills seemed least verdant, the concealed treasures of the earth abounded most. Cortez at once attempted to subdue what he considered an island of moderate fertility. In those times national right was little more than a fiction; and with this ambitious explorer discovery conferred the privilege of dominion. But he failed, and it was not until 1679 that a Spanish admiral planted a flag in that soil—a flag destined to flourish there through many generations, until the mother-country, languishing under a long decline, lay prostrate amid the rising powers of Europe. Meanwhile, New California was in 1542 discovered by Cabrillo, explored by Drake, and surveyed by Spain sixty years later. Considerable uncertainty hangs round the exact order of events connected with this wealthy region; but its early history is associated with the names of those adventurous navigators who sought to conquer by the sword what they had through chance discovered. It forms a map of events too intricate to be delineated in the present sketch. Drake saw the country, named it New Albion, and called it British territory. Our claim, however, was never asserted. Sebastian Visconio, in 1602, was led by accident to Monterey, and established the Spanish authority there; but finally, when the first heat of enterprise had cooled, and the enthusiasm of many contending claimants was exhausted, the Jesuits, towards the close of the seventeenth century, obtained permission to colonise a territory whose value was still unknown to the world, but which to their subtle discernment appeared to teem with the ready materials of wealth.

A hardy band of seamen or soldiers, commissioned to this adventure, would have landed, sword in hand, upon the coast, built a fortress, planted cannon on the heights, and at once built up their dominion on the adamant basis of superior power; but the Jesuits infused the character of their order into the prosecution of their enterprise. Theirs was a bloodless conquest. They carried gifts, not arms, into California. They subdued the natives with luring promises, not with the sabre or the arquebuss; and their sway—unseen, unrecognised at first,—spread in a rapidly widening circle over the region. Having destroyed the independence, they sought to develop the resources of their acquisition; they planted missions; they stimulated labour; they industriously wrought the land; and their energies soon piled up stores of wealth. Crafty in this, as in every other project, they feared jealousy, and assiduously scattered through Christendom accounts of the sterility, the baneful climate, the unwilling people of California. Meanwhile the pearl-fishers brought up riches from the bed of the ocean; the lands were covered with plenty, and the Jesuits despatched many a rich galleon, to the various markets of the world.

Ships with costly cargoes left the harbours, bearing in their holds the riches of the virgin soil; but in the mouths of their crews, reports of the wretched country they had left! Still these crafty fathers laboured not wholly for themselves: with them it was an axiom that the enthralled mind is the heaviest fetter for the body; and whilst they reaped the ready crops of California,—whilst they ranged its forests in search of gums, and bored its rocks in quest of gold,—they spread everywhere the influence of Christianity, and the promising buds of a new civilization appeared. Before the arrival of these Jesuits the country wore the aspect of a fertile solitude, with primæval forests, vast grassy valleys, and luxuriant plains, peopled only by wandering houseless savages. Its progress under their influence was rapid, and its prosperity rose high. Let us not inquire too closely into the motives of the saintly fathers, whose energies ripened into results so friendly to civilization.

At length Lord Anson captured a vessel, richly freighted, sailing from that poverty-stricken land. The Jesuits owed their fall to the occurrence of that day; for their masked rapacity was trumpeted through the length and breadth of Europe; and when the country was smiling in its changed attire, and the Indians had sunk to a proper degree of submission, a new revolution occurred. It formed the dawn of another epoch in Californian history. The Jesuits were expelled, and the region was confided to the control of the Dominican monks of Mexico and the saintly Franciscan friars.

The peninsula was at this time studded with sixteen villages; and though the upper country had not maintained the race with equal swiftness, its superior beauty and richer verdure attracted the enterprise of settlers. It seemed to roll away to the snowy mountains in splendid undulations of fertile land, with dashing streams and plenteous valleys, inviting culture, and offering a generous reward to industry.

The first mission in New California was San Diego. It was planted in 1769, and soon around it there sprung up others, until, in 1803, eighteen were scattered over the country. Each mission was considered as the fold of a tribe of Indians, numbering in some, more than twelve hundred; and during the domination of the priests, the converts were well fed, clad, and lodged, in return for the labour of their hands. The products of their industry were bartered with the merchants of Europe; and attracted by the forms and ceremonies of the Christian Church, owing its soft influence, and the benefits to be derived from steady lives and well-directed toil, the neophytes swelled their numbers, and California promised to become the home of a population at once happy, simple, and religious.

The means of conversion, however, were not always the most scrupulous; for the good missionaries held the theory, that the result obtained sanctifies the instruments employed. When persuasion, or gifts, or gentle allurements failed, the stubborn savages were seized, condemned to ten years' servitude, compelled to adopt the Christian creed, but encouraged by kind treatment, and taught the various arts of industry. Many laboured for the common interest, many were let out to private service, and many, having served their period, received allotments of land and rewards for faithful conduct. The influence of the missions was beneficial, if the manner of its employment admits of blame. The rise of population and the extension of industry were rapid in the extreme. In 1790 there were in the upper country 7,748 inhabitants; in 1801, 13,668; in 1802, 15,629, or double the first number; whilst the quantity of wheat raised, increased from fifteen to thirty-three thousand bushels, and the oxen fattened, from twenty-five to sixty-eight thousand. This tide of prosperity was rising with undiminished rapidity when troubles, in 1835, broke out, and the accumulated store of years was swept away by a torrent of struggles and confusion. Authority changed hands. The priests, stripped of their functions, degenerated into simple pastors, and the administradors, appointed by a despotism cloaked under the venerated name of a Republic, drove the Indians in great numbers to their native woods, robbed them of the fruits of their long labour, and overthrew the fabric commenced by the Jesuits and continued by the monks and friars.

The Indians, driven from their homes, galled by bitter injuries, robbed of their humble riches, and hunted once more to a refuge among woods and mountains, carried with them the spirit of hatred, and the purpose of deep revenge. They retaliated on their oppressors. Populous cultivated places were laid desolate, and left deserted; and the flames of a harassing and miserable war threatened to convert the smiling verdure of the land into a waste of smoking ashes. The missions were neglected; ruins became frequent; the earth was uncultivated; Christianity languished, and all things appeared as though the degenerate savage was again to range, in the unlimited freedom of nature, over a wild but magnificent wilderness. But the United States infused a new element of population into California. Her war with Mexico—whether justifiable or not—afforded the occasion; but there was a policy in her movements rarely observed in the impetuous conduct of youthful powers. She spread her actual influence long before she planted a flag as the sign of her dominion.

For two years previous to the capture of Monterey in 1846, her authority had been paramount in the country, which—nominally a province of Mexico—was, in truth, American territory. At length, towards the close of the summer of 1845, Captain Fremont appeared in the neighbourhood of Monterey, whose park-like scenery—trees scattered in groups over grassy hills, wide sloping fields, plantations of oak and fir, red-tiled houses, yellow-washed church, and white cottages—showed in pleasant contrast to the desolate region he had left. He was accompanied by some of his trappers—gigantic loafers, dressed in deer-skin coats, with formidable rifles, and mounted on tall spare horses. They rode in Indian file through the outskirts; their one-eyed leader viewed the town, and they vanished. Soon again he appeared with an ominous array of thirty-five followers, encamped on a woody height; was commanded to depart, was driven to the hills, pursued, and again lost sight of. An American ship then sailed into the harbour. Fremont was again at Monterey. The Californians foresaw the probable progress of events, and perhaps secretly desired the fostering protection of the great Republic. They balanced between that and independence; but, at length, a Mormon prophet excited an insurrection; and while a contest was pending, two United States vessels simultaneously entered the harbours of Monterey and San Francisco, and in July, 1846, the whole of California relapsed without a struggle, under the easy rule of America. A new era was again opened. An immediate change appeared. Industry was revived; deserted villages were re-peopled; neglected lands were again cultivated; decaying towns were renovated; and the busy hum of toil broke that death-like silence, that dispiriting lethargy, which broods over an ill-governed country.

But another and a greater change was at hand, to turn the tide of her fortunes into a new, a wider, and more diffusive channel, and to raise California from the condition of an ordinary State, to be the focus of the world's attention, the spot where innumerable streams of emigration from the four quarters of the world, from barbarous and civilized countries, pouring over the Rocky Mountains, or brought over the sea, from distant shores, were to meet in tumultuous confluence, and, flowing upon each other, form an eddying whirlpool of excitement, such as few countries on the globe, in any period of their history, could present to the observation of mankind.

The region itself—independently of its newly-discovered treasures—is wealthy in many natural resources. Its extent is great. From Cape Mendocino, at the borders of the United States, to the root of the Peninsula, is seven hundred miles, and Lower California thrusts out its vast tongue to an almost equal distance. The old region is for the most part a broken, hilly, and barren tract of land; but occasional plains of rich fertility alternate with the less favoured tracts; and these formed the sites of the old Jesuit Missions. Alta California extends from the coast to the provinces of New Mexico; but the interior desert basin remains unknown, except in those parts traversed by the Exploring Expedition. All that is known of it is, that it is a wild, rocky, and woody territory, watered by a few rivers, and lakes, rising periodically from the earth, and peopled by wandering Indian hordes—uncouth improvident savages; who seem to have derived from the white race little save that vice which appears most easily to be planted, and most quickly to grow, in all newly-discovered soils. The wild man at first contemplates his strange visitor as a god, and then receives from him the worst lessons of profligacy and debauch; leaving it for his children to learn, that civilization has commonly sent her most abandoned sons in the train of great discoverers.

The Sierra Nevada, or Snowy Range, divides the gold region from the great desert basin; and between this and the sea lies another line of mountains, forming a valley 500 miles in length, watered by the Sacramento and the San Joachin. These streams, forming a junction in the centre of the valley, diverge towards the sea, and pour in an united current into the harbour of San Francisco—one of the noblest on the globe. The aspect of the country is diversified, and full of beauty. Green valleys, glittering lakes, and verdant hills, extend along the interior borders, backed by the rounded spires of the Snowy Range, whose deep ravines and caverns are now peopled by toiling gold-hunters; who draw more wealth from the bleakest, most barren, and most neglected spots, than the husbandman in the course of many years could derive from the most luxuriantly cultivated land. Along the river banks, light grassy slopes alternate with stony, broken, sandy expanses, honey-combed as it were by time, but now swarming with amateur delvers. However, the country, as a whole, is fertile; producing abundance of grains, vegetables, and fruits, with fine timber; whilst immense pasture grounds afford nourishment to the flocks and herds that once formed the principal wealth of California. Several towns have risen along the coast; and of these Monterey, San Diego, San Francisco, San Gabriel, and the City of Angels, are the chief. Previous to the popular outbreaks and the war between the administrators and the Indian tribes, considerable commerce was carried on at the ports,—the produce of the country being exchanged for cloths, cottons, velvets, silks, brandies, wines, teas, and other merchandise.

But this trade was almost wholly destroyed, until the Annexation gave a new aspect to affairs. Then a new era was opened up, and prosperity filled the towns with bustle, the ports with shipping, the fields with cultivators, and the workshops with industrious artisans. Even the Indians, driven to the forests by misgovernment, flocked to the peopled communities, and gradually cast away, for the second time, the mantle of their barbarous life.

Before the establishment of Christianity, they formed one of the strangest and most savage sections of the human race. They worshipped a fantastic god; they dwelt in tribes, and lived partly in primitive thatched huts, and partly under the still more primitive roof of the forest. They wandered abroad in search of game, of dried seeds, of the wild produce of nature's own orchards, and roots dug out of the earth. The whole race was plunged in the darkest barbarism. From this condition they were elevated by the successive European rulers of the country.

Their domestic manners were purified by passing through the first progress of refinement; their habits of life became more decent and more regular, and their ideas were enlarged within the sphere of a new belief. They rose to a considerably high standard of progress; but were again depressed by the events of 1835, and once more reclaimed by the establishment of American power. The fisheries were actively prosecuted, and the culture of grain—which had been so neglected that foreign produce was required to blunt the edge of famine—occupied the energies of a numerous class. The rearing of oxen and sheep was undertaken with the vigour of former times. During the spring-tide of her prosperity, California was famous for hides and fleeces. This branch of industry also withered, and the traveller across those wide-spreading pastures was only reminded of the productive labour of former days by the vast heaps of bleaching bones left on the slaughtering-grounds. They frequently occur in many of the districts, and call to recollection those ominous piles of white bones which dot the sandy wastes of Libya, recording the fate of luckless caravans. But a new epoch was about to open. A sudden change appeared in the aspect of the country. It sprang up from its low prostration; it revived from its long lethargy; and society, restored to health, was again inspired with the spirit of industry, the love of commerce, and the ambition of well-earned prosperity.

The inter-communication between California and the United States received a vigorous impulse. Broad currents of emigration flowed through the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, from the territories of the great republic, and into the valleys and plains of California. This leads us to consider for a moment one of the most curious features of commerce in this or any other quarter of the globe. We mean that great caravan or wagon-train which traverses the deserts, gorges, hills, valleys, and flowery plains lying between the town of Independence, Missouri, in the United States, Santa Fé on the western slope of the Rocky range, and the City of Angels on the coast of Alta California. It was formerly one of the principal links of intercourse, and, indeed, with the vast emigrant trail diverging from it, and crossing the Rocky Mountains through the South Pass, afforded a main channel for the inter-communication of the two regions.

Forty-five years only have elapsed since one James Pursley, after wandering for a long period through the desolate solitudes west of the Mississippi, fell in with some Indians on the banks of the Platte River, and descended with them to the trading station of Santa Fé. Whether or not he opened a barter with that town, is conjectural; but it appears certain that he planted the first seed of that overland intercourse, although local tradition relates that a swindling French Creole amassed much wealth through trade carried on across the Rocky Mountains. Some desultory undertakings were attempted, but with little result, until in 1821 the first caravan arrived at Santa Fé. Perils and privations were the lot of the first adventurers; but in the next year a company of traders was formed to establish the system of commerce. Eighty of them in 1824 started with a caravan of numerous mules and twenty-five carts, bearing merchandise to the value of thirty thousand dollars. The journey was performed with little difficulty; but gradually, when the wagon-trains passed in regular succession along the trail, their wealth attracted tribes of roving Indians to hover along the line of march, plunder, murder, and intercept. They filled the woody hollows, lying in closest ambush until the head of the large, unwieldy caravan appeared in view, and then suddenly but stealthily thronging out upon the comparatively defenceless traders, who nevertheless frequently beat back their assailants and left a mound of slaughter on the spot. Still, the guilt of the first bloodshed hangs in a doubtful scale between the savages and the civilized men, though certain it is that many a corpse, shrouded in its own clothes, filled a grave on the wayside, and numerous stone-heaps or upright posts mark the resting-places of the dead along the borders of the trail.

In 1829 military protection was secured, and bodies of riflemen accompanied the caravans a considerable distance on their journey.

From various districts of America merchandise is collected on the Missouri River, brought up over its waters to the City of Independence, and then stowed in huge wagons, which bear it to Santa Fé, where part of the cargo, if we may so call it, is sold to the merchants of New Mexico, whilst a portion is carried on to the City of Angels. The caravan starts from Independence in May. Its appearance is singularly picturesque. A train of perhaps a hundred teams of from four to fifteen yokes, pulling five-score huge tented wagons, under the guidance of numerous drivers, cracking their long whips and shouting with all the power of their lungs; immense droves of cattle; long strings of carts drawn by mules; numbers of these animals laden with packs, with the merchants in their rude attire;—all these, and countless other features,—too minute to be described—too picturesque to be forgotten,—impart the chief interest to a scene of singular romance. All the town's-people throng out to witness the departure of the caravan, which is regarded as the great event of the year, although it is not more gigantic than many of those vast loaded trains which nightly issue from every side of London, and travel through darkness to the remotest quarters of the kingdom.

The interest of the expedition is not diminished by the wild landscapes across which the caravan pursues its creeping way. Now it enters on a broad grassy savannah, level as a lake; now it wends among flowery slopes, dotted with a few trees, brilliant with the Californian poppy, and speckled with thickly blooming shrubs, crimson blossoms, purple lilies, and the modest petals of the white and yellow evening primrose. Now it strikes out upon a wide, bleak, barren plain, studded with stony heaps; now it descends into a desert valley, deep and broad, waving from rim to rim with the wild mustard; now it skirts the arid shores of a salt lake; and now it enters the Vale of the Lonely Elm, where a solitary tree, by a pool of water, has given its name to the spot where it grows. Occasionally a little clump of tall cotton trees dots the prairie, each bearing amid its branches a small platform whereon a shrouded Indian corpse is laid. The climate is favourable to rapid desiccation, which encourages this singular plan of disposing of the dead. It is a custom among many barbarous races, and was practised by the ancient Scythians, as it is now among some of the Bornean tribes.

Plunging amid rugged gorges, dark precipitous heights, and deep lonely defiles, the wagon-train winds among the Rocky Mountains, and then, descending the slopes, entering a valley cultivated with rich crops of corn and yams, reaches Santa Fé. The town has three or four thousand inhabitants, dwelling in mud-brick houses, one story high, with a church and fine gardens in the suburbs. Long strings of asses may be constantly seen, laden with wood, wending their way from the distant hills, upon which the city depends for fuel. The arrival of the caravan spreads life through the dull streets, and a brisk barter is at once commenced: the mules and cattle of the surrounding region, with other materials of wealth, being exchanged for the merchandise brought from the Missouri.

In October a train of about two hundred horsemen, with a multitude of loaded mules, leaves Santa Fé for the City of Angels. They take with them woollen, cotton, and linen cloths, to be exchanged for horses and mules—two pieces being the usual price of each animal. Crossing the Sierra Madre, descending southward to the Rio Navajoas, traversing the wasted districts of the old missions, and making its way over the Colorado, the Snowy Range, the Valley of Tularos, and the Californian hills, it reaches Los Angeles in about seventy-five days, and leaves it in the following April, before the melting of the snows, with a train of two or three thousand horses and mules. Everywhere neglected lands, olive plantations heavy with fruit, and magnificent vineyards overgrown with wild vegetation, recalled the decayed industry of former days. But American enterprise was gradually rebuilding the ruined fabric of prosperity, when a discovery was made which turned adventure into a new channel, and opened another era in the history of California.

In September, 1847, an American settler, Captain Sutter, erected a water-mill in a mountainous spot a thousand feet above the level of the valley, where the Rio des los Americanos pours down from the Sierra Nevada to swell the united streams of the Sacramento and San Joachim. Some glittering particles were observed in the mud. They were examined—they were tested—they were proved to be pure and virgin gold. The discoverer at first secreted his knowledge, but it escaped him and spread abroad. The first rumours were lightly tossed aside; but confirmation gave them strength, and as each transmission of intelli gence to the United States carried fresh accounts of new discoveries, an enthusiastic ardour was awakened, and within four months of that eventful day five thousand persons were delving on the river's banks, on the slopes, amid the ravines, hollows, and caverns in the Valley of the Sacramento.

From the vast population of the rising Republic new streams of emigration broke at once to swell that current which had for years set noiselessly towards the valleys of California. The upper region, or at least that portion of it lying between the Snowy Mountains and the sea, previously contained about twenty-five thousand inhabitants, of whom half were Christianized Indians, a third Spanish Americans, and the rest foreigners. Of the wild tribes in the interior no reckoning was ever made; but the number we mention swelled at once to immense additional magnitude after the discovery of the gold. Gradually the knowledge of that auriferous soil was borne to the four quarters of the world, and from all the ports of all the nations a few sails were spread towards the coasts of that wealthy region, the valley of that modern Pactolus, whose Chrysorhean stream appeared to pour down an inexhaustible flood of riches from the caverns of the Snowy hills.

Industry was making rapid progress along the coast; the towns were full of life, and the sounds of the hammer and the anvil awoke a thousand cheerful echoes. But the sands of the Sacramento attracted the population as by a magnetic impulse. Lawyers, stewards, hotel-keepers, merchants, mechanics, and cultivators, left their occupations and hurried with basket and spade to the glittering region. Sinbad's diamond valley appeared not half so rich. Houses were closed; the grass threatened to grow over whole streets; deserted ships swung on their anchors in silent harbours. There was little danger in this. None had time to rob; none had the inclination. The garrison of Monterey abandoned arms and took up the pickaxe and the shovel. Trains of wagons constantly streamed from the coast to the interior. Stores and sheds were built along the river bank, and crammed with provisions to be sold at more than famine price; whole towns of tents and bushy bowers sprang up as if by magic; every dawn rose upon a motley toiling multitude, swarming in every nook and corner of the modern El Dorado, and every night was illumined by the flames of a thousand bivouacs.

Half-naked Indians; sharp visaged Yankees in straw hats and loose frocks; groups of swarthy Spanish Americans; old Dons in the gaudy costume of a dead fashion; gigantic trappers with their rude prairie garb; and gentlemen traders from the United States, with crowds of pretty Californian women, jostled in tumultuous confusion through the gold district. Every method, from the roughest to the most ingenious, was devised for the rapid accumulation of gold; and the strange spectacle was presented of a vast population without law, without authority, without restraint, toiling together in amicable companionship. But the duration of this condition of things was brief. Outrages were perpetrated; robbery commenced; blood was shed, and anarchy in its most hideous form appeared. But the United States' government soon laid the foundations of order, and has prepared a system of regular legislation for California. A severe code was established; thieving incurred the heavy penalty of a brand on the cheek, with mutilation of the ears; and by the last accounts, the treasures accumulated by the gold digger lie as secure in his canvass tenement as though under treble lock in a London bank.

A Californian gold hunter, who wrote this day five months ago, estimating the influx of population from the States during the past season, fixes it at a hundred thousand souls, so that the original census was quadrupled within those few months. Of these he calculates forty-five thousand arrived in the nine thousand wagons that traversed the overland route, and four thousand on mule-back, whilst the remainder came via Panama, and round Cape Horn. One third of this multitude was composed of farmers, another of tradesmen and mechanics, and the rest of merchants, professional men, adventurers, and gamblers. The vast emigrant armies have acted as pioneers on their various routes, hewing down trees, filling up chasms, levelling the grounds, bridging torrents, and in every manner possible facilitating the passage of the trail. But the sufferings endured in these colossal caravans are severe and terrible. Many perish by the way; many become insane through lack of food and water. The Mormon half-way settlements on the Salt Lakes have afforded succour to thousands of these struggling wretches; so that some good has been effected by the wild saints of New Jerusalem.

By this time two or three hundred thousand persons must be busy in the golden region, although it appears as though the settlers wished to check emigration by fabricating accounts of the bad climate and poor soil, in imitation of the old Jesuit policy, but in contradiction to all writers of authority on California.

American enterprise is clearing the forest lands, cleansing out mines, planning cities, speculating in town lots, erecting school-houses, universities, and churches; whilst land is selling at prodigious prices. Dreaming adventurers call to mind the coffers of King Croesus, and hearing that in California there is

"Gold to fetch, and gold to send,
Gold to borrow, and gold to lend,
Gold to keep, and gold to spend,
And abundance of gold in futuro," pour in mad torrents to the favoured land, and dig with glistening eyes, whilst building up visionary castles more extravagant than those of the sanguine Alnaschar in the Thousand and One Nights. They never call to mind The Melancholy Man's Moral Maxim,—Hope for nought, and nought will disappoint you.

But the rage for gold has not driven all human feeling from the land, for the speculators are falling in love by thousands, though marrying only by hundreds, as women are very scarce, and most desperate jealousies occur; so that matrimony is as busy among them as the Midas mania for the glittering treasures of the Sacramento. Still, it must be confessed that Mr. John Cayley, pausing from his narration of the deeds of Sir Reginald Mohun to apostrophize the reader, is right when he lays down the maxim—

"Have you a heart? gold is the thing to harden it;" and we sadly fear that many of the speculators having been victorious in a jealous struggle, rather neglect their wives, to sift the fine grain on the sand flats, or dig for precious fragments among the rocks. Still, many edifying pictures of felicity occur, and the speculative gold-hunter may often lift his eyes and see a long Yankee storekeeper scraping in the same hole with his partner, in most loving companionship; one holding the sieve, whilst the other pours upon it the rich dust; or one filling the pail, whilst the other stirs it with a long wooden pestle.

A traveller journeying from San Francisco to the gold district, has given some interesting details of the singular aspect presented by this population of miraculously rapid growth which now swarms from end to end of the Sacramento Valley, and even to the spurs of the Snowy Mountains. He arrived at San Francisco in April, 1848, and was delighted with the view spread out before his eye, whilst sailing across the broad lake-like harbour, whose gently heaving bosom was studded with ships that had recently arrived from Europe and America. On all sides rose lofty hills, whereon pastured innumerable herds of oxen and flocks of sheep. Their vast green slopes were dotted with clumps of trees. The town lay scattered on the harbour's rim; and over the entrance of the port frowned quaint old Spanish fortifications, where the star and stripes of the Republic fluttered gaily above, and the streamers of a merchant fleet below. But our traveller was dreaming of gold, and the prospect had few endearing charms for him.

During his stay at the town, a man arrived from the gold district with twenty-three ounces of the pure metal, the produce of eight days' work. Others followed him, and gradually shovels, mattocks, and tin pans rose to a premium at the San Francisco market; whilst parties of adventurers continually left for "the diggings." Houses were closed; half-finished buildings were abandoned, and every species of industry was neglected. Meanwhile, vessels laden with amateur miners arrived from the United States, and the disembarked emigrants presented a curious spectacle, as they hurried in search of the means of rapid transit to the diggings. Here was a lawyer who had left his office—perhaps with a half-written brief upon the table; behind him stole his clerk, and at his heels, perhaps, the functionaries of the law, abandoning quills, blue bags, red tapes, and staves, for spades, mattocks, crowbars, and colanders. Here was a merchant who had closed his counting-house, with his partners and assistants; here was a storekeeper; here was the master of an hotel; and here an ominous array of most doleful and grim-looking individuals proclaimed themselves connected with the press; indubitably they were none other than the patient workers who toil by twilight. From the editor to the printer's devil, the whole staff of a New York journal emigrated to California; presses stood still; types remained in hopeless "pies," and uncorrected proofs were abandoned to the rats; for gold tempted all classes to its shrine, and even justices, naval and military officers, musicians, and farmers, left their gentler crafts to bore the rocks, and dig among the caverns of the Snowy Mountains, or to wash the mud and sift the glittering sands of the Sacramento.

Negro servants and labourers of all classes immediately assumed imperial airs, and demanded an imperial rate of wages. The waiter at the San Francisco hotel, succumbing—reluctantly, no doubt—to circumstances, found himself perfectly comfortable for some time with a salary of nearly nine hundred a-year. Gold-scrapers, sieves, spades, shovels, and pickaxes, were sold for enormous sums; provisions were vended at Tanjore—famine prices; and camp equipage, arms, horses, and liquors, could only be obtained by those whose purses were heavy with the accumulation of former gains. The traveller, with a party of companions, prepared well for their adventure, and were lucky enough to secure the services of a mechanic to furnish them with saddles; but visiting his workshop to order some alterations, saw posted on the door the laconic written notice—"Gone to the Diggins."

Journeying to the banks of the Sacramento, they overtook many huge wagon trains, laden with emigrants to the gold regions, groups of horsemen and crowds of men, women, and children; whilst along the border were sprinkled numerous tenements composed of rough wooden frames, covered with brown calico or cotton. The great valley was peopled by an industrious multitude, some digging in holes, others washing in the river beds, shaking pails and sieves; some erecting houses, some dispensing provisions from stores, others changing the dust for coin—(the Jews monopolise this)—whilst all pursued through varied means one common object—gold. Along the waters of the river, the masts of numerous vessels might be seen threading their way from the coast, and immense encampments studded the hill-slopes with life.

On dry and level spots, the amateur diggers erected their tents under the trees. Huge log-fires were kindled, bowie knives cut the pork, spoons mixed the coffee; the meat was fried in oceans of its own fat, with soaked pilot bread; and tin pails, used in common for gold washing and water boiling, foamed with the rich brown cream of the grateful beverage. An American "digger" describes with much animation the scene he witnessed around, whilst engaged pleasantly devouring fat pork and swallowing hot coffee. The axe resounded, and the flames crackled in all directions through the valley as evening approached, while continual streams of new comers poured towards the mines. Hundreds of these were escaped or released convicts from New South Wales, whose appearance was that of so many demons broken from the infernal realms. Dressed in discoloured shirts, their ugly and impudent faces, says the American, peered with cunning impudence from beneath flaming red caps, which from their shape might be the camp pudding-bag; around their waists circled greasy leathern belts, in which worked at ease a wooden-handled sheath knife, used to blood of man and beast; while, leaping through the flames of their camp fire with hideous yells, they completed at least a close copy of one of Pluto's ante-chambers.

The night closes in: the vast scattered camps relapse into repose; the sound of digging, washing, and sifting ceases; the swarthy multitudes seek their various places of rest, or lie down shelterless on stores of gold. The camp fires blaze dimly, and shed a lurid glare on tent and sleeper, whilst the dark assemblages of bush-formed bowers, canvass tenements, calico-frame houses, and mud huts, mingled with the groves and strewn along the river banks, with the thousands of prostrate forms, and the few groups of watchers, form a picture at once novel, wild, and romantic. Early dawn changes it: all are again astir. The fires blaze up; the pots are on; the kettle hisses; the frying-pans sputter with their floating masses of pork, and a general demolition of bread, meat, coffee, and tobacco takes place. The meal is hurried. The whole valley wakes into activity. Every man seizes his implements. Pots, kettles, colanders, crowbars, and axes are caught up, and thus armed, the whole host of gold diggers pours out upon the plains, valleys, and hills, to toil for another day, and heap up a new accumulation of wealth.

Our American was a trader, and opened a store in the Culoma valley. The great tent was pitched, and piled with merchandise. A broad counter, erected on barrels, was prepared in front. "Then arranging our articles we prepared for trade, and were soon visited by groups of diggers or others to purchase or look on. Ascertaining the current prices, we disposed of powder at sixteen dollars a pound, percussion caps at two dollars a hundred, or for waterproof, eight dollars a quarter box, with small belt pistols from thirty-two to forty-eight, a rifle for a hundred, clasp, sheath, and bowie knives at eight, ten, and sixteen dollars, and cigars at from seventy-five cents to a dollar and a quarter a dozen. The abundance of the gold dust and lumps in the possession of the miners was most wonderful. A fellow clad in greasy deer-skin pants and hunting shirt, the usual dress of the diggers, would purchase some article for an ounce or half-ounce, and producing, from the folds of a sash or handkerchief around him, an old deer-skin pouch, untie the coarse string, and turn out the dust into our scales. In this clumsy process more or less gold was spilled on the paper under the scales, and unless it was a considerable quantity, they generally refused to receive it back, saying, 'There's plenty more where that comes from.'" handled shovels delved among clumps of bushes, or by the side of large rocks, never raising their eyes for an instant; others, with pick and shovel, worked among stone and gravel, or with trowels searched under banks and roots of trees, where, if rewarded with small lumps of gold, their eyes kindled with sudden pleasure, and the search was more intently pursued. In the water, knee, or even waist deep, regardless of the shivering cold, others were washing the sand in tin pans or the common cradle rocker, whilst the sun poured a hot flood upon their heads. The rocker is a wooden cradle covered with a grating, in which the earth and water are thrown, escaping through a contrivance at the bottom, which retains the gold. Some are so large as to require five men to work them, and with steady labour the thrifty miner rarely fails to pile up in his tent a store of glittering riches; but what is obtained with toil is spent in excess. Parties of diggers continually throng to the stores to enjoy "a burst," which means a few days of degrading revel, drinking, feasting, and profligacy. Brandy at half an ounce, and champagne at an ounce, a bottle, are swallowed in profusion, and the intoxicated wretches rush from place to place, brandishing bowie knives, or shooting with the rifle at any fancied mark, with the ball often not half home and the rammer in. Others, leaping into the saddle and howling with frenzied excitement, ride fiercely through the tents in any direction, and are frequently thrown and nearly killed; whilst oaths and blasphemy so fearful that, as our American well expresses it, the rocks refused to echo them, fill the air. Many of the miners have spent as much as ten thousand dollars in two or three days—answering all remonstrance with "There's plenty more, and when we want it we can dig it."

Such were the scenes which were in 1849 to be witnessed from end to end of the gold region. We have merely glanced at a few pictures, and of these rather suggested the outline than filled in the details. But the reader's imagination will doubtless carry him to those splendid valleys, those green hills and glittering rivers, where the waters are golden, where the soil teems with precious dust, where every stream is a Pactolus and every ravine a miser's chest; where Time has hoarded up his stores, now opened to the eye of man; where the Snowy Mountains have rolled down their exhaustless wealth, and converted the whole region into one vast mine, wherein now merchants, doctors, convicts, parsons, thieves, artists, editors, judges, soldiers, sailors, broken adventurers, blacklegs, and lawyers, dramatic poets, beggars, mechanics, and vagabonds of all classes and calibres, swarm as flies about carrion, delving, washing, scraping, toiling and sweating from morning till night—all falling down and bowing before the great idol of their worship, the golden calf of Mammon, as the multitudes of old Egypt laboured around the eternal pyramids, at the bidding of their despotic kings.

One most singular circumstance is, that the Chinese, who for unnumbered ages have been interdicted from foreign settlement, have broken all old bonds, crossed ten thousand miles of ocean, and located themselves in great numbers at San Francisco, in wooden tenements brought from Hong Kong, occupying themselves, as usual, in cheating as well as house-building—both most lucrative employments in California. A complete hotel has been sent thither from Antwerp: it consists of forty rooms, with furniture, all in cast-iron. The whole takes to pieces when desired. Similar houses have been shipped from Liverpool; but lodgings are nevertheless at a high premium, both in the towns and at the diggings.

(1) "Sights in the Gold Region and Scenes by the Way." By Theodore T. Johnson. New York: Baker and Scribner, 1849.

Remembering the vast and continually rising tide of emigration that sets towards those golden shores, we cannot but regard with interest the plans for facilitating the transit of passengers. The voyage to New York offers, of course, every facility, but from thence to San Francisco, by way of Cape Horn, is a breadth of sea extending seventeen thousand miles, whilst the journey by the Panama Isthmus is only a third of that distance. But the passage of this narrow link of land, connecting the South with the North American continent and Mexico, is now tedious and difficult—open to long delays and vexatious obstacles. A company has, however, been chartered to connect, by a railway, the Atlantic with the Pacific Ocean. The contractors for the line, which is to be fifty miles in length, are pushing the accomplishment so vigorously, that a year is expected to complete the undertaking, and the voyager from New York may then, instead of navigating the perilous sea that rolls round the head of Cape Horn, land at Chagres, place himself in a railway carriage, pull out his copy of the Ancient Mariner, and ere he has seen the old man shrivel, find himself at Panama, on the banks of the Pacific. It is a noble project, and its accomplishment will be one of the most splendid triumphs of human enterprise. To bore a tunnel through the earth beneath a river is a wonderful thing; but to throw a bridge of iron, to be traversed by steam, between the two mightiest oceans on the globe, will be a magnificent achievement. It will open an easy road from the Old and New Worlds to the shores of the land of gold.

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

CARON DE BEAUMARCHAIS, the French dramatist, was one of the most remarkable men of his day. He is known in this country chiefly by his celebrated comedies, Le Barbier de Seville and Le Mariage de Figaro, or rather by the operas founded upon them, to which Mozart and Rossini contributed their beautiful music, and which have gained unbounded popularity in every country of Europe. These operas, however, delightful as they are, give but a faint idea of the spirit of the original Comedies. The Mariage de Figaro was produced a few years before the breaking out of the great Revolution of 1789, and is believed to have had some share in bringing about that event, by the keenness with which it satirized the prevalent abuses in the government and the administration of justice, and the dissolute manners of the aristocratic classes. The author had at first great difficulty in getting his play represented, and, long before its appearance, the expectations of the public were raised to the highest pitch. It continued to be acted without interruption for two years, not only in the capital, but in all the provincial theatres, and its gibes and sarcasms against the nobility and official functionaries became proverbial expressions in every mouth. Its satire has now lost its point, but we still read it with pleasure derived from the ingenuity of its Spanish plot, full of bustle and intrigue, and the wit and liveliness of its dialogue. It was turned into an Italian opera soon after its production, and its delicious music was one of the last efforts of the genius of Mozart.

The literary pursuits of Beaumarchais were not sufficient for the extraordinary activity of his mind. He engaged in commercial speculations of great magnitude, one of which was, supplying the government of the United States with arms, ammunition, and military stores, during the war of independence with Great Britain. At the beginning of the French Revolution he imported fire-arms for the use of the army; but his liberal principles and patriotism did not save him from the perils of the "Reign of Terror." Falling under suspicion, his property was confiscated, his person proscribed, and he escaped with difficulty from the fury of the revolutionary mob. The dangers and sufferings of this period have been described by him in a work entitled Mes six Epoques, written with graphic power and full of interest. After living some years in exile, he returned to France when the storms of the Revolution had subsided, and, having recovered some portion of his property, died at Paris, in 1799.

This slight biographical sketch will serve as an introduction to the narrative given by M. de Beaumarchais himself of the perils he underwent in the month of August, 1792. It is contained in a letter to his daughter Eugenia, at the Hague, whither he had sent his family for safety a short time before, while he himself remained at Paris.

Paris, August 12, 1792.

As I have promised to write to you during our separation, it is to you, my dear daughter, that I shall relate the events which have happened to me during the last three disastrous days.

On Wednesday morning, the 8th, I received a letter, in which a gentleman, who made no secret of his name, told me that he had called on me to inform me of a matter of great urgency which concerned me, and desired a meeting. He came to my house accordingly, and said that a band of thirty ruffians had formed a plan to pillage my house on the night between Thursday and Friday; that six men, dressed like national guards or federates, were to come and demand, in the name of the municipality, that I should open my doors, under the pretext of a search for concealed arms. The band were to follow, armed with pikes and with red bonnets on their heads, like zealous citizens. They were to shut up my domestics in the kitchen or cellars, threatening to murder every one who uttered a word; and then they were to ask me, with a dagger at my throat, what had become of the 800,000 francs, which, the gentleman said, they believed I had received from the national treasury.

"In fine," added this worthy man, "they have made me privy to the plot, threatening death to every one who should reveal it. I give you my name, my profession, my residence; take your precautions, but do not expose my life in return for the important warning which my esteem for you has led me to give you."

After having thanked him warmly, I wrote to M. Pétion, as chief magistrate of the city, to demand a safeguard. I handed my letter to his porter, but received no answer.

I shall say nothing of the terrible events of Friday;¹ you will learn them from the newspapers. In the evening, seeing the soldiers and people returning, discharging their muskets, and firing off petards, I concluded that all was quiet, and passed the night at home.

On Saturday, the 11th, about eight o'clock in the morning, a man came to tell me that the women of the Port St. Paul were going to bring the people upon me, excited by false information, that there were arms in my house, in the pretended vaults which have been so often imagined, and the suspicion of which has not been destroyed by three or four previous visits. And this, my dear child, is one of the fruits of calumny: falsehoods, exposed ever so completely, leave obscure reminiscences, which base enemies revive in troubled times; for these are the times, my daughter, when the most cowardly revenge is taken with impunity.

On this intimation, I threw open every part of my house, bureaux, cupboards, rooms, and closets, being resolved to surrender my person and my house to the severe inquisition with which I was threatened; but when the multitude appeared, their noise and clamour was so loud, that my alarmed friends would not allow me to go down, and entreated me to save, at least, my person.

While the mob was clamouring for the opening of the outer gates, my friends forced me to retire by the upper end of the garden, but a man who had been set to watch called out, "There he is, running away!" though I was walking slowly. He ran to report my flight to the people assembled at the gate. I only doubled my pace; but the women, ten times more cruel than the men in such scenes, started off in pursuit of me.

It is certain, my Eugenia, that they would have torn your poor father in pieces if he had not got the start of them, for, the search not having been made, nothing could have put it out of their heads that I fled as a criminal. Such was the consequence of my weakness in following an advice dictated by fear, instead of remaining coolly, as I had determined to do. I got into a friend's house, of which the door was re-closed, in a street which, forming an angle with that in which these cruel women were running, saved me from their pursuit, though I continued to hear their horrible cries.

While I remained shut up in my place of refuge, thirty thousand souls were in my house, in which, from cellar to garret, smiths opened every lock, masons raised the stones of the floors, and perforated the walls with holes, while others dug the garden down to the virgin earth, all of them passing and repassing twenty times through every room, but some of them saying, to the great disappointment of the thieves, who were there in hundreds, "If nothing is found here that belongs to our search, the first that touches the slightest article of furniture shall be hanged without mercy, and hacked in pieces by our hands." At length, after seven hours of the strictest search, the crowd dispersed under the orders of some one who led them. My servants swept away dust of an inch thick, but not a pin was lost. The children pillaged the green fruit—I could have wished it riper for their sake—there is no malice at their age. A woman in the garden gathered a flower; she got twenty buffets for her pains, and narrowly escaped being ducked in the basin.

I returned home. They had had the attention to draw up a report, garnished with a hundred signatures, which attested that nothing suspicious had been found in my possession. I dined as if nothing had happened. My servants, who had all behaved admirably, gave me all the particulars.

"Sir," said one, "they were twenty times in the cellars without drinking a single glass of wine."

"They emptied the water but in the kitchen," said another, "and I rinsed the glasses for them."

"They rummaged all the linen-presses," said one of the maids, "and not a towel is missing."

"One of them," said another, "came to apprise me that your watch was at your bed's head, and there it is, Sir! Your spectacles, your pens and pencils, were on your writing table, and not an article has been touched."

But now I come to the terrible night I have already mentioned to you.

While walking in the garden with some friends, on Saturday, in the dusk of the evening, somebody said, "Upon my word, Sir, after what has happened, there can be no harm in your passing the night here." My answer was, "Very true; but neither can there be any harm in my passing it elsewhere. It is not the people I fear; they are disabused with respect to me; but this information that I have received, of an association of robbers to plunder me one of these nights, makes me fear that, in the crowd which has been in my house, they may have devised the means of entering it in the night. In short, I have a desire to go and pass a quiet night in the house of our good friend in the Rue des Trois Pavillons, while he is in the country. Go, François, and put on his bed a pair of sheets for me."

I supped; fortunately, I ate little; and then I sat

(1) The memorable 10th of August, the day on which the Tuilleries were stormed, the brave and faithful Swiss Guards massacred a man, and the last blow given to the Monarchy of France.

out in the dark for the Rue des Trois Pavillons, satisfying myself, from time to time, that nobody was following me.

My servant having left me to return home, the street-door being well barred and bolted, and a domestic of my friend's in the house with me, I went to sleep. At midnight, the servant, in his shirt, and in great alarm, came into the bed-room.

"Sir," he said, "get up; the mob are in search of you, and are knocking as if they would break open the door. You have been betrayed at home, and this house is going to be pillaged."

While he was speaking, the multitude were thundering at the door. I was only half-awake, and the man's terror infected me. I put on my coat without my waistcoat, and thrust my feet into my slippers.

"Is there any way," I said, "by which I can get out?"

"None, Sir; but make haste, for they will break down the door. Ah, what will my master say!"

"He will not say anything, my friend, for I am going to surrender myself, so that they may respect the house. Go, open the door, and I shall go down with you."

While he went down stairs, I opened a window in the first floor, which looked into the Rue du Parc Royal. There was on the balcony a lamp which showed me, through the blinds, that the street was full of people. A frantic desire that seized me to leap from the window, left me at the moment I was about to do it. I went down trembling, to the kitchen at the bottom of the court-yard; and, looking through the window, I saw the door at length open. I saw blue coats, pikes, men in their shirt-sleeves, pouring into the house; women were yelling in the street. The domestic came to me, looking for candles, and said in a smothered voice,

"Ah, it is really you they want!"

"Well, they will find me here."

Adjoining the kitchen there is a kind of store-room with a large press for earthenware, the doors of which were open. As a last refuge, my child, your poor father placed himself behind one of the leaves; and there I stood, leaning on my cane, with the door of the room only half closed, while the search began.

Through the open windows that looked into the court, I saw candles moving about, up-stairs and down, from room to room. I heard footsteps above my head; the court was guarded, the street-door open, and I, on tiptoe and holding my breath, laboured to regain coolness and presence of mind. I had a brace of pistols in my pockets, and I debated with myself whether I should use them. I came to the conclusion, that, if I did, I should be cut to pieces on the spot, and should hasten my death by an hour, while I deprived myself of the last chance of crying for help, and perhaps obtaining it, by calling out my name as they were dragging me to the Hotel de Ville. While I was thus calculating chances, a light came near the spot where I stood, and I heard the door of my hiding-place drawn close; a movement which I ascribed to the good domestic, who seized the opportunity of thus diminishing my danger. The most profound silence reigned; I saw, through the windows of the first floor, that they were opening all the presses and cupboards. Then I thought I had found the meaning of all these riddles. The robbers, I said to myself, have been to my house; they have forced my servants, on pain of death, to tell where I am; they are come hither in consequence; and finding this house as good for plundering as my own, they are reserving me for their last object, sure that I cannot escape them.

Then my sad thoughts turned to your mother, and you, and my poor sisters. I said with a sigh, "My child is safe; I am old, my life is worth little, and my death will at most anticipate by a few years the course of nature; but my child and her mother are in safety;" and tears flowed from my eyes. Comforted by these reflections, I endeavoured to prepare for the death I thought so near me. At length I became exhausted by such violent agitation, and sank into a state of apathy. I gazed mechanically on the lights as they went and came. I said from time to time, "The moment approaches;" but I felt like a man in a dream, or one whose thoughts begin to wander; for I had been four hours in a violent state before it changed to this death-like composure. Feeling weak, I sat down upon a bench, and there I waited my doom without any further emotion.

While in this horrible waking dream, I heard the noise grow louder; it drew near, and I placed myself instinctively behind the folding-door of the press by way of screen. The door opened, my face was bathed in a cold sweat, and I felt my strength exhausted.

I saw the servant come towards me in his shirt, with a candle in his hand.

"Come, Sir," he said, "some one is asking for you."

"What! you will give me up, then? I shall go without you. Who wants me?"

"M. Gudin, your cash-keeper."

"What do you say about my cash-keeper?"

"He is there—with those gentlemen."

I thought my reason had forsaken me, and that I was under some delusion. My hair was dripping; my face streamed like a fountain.

"Come," said the domestic; "come—it is not you they are seeking. M. Gudin will explain every thing."

Unable to attach any meaning to the words that fell upon my bewildered ear, I followed the servant up-stairs. There I found M. Gudin in his uniform of a National Guard, and armed with his musket, along with some other persons.

"What chance has brought you here?" cried I, astonished to see him.

"A chance, Sir, as strange as that which brought you here the very day that an order was issued to search this house on information of concealed arms."

"Ah, my poor friend!" I cried, "you have base enemies as well as I."

Being no longer under the necessity of keeping up my powers, they now gave way entirely. I sank down on the bed in which I had been sleeping when the alarm began. When I recovered myself, M. Gudin gave me the following explanation:—

"At eleven o'clock at night, anxious to know if our quarter was guarded by patrols, I took my uniform, musket, and sabre, and went into the streets in spite of the advice of my son. I fell in with a patrol, who, knowing me, asked me to accompany them. I agreed, the more willingly, as this gentleman, whom you see in the uniform of the National Guard, is the confectioner who lives opposite your windows—M. Gibé, in short."

Upon my word, my poor girl, I rubbed my forehead to convince myself that I was awake.

"But why," said I to M. Gudin, "if it is really you I speak to, why did you leave me for four hours in the agony of death, without once coming near me?"

"I am going to astonish you still more," he answered. "Seeing that the party were marching in double quick time, I observed that this was not the way to patrol. 'We are not patrolling,' they said, 'we are going to make a seizure.' I saw them arrive at the Rue du Parc Royal, and then my heart began to beat when I found myself so near you. When we turned into the Rue des Pavillons, and came in front of this house, where we now are, the word was given, 'Halt!' Good God! said I to myself, by what fatality am I among those who are come to arrest M. Beaumarchais? I, too, thought myself in a dream, but contained myself to see how it would end. The servant opened the door, and started back with surprise when he saw me among these gentlemen. He thought that I shared in the treachery which he suspected in your household. The order given by the section, to search this house for concealed arms, was read."

"Then why," cried I, "did you not instantly fly to me? Why had you no pity for my condition?"

"My terror was only increased by what I heard," said Gudin; "I did not know whether there might, or might not, be arms in the house, and I saw that, if anything were found, your having shut yourself up here might be the cause of your destruction. While the search was going on, I found an opportunity to whisper the servant, 'Is your master's friend in the house?' 'He is,' was the answer. 'But where is he?' 'I have no notion where,' again answered the servant. He was employed in lighting the searchers, and could not leave them. I slipped, in the dark, into your bed-room, and groped about in search of you, calling your name softly; but you were elsewhere, and I had no idea where I could find you. At length, when the search was over, and I was sure that calumny had missed its aim, I informed all these gentlemen how it happened that you had concealed yourself in this house; and their astonishment was as great as ours. Now it is all over, thank heaven; go to bed again, Sir, try to sleep,—you must have much need of it."

The visitors, having drawn up a report of their search, went away, telling the people that the house was free from suspicion. The women, enraged that nothing had been found, insisted that the search had been bad, and that they would make the discovery in five minutes. They wished to force their way into the house, but the Commissary ordered the door to be shut in their faces. Thus ended my troubles, but I was overcome with fatigue and weakness.

While I reflected on all the incredible chances which had concurred to compose this thousand and second night of the Arabian tales, I said to myself, "I shall write it down; twenty people will attest its truth; nobody will believe it, and every body will be in the right." All the principal features of my life have had a tinge of singularity, but this surpasses them all. The horrid truth is like a wild dream; if anything can make it credible, it is the impossibility of believing that any one could have imagined so improbable a tale.

But I learned next day, that elderly men, long resident in this quiet quarter that had never before been disturbed by any thing, hearing this frightful tumult in the night, had in their terror endeavoured to escape, and leaping in their shirts over garden walls, had alarmed their neighbours in the Rue de la Perte, by cries to them to save their lives. One of them had broken his leg. The fright had spread, and of all the people of the quarter, your father, who had the greatest reason for fear, was perhaps the only person who finished in his bed a night so full of dread.

Such, my Eugenia, are the details I promised in my last letter to your mother. A man of less firmness and less experience in danger and misfortune, would have died outright of sheer terror. Coolness and prudence have saved me from many dangers; here I owed my safety to mere chance. But how often did I say to myself, as I was falling asleep in the morning; "Oh, how joyfully shall I embrace my child, if she is not deprived of her father by events still more terrible and disastrous!"

SALT IN THE SEA.

THE amount of common salt in all the oceans is estimated by Schaufhault at 3,051,342 cubic geographical miles. This would be about five times more than the mass of the Alps, and only one third less than that of the Himalaya. The sulphate of soda equals 633,644'36 cubic miles, or is equal to the mass of the Alps; the chloride of magnesium, 441,811'80 cubic miles; the lime-salts 109,339'44 cubic miles. The above supposes the mean depth to be but 300 metres, as estimated by Humboldt. Admitting with Laplace, that the mean depth is 1000 metres, which is more probable, the mass of marine salt will be more than double the mass of the Himalaya.—Silliman's Journal.

LINES

ON THE LAMENTED DEATH OF ADELAIDE, QUEEN DOWAGER OF ENGLAND.

Thou art gone to where the righteous
Shine with everlasting light;
Thou hast pass'd the gloomy precincts
Of the grave's sepulchral night.

When the pomp of earthly station
Faded from thy Queenly brow,
Thou attained a crown immortal,
And it rests upon thee now.

Such, at least, thy life's long tenour
Of laborious duties prove;
And thy dying affirmation
Of a Saviour's saving love.

Many a tearful eye shall mourn thee,
Many a sable garb shall bear
Witness to the orphan's sorrow,
And the widow's silent prayer.

They have drawn a circlet round thee
Brighter than the purest gem;
Like Cornelia's priceless jewels,
They surround thy diadem!

When the ruby pales its lustre,
And the sapphire's fires grow dim,
They shall shine, as time advances,
They shall chant thy glorious hymn:

The redeem'd ones, whom thy efforts
Suatch'd from misery and crime;
Who have reach'd with thee the haven,
And escaped the storms of time!

WILLIAM ETTY.

BY T. W. NEWTON.

THE lamented death of Mr. Etty has left a great void in the world of art. The position which he occupied, there is no one to fill. Great minds doubtless exist, to command our admiration and reverence; but on the path which he made so peculiarly his own, no one will dare to tread. As a colourist he stood first among painters, and in his own person raised the English school to the level of the old Venetian. He was gifted with a mind radiant with the brightest visions of poesy; and the products of his imagination—embodied on the canvas by a hand skilled in portraying the manifold graces of the human form, and with a pencil steeped in gorgeous hues that rivalled Italian sunsets—were things of beauty, which, once seen, became “joys for ever.”

The late William Etty was born at York on the 10th of March, 1787. His father was a miller, and carried on the trade of a confectioner also. The mill occupied by him at the time of the birth of his son was standing until very lately, when it became the property of the Recorder of York, who pulled it down, and erected a mansion near the site. From his own description we find that, at a very early age, he was seized with a passion for sketching,—sometimes with chalk on the rough beams and flooring of the mill,—and that the promise of a box of colours delighted him beyond expression. When we call to mind that it was in an old mill that the boyhood of Rembrandt was passed, and that the stray gleams of light which penetrated into the dark interior founded in him those deep-laid principles of chiar-oscuro which made him the master of his own and of succeeding ages, we cannot but conclude that a similar scene was not without its due influence upon a mind as ardent and aspiring as young Etty's.

From his home, and from his favourite pursuit, however, he was soon to be removed. His parents treated with indifference his youthful essays at drawing, and entertained no conception of the bright destiny which awaited him. On the 8th of October, 1798, being then under twelve years of age, he was taken to Hull, and apprenticed to the printing trade in the office of Mr. Peck of that town. There he continued until the expiration of his term of seven years, working during the greater part of that time most laboriously; and, as he was engaged on the Hull Packet newspaper, even Sundays were not exempt from toil. An ordinary mind, suddenly arrested in the pursuit of a favourite object, would have sunk under a check so dispiriting in its influence as this; but, in the case of Etty, no opposing circumstances for a moment banished his deep-rooted passion, but only caused him to pant more ardently for the time of his freedom, and cling with greater tenacity to the hope of one day becoming a painter.

On the 23d of October, 1805, he completed his period of servitude; and, after working as a journeyman for three weeks, a letter arrived, not unexpectedly, calling him to London. This was from his uncle, Mr. William Etty, of the firm of Bodley, Etty & Bodley, Lombard Street, who, himself skilled in drawing, had not been unobservant of the natural bent of the mind of his nephew. Under his roof young Etty continued for some time, copying engravings, or making small sketches from nature; but his first serious labours in art began in Gianelli's plaster-image manufactory in Cock-lane, Smithfield, a spot celebrated in the annals of popular delusion, but rendered worthier of note by the visit of Dr. Johnson and the pamphlet of Oliver Goldsmith. In the workshop of this Italian modeller he laboured with untiring zeal,—often when the wintry winds were drifting the snow through its rudely-constructed doors and windows. Here he drew, with much success, a Cupid and Psyche, from the antique; and, furnished with an introductory letter, he carried his drawing, with fear and trembling, to Mr. Opie. Fortunately, it met with that great man's approval; and, after treating the young artist with much kindness, he gave him a commendatory letter to Fuseli,—Fuseli, whose delineations of the terrible had invested him with a mystery like that ascribed to Dante,—by whom he was immediately appointed a probationer in Somerset House. Collins, a devout worshipper of nature in her simplest forms, was entered as a probationer the same week. Etty had now realized one of his bygone dreams, that of drawing in the Royal Academy. He laboured as hard as he had ever done in the time of his servitude, devoting all his days to drawing, and his nights to painting; a practice which he continued in after years, and which has been a favourite habit of many painters from the time of Tintoretto, as from lamp-light it is possible to derive a greater breadth of shadow and depth of tone. At this period he drew the "Torso" of Michael Angelo and the Laocoon. Shortly after, he was placed by his uncle under the tuition of Sir Thomas Lawrence, in whose house he resided for a year, being engaged in copying the pictures of his master, an occupation too limited for his ambitious spirit. On leaving Sir Thomas Lawrence, he devoted himself principally to copying from the old masters, and to the practice of that beautiful system of colouring which at the time called for the approbation of Fuseli, and afterwards placed him at the head of English colourists. Filled with visions of success, he now sent six pictures, on which he had bestowed much labour and expense, to the exhibition. But, alas! with what feelings of disappointment and self-humiliation did he find that not one of them was accepted. Some others which he had sent to the British Institution experienced a similar fate. This convinced him, on reflection, that there was a radical defect in his pictures yet to be conquered. Accordingly, with that characteristic energy which nothing could daunt, by unwearied application, he perfected himself in a scientific knowledge of the anatomical construction of the human frame, to the want of which he attributed the failure of his paintings. And now brighter days began to dawn. A "Ganymede" which he painted attracted much attention, and he was complimented by Mr. West and by the President Sir Martin Shee. This emboldened him to greater exertion, and he produced, on a larger scale than the former, "The Coral Finders;—Venus and her youthful attendants arriving at the Isle of Paphos;" a work which, for brilliant colouring and classic purity of invention, may be ranked with the chefs-d'œuvres of the school of Venice. It was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1820, and gained him a commission for another picture, "Cleopatra on the Cydnus," which rivalled its predecessor. As an instance of the increase of value which time gives to works of art, we may mention, that the artist received for the "Cleopatra" two hundred guineas in 1822, and that the same picture was purchased in 1848 for one thousand pounds.

In the summer of 1822 he left England for Italy, passing through Paris. When he reached Rome, he found the weather unusually hot, and malaria raging, which induced him to retire for a time to Naples. There he passed the time in a manner congenial with his refined taste, visiting Herculaneum and Pompeii, Baïæ, Pozzuoli, and other places of note in that lovely region. He pursued his artistic studies in the Museum at Naples; and, in the sea-shore gardens of the Villa Reale, he drew the celebrated "Tauro Farnese." Before leaving that part of Italy, he ascended Vesuvius, while the mountain was in a state of eruption. He passed a whole night, not without peril, in watching the mighty throes of that fearful volcano; and descended just as the dawn of a summer's morning unfolded the beauties of the city and bay of Naples.

The malaria having subsided, he started for the Eternal City. Rome, with its glorious historical associations, its mighty architectural relics, its sculptures and its paintings, furnished unlimited materials to the fertile mind of Etty. Nothing of interest was overlooked by him; and, with the deep soul-worship of a congenial spirit, he felt at the same time humbled and inspired in the presence of the world-famous creations of art so profusely spread around him. He painted in the Borghese Palace, in the Capitol, and the Vatican, devoting himself chiefly to copying from Michael Angelo and Raffaele. He also studied the Laocoon, the Apollo Belvidere, and the Cupid and Psyche; and paid occasional visits to Tivoli, Albano and Frascati.

But even in Rome, the mighty metropolis, where—

The very dust we tread stirs as with life;
And not a breath but from the ground sends up Something of human grandeur—

his thoughts were turning to that "glorious City in the Sea," in whose bosom were deposited the treasures which he idolized, the glowing productions of the school of Venice. He was not long in reaching the spot which was the goal of his wishes. "Venezia, cara Venezia," he exclaims, kindling at the recollection of bygone days, "thy pictured glories haunt my fancy now! Venice, the birthplace and cradle of colour, the hope and idol of my professional life, its towers and campanelles rising like exhalations from the bosom of the Lagoon, the Queen of Isles. I hear the bells from the towers thereof; mark well her bulwarks; the gondola glides, the dark gondola. Stanzas of Tasso and Ariosto are sung beneath my windows; the scene enchants me, even in a dull day in November. I felt at home most in Venice, though I knew not a soul." Here, then, surrounded by the master pieces of Titian, Tintoretto, Bassano, Bonifacio, and all the "radiant glories of that beloved city," he gave himself up to that mental luxury which results from the highest appreciation of art. He pursued his studies with increased vigour; and the Academy elected him an honorary member. Making Venice his head quarters, he visited every spot invested with natural or historic interest. Bologna and Ferrara, Mantua and the "smooth-gliding" Mincio, and Verona, where Juliet lies, by turns claimed his attention.

He now determined to visit Florence, for the purpose of copying, life-size, the celebrated "Venus" of Titian. With the assistance of friends, after several days' delay, he succeeded in obtaining the requisite permission to copy in the Tribune. All who have compared with the original the picture which he then drew, admire its fidelity and beauty. On completing his Titian, and some less important subjects, he went again to Venice, where he continued for some time; and then began to think of returning to England. He set out from Italy with that feeling of regret which all experience in leaving who have sojourned in that lovely land.

From Italy he went to France, and spent a short time in Paris, copying in the Louvre. He arrived in England in 1824, with an immense collection of finished studies and sketches, the result, for the most part, of two years' indefatigable labour in the countries where the mightiest in art were born, where they flourished, and where they died.

The night after his arrival he was at his duties in the Royal Academy; and the happy result of foreign travel on his mind was visible in the beautiful picture of "Pandora crowned by the Seasons," which he soon after exhibited. At the next election, the Academy chose him an Associate, in opposition to Mr. Allan, now Sir William Allan, President of the Scottish Royal Academy. In a letter to Wilkie, written at this time, Sir Thomas Lawrence observes, "You know the claims of Mr. Etty, and how much he may be said to be a child of the Royal Academy;—educated in it, its most assiduous student, a former pupil of its President, and a man of the most blameless life, modest and natural manners."

From this period he painted with wonderful rapidity almost up to the end of his life. The walls of the Exhibition were enriched year after year with paintings, the finished beauty of which was matter of surprise considering their number and variety of subject. With the exception of Rubens, perhaps there never was a genius more prolific. The enumeration of his works would fill a volume. A few of the principal may be named, without regard to order—"The Origin of Marriage," "The History of Judith," "The Judgment of Paris," "The Combat," "Hero and Leander," "Benaiiah, David's Chief Captain," "Ulysses and the Sirens," "Joan of Arc," "A Bivouac of Cupid," "Phædrus and Cymochles," and "Woman pleading for the Vanquished." Not only were these bought up with avidity, and realized high prices, but all his works have been eagerly sought for; and so high do they now stand in public opinion, that it is impossible to guess what sums may have to be paid hereafter for even the smallest production.

In 1828 Mr. Etty was elected Royal Academician. In 1830 he paid another visit to Paris, in company with some friends. While resident there, the Three Days Revolution of July burst on the city with fearful violence. He was engaged at the time in copying in the Louvre, and his daily walk from his residence was beset with dangers and horrors. But nothing could induce him to stay within doors. His conduct at this time forms an admirable illustration of the triumph of mind over material circumstance. While an infuriated populace was raging round the walls of the Louvre, and the artillery was thundering on them from the Pont Neuf, within, the painter was pursuing his peaceful calling, disturbed only by the grapeshot that shattered the windows of his study.

He speedily returned to England, however, happy in escaping the wild excitement of the French metropolis. He settled in London, residing chiefly in Buckingham Street, Adelphi, and painted and studied with untiring enthusiasm. Indeed, almost to the last, he was as constant an attendant in the 'Life' study as if he were a mere novice in the art.

In June of past year a selection of his works formed the second exhibition of the works of British Painters at the Society of Arts in the Adelphi. One hundred and thirty pictures then graced the walls of that valuable institution, some of which were his most successful efforts. On a small picture of "Cupid sheltering his Darling from the Approaching Storm," appeared the earliest date, 1822. "Cupid in a Shell," "The Mourner," "Nymph after Bathing," and some others, were then first exhibited. The public had not till that time witnessed so glorious an assemblage of paintings, the brilliant emanations of one mind.

He had been for some time in declining health, when, about a year and a half ago, he retired to York, for the benefit of his native air, and purchased a house in Coney Street. The exhibition in June had necessarily demanded his presence in London, but was an exertion which he was ill able to bear. He had been labouring for a long time under a disease of the heart; and he expired, somewhat suddenly, at his residence in York, on the 13th of November last, at the age of sixty-three, universally regretted. The admiration with which he was regarded in his native place, was testified by the profound respect paid to his memory, when his remains were taken to their final resting-place in the church-yard of Saint Olave's, Mary Gate. The funeral procession comprised a vast number of persons on foot and in carriages, among whom were the Lord Mayor and Corporation, the Council of the Yorkshire Philosophical Society, and the pupils of the York Government School of Design. As the mournful company passed along the principal streets, most of the shops were closed; and the death-bell of the Minster proclaimed to York that its most illustrious citizen had departed. We perceive with pleasure that his fellow-townsmen contemplate erecting a statue to his memory.

In private life there was no one more esteemed. Always humorous, he was an agreeable companion; while his ordinary conversation was remarkable for a poetical expression perfectly natural and unaffected. Remembering the struggles and disappointments of his own early days, he was ever ready to lend a helping hand to those in need. He was deeply imbued, from his earliest days, with the spirit of religion, and was rigorous in the duties of Divine Worship. He took great interest in the establishment and progress of the York Government School of Design; and in the preservation of the antiquities of his native city. When a great portion of the noble cathedral was destroyed by fire, he was one of those most active in promoting its restoration. One weak point of character, for which he was always remarkable, as he himself informs us, was a tendency to "fall in love!" Alfieri asserts, that this propensity, shown in early life, is "an unerring sign of a soul formed for the Fine Arts." The truth of this assertion Etty would seem to have illustrated; but why, possessing this amiable qualification, he was never married, is a problem which we must leave to our fair readers to solve.

Unlike his master, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Mr. Etty amassed a great fortune; and is an instance, not of daily occurrence, of the alliance of prudence and genius. It is not uninteresting to know, that he has a brother still living, who bought him, when a child, his first box of water colours.

In style Mr. Etty has been said by some to resemble Rubens. To us he seems to have followed no one master, but rather to have formed a style for himself out of the collected beauties of the Venetian school. His delineations of the nude, especially in the female form, possess a beauty which we vainly seek in the works of Rubens. Like Titian, he has produced but few landscapes, preferring to exercise his powers in the development of the human form; but the scenes which form his back-grounds,—the woods, streams, meadows, flowers, and skies,—present the most glorious aspects of the earth and heavens.

There are still extant many rough draughts and sketches, executed during his apprenticeship, which display a bold and skilful drawing. They were probably his only solace in that busy period. His earliest exhibited works were "Telemachus rescuing the Princess Antiope from the fury of the Wild Boar," and "Priam supplicating Achilles for the body of Hector." They were in Somerset House in 1811, but drew no particular attention. The Vernon Gallery contains eleven of his pictures, two of which, "Bathers surprised by a Swan," and "Youth at the Prow and Pleasure at the Helm," may be classed with his most felicitous efforts.

His auto-biographical sketch, addressed in letters to a relative, which appeared some months ago in the "Art Journal," is the record of a life wholly devoted to art; and is equally remarkable for its moral axioms and its elegant diction.

The Heathen Mythology, "The Iliad," and "The Faërie Queen," were the chief sources of his inspiration. And what visions of loveliness has he presented to our gaze! Scenes which a Grecian poet of the antique time might have dreamed on the banks of Cephissus:—Wood-nymphs sheltering from noon-tide heat in the depths of impenetrable forests; laughing naiads frolicking with swans; summer bathers in lily-covered lakes; goddesses combing their tresses before mirrors of steel, or floating, in burnished ships, on the bosom of waters flushed with crimson sunsets.

There is no painter whose absence from the exhibition of the Royal Academy will be more deeply deplored. When from amidst that bright assemblage of the creations of native genius we miss the "old familiar faces," we shall feel that a spell, which held us in delicious thralldom, is dissolved, and that a spirit, whose mission was to charm us from the realities of life, has passed from the earth for ever.

CHANGES AND CHANCES.

THE vicissitudes of life furnish every branch of literature with its most affecting subject. Scripture often adverts to them, and they are recorded so frequently in the pages of history and biography as to strike the most careless reader. The poet and the novelist make them the theme of their most touching passages, and the philosopher of his most impressive lessons; and all are naturally led to contrast their continual recurrence with the course of that happier state of existence, where, in the midst of endless variety, no change can interpose to mar felicity. The great uncertainty of the attainment of the most insignificant object is so plain to us all, that we feel with Sterne, "that the most likely causes disappoint and fail of producing for us the effect which we wished and naturally expected from them."

We need not look beyond our own days for Changes and Chances quite astounding. Within less than two years we have seen kings doffing their crowns and laying down their sceptres so repeatedly, that the sight has become perfectly familiar; and these remarkable events have been marked by trifling, but significant incidents, which have been appropriately called signs of the times, and are similar to those which are described as having taken place when Louis XVI. was dethroned and executed. Ballad singers at that time adapting their revolutionary songs to the same airs to which they had chanted their loyal ditties; the itinerant venders of goods, as they oried them through the streets, throwing in a phrase to show which way the tide had turned; thus, the fruit which had been loudly called through the public ways as "the plums of Queen Claude," were then vociferously offered as the "prunes de la Citoyenne Claude." We have so often seen what was intended for a special purpose turned to a totally different use that we have been repeatedly reminded of the striking manner in which this has been touched on by Shakespeare, when Hamlet says,—

"——The funeral baked meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage table."

The wax lights set up for the ball to be given at the Tuileries by the king and queen of the French, served for the illuminations during the rejoicings on the night of the abdication,—the very night which had been fixed on for the royal ball. A most striking instance, though arising wholly from accident, occurred in Rome, by which a purpose altogether different from that intended was answered;—it struck us so much at the time, that we copied it from The Times of August 14, 1847-1848. Part of the paragraph ran thus:—"In the evening a frightful tumult arose in the streets, it being stated that news had arrived confirming the statement that the Italians had won the battle, and it was added that Radetsky was killed. The great bell of the capital was rung, and all the other bells in Rome answered it. Muskets were fired here and there, and in a group more agitated than others, there were loud cries of 'Long live King Albert, only king of Italy!' A body of the people went to the minister Manciani, who declared to them that the news of the victory of the Italians was true. They then went to the Sardinian ambassador's, when a person appeared on the balcony, and also announced that the intelligence was correct; after which he cried, 'Long live Charles Albert the victorious!' The people were so impatient to ring the bells that they did not wait for the keys of the churches, but broke open the doors; and, as they were not accustomed to bell-ringing, some, instead of ringing peals of joy, clanged the death bells, and others sounded the tocsin." This, added to the discharge of muskets and the excitement of the people in the streets, caused great dismay, and it is said that some women, enceinte, actually died of terror, and by the discharge of the muskets several persons were desperately wounded. A few days after these fatal and ominous rejoicings, news arrived that the Italians had not been victorious, but had been beaten. Thus the tolling of the death bells, rung but accidentally as signals of joy, were indeed too well suited to the occasion.

Southey mentions, in his letters from Spain and Portugal, a remarkable instance of a statue being made to serve a purpose which was never thought of—it was of a sleeping Venus. It was placed in the romantic gardens of Penhavarde, in Cintra. A pious Roman Catholic repaired every morning to the spot, to offer up his prayers to the heathen goddess, under the impression that she addressed herself to an image of the Virgin Mary. There never was a more striking instance of the different purpose from what was intended having been effected, than that which we all remember—where Haman was hanged upon the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. A most affecting incident is told of the Princess Charlotte, which bears upon the subject. She was sitting for her likeness to Lawrence, unknown to Prince Leopold, intending it for a gift and agreeable surprise to him on her birthday; but before that day came round she was in her grave, and the picture, which was to have given so much delight, became a most affecting legacy.

Another very touching instance may be given. The mail coaches, at Christmas and other holiday times, used to be filled with the boys from Eton, Harrow, and other schools, all on their way to their longed-for homes; and many a one that met them along the roads looked with pleasure on their happy faces, and read upon the banners which they displayed, "Dulce domum," and they heard the young merry voices singing joyfully in chorus, "Dulce, dulce domum;" a song indeed most full of pathetic recollections. The story tells that once in holiday time it fell, that one poor boy was kept for punishment in Winchester School, and he saw all his companions set off with hearts elate for home, and his heart yearned to be with his own, and he composed that ballad of "Dulce Domum," and he set it to his own simple music, and he continued incessantly to sing it, and as he sung, he pined more and more after his home, and so he fell sick and died.

ROMANCE IN BOYHOOD.

BY G. C.

ROMANCE in boyhood,—as well might it be said, boyhood in romance, for where that age is happy amidst circumstances favourable to the nature being developed, it is as much soaked and steeped in this glowing and gorgeous element, as it conceives the materials of it within the mind. Boyhood is not poetic, except inasmuch as romance is the passive, inactive branch of poetry, not conscious of any imaginative light it throws upon nature and events. It may be described as that state in which the heart is all credulity, association, wonder, dread, impulse, and bursting happiness; when the soul, its desires and reveries, are disproportioned to external objects, yet transform themselves outside into seeming realities. Romance is proper to the heart then, or else it must be cramped and limited all its life long, never to conceive an idea greater than its condition, and to drag on in the same dead level till the end. The country, with its vagueness and variety of associations, is the natural source for this; yet all boys, even all boys born and living in the country, are not characterised by the tendency to it; there is the rural feeling in them often without the romantic. In the case of both men in general and poets, it has been disputed whether those bred in town or country are best fitted to appreciate and describe nature, human or inanimate; the former, "long in populous city pent," come out and fall a raving about everything that is rustic; they "babble o' green fields;" the latter, like natives of any particular region, omit many things that are interesting in it, and are apt to muse and meditate of matters akin to solitude, but not human. Our verdict in this question would be, that he will best feel or represent nature who has first drawn nourishment in sequestered life, afterwards to recall it through the medium of streets and men. But there is a third element still required, to confer a richness upon the imagination of all objects, which combined with those other two would make up the perfect poet, and which cannot be gained except by original situation of a specific kind. This element is the historical; the continual presence of remains from what is past and old, so that we may be allied to the hereditary ideas of the race, seeing colours and forms that are not palpably obvious, regarding some things with a sentiment of veneration because they belong to time. This sentiment in our own day appears in a measure fading from the world, which rather aspires now toward the future and the better, than reveres what has been. In early boyhood, however, there is an embrace for everything that leads it out of itself and gives vent to the restless fancy. To youth belong change, life, the future world of activity and passion; but boyhood loves the objects around it because it can invest them with a thousand meanings; it is satisfied with them because it never thinks of questioning their authority; all it has to do is to explore this and revere it.

district full of antique remnants, of olden manners, traditions, songs, and quaint historical associations. Of all places in our island, the pastoral Borders are the region where romance has lingered longest, and where, although the intelligence of two nations might be thought to interchange, the mediæval spirit has its best representation. The people of the Highlands have far less of this rich, fantastic lore about them; it was from hence the Ballad minstrelsy arose, which infused new vitality into our literature. While Burns in the West expressed the heart of human passion, freshly lyrical, and Wordsworth in the South expounded the thoughtful human soul, it was Scott, and Hogg, and Allan Cunningham that represented human life in its relation to circumstance and story.

Within but a narrow circle round the small upland parish in which we lived, little as the neighbourhood possessed that was beautiful to the eye in itself, there was quite a cluster of old towers, of castles, abbeys, and chapels, all ruined in their places, all linked to the names of living families, each mentioned in some ballad of love, of fight, or foray. Half-a-mile from our birth-place, under a hill that was visible from our bed-room window, stood Corsbie Tower, hoary, broken, and tree-surrounded, which the name of some unknown Scott endeared. Over on the other side of a northern upland was the hold of Whitslead, a grey fragment on a mound by the bank of a brook; and in the little green churchyard near our garden you could read upon an old stone table, "Here lyeth Sir William Montgomery of Whitslead." Five miles off, by paths through the long fir-woods, you came to the red upright shaft of Gordon Tower, still slated over, like that of grim and ghostly Smailholm, that rose upon a rocky eminence right between you and the southern sky. Eastward, when you went up the hills, appeared the larger pile of Hume Castle, lifted on the horizon of an endless range of uplands; the cry only of a more sagacious and strong-winged bird of prey, the eagle's nest among hawks'. Soon you could look over almost into the vale of Melrose, for you saw the cloven peak of the Eildons, the black hill, and the purple hill of Cowdenknowes, where were the old house of Cowdenknowes with its keep still in use as a cellar, and the tower of Thomas the Rhymer, down amongst the smoke of Earlstoun village, beside the clear channel of the Leader. There was the ford which "True Thomas" crossed at dawn, with the mysterious hart and hind, to go up the grey side of the Eildons, away for ever to Faëry land; and looking, as we could have done every day at school, into the lime and earth upon his dark hall-floor, was it not natural for us to believe in our secret hearts of the wizard knight, of Faëry land itself, and of the prophecy fulfilled, that "The hare shall kittle on thy hearth-stane!"

Even passing as boys amongst the hills and pine-plantations, sometimes we used to realize forcibly the old condition of the inhabitants that had been, when there was no refuge from that chain of towers and castles, except by belonging to one of them. Sheep and cattle fed quietly all round about, stumbling unmolested upon the very mounds of their foundations; the shepherd, an Elliot, an Armstrong, or a Scott, looked out placid from the hill-side with his dog; but the thought often sprung into our imaginations, and was exchanged in words—if we could but see the horses' heads and the steel caps above them, winding down from yonder tower in the dusk, with gleaming spear-heads, what work there would be! Perhaps it would be a long moonlight night, though; and Border moonlight had a peculiar sense, as it rose misty over the innumerable braes: for all the hills near at hand would be bare enough, and a dark night would do to harry a neighbour in; there would be striking of hands, and gathering together from many a haugh and glen, all to ride away for England yonder, where the pale blue Cheviots topped the south-cast. To us that faint glimpse of England was a whole gush of thrilling imagination, reality, and national hatred; we lived absolutely in old time, long before the Union, somewhat in the days of "The Flowers of the Forest," which girls sang as they milked the cows. Next morning, we thought, there would be smoke after smoke rising along the path of our moss-troopers, from barn, from byre, and dwelling; fire would answer fire on the beacon-heights, and perchance in some ford of Tweed, choked up with cattle, there would be enacted some stirring scene of Border ballad again. Yet when first I saw grey Dryburgh in its woods, and the broad green vale of "holy Melrose" opening by silver Tweed, and pale Kelso Abbey, or a little Lady Chapel, how did I realize on the other hand what blessings of peace, refuge, order, the Church afforded long ago! Mercy, pious repose, awful sanctity, looked out through the delicate tracery of their ruined windows; their beauty was a thing that came melting even one's boyhood, from the very buried hearts of the old unhappy dead, that were so harassing and harassed, so evil and ignorant, ages ere we were born. For the sake of those towers upon the heights, and unknown huts obliterated near them, blessed were these cloisters in the vale. And the heretic-burning, soul-governing sons of Mother-Church—the quaint old monks,—what soft green fields and fruitful orchards did they cultivate, when the precincts of knights and moss-troopers were so sterile and hungry-looking, as they are to this day! They chose out, indeed, the fairest, most fertile spots, but they took what no other proprietors would have cared for, to till, or would have undertaken to defend. Those good Border fathers—blessings be on their shaven heads!—had no heretics to trouble them, for no man thought at all; but two commandments of the decalogue must have given them sad work, while yielding them as much revenue as all the rest together.

Then again, four miles away, at Lauder, there was Thirlestane Castle, where the gloomy Lauderdales, with a Covenanter's curse upon them, had dwelt; illustrated, too, by our own little churchyard, where many a time I used to clear out with a nail the epitaph of "that godly man, Mr. Calderwood," who slept very quietly under a "through-stane," at the church-gable, borne up by cherubs' heads and wings, long grass blowing round him into the shadow of the old building he had preached in. For there were moors and hills round about, where Covenanters and Cameronians had wandered, even here and there a green mound in the heather which shepherds would say was their last resting-place, watered by dews and kept free from scath, like Gideon's fleece upon the threshing-floor of Abiezer, a sign to the Lord for all generations. But most romantic circumstance of all, —the towers of Abbotsford were within a ten miles' journey; the Great Magician of the Borders was near us in our boyish days, living and writing his marvellous books within the same circle of sky. Now and then he would pass through the village where we were at school,—that tall grey man, grey-haired, grey-eyed, with shaggy grey eyebrows, in his plaid trowsers and dark shooting-coat, walking by a pony carriage, with "a hircle in his gait:" a dim form and indistinct to our careless eyes! But going home over the hills I read his "Lord of the Isles" and "Last Minstrel," while still the wondrous pen wrote on; and the reading of those strains, in sight of Border hills and towers, stirred my soul like the voice of trumpets. To one with such schooling the things visible could not be mere objects of to-day and yesterday, or to-morrow!

It was that old Tower of Corsbie or Crosbie, however, that first sent into my own boyish love of rustic things and idle adventures the additional sentiment of romance: it was our own tower, a sort of picture in the living primer of our childhood, that stood for all the stateliest remnants of antiquity, from itself to the Colosseum. Our father and mother would have us stay at home, learn our lessons, and speak English; but only while mere children did the narrow household grounds and the home plantation suffice for our enjoyments, or "speaking proper" for the many quaint notions that could be only expressed in good broad Scotch. Then there was the neighbouring farmer's son, an uncombed, uncultivated little fellow of my own age, whom I was not to make my companion; but of all boys this was the one my soul must love, and a feeling arose towards him so unique, so independent of all that he really was or was to be, that one cannot describe it, for it has nothing after it to compare with. His occupation seemed to me the very ideal of existence; in the summer time he went to no dull, monotonous school, but herded his father's cows and "stirks" all day, out of sight or hearing, and drove them home at night along between the fir-woods. He had his plaid and his stick, his bannock and his can of milk, his own dog "Help;" he sat and cut whistles out of branches with his knife, or built a hut for shelter from the rain, or threw stones at the birds, and knew all the nests for miles round. That was the true, happy pastoral life, the golden age of which I had read in Ovid's dead Latin, by dint of dictionary and chastisement; and oh, what delight it was to find it so near, by stealing out now and then to spend the long summer day with him, in the long green fields, with the long green fir-woods to shut out the chimneys of the house and everything connected with it!

First, there was to be discovered the particular field in which that season had laid their pasture-ground; and then how fortunate if it chanced, as often was the case, to lie in the solitary hollow about the marsh where the old tower arose! The cattle fed slowly towards it in the afternoon, cooling their feet amongst the boggy sedge around it, then finally lying down to rest at the roots of the tall old trees which encircled its solid mound of turf. The grass there was old, short, and greener than elsewhere, concealing the foundations of an outer rampart, though here and there a grey stone jutted out; across the quaking bog, blackened with peat-holes, a firm path led along what had been a causeway to the bottom of the brown desolate hill sloping up behind. On another hillock hard by lay seemingly the traces of a few cottages, where simple, peaceful people might have lived; away from thence the ground was free for the single file of riders, coming cautiously over the narrow passage, to have scattered out, struck spurs, and galloped off to replenish their court-yard, which the lady at home had reminded them was empty. One realized the scene so vividly, as to look up for her coifed head and the faces of her damsels appearing on the upper battlement. The tall ruddy tower stood upon the summit of the mound, a wide crack in its broadest wall where the distant sky stared through, a loophole or two from story to story, a high window sprinkled across with leaves of a green weed, another opening black as night; inside, the vent of a chimney blackened by smoke, and a hollow stone basin full of withered leaves which the wind of years had scattered in it. The place was silently mournful; you looked up from a reverie of what had passed there, a whole scene of life seeming to vanish off in the moment with a spectral whisper, and you saw only the white clouds floating high over the ragged top of the wall above. One or two trees, dead with age, writhed ghastly and black upon the northern side; the rest, alive, green, throwing out their strong arms, made you think of actual witnesses to things they never could reveal. The great branch of one by the gateway stretched forth like a beam that had served many a time for Border justice, in the days when feudal masters held power of life and death; when the baron's gallows might have three posts, the lord's two, and the knight's but a single one. And a quarter of a mile off, over the rise of ground, peeped up the short black chimneys and thatched roofs of cottages in the "hinds'" hamlet, near the large slated house of the great farmer laird; all feudal there to that day, for the women "bondagers" of the farmer's hinds were perhaps hoeing in a field beyond. Those cottages, looking so peacefully quiet in their faint blue smoke, were built out of one wall of the tower; it was but the feudal order succeeding in its time, at this belated place, to the strife of more ancient barbarism. Amongst the rank sedges of the marsh which had been its warlike defence, perchance of yore a little solitary lake by the hill-foot, there bloomed many a wild water-flower, the red marsh-rose, the purple moss-hyacinth and fleur-de-lis, white cat's-tail, water arrow-head, blue forget-me-not, and fragrant queen-of-the-meadow. Short willow-bushes fringed the bank, blue-berries and moss-berries were to be found along the foot of the hill; the whole place was full of Nature, whose freaks there wore the air of elfin-like rejoicing, as if she stole out of the ploughed land and cropped pasture, for refuge in it. What with birds and their eggs, too, it was a perfect manor to us boys; yet all the while, the still vicinity of that ruin, so august and knightly yet, sank into one's imagination the more it contrasted with our momentary enjoyments. When all of a sudden the rich golden glow of late sunshine smote its summit over the trees, bringing out the shadow, and lighting up each weather-mark in the stone, there was something solemn in it: the dark window gloomed out upon us, the high battlement looked down proudly, and we could not help gazing up in awe, and involuntarily speaking low. The tower seemed drawn out from the shadow of the brown hill, within which it stood cold and grey in the morning. The gleam stole down almost to its foot, gilded the grassy mound and a branch or two of the trees; for a minute it was all arrayed in light so rich, so bright, so exquisitely tender, that you would have thought Nature loved to give it a visit on her way; then the radiance crept up again till it only lingered on the highest stones, the overhanging piece of parapet, the sprigs of wall-flower, where it burned like the touch of a jewelled finger, as if in visible farewell. Beneath stood the strong dark masonry, the level marsh lay along in cool, rank green, rough with sedges; the last glimmer was lifted from off it, and appeared upon the top of the sombre hill, while the twilight floated down like a falling garment: on every side arose the Border uplands, some brown with moor, some grey, others ploughed red in furrows to the sky, or fringed with the spires of fir. The bittern and curlew began to call in the marsh, and suddenly the yellow space of sunset was sprinkled with the shower of rooks that came in one long string towards their cluster of nests in the old trees; some parting off to the round tall wood upon a neighbouring eminence, the rest circled once about the tower and then settled down cawing and croaking upon the branches, making the silent place echo with their noise.

At night, indeed, our favourite old tower was changed into the haunt of all that was supernatural and ghostly; for, according to the vulgar legend of the place, it was the abode of some strange unearthly being, called "The Green Lady." Whether this mysterious inhabitant had once been human, or was merely an embodiment of the natural spirit which popular emotion had inferred from the scene, there was a specific character in the very epithet that carried its force to young imaginations. Without that notion there would have been something wanting in our whole system of ideas; we no more doubted of the "Green Lady" than of the tower itself; and I have since thought, although I never heard of a fair one so complexioned in connexion with any other spot, that it was no infelicitous name for that mute, wondrous lady who takes up her dwelling in the desolate hall of man, expelling all his gibbering ghosts, yet bringing thero a pathos of her own. Her thrilling eyes they were that glanced through the openings from one side of the sky to the other, her solitude that looked out of the inner gloom from a window; purple, blue, crimson and golden, were the lights which came about her place from phantom land, the elfin holders of her train while men pointed together at her ruined palace. But to single witnesses, in night and loneliness, she came out alone; she was no black horror, white spectre, or ghost with bloody mantle and stony gaze: her garment was green, her very look was growth, verdure, reconciliation to sad human history, and her eyes, bright as emerald, wore the meaning of the Past against every morning. The rustics of the place, belated as they crossed by the edge of the peat-moss, when the fox stole out of the fir-plantations above and the owl hooted from the tower, when the bittern boomed and a rook or two cawed faintly in his sleep, thought they had seen the "Green Lady," with her flowing robe held up, glide silently along the dusk of the hollow; and a whisper shot back to the other side as she seemed to enter the dim pine-woods, perhaps the rustling of innumerable leaves. She was going towards Gordon or Smailholm, or the "Rhymer's Tower," they fancied, and whoever she met would go mad to his dying day: it may be, who knows, she was passing to Abbotsford, to visit the minstrel there, after turning in to look on "holy Melrose" and fair Tweed, nothing fearing the sacred rood or the monk's cell. For so they say of minstrels, that the Spirit of Nature has turned their brain with her unutterable eyes! And we children always felt that in this superstition of the "Green Lady," however strongly credited, there was less of terror than of a quaint, "cery" veneration; an indistinctness was associated with her, that had probably induced the distinctive epithet, while she herself was the imaginative provision against any guilty human ghost that might otherwise have been in her place. Perchance the moss-troopers of Corsbie Tower had lived free at least of domestic crime, and there was a want of grounds for any ancient inmate to remain out of the grave, with ten times the vividness and the dread, as in some old shattered house of a more recent day, with its long passages and moonlit terracc. So the "Green Lady," who would have triumphed some time after all, had taken quiet possession for many a year. In her colour, though, I must confess the "Green Lady" had taken an unfair advantage, since any bush or tree might have seemed herself by moonlight or mist, or some unfortunate person might have mistaken her for a bush or tree, and gone crazy by mistake in the one case, or remained sane in the other; as one who can describe bushes and trees sometimes conceives himself muse-stricken and bound to rave, while a "mute inglorious Milton" may happen not to know his own faculty.

But above all, behind the ruin, high up in a narrow face of its red wall, there was an open door-way cut off from the rest of the tower and altogether inaccessible to us; although part of a rugged buttress below, and a few broken steps jutting out above, seemed always tantalizing us to the attempt. Not a streak of light mixed with the blackness ever gazing forth at this mysterious door, so that there a portion of the old stronghold must actually remain entire; the very stairs trodden by feet hundreds of years ago clung there to the stone, leading the imagination as it were step by step up to the threshold, and over it into the darkness, after leaping over the blank between. But to get over that blank corporeally was the point; one which we could not manage, even if we would have dared to go in. The door was that of a chamber, we did not doubt, and it might lead to others, still perfect, still perhaps containing fragments of antique furniture, of armour, or things yet more wonderful. Contrasting with the bare shelterless aspect of all besides, open as the tower was to sky and weather, this entrance into a covered privacy beyond reach of man, or in fact of the highest ladder thereabouts, had of itself a sufficiently impressive effect; and in later days I should have speculated as to what purpose that shadowy apartment served in the family of a chief of old, whether it was the stately dame, or the young maiden, or the shaven "moss-priest," or the friendly guest that used to occupy it, and look out from some upper loop-hole in it along the hollow. By popular consent, however, that was the very chamber of the "Green Lady" herself, the door through which she issued and returned without need of step or stair, and the place by which her awful presence was connected so incomprehensibly with this outward world. And as my companion and I lay upon the heather at the hill-foot opposite, gazing across at its dark mouth, many a curious dialogue did we hold as to what went on within, what marvels it might contain, who and what the strange supernatural tenant was. Each of us would invent his own hypothesis of her history and nature, striving above all to explain that most singular characteristic expressed by her name: with me, I remember, she was the lord of the tower's fair daughter, and the knight of "Greenknowe Tower," beyond the hill at Gordon, had been her lover; but her father had foully slain him and buried him secretly, so that every night she wandered out to find his grave by the greenness of the grass where he was hidden, or by the falling of the leaves in the wood, until her love and grief made her at last like the grass and the leaves herself before she died. For an old servant-maid of my father's used to sing two verses of a ballad, the rest of which she did not know, somewhat like these:—

"O green's the boughs in Huntly wood,
And green's the grass by Gordon east,
For o' the tane ye made his bier—
The tither haps' my true-love's breist!"

O Huntly wood and Gordon shaw,
It's gin' ye're greener where he's laid in—
Mak my heart's bluid like the sap o' yours,
Ye're kinder far than bluidy kin!"

It [was only my fancy, however, that connected them with the legend of the "Green Lady," so far as I know; and my rustic companion had a different story, more consistent with his notions. According to him, she had probably been a changeling carried away by the fairies in the great days of the tower, who had come back only when it was a ruin, and did not understand anything she saw, wandering about bewildered all night; but there was, no doubt, a rich treasure up in that dark chamber, which she was afraid to leave. One supposition we agreed nevertheless to scout, namely, that only her dress was green; no, her face, her hair, herself and everything about her, must of course be pure green, and her eyes must be more wonderfully and awfully green than anything upon earth. Had we doubted of her colour we should have disbelieved in her altogether.

But as more matter-of-fact times began to dawn upon us, the romance of the "Green Lady" lost its hold; the chief interest of the old tower became concentrated in that idea of a hidden treasure up in the inaccessible old chamber, which was a deep-seated one with every schoolboy that went to the rookery to get young crows, and did not know whether it had been explored or not. The golden dreams that succeeded to superstitious ones were not less fascinating, and supplied us with as many trains of speculation and coinages of the brain, while we lay upon the grass near at hand or far off, looking at the ruin and the clouds, or into the green wood. We had a cousin, a medical student, who came one summer from Edinburgh to stay with us; and little as he would have been affected by our other legends, or put faith in this, he considered it at least 'practical.' One afternoon we made an expedition to Corsbie Tower, where our cousin, who had supplied himself with a long pole and a hook at the end of it, succeeded after some difficulty in climbing up till he got into the door-way of our mysterious chamber. He then let down a rope-ladder which we had made, thus enabling my brother and me, with our friend the cow-herd, to ascend after him, and gain at last the long-desired object of our boyish curiosity. We then lighted a lantern, which revealed to us the cold bare walls, the vaulted roof, the floor thick-laid with dust and the droppings of owls, bats, and jackdaws, whose haunt it must have been for centuries. Two steps led up to a wider loop-hole just under the topmost battlement, through which a young rowan-tree had grown out, so as to raise its green leathery twigs into the upper air: we looked under them to the brown hill-top, and across the long fields and fir-woods as far as the smoking chimneys of our own home. We gazed out of the inner gloom from the empty door way into the bright summer air, and felt a thrill of emotion as if the very feelings of the ancient dead had entered into our hearts and issued from them again.

It was as if we understood for the first time their familiar associations, their daily purposes, a thousand things more unintelligible and ghostly than all we had dreamed of when looking up from the grass below; then the strange consciousness shot away with a whisper, like some august presence departing to the silent uplands, leaving us and the place as void as ruins ought to be. There was no inmate, no spirit, no treasure there; it was utter melancholy to see the palpable emptiness, to have driven the fancy from point to point, from bare hall to dark chamber, till it escaped at the highest loop-hole, and would leave that last refuge for ever vacant in our thoughts. For thus the cold glance of living reality streamed in upon the broken visions of youthful romance, bringing a time when they are no longer credible.

Twelve years after, a period doubled by the changes it had developed, I went back and stood by that old tower: the string of rooks came cawing home to the trees as before, out of the yellow sunset glow; it was all the same. But then I felt how securely imagination had translated it and all its associations to an ideal distance, so that there was an indestructible region within, more beautiful and significant by far. And often, in worldly days, from amidst the throng and hum of occupation, have we the power of going thither and conveying those we love, on wheels more swift and on wings more full than when upon earth we visit with steam car, with wheel, or sail, the lakes, the mountains, the towers, the woods of actual nature.—

"Twixt life and youth's blue land of wonder
Hath crept the long desert sand,—
But a fairy well springs midway yonder,
By a broad-leaved palm-tree fann'd.

If a pilgrim spirit hath drank the fountain,
And a palm-leaf into it fling,
Then bubbles the water from shore to mountain,
Ring swiftly following ring.

Each widening circle's necromancy
Wafts the palm-leaf larger in,
Like a bark where the rustling sail of fancy
Up the pilgrim's staff will win.

From foreground stern into æry distance
Spreads memory's pale expanse,
And a line of light from this dull existence
Strikes the shore of old romance.

Steps into the shallop a friendly chorus
Behind the o'ershadowing sail,
That breasts the moonshining air before us,
Driven on by a fragrant gale.

So wondrously mingle, to lake and shallop,
Green thought and long years ago,—
And every hand hath a holy scallop
To dip from their lyrical flow!

CHRONICLES OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

A VOLUME devoted to the history of the great motive power of modern society cannot be passed over as uninteresting or unimportant. In the "Chronicles of the Stock Exchange" are recorded many facts much stranger than fiction, and incidents which are calculated to suggest to the thoughtful mind the most salutary reflections. The events which Mr. Francis has so vividly narrated, are not less momentous, and are scarcely less exciting, than the history of political conflicts and foreign warfare. We are startled and confounded with authenticated instances of corruption in high places, and, as a natural sequence, of wide-spread national immorality. We read of gigantic fortunes reared upon the ruin of unlucky speculators; of human credulity, or gullibility, almost incredible; of dexterous knavery that has no parallel elsewhere; of disgraceful schemes which have beggared many and enriched a few; and of all the whimsical and sad vicissitudes which, during the last century and a half, have distinguished the careers of the worshippers and the worshipped in the temple of Mammon. We meet with many singular varieties and inconsistencies of character, and with many remarkable forms of human selfishness; and, it is right to add, with many examples of well-directed energy and unsullied probity, as well as of sordid cunning, profligacy, and fraud.

We are not among those who denounce every form and species of speculation as improper and immoral. Recent events have tended to cast suspicion and discredit upon the most legitimate undertakings. We do not wonder at it; the reaction perhaps is salutary and necessary. But deeply as we may deplore the reckless spirit of speculation which has caused so many broken hearts and impoverished homes, we agree with Mr. Francis that it is to Joint-stock Companies and the principle of association, that England is indebted for her greatest and her grandest undertakings.

"The bank of England, which has been called the bank of the world—the railways, which bear comfort and civilization to the remotest hamlets—the canals, which convey our commerce and irrigate our lands—our docks, which contain the wealth of the East and of the West—our Life Assurance Companies, which comfort many a desolate hearth and home, are the result of Joint-stock Companies. The evil is passing; but the good is permanent."

The tulip mania in Holland, which occurred in 1634, is referred to by Mr. Francis, as "the earliest instance of the fatal love of speculation, which is so ruinous to the character and credit of all who possess it." Despising their ordinary traffic, the principal cities of the Netherlands plunged into this wild speculation; the value of a bulb was frequently more than its weight in gold; "and tulips were as eagerly sought in 1634, as railway scrip in 1844."

"Contracts were made, and thousands of florins paid for tulips, which were never seen by broker, by buyer, or by seller. For a time, as usual, all won and no one lost. Poor persons became wealthy. High and low traded in flowers; sumptuous entertainments confirmed their bargains; notaries grew rich; and even the unimaginative Hollander fancied he saw a sure and certain prosperity before him."

At length a panic came, and confidence vanished.

"To parry the blow, the tulip merchants held public meetings, and made pompous speeches, in which they proved that their goods were worth as much as ever, and that a panic was absurd and unjust. The speeches produced great applause, but the bulb continued valueless; and, though actions for breach of contract were threatened, the law refused to take cognisance of gambling transactions."

Without wishing to make any invidious reflections, we think it will be admitted that the greater part of this description will apply as well to the gamblers in railway stock, as to the gamblers in tulips.

But before we proceed further, it will be convenient to turn to the principal topic discussed by Mr. Francis, —that of the origin and progress of the National Debt. The existence of this huge incumbrance has given rise to some party recrimination. It was the boast of the old Tories, that this debt was unknown in the days of the Stuarts, and that it came in with the house of Orange. On the contrary, it has been asserted by Mr. Macaulay,—and his remarks appear to us, on the whole, correct,—“that there can be no greater error than to imagine the device of meeting the exigencies of the State by loans, was imported into our island by William III. From a period of immemorial antiquity it had been the practice of every English government to contract debts. What the Revolution introduced was the practice of honestly paying them.” The rapidity with which the debt increased from the period of its establishment, is most marvellous. At the Revolution it amounted to 661,000*l.*; by 1710, it exceeded 50,000,000*l.* As it continued to augment, statesmen and philosophers indulged in the most gloomy predictions:—

“Hume wrote, ‘Either the nation must destroy public credit, or public credit must destroy the nation.’ Sir Robert Walpole said,—‘When the debt reaches 100,000,000*l.* the nation will be bankrupt.’ . . . Lord Bolingbroke declared the debt was sinking England into the gulf of inevitable bankruptcy.”

It has since increased to the astounding amount of upwards of 800,000,000*l.*; and though at different times many ingenious plans have been propounded, no effectual effort has yet been made to reduce it, or to provide for its ultimate extinguishment. In the meanwhile we have become used to the burden, and many persons are sanguine enough to speak of it as a source of national prosperity! But the subject is growing every day of grave importance to our own and our children's peace. Great as the resources of the country may be, no statesman at the helm of affairs can contemplate the national liabilities with complacency. We are no alarmists, but we feel the necessity of looking this question in the face.

“It is,” says Mr. Francis, “one great evil of the present age, that it persists in regarding the debt as perpetual. Immediately the expenditure is exceeded by the revenue, there is a demand for the reduction of taxation. We—a commercial people, brought up at the feet of Mr. Culloch, with the books of the national debt as a constant study, with the interest on the national debt as a constant remembrancer, persist in scoffing at any idea of decreasing the incumbrance; and when a chancellor of the exchequer proposes a loan of eight millions, we growl and grumble, call it charitable, trust for better times, and read the opposition papers with renewed zest. There is no doubt that the resources of the nation are equal to far more than is now imposed; but it can only be done by an efficient revision of our taxation; and this will never be effected till the wolf is at the door. A war which greatly increased our yearly imposts would, with the present system, crush the artisan, paralyse the middle class, and scarcely leave the landed proprietor unscathed.”

It is but little use now to complain of the manner in which the debt was incurred:—

“The case is very similar to that of a land proprietor mortgaging his estate to defend it from a suit which endangers it. His posterity may regret, but they cannot complain; they know it is better to have the estate partially mortgaged than not to have an estate at all.”

The national debt having been created during the reign of William III., “jobbing in the English funds and East India stock succeeded.” The Hebrew and the Quaker appeared upon the mart, and measured their craft against each other. Substantial tradesmen became speculators in the funds. The “moneyed interest,” unknown till about 1692, was felt to be a power in the State.

The monetary magnate was frequently unscrupulous, and tricks and stratagems were employed to ensure success. Of this we have many examples.

Sir Henry Furness, a director of the Bank of England, was one of the earliest and most skillful jobbers upon record:—

“The news of the many battles fought at this period was received first by him, and the fall of Namur added to his profits, owing to his early intelligence. . . . But the temptation to deceive was too great even for this gentleman. He fabricated news; he insinuated false intelligence; he was the originator of some of those plans, which at a later period were managed with so much effect by Rothschild. If Sir Henry wished to buy, his brokers were ordered to look gloomy and mysterious, hint at important news, and after a time sell. His movements were closely watched; the contagion would spread; the speculators grow alarmed; prices be lowered four or five per cent.—for in those days the loss of a battle might be the loss of a crown, and Sir Henry Furness would reap the benefit by employing different brokers to purchase as much as possible at the reduced price.”

The number and importance of the jobbers continued to increase, and by 1715, they “must have reached,” says Mr. Francis, “a somewhat high position, as the same year one Quare, a Quaker, and celebrated watchmaker in ‘Change Alley, having successfully speculated in the shares and funds with which it abounded, was of sufficient importance to invite to the marriage feast of his daughter, Sarah Jennings, Duchess of Marlborough, and the Princess of Wales, who with three hundred guests of distinction graced the wedding entertainment.”

We must also here copy Mr. Francis's picturesque description of the first stock-jobbing-hoax.

“The first political hoax on record occurred in the reign of Anne. Down the Queen's Road, riding at a furious rate, ordering turnpikes to be thrown open, and loudly proclaiming the sudden death of the queen, rode a well-dressed man, sparing neither spur nor steed. From west to east, and from north to south, the news spread. Like wildfire it passed through the desolate fields where palaces now abound, till it reached the city. The train-bands desisted from their exercise, furled their colours, and returned home with their arms reversed. The funds fell with a suddenness which marked the importance of the intelligence; and it was remarked that, while the Christian jobbers stood aloof, almost paralyzed with the information, Manasseh Lopez and the Jew interest bought eagerly at the reduced price. There is no positive information to fix the deception upon any one in particular, but suspicion was pointed at those who gained by the fraud so publicly perpetrated."

The South Sea bubble is ordinarily referred to as the most signal instance of human infatuation upon record. The success of the scheme was at first marvellous. At one period the stock rose as high as 1,000 per cent.; after which it sunk rapidly; "several eminent goldsmiths and bankers were forced to abscond; and every family in England felt the shock." A few anecdotes relating to this eventful period have been collected by Mr. Francis, which we transcribe to our pages:—

"The elder Scraggs gave Gay 1,000*l.* stock, and, as the poet had been a previous purchaser, his gain at one time amounted to 20,000*l.* He consulted Dr. Arbuthnot, who strongly advised him to sell out. The bard doubted, hesitated, and lost all. The doctor who gave such shrewd advice was too irresolute to act on his own opinion, and lost 2,000*l.*; but, with an enviable philosophy, comforted himself by saying, it would be only 2,000 more pairs of stairs to ascend.

"Thomas Hudson, a native of Leeds, came to London, and filled the situation of a government clerk. Having been left a large fortune, he retired to the country, where he lived until, tempted to adventure in the scheme, he embarked the whole of his fortune in it. After his loss he came to London, became insane, and Tom of Ten Thousand, as he called himself, wandered through the public streets, a piteous and pitiable object of charity.

"One tradesman, who invested his entire resources in the Stock, came to town to dispose of it, when it reached 1,000. On his arrival it had fallen to 900, and as he had decided to sell at 1,000, he determined to wait. The Stock continued to decline; the tradesman continued to hold; and became, as he deserved, a ruined man.

"Others were more fortunate. The fine mansion of Sir Gregory Page at Blackheath was built out of the profit made by his guardians; and two maiden sisters who sold the Stock at 970*l.* re-invested their money in navy-bills, at a discount of 25 per cent., which in a very short time were paid off at par.

"The wags of the day were not idle. A pretended office was opened in 'Change Alley to receive subscriptions for raising one million. The people flocked in, paid five shillings for every thousand they subscribed, fully believing they would make their fortunes. After a large sum had been subscribed, an advertisement was published, that the people might have their money without any deduction, as it was only a trial to see how many fools might be caught in one day."

Among the many remarkable men who were "tempted from their legitimate pursuits," to compete with the jobbers of the Stock Exchange, we meet with the name of Thomas Guy, the founder of Guy's Hospital, who died in 1724, leaving behind him a fortune of 500,000*l.*; in those days an almost fabulous amount. Our readers will regret to learn that a large portion of this sum, a moiety of which has conferred such inestimable benefits on posterity, was literally wrung from the hard earnings of brave but improvident seamen.

"His principal dealings were in those tickets with which, from the time of the second Charles, the seamen had been remunerated. After years of great endurance, and of greater labour, the defenders of the land were paid with inconvertible paper; and the seamen, too often improvident, were compelled to part with their wages at any discount which the conscience of the usurer would offer. . . . In these tickets did Thomas Guy deal; and on the wrongs of these men was the vast superstructure of his fortune reared. But jobbing in them was as frequent in the high places of England, as in 'Change Alley. The seaman was poor and uninfluential, and the orders which were refused payment to him, were paid to the wealthy jobber, who parted with some of his plunder as a premium to the treasury, to disgorge the remainder."

In 1732 we are told that "Sir John Barnard endeavoured to draw the attention of the House of Commons to the dealings and doings of the Stock Exchange." Its fraudulent practices were denounced and exposed. "But it was to the bargains for time that public attention was principally pointed." During the time that the Bank books were each quarter closed, to prepare for the payments of the dividend, and when no transfer of stock could be made, it became a practice to buy and sell for the opening. This was a fruitful source of speculation. Purchases and sales of imaginary stock took place during this period, and Sir John Barnard endeavoured to cure the evil by legislative enactment. He succeeded in passing an Act which provided that no loss in bargains for time should be recoverable in the courts. The statute was, however, inoperative. "One hundred and sixteen years have passed," says Mr. Francis, "the Act is still in force, and speculative bargains have not only increased, but form the chief business of the Stock Exchange." In 1737 this patriotic senator brought forward a proposition to reduce the interest on the national debt from four to three per cent. But the moneyed interest successfully opposed the motion; though it was afterwards, (although received with a storm of indignation,) carried in 1750. But notwithstanding his many estimable qualities, the measure cost Sir John Barnard his popularity. "He grew," said Horace Walpole, "almost as unpopular as Byng." Few men, however, are more deserving of the respect of posterity. For six sessions, he represented in parliament the city of London; "his opinion on commercial subjects was greatly regarded; and in 1746 he had the honour of refusing the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer."

"The blood of Sir John Barnard," adds Mr. Francis, "yet flows in the veins of some of the best houses in the commercial world, his son having married the daughter of a gentleman, known in contemporary history as 'the great banker, Sir Thomas Hankey.'"

For the business of the Stock Exchange, the keen-witted Hebrews in the metropolis displayed from the first a peculiar aptitude; and the following is a characteristic portrait of one of the most distinguished members of that money-making race:—

"Sampson Gideon, the great Jew broker, as he was called in the city, and the founder of the house of Eardley, as he is known to genealogists, died in 1762. This name, as the financial friend of Sir Robert Walpole, the oracle and leader of 'Change Alley, and the determined opponent of Sir John Barnard, was as familiar to city circles in the last century as the names of Goldsmid and Rothschild are to the present. A shrewd, sarcastic man, possessing a rich vein of humour, the anecdotes preserved of him are unhappily few and far between. 'Never grant a life annuity to an old woman,' he would say; 'they wither, but they never die:' and if the proposed annuitant coughed with a violent asthmatic cough on approaching the room door, Gideon would call out, 'Ay, ay, you may cough, but it shan't save you six months' purchase!'

"The greatest hit Gideon ever made, was when the rebel army approached London; when the king was trembling; when the prime minister was undetermined, and stocks were sold at any price. Unhesitatingly he went to Jonathan's, bought all in the market, advanced every guinea he possessed, pledged his name and reputation for more, and held as much as the remainder of the members held together. When the Pretender retreated, and stocks rose, the Jew experienced the advantage of his foresight."

We are not called upon in the present article to discuss the morality of the practices which have been sanctioned by the usage of the Exchange. Viewed by the ordinary standard of right and wrong, some of them may appear questionable, and some altogether indefensible. But one of Mr. Francis's anecdotes may amuse our readers, as showing the opinion entertained of the honesty of stock-jobbers in certain quarters. In 1765, it is said, no fewer than four brokers were robbed of their pocket-books—containing large amounts of property—in one day:—

"The thief was taken; but, in place of expressing contrition, he gave a voluntary and unexpected opinion that one man had as much right to rob as another, and that he was only acting as an honorary magistrate in taking that of which they had cheated their neighbours."

The great Lord Chatham appears to have entertained an opinion respecting the jobbers in the money-market, very similar to that expressed by the pick-pocket. The following sentiments are, at any rate, highly characteristic of the great statesman whose name is held in such high reverence by every "true-born Englishman."

"Lord Chatham was not backward in expressing an opinion of those whom he designated 'the cannibals of 'Change Alley.' 'To me, my lords,' he once said, 'whether they be miserable jobbers of 'Change Alley, or the lofty Asiatic plunderers of Leadenhall Street, they are equally detestable.' The same strong feeling animated him when he was told that one of his measures had caused a decline in the Stocks. 'When the funds are falling, we may be sure the credit of the country is rising.'

"A finer spirit—and that spirit is the principle which has pervaded the whole public transactions of England—was evinced when the same nobleman was advised to retaliate on the Dutch merchants,—who had committed several outrageous frauds on the English,—by seizing their immense property in our funds. 'If the devil himself had money there,' he replied, 'it must rest secure.' To his lordship and to the political assertion he made, that 'not a gun should be fired in Europe without England knowing why,' it was of the utmost importance that the integrity of the nation should be maintained."

Among the keenest votaries of Mammon, however, we rejoice, for the honour of human nature, to find some examples of disinterested virtue and self-denying charity. Conspicuous among the "magnates of the money-market," distinguished alike for commanding wealth and rare benevolence, we meet with the names of the brothers Abraham and Benjamin Goldsmid. We think we can discover in these amiable men, the type of the brothers Cheeryble, in Mr. Dickens's novel of Nicholas Nickleby. If we recollect aright, the brothers Cheeryble were said by the author to have been drawn from life; and we are willing to believe there may have been more than one such pair in the city of London. But the portrait of the Goldsmids bears, at any rate, a general resemblance to that of the beneficent brothers in the romance:—

"The daily papers," says Mr. Francis, "bore an almost daily testimony to their munificence. Naturally open-handed, the poor of all creeds found [in them] kindly benefactors. On one day the grandeur of an entertainment to royalty was recorded, and on the next a few words related a visit of mercy to a condemned cell."

Nor were the brothers less distinguished than the Cheerybles for affection to each other:—

"They had faced the storm of life in their earlier years. Fortune, which crowned their efforts, proved that prosperity had no power to divide them; and when, in the earlier part of the nineteenth century, Benjamin Goldsmid destroyed himself, the survivor felt the loss so severely, that he never recovered the shock."

"But the death of Benjamin," adds Mr. Francis, "caused no abatement in the benevolence of Abraham Goldsmid. Many anecdotes, singularly illustrative of his kindly feeling, are still remembered. It is stated that on one occasion, noticing a great depression in the waiter who usually attended him where he dined, he inquired the cause, ascertained that it was pecuniary, gave the astonished man double the amount he required, and refused to listen to the thanks of the recipient. Another story is extant to the same purport. He became acquainted by accident with one of those simple and single-minded country curates, whose poverty was the disgrace, and whose piety was the glory, of the Church of England. This was the man for Abraham Goldsmid at once to appreciate and to benefit. He obtained all necessary particulars, and in a few weeks a letter was received which told the curate he had been allotted a share of a new loan. The letter was a mystery to the country clergyman, who placed it on one side, with a confused notion that a hoax was intended. He had not long to wait. The next day brought a second letter, and with it comfort and consolation in the shape of a large sum which had been realized on the allotment. These things are pleasant to record; and it is doubtful whether the cheque gave most pleasure to the wealthy Hebrew to write, or the country curate to receive."

The reception of all great inventions, and the fate of the inventors, have been often adverted to as instances of human shortsightedness and injustice. The projector finishes his days in a poor-house or a prison, while those who at first derided his plans make splendid fortunes by carrying them into execution. According to Mr. Francis this has been the case in the instance of railroads. We hear and read of persons who have realized immense sums by their construction; more or less we all derive benefit from increased facilities of transit; but the name of Thomas Gray, the most determined and pertinacious advocate of English railway communication, is never mentioned. It is not denied that this individual was among the first to discern the advantages and utility of railroads:—

"From an early period," says Mr. Francis, "he formed the opinion that railways would become the principal mode of transit. It was his thought by day; it was his dream by night. He talked of it until his friends voted him an intolerable bore. He wrote of it until the reviewers deemed him mad." At length a railway was projected between Liverpool and Manchester, and succeeded; "but no reward was conferred on Thomas Gray. Other railways followed, and were successful; but no notice was taken of Thomas Gray. The great railway mania came; but Thomas Gray was nothing in the eyes of excited speculators, greedy of gain. An endeavour was made by some of the friends of Gray, to win for him the public sympathy; and the poor, old, broken-hearted man, when he respectfully begged for a situation on one of these railroads which he had so greatly forwarded, was refused!"

The "railway pioneer" died in poverty, whilst speculators and engineers who once ridiculed his ideas, reaped large gains by putting them in practice.

It is scarcely necessary now to refer to the opposition which the early promoters of railroads had to encounter; but many of the arguments, even at this short distance of time, appear so ludicrous that we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing a few from Mr. Francis's work:—

"The objections urged by the opponents of the railway were worthy their cause. It was contended by them that canal conveyance was quicker; that the smoke from the engines would injure the plantations of gentlemen's houses; and one witness, more imaginative than perceptive, described the locomotives as 'terrible things,' although, on further questioning, he admitted he had never seen one. It was boldly declared that a gale of wind would stop the progress of the carriage; that there would be no more practical advantage in a railway than in a canal; that Mr. Stephenson was totally devoid of common sense; that the plan was erroneous, impracticable, and unjust; and that the tendency of the railway would be to increase the price of carriage. It was declared to be based on fraud and folly; that balloons and rockets were as feasible; and that the whole line would be under water for two and three weeks in succession."

The years 1824 and 1825 were remarkable for the number and absurdity of the bubble speculations which they produced. Among the precious projects of these eventful years were companies for making gold, a railroad from Dover to Calais, loans to the Patagonians, and mining companies which boasted of "mountains, not mines" of metal. Perhaps, however, one of the most important and absurd of the schemes then afloat, was a certain "Equitable Loan Company," skilfully formed to impose upon the charitable, which is thus described:—

in paragraphs, calculated to excite the sympathy of the public, the directors denounced the profits of the pawnbroker, arraigned his evil practices, and delicately concluded by hinting that a company formed upon the most philanthropic principles, and paying 40 per cent, would soon be formed. The philanthropy might have been proclaimed for centuries, but 40 per cent. was irresistible. The Duke of York good-naturedly lent his name; members of parliament were bribed with shares; and when it was honestly said by one that 'the bill would never pass the house,' the triumphant reply given was, 'Oh! we have so many on the ministerial, and so many on the opposition side, and we are sure of the saints!' The shares, however, went to a discount; both opposition and ministerial members lost all interest in the nefarious doings of the pawnbrokers, and the philanthropy of the saints faded with the fading vision of 40 per cent."

We have already introduced our readers to several monetary potentates, but the greatest remains to be spoken of. Our portrait-gallery would be incomplete without a sketch of Nathan Meyer Rothschild,—the Cæsar or Napoleon of the Stock Exchange. Rothschild, it appears, was a native of Frankfort, but finding that city too small for his operations, he determined to quit it. Though utterly ignorant of the English language, he suddenly resolved to settle in Manchester.

"On Tuesday he told his father he would go to England, and on Thursday he started. With 20,000*l.* he commenced his career; and in a short time his capital was trebled. At Manchester he soon saw there were three profits to be made, in the raw material, the dyeing, and the manufacturing. It need hardly be added that his great mind had stomach for them all, and that, having secured the three, he sold goods cheaper than any one else."

Having laid the foundation of his fortune, he proceeded "from bargain to bargain, and from profit to profit." The times were favourable to his purpose. The governments of Europe were plunged in expensive wars; loans were negotiated; and the great capitalist reaped a rich harvest. "With the profits on a single loan he purchased an estate which cost 150,000*l.*" But whilst dealing with millions, it seems he was not unmindful of the pence:—

"Nothing," says Mr. Francis, "seemed too gigantic for his grasp; nothing too minute for his notice. His mind was as capable of contracting a loan for millions, as of calculating the lowest possible amount on which a clerk could subsist. Like too many great merchants whose profits were counted by thousands, he paid his assistants the smallest amount for which he could procure them."

His magnificent residence, gorgeous plate, fine furniture, and the number and rank of his worshippers, bore witness to his enormous wealth; but he was not happy. In the midst of all his splendour, he was appalled by frightful fears, and troubled with gloomy apprehension. He was in constant dread of assassination.

"Occasionally," says Mr. Francis, "his fears took a ludicrous form. Two tall, moustachioed men were once shown into his counting house. Mr. Rothschild bowed, the visitors bowed; and their hands wandered first in one pocket, and then in another. To the anxious eye of the millionaire, they assumed the form of persons searching for deadly weapons. No time seemed allowed for thought: a ledger, without a moment's warning, was hurled at the intruders; and, in a paroxysm of fear, he called for assistance, to drive out two customers, who were only feeling in their pockets for letters of introduction. There is no doubt that he dreaded assassination greatly. 'You must be a happy man, Mr. Rothchild,' said a gentleman who was sharing the hospitality of his splendid home, as he glanced at the superb appointments of the mansion. 'Happy!—me happy!' was the reply. 'What! happy when, just as you are going to dine, you have a letter placed in your hands, saying, "If you do not send me 500*l.*, I will blow your brains out?" Happy!—me happy!' And the fact that he frequently slept with loaded pistols by his side, is an indirect evidence of a constant excitement on the subject."

Of this distinguished man, the following portrait is added. Mr. Francis has played the part of an honest chronicler, and has not, to please the idolaters of wealth, smoothed down or concealed the disagreeable features in the character of the rich money lender:—

"He was a mark for the satirists of the day. His huge and somewhat slovenly appearance; the lounging attitude he assumed as he leaned against his pillar in the Royal Exchange; his rough and rugged speech; his foreign accent and idiom, made caricature mark him as its own; while even caricature lost all power over a subject which defied its utmost skill. His person was made an object of ridicule; but his form and features were from God: his mind and manners were fashioned by circumstances; his acts alone are public property; and by these we have a right to judge. No great benevolence lit up his path; no great charity is related of him. The press, ever ready to chronicle liberal deeds, was almost silent upon the point; and the fine feeling which marked the path of an Abraham Goldamid, and which brightens the career of many of the same creed, is unrecorded by the power which alone could give it publicity."

The manners of the Stock Exchange appear to have been as singular as its morals are questionable. We know not what may be its present usages; but it seems from Mr. Francis's volume, that its members occasionally indulge in a species of boisterous fun which would not be tolerated in any moderately civilized circles. If from curiosity or ignorance a stranger intrudes upon their orgies, his life and limbs are immediately in peril. "Fourteen hundred fives" is shouted on all sides, and the unlucky visitor is kicked and insulted till he has withdrawn himself from the dangerous domain. A gentleman who visited the place in 1828 has given a graphic account of the usage to which he was subjected. First a Jew staggered sideways against him. Then a brawny Scotchman, under pretence of assistance, pushed him back: and for a quarter of an hour these two worthies amused themselves with the visitor as a shuttlecock. Struggling to extricate himself, he aimed a blow at the Hebrew, which took effect. We must give the sequel in the narrator's own words:—

"The rash step which I had taken was likely to produce very formidable consequences. All present were highly exasperated. The war became more desperate than ever. Each individual seemed anxious to contribute to my destruction; and some of their number considerably called out,—

"Spare his life, but break his limbs."

"My alarm was extreme; and I looked anxiously round for the means of escape.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself to use the gentleman in that sort of way,' squeaked a small imp-like person, affecting sympathy, and then trying to renew the sport.

"How would you like it yourself," cried another, 'if you were a stranger?' shaking his sandy locks with a knowing look, and knocking off my hat as he spoke.

"I made a desperate blow at this offender. It did not take effect, from the expedition with which he retreated, and I had prudence enough to reflect that it would be better to recover my hat than to pursue the enemy. Turning round, I saw my unfortunate beaver, or 'canister,' as it was called by the gentry who had it in their keeping, bounding backwards and forwards between the Caledonian and his clan, and the Jew and his tribe.

"Covered with perspiration, foaming with rage, and almost expiring from heat and exhaustion, I at last succeeded. I did not dare to renege it, but was forced to grasp it with both hands, in order to save what remained of it. I baffled several desperate snatches, one of which carried away the lining, and was now trying to keep the enemy at bay, afraid again to attack the host opposed to me, but not knowing how to retreat, when a person who had not previously made himself conspicuous, approached and interfered, 'Really, you had better go out,' at the same time pointing to a door I had not seen before."

We must now take leave of Mr. Francis's volume, and of the many interesting subjects of which it treats. Its last chapter is devoted to a history of Life Assurance, and the important benefits which have accrued from it are ably set forth. In connexion with Assurance Companies, however, attention is drawn to a gigantic imposture, which affords fresh proof, if proof were needed, of English credulity. In 1837, advertisements were inserted in many provincial papers, "drawing attention to the peculiar claims of 'the Independent West Middlesex Life and Fire Assurance Company.'" Capital, 1,000,000*l.* Among its directors appeared the names of Drummond and Perkins, and of course, "the uninitiated believed the one to be the great banker, and the other the rich brewer, bearing the same names." It offered to insure lives on smaller premiums than other offices, and to give larger annuities for smaller sums. But the whole was a delusion of the worst character; the successful project of a knot of swindlers, who were happily at last unmasked:—

"The deed of the company—for, strange to say, it had a deed—was signed by any one who chose; and the law stationer applied indiscriminately to all who came near him. Any one who asked for a situation was made a governor. A schoolmaster who requested a clerkship was made a director. An errand-man was employed as manager. A boy of sixteen was appointed to a seat at the board. One director had been tapman to a London tavern; another had been dismissed from his employ as a journeyman bellhanger; a third had been a gentleman's servant: all had orders to dress well, to place rings on their fingers, and adorn their persons with jewellery; fines being instituted if they omitted to wear the ornaments provided."

Something like this may have occurred more recently; but Mr. Francis has perhaps wisely abstained from commenting on the delusions of the last few years. The history of the great railway mania remains to be written; and may an historian be found for it as able and honest as the author of the "Chronicles of the Stock Exchange!"

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXIX.

IS CHIEFLY CULINARY, CONTAINING RECIPES FOR A "GOOD PRESERVE," AND A "PRETTY PICKLE."

THE moon was shining brightly, though flitting clouds passed from time to time across its silvery disk, wrapping wood and hill and valley in momentary darkness, only to enhance their beauty when its pale cold rays once more fell uninterruptedly upon them, imparting to the scene the magic of a fairy twilight. Such, however, were scarcely Lewis's thoughts as, haunted by the appealing expression of Annie's soft eyes, he hastened to overtake his companions. The party proceeded in silence, following their guide, who was none other than the renegade Villiam, across one of the wildest portions of the park towards a young larch plantation, covering about forty acres of ground. This spot, named Tod's Hole Spinney, from certain fox carots that had existed in it till their occupant's partiality for dining on pheasants had led to their ejection, was considered, from its isolated situation, the thick growth of underwood, the fact of a running stream passing through it, and other propitious circumstances, the most amply stocked preserve on the property, and it was with a degree of annoyance proportioned to the enormity of the offence, that the General learned this was the place selected by the poachers for the scene of their depredations. As they approached the spot, the report of a gun was heard, followed by three or four others in rapid succession. General Grant, irritated beyond control by this audacity, immediately rode forward at a brisk trot. Lewis, bearing in mind Annie's injunction, grasped the crupper of the saddle firmly with his left hand, and with this slight assistance ran by the General's side, keeping pace with the horse. In this manner they had nearly reached the wood, when a man sprang from behind a bush, and would have seized the horse's bridle, had not Lewis interposed, saying, in a low voice, "Don't you know us Millar? it is General Grant, who when he heard the poachers were out, determined to come with me."

"I beg yer honour's pardon," returned the keeper, touching his hat, as he recognised his master. "I never expected to ha' seen you here to-night, to be sure."

"I am usually to be found where my duty calls me," returned the General stiffly. "These scoundrels seem to be out in force," he continued.

"Vell, I take it there's as many on 'em as ve shall know wot to do with," was the reply; "but I've got above a dozen men on the look hout, only in course they're scattered."

"And how do you propose to act?" inquired the General.

"I thort of taking a party into the wood, trying to captivate long Hardy, and one or two of the ringleaders, chaps as I've had my eye on for ever-so-long; then take ther game from the tothers, and seize their guns hif posserbul;—but the chief thing is to captivate that willain, Hardy; so I means to leave three or four men on ther look-hout, in case he manages to do us, and break cover."

"Your plan seems a good one," returned the General reflectively. "How many men do you propose to take into the wood with you?"

"Vell, there's half-a-dozen lads a laying down behind those bushes yonder, and there's two more jist inside that gap; then there's myself and Muster Arundel."

"Let the boy that guided us hold my horse,"—began General Grant.

"Hif I might advise," interrupted Millar, "yer honour would remain hin this wery place; and hif Hardy should get away from us—as he's likely enough, for he's as strong as a young steam ingine—he's a-most sure to break cover here; in vich case yer honour can ride him down, and hif he dares to show fight, give him a cut hover the scull with yer long sword there."

"You feel sure he will endeavour to effect his retreat on this side?" inquired the General, doubtfully.

"Sartain sure, I may say," cried Millar, confidently; then as his master turned to explain to Lord Bellefield, who had just come up, the plan of operations, he added in a low voice, so that Lewis only might hear,

"The old Master's pluckey enough for anything, but his legs ain't so young as they used to be, and he's rather touched in the vind, vich vont do for sich a walk as we've got before us."

At this moment more shots were heard in the wood, but apparently much nearer than the last; the poachers were evidently advancing in that direction.

"There is not a moment to be lost, Millar," exclaimed the General, eagerly. "I think as you say, I may be of more use here; some one must remain outside to cut off the retreat of these fellows if you should succeed in driving them out of the wood. Lord Bellefield will accompany your party;—where are the other watchers on this side stationed?"

"About fifty yards apart, along the ditch skirting the wood. If yer honour wants help, a note on this whistle will produce it." So saying, Millar handed him an ivory dog-whistle; then, signing to Villiam to proceed, and requesting Lord Bellefield and Lewis to follow him, the keeper conducted them along a narrow track leading into the wood.

"Do you really expect that Hardy will attempt to cross that part of the park, or was your assertion merely a white lie, framed to secure the General's safety?" asked Lewis, as he walked by the keeper's side.

"Vell, it won't altogether a lie," was the reply; "for if we don't nab the gentleman, that's the side he'll try for, as it's easiest for him to get away; but if I vonce has a fair bit at him, I don't mean to leave him a chance to get away. I shall not stand nice about hurting him neither, I can tell yer. He beat Sam Jones, one o' my hunder keepers, so savage that the poor feller worn't out of his blessed bed for two months. He deserves summat pretty strong for that."

"Mind you point him out to me, if you catch sight of him," rejoined Lewis; "I am most anxious to be introduced to this truculent gentleman."

"Yer can't mistake him hif yer once sets eyes on him," returned the keeper; "he's half a head taller than any of the rest of 'em, but I'll show him to yer."

As he spoke, they reached the spot where the six men were waiting, though, so well had they concealed themselves, that Lewis was close upon them ere he was aware of their vicinity.

"Now, my lads, are you all ready?" inquired their leader in a low voice; an answer in the affirmative was followed by the order,—

"Come on, then," when Lord Bellefield interposed by saying—"One moment! listen to me, my men; I offer five guineas reward to any of you who may secure Hardy—you understand me?"

"We'll try our best, my lord, and many thanks to your lordship," replied a strong athletic young fellow in the dress of an under keeper; and the others made a like acknowledgment. After a strict injunction from Millar to preserve silence, the party again moved forward, Lord Bellefield, Millar, and Lewis in front, and the others following two abreast. As soon as they had entered the wood, the two remaining men joined them, making altogether a company of eleven. As they advanced farther into the plantation, the boughs of the trees, becoming thicker and more closely interlaced, intercepted the moonlight, and rendered their onward progress a matter of some difficulty. The gamekeeper, however, knew every intricacy of the path, and could have found his way in the darkest night as easily as at noonday. After winding among the trees for some minutes, they came upon a little glade where the underwood had been partially cleared away, and a small quantity of barley stacked for the purpose of feeding the pheasants. At the entrance to this space thus cleared, the party halted, and Millar, creeping forward on his hands and knees, reached the stack. Sheltering himself behind this, he made his way to the opposite side, where he was lost to sight; re-appearing almost immediately, he cautiously rejoined his party, saying in a low whisper—"I expected how it would be; there is from twenty or thirty pheasants roosting on the trees beyond the stack there, and Hardy and his mates being aware on it, is a-making of their way through the bushes right ahead. I could hear 'em plain enough when I was at the stack yonder. Now, two on yer must come along o' me, creep to the stack and hide behind it as yer see me do, then wait till them blackguards has let fly at the pheasants, and afore they can load again ve three must jump forrard and try and take Hardy; in the mean time, you others must make yer way round through the bushes and take 'em in the rear, and help us if we wants helping."

"Which you will do most certainly," returned Lord Bellefield.—"I'll lead the party that remains."

"And I'll go with you, Millar," observed Lewis.

"And you, Sam," continued Millar, addressing the under keeper before alluded to. The man came forward, and placing himself by Lewis's side the three crept along till they had reached the stack, sheltered by which they again stood upright. Scarcely had they taken their places, when two guns, followed by four others, were discharged in rapid succession, and so close to them that the shot pattering amongst the underwood was distinctly audible, and one of the wounded pheasants dropped at Lewis's feet; while almost immediately afterwards a couple of men ran forward to collect the fallen game. The foremost of these was a fellow of Herculean proportions; as he stooped to pick up a pheasant, a ray of moonlight revealed his features, and Lewis immediately recognised his former antagonist the tall Chartist. At the same moment Millar whispered, "That's our man; go ahead!"

"Leave him to me," returned Lewis eagerly; and bending forward, with a bound like that of a tiger, he sprang upon him.

The poacher was taken so completely by surprise (his back being turned towards his assailant), that Lewis, encircling him with a grasp of iron, was enabled to pinion his arms to his sides. Like a wild bull caught in the toils, his struggles to free himself were tremendous; but Lewis, now in the full vigour of his strength, was an adversary not easily to be shaken off; and despite his unrivalled powers, the poacher failed to extricate his arms. Shouting, therefore, to his companion for assistance, he desired him, with an oath, to shoot the — keeper; but that individual was unable to comply with his comrade's benevolent suggestion, by reason of certain well directed hits wherewith Sam Jones the under keeper was producing a marked alteration in the general outline of his features. In the mean time Millar, drawing forth a piece of cord, began coolly to tie Hardy's wrists together, disregarding a series of ferocious kicks with which he greeted him. At this moment the other poachers, to the number of some half-dozen, attracted by the sound of blows, reached the scene of action, but the party led by Lord Bellefield were equally on the alert, and the fight became general. And now the capture of the poacher Hardy appeared certain; exhausted by his unavailing struggles to free himself from Lewis's encircling arms, he could offer no effectual resistance to Millar, who continued most methodically to bind his wrists, in no way diverted from his purpose by the storm of blows which raged around him, many of which fell on his unprotected person,—when suddenly the report of a pistol rang sharply above the other sounds of the combat, and an acute stinging pain darted through Lewis's left shoulder, causing him such agony for the moment, that he involuntarily relaxed his grasp. Hardy was not slow to avail himself of the opportunity thus offered;—flinging off the young tutor with so much violence that he would have fallen had not one of the gamekeeper's assistants caught him and prevented it, he wrenched his hands from Millar's grasp, and raising them still bound together as they were, struck the keeper such a severe blow on the side of the head, that he reeled and fell; then, seeing that his companions, overpowered by numbers and disheartened by his supposed capture, were giving way on all sides, he turned, and dashing into the bushes, disappeared, not so quickly, however, but that Lewis, who had never taken his eyes off him for a moment, perceived the movement.

Grasping his stick, which he had contrived to retain during the struggle, firmly with his right hand, he lost no time in following the fugitive, and guided by the crashing of the bushes, kept close on his traces till they reached the boundary hedge;—breaking his way through this obstacle with the strength and fury of some wild animal, the poacher sprang across the ditch into the open park beyond. Seeing that he had a desperate man to deal with, and fearing that although the first severe pain had abated, and little more than a sensation of numbness remained, his left arm might prove in some degree incapacitated by the wound he had received, Lewis paused a moment to reconnoitre, ere he followed him. To his great delight, he perceived he had reached the hedge along the side of which the watchers were stationed, near the spot where General Grant had taken up his position. Hardy, unconscious how closely he was followed, stopped also a moment while he endeavoured to set free his wrists; but so securely had Millar bound them, that although by a violent exertion of strength he contrived to render the cord slacker, he was unable wholly to succeed in his object. Fearing, however, that the cord would not hold out much longer, and unwilling to lose the only advantage gained by his previous struggle, Lewis determined once more to endeavour to seize him. Shouting, therefore, to give notice to the watchers, where their assistance was likely to be required, he sprang across the ditch and advanced towards his antagonist. At first the poacher appeared inclined to stand his ground; but seeing his opponent was armed with a stout stick, and recollecting his own defenceless condition, he resolved to trust rather to his unrivalled fleetness, and turning away with an exclamation of disappointed rage, again betook himself to flight. This portion of the park was clear of trees or any other cover, for a space of more than half-a-mile square, beyond which lay another larger wood; if Hardy could contrive to reach this, his escape would become a matter of certainty. The ground, which had once formed part of an ancient Roman camp, lay in terraces, and this circumstance gave Hardy, who knew every inch of the country by heart, a slight advantage. In speed they were very equally matched; for although Lewis, from his youth and light active make, was, perhaps, really the fleetest, Hardy was in better training. When they first started, the poacher was about ten yards ahead, and they had reached nearly half the centre of the space between the two woods ere Lewis had diminished that distance materially. Hitherto they had been running up-hill, and the poacher's superior condition (as a jockey would term it) enabled him to continue his rapid course without the pace telling as much as it did on his pursuer; but now the ground began to descend, and Lewis, having saved himself for a short distance to recover breath, put forth his whole powers, and despite the utmost exertions the poacher was capable of making, gained upon him so fast that it was evident that in a few more strides he must overtake him. But Hardy's usual good luck appeared not even yet to have deserted him, for at the very moment when it seemed certain Lewis must come up with him, a cloud obscured the moon, and the poacher, taking advantage of this accident to double on his pursuer, contrived to make such good use of his knowledge of the ground, that when the bright moonlight again enabled Lewis to discern his retreating figure, he perceived, to his extreme chagrin and disappointment, that the fugitive would gain the wood, and doubtless effect his escape, before he could again overtake him. It was, then, with no small satisfaction that just as he was about to give up the chase as hopeless, he caught sight of a man on horseback galloping in a direction which must effectually cut off the poacher's retreat. Another moment sufficed to show him that the rider, in whom he immediately recognised General Grant, had perceived the fugitive, and intended to prevent his escape. Lewis accordingly strained every nerve to reach the spot in time to render assistance, more particularly as he remarked that Hardy had by some means contrived to set his hands at liberty. In spite of his utmost exertions, however, it was evident that the encounter would take place before he could arrive; and remembering his promise to Annie, it was with mingled feelings of anxiety for her father's safety and self-reproach for having quitted him, that he prepared to witness the struggle. As soon as the General perceived the state of affairs, he waved his hand as a sign to Lewis; then, drawing his sabre, stood up in his stirrups, and rode gallantly at the poacher, shouting to him at the same time to stop and yield himself prisoner. Hardy paid no attention to the summons, continuing to run on till he felt the horse's breath hot upon his neck; then, as General Grant, after again calling on him to "surrender, or he would cut him down," prepared to put his threat into execution, he dodged aside to avoid the blow, and springing suddenly upon the rider, dashed the sword from his hand, and seizing him by the throat endeavoured to drag him off his horse. The old man, though taken by surprise, clung firmly to his saddle, and spurring his horse, tried to shake off his assailant; but his strength unfortunately was not equal to his courage, and the poacher, snatching at the rein, backed the horse till it reared almost erect and flung its rider forcibly to the ground. Apparently bent on revenge, Hardy, still retaining his grasp on the bridle, led the horse over the body of the fallen man, with the brutal intention of trampling him to death. But the generous instinct of the animal served to frustrate his evil purpose; as, though he led it twice directly across its prostrate master, the horse raised its feet and carefully avoided treading on him. Striking the animal ferociously on the head with his clenched fist, he next attempted to back it in the same direction, but the frightened animal sprang aside and plunged so violently that he was unable to effect his design. He was still striving to do so, when Lewis, breathless with the speed at which he had run, reached the spot. Instantly leaping over the fallen man, stick in hand, he struck Hardy so severe a blow on the wrist that he was forced to quit his hold on the bridle, and the scared horse broke away and galloped off, snorting with terror. The poacher, infuriated by the pain of the blow, forgot all prudential considerations; and heedless of the approach of three of the watchers, who, attracted by the noise of the struggle, were rapidly hastening towards the spot, he rushed upon Lewis, and disregarding a heavy blow with which the young tutor greeted him, flung his arms round him and endeavoured to dash him to the ground. Fortunately for Lewis, he was not ignorant of the manly exercise of wrestling, and his proficiency in the art stood him in good stead at this moment; for, despite his gigantic strength, Hardy could not succeed in throwing him. In vain did he lift him from the ground; with whatever violence he replaced him, he still fell upon his legs; in vain did he compress him in his powerful arms, till Lewis felt as if every rib were giving way—the only effect of his exertions was to exhaust his own strength; till at length, taking advantage of an incautious movement of his adversary, the young tutor contrived to pass his leg behind that of the poacher, and thus trip him up. His victory was, however, nearly proving fatal to him; for, in falling, the ruffian clutched him by the throat and dragged him down with him. Nor, although Lewis being uppermost was enabled to raise himself on one knee, and return the compliment by inserting his hand within the folds of his adversary's neckcloth, could he force him to relinquish his grasp. Fortunately, help was at hand; and just as Lewis began to feel that it was becoming serious, and that if the pressure on his throat continued much longer he should be strangled outright, the three assistants came up; two of them immediately flung themselves upon the poacher, while the third dragged Lewis, who was rapidly getting exhausted, from the deadly embrace of his prostrate foe. Having with some difficulty succeeded in so doing, the man laid him at full length on the grass, and leaving him to recover as best he might, turned to assist his companions to secure Hardy. This was now a comparatively easy task, for his final struggle with Lewis had exhausted even the poacher's strength, and after a futile attempt to rise and shake off his captors, he ceased to resist, and submitted in sullen silence, while his arms were secured with the General's sword-belt. This operation concluded, the man who had rescued Lewis returned to him, and found him sufficiently recovered to sit up.

"Have you looked to the General? is he uninjured?" was his first question.

"I'm afeard he's terrible hurt, if he ain't killed outright; leastways he's onsensibil; and one of his arms seems crushed like," was the consolatory reply.

"Oh that I had come up a minute sooner!" exclaimed Lewis, in a tone of bitter self-reproach.

"You had been a dead man if yer had, Sir," was the reply; "if that willian there had had hold of your throat half a minute longer, you'd have been as stiff as a leg of mutton by this time."

"Better that I had perished than that this should have occurred," murmured Lewis; then turning to the man he continued, "Lend me your arm; I can walk now;" and rising with difficulty, he advanced towards the spot where General Grant lay. He was perfectly insensible; his hat had fallen off, and his grey hair, exposed to the night dews, imparted, as the moonlight streamed on it, a ghastly expression to his features; while his right arm was bent under him in an unnatural position, which left no doubt that it must be broken, probably in more places than one. Lewis knelt down beside him, and raising his uninjured hand, placed his finger on the wrist.

"I can feel his pulse beat distinctly," he observed, after a moment's pause; "he is not dead, nor dying,—indeed, except the injury to his arm, I hope he may not be seriously hurt,—no time must be lost in carrying him to the house and procuring a surgeon."

"Somebody ought to go to Broadhurst, to let'm know what's happened, and get us some help. We've more than we can manage here, you see," urged the assistant; "it will take two on us to purwent that blackguard Hardy from getting away—he won't lose no chance, you may depend."

"I'll stay with General Grant if you'll run to the house," returned Lewis feebly.

"Your arm's a bleeding, Sir; did that willian stab you?" inquired the assistant.

"No; I was hurt in the wood," was the reply.

"Do you think you could ride, Sir?" continued the man; "cos if you could I'd try and catch the horse,—he's a grazin very quiet yonder,—and then you could go to the house, start off one of the grooms to fetch a doctor, send some of the people down here to help us, get yer own wound dressed, and break the news to the family better than such a chap as me."

This observation was a true one; and Lewis felt that it was so; therefore, although he dreaded the task, and would rather have again encountered the dangers he had just escaped, than witnessed Annie Grant's dismay and sorrow when she should find her dark anticipations realized, he agreed to the arrangement; and as the man succeeded in catching the horse almost immediately, he mounted with some difficulty, and rode off at speed, though the rapid motion increased the pain of his wound till it became almost insupportable. He reached Broadhurst in less than ten minutes, never drawing bit till he entered the stable-yard; although he turned so faint and dizzy on the way, that more than once he was nearly falling from the saddle. His first act was to despatch a mounted groom to procure a surgeon; he next sent off four of the men-servants with a hurdle converted into an extemporary litter, giving them exact directions where to find their master, and waiting to see that they started without loss of time; he then attempted to dismount, but was unable to do so without assistance; having paused a few moments till the faintness had again gone off, he entered the house by the servants' entrance, and calling the butler aside, desired him to summon Mr. Leicester as quietly as possible; then, sinking into a chair and resting his head on his hands, he awaited his arrival with ill-concealed anxiety; dreading lest some incautious person should abruptly inform Annie of her father's accident.

CHAPTER XXX.

LEWIS MAKES A DISCOVERY, AND GETS INTO A "STATE OF MIND."

THE end of the room at which Lewis had seated himself lay in shadow, so that Leicester, who shortly made his appearance wrapped in a dressing-gown, could merely distinguish the outline of his figure.

"Why, Arundel," he began, "is anything the matter? Here has Wilson been and roused me out of my first sleep, with a face like that of the party who 'drew Priam's curtains i' the dead o' night.' Where's Governor Grant, and how is it that you're home first?"

"It's no joking matter, Mr. Leicester," returned Lewis, faintly, and without raising his head. "The pouchers have given us more trouble than we expected, and in attempting to capture Hardy, the general has been thrown from his horse. His right arm is broken in two places, and when I came away he was still insensible."

From the position in which Lewis sat (his elbows resting on a table, and his forehead supported by his hands), he was unable to perceive anything that might be going on in the apartment, consequently he had continued his speech, ignorant that a third person had joined them. Annie (for she it was who, pale as some midnight ghost, had glided noiselessly into the room) laid her hand on Leicester's arm to prevent his calling attention to her presence, while eager and trembling she listened to Lewis's account of her father's accident; and overcome for the moment by these evil tidings, she remained speechless, leaning against a chair for support. Lewis, surprised at Leicester's silence, raised his head languidly, and the first object that met his eyes was Annie's sinking figure. With an exclamation of dismay, he attempted to start up, but he was becoming so weak from loss of blood, that he failed to accomplish his purpose. Roused by the action, Annie recovered herself, and as a new idea struck her, she asked,—

"Where, then, is poor papa? Have they brought him home? I must go to him instantly!"

"He is not yet arrived, Miss Grant," returned Lewis, in a low voice, that trembled with conflicting emotions; "his own servants are carrying him, and a surgeon will be here instantly. I——" he paused abruptly, for Annie, drawing herself up, advanced towards him, and with flashing eyes exclaimed,—

"Is this then the way in which you have fulfilled your promise, Mr. Arundel? I trusted so implicitly to your assurance that you would watch over him and protect him; and now you have not only failed him in the moment of danger, but deserted him in his necessity, and secured your own safety by coming home to break my heart with these evil tidings. Oh, I am ashamed of you—grieved—disappointed!"

"Hush, my dear Annie," observed Leicester, soothingly. "Arundel might not be able to prevent this accident—you are too hasty."

"No! no!" returned Lewis, in a low broken voice, "I deserve her reproaches. I ought never to have quitted him, and yet I did so, believing that I left him in perfect safety. I could not bear to stand inactive, when other men were about to face danger, and coolness and address were required;—besides, I had pledged myself to assist in capturing this poacher." He paused, then added, "I have been to blame, Miss Grant, but I am not quite the poltron you imagine me. I did, indeed, leave your father, that I might accompany the attacking party into the wood, but I strained every nerve to come up with Hardy before General Grant encountered him; and although that was impossible, I arrived in time to prevent him from forcing the horse to trample the life out of the fallen man, and, wounded as I was, I engaged with and captured, at the risk of my own life, the ruffian who had injured your father; nor should I have been here now, but that it was necessary for some one to procure assistance, and summon a surgeon, and I rode here at speed to my own injury, that I might leave a more efficient man with the General."

As he ceased speaking, the butler entered the room, bearing in his hand a lamp, and for the first time the light fell upon Lewis's figure. Leicester, as he beheld him, uttered an exclamation of surprise and horror, which his appearance was well calculated to call forth. His face was deadly pale, save a red line across the forehead, where some bramble had torn the skin; his dark hair, heavy with the night dew, hung in wild disorder around his temples; and his clothes, stained with mud, bore traces of the severity of the struggle in which he had been engaged; the sleeve of his left arm, which still rested on the table, was soaked with gore, while the momentary excitement which had animated him as he spoke, had given way to a return of the faintness produced by the loss of blood, which was by this time very considerable. As this ghastly figure met her sight, Annie uttered a slight shriek—then a sense of the cruel injustice of her own reproaches banished every other consideration, and springing towards him, she exclaimed,—

"Oh, Mr. Arundel, what can we do for you? how shocked, how grieved I am!—will you, can you forgive me?"

Lewis smiled and attempted to reply, but the words died away upon his lips, and, completely overcome by faintness, he would have fallen from the chair had not Leicester supported him. Fortunately, at this moment the surgeon arrived, and Annie quitting the apartment, Lewis's sleeve was cut open, his wound temporarily bound up, and his temples bathed with some stimulating essence which dispelled his faintness, before the surgeon's services were required for General Grant. The latter gentleman had recovered consciousness ere he reached Broadhurst, and though suffering acute pain from his broken arm, appeared cool and collected. His first question had been "whether Hardy had escaped," and he seemed to revive from the moment he was informed of his capture. His next inquiry was, who had taken him, and on learning it was Lewis, he was much pleased, muttering, "Brave lad, brave lad, pity he's not in the army." He recognised Annie and spoke kindly to her, gave orders for the safe custody of Hardy, demanded of the surgeon who examined his arm whether he wished to amputate it, as he felt quite equal to the operation, and in short, under circumstances which would have overpowered any man of less firmness of character, behaved like a gentleman and a brave old soldier, as he was. Fortunately the surgeons (for a second, attracted by the rumour of an accident, as vultures are if a camel dies in the desert, had come to test the truth of the old proverb that two heads are better than one) succeeded in setting the arm, pronounced amputation unnecessary, and, after careful examination, gave it as their opinion that, with the exception of a few contusions of little consequence, the general had sustained no further injury. Having come to this satisfactory conclusion, they found time again to direct their attention to Lewis. After much whispered consultation, and considerable exchange of learned winks and profound nods, they informed him that he had been wounded by a shot from a pistol, (which, by the way, he could have told them,) and that they had very little doubt that the ball remained in the wound, in which case it would be necessary to extract it;—to this Lewis replied, "The sooner, the better." Accordingly, they proceeded to put him to great agony by probing the wound to find the ball, after which they hurt him still more in extracting it, performing both operations with such easy cheerfulness of manner and utter disregard of the patient's feelings, that a bystander would have imagined they were carving cold shoulder of mutton rather than the same joint of live humanity. But surgeons, like fathers, have flinty hearts, unmacadamized by the smallest grain of pity for the wretched victims of their uncomfortable skill; their idea of the "Whole Duty of Man" being that he should afford them "an interesting case" when living, and become a "good subject" for them, when he has ceased to be one to the Queen. After the ball was extracted, Lewis requested it might be handed to him; it was small, and from its peculiar shape, he perceived that it must have been discharged from a pistol with a rifle barrel.

"If you will allow me," he said, "I shall keep this bit of lead as a memorial of this evening's entertainment."

"Oh certainly," replied the most cheerful surgeon, "by all means; if it had but gone an eighth of an inch farther," he added, rubbing his hands joyously, "only an eighth of an inch, it would have injured the spinal cord, and you would have been—droll how these things occur sometimes—you'd have been paralysed for life."

Lewis shuddered, and wished devoutly he were for the time being Caliph Haroun Alraschid, in which case the facetious surgeon would have added a practical acquaintance with the effects of the bastinado on the sole of the human foot, to his other medical knowledge.

"I don't think," resumed the doctor, meditatively, "I don't think you need apprehend any very unpleasant result, as far as I can as yet see into the case. Of course," he continued, with hilarity, "erysipelas might supervene, but that is seldom fatal, unless it affects the brain; and I should hope the great effusion of blood will prevent that in the present instance. You feel very weak, don't you?"

"Well, you need not be uneasy on that score; I don't apprehend a return of syncope, but if you should feel an unnatural deficiency of vital heat, or perceive any symptoms of approaching collapse, I would advise your ringing the bell, and I'll be with you instantly. Scalpel's obliged to be off; he's got a very interesting broken leg—compound fracture—waiting for him down at the village, besides some dozen agreeable minor casualties, the result of to-night's work. Keep up your spirits, and go to sleep—your shoulder is easier now?"

"It feels as if the blade of a red-hot sword were being constantly plunged into it," returned Lewis, crossly.

"Delighted to hear it," replied Dr. Bistoury, rubbing his hands; "just what I could have wished; nothing inert there! I would recommend your bearing it (which word he pronounced be-a-a-ring,) quietly, and rely upon my looking in the first thing to-morrow." So saying he rubbed his hands, chuckled and departed.

In spite of his wound, which continued very painful, Lewis contrived to get a few hours' sleep, and awoke so much refreshed, that he resisted all attempts to keep him in bed, and though stiff and weak to an excessive degree, made his way to the study and cheated Walter out of the holiday he had expected; a loss which he scarcely regretted in his joy at finding that the wicked poachers had not seriously injured his dear Mr. Arundel. And then Annie could not be happy till she had caught Charles Leicester and made him accompany her on a penitential visit to Lewis, to tell him how grieved she was at the recollection of her injustice to him;—it seemed so dreadfully ungrateful when in fact he had just saved her father's life:—and she looked so pretty and good and pure in her penitence, that Lewis began to think women were brighter and higher beings than his philosophy had dreamed of, and for the first time it occurred to him that he had been guilty of an unpardonable absurdity in despising the whole race of woman-kind because he happened to have been jilted by a little coquettish, half-educated German girl; and he forgave Annie so fully in his heart, that with his lips he could scarcely stammer out half-a-dozen unmeaning words to tell her so.

Leicester asked him in the course of the conversation whether he had any idea which of the gang of poachers had fired the pistol, adding that two others had been taken besides Hardy. Lewis paused for a moment ere he replied, "That his back had been turned towards the man who shot him, and that it was too serious a charge to bring against any one without more certain knowledge than he possessed on the subject;" and having said this, he immediately changed the conversation.

As soon as Annie and her cousin withdrew, Millar the gamekeeper made his appearance, full of congratulations on Lewis's gallant conduct, and sympathy in regard to his wound.

"I can't imagine ritch o' ther warmints could have had a pistol; it worn't neither o' ther two as we captivated, for I sarched 'em myself, and never a blessed harticle had they got about 'em, except ther usual amount o' bacca and coppers lin ther breeches' pockets."

"Did you have any more fighting after I left you to follow Hardy?" asked Lewis.

"Vell, we did 'ave one more sharpish turn," was the reply; "when the blackguards sec me down, they made a rush to recover the sack with the game, and almost succeeded, only Sam Jones pulled me out of the crowd and set me on my legs again, and I was so mad a-thinking that Hardy had got clear away that I layed about me like one possessed, they do tell me; so we not only recovered the game, but bagged two o' ther chaps themselves. By ther bye," he continued, "Sam Jones come here with me; he wants to see yer when I've done with yer; he says he's picked up somethin' o' yourn, but he won't say what—he's a close chap when he likes, is Sam; howsomever, I suppose he expects you'll tip him a bob or so, for it was he as ketched yer, when Hardy first flung yer off; you've paid him for it sweetly, and no mistake; he'd got a lovely black hye and his right wrist was swelled as big as two ven we marched him hof to H— jail this morning. And now I'll vish yer good artemnoon, Mr. Arundel, and send Sam hup, if you're agreeable."

Lewis, with a smile at the equivocal nature of the phrase, signified his agreeability, and the keeper took his departure;—in another minute the sound of heavy footsteps announced the approach of Sam, who having obeyed Lewis's injunction to "come in," vindicated his title to the attribute of "closeness" by carefully shutting the door, and applying first his ear and then his eye to the key-hole, ere he could divest his cautious mind of a dread of eaves-droppers. He then crossed the room on tip-toe, partly from a sense of the grave nature of his mysterious errand, partly from respect to the carpet, the richness of which oppressed him heavily during the whole of his visit, restricting him to the use of one leg only, the greater portion of the time.

"You have found something of mine, Millar tells me," began Lewis, finding that ghost-like his visitor appeared to consider it a point of etiquette not to speak first.

"You're very kind, Mr. Arundel," returned his visitor, who, catching sight at the moment, of the gilt frame of an oil painting which hung over the chimney, and believing it firmly to be pure gold, became so overpowered between that and the carpet, that he scarcely dared trust himself to speak in such an aristocratic atmosphere. "I'm much obliged to you, sir; yes, I have found something, sir, but I don't know disactly as it's altogether yourn."

"What is it, my good fellow?" inquired Lewis, half amused and half bored by the man's bashfulness.

A consolatory mistrust of the sterling value of the picture-frame had, by this time, begun to insinuate itself into Sam's mind, and reassured in some degree by the doubt, he continued,

"I beg pardon, sir, but I hopes you don't feel so bad as might be expected, where you was shot last night?"

Lewis thanked him for his inquiry, and said he believed the wound was going on favourably.

"I'm sure I'm very glad to hear it, which is a mercy to be thankful for," returned this sympathising visitor; then, leaning forward so as to approach his lips to Lewis's ear, he continued in a loud whisper,

"Have ye any idea who it was as fired the shot?"

Lewis started, and colouring slightly, fixed his eyes on the man's face as he inquired abruptly,

"Have you?"

Forgetting his veneration for the carpet in the excitement of the conversation, the suspicious under-keeper walked to the door, and again tested the key-hole, ere he ventured to answer the question; then approaching Lewis, he thrust his hand into a private pocket in his shooting-jacket, and drawing thence something carefully wrapped in a handkerchief, he presented it to the young tutor, saying,

"That's what I've been and found, sir; I picked it up in the wood not twenty yards from the place where you stood when you was shot, Mr. Arundel."

Lewis hastily unrolled the handkerchief, and drew from its folds a small pocket-pistol; on the stock, which was richly inlaid, was a silver escutcheon with a coat of arms engraved upon it; from marks about the nipple, it had evidently been lately discharged, and on examination it proved to have a rifle barrel. Lewis's brow grew dark.

"It is then as I suspected," he muttered; pausing, however, as a new idea seemed to strike him. "It might be unintentional," he continued, "the mere result of accident,—I must not jump too hastily to such a conclusion;" then addressing the under-keeper, he inquired,

"Have you any idea to whom this pistol belongs?"

"Pr'aps I may have," was the cautious reply,

"but there's some things it's best not to know—a man might get himself into trouble by being too knowing, you see, Mr. Arundel."

"Listen to me, my good friend," returned Lewis, fixing his piercing glance on the man's face; "it is evident you more than suspect who is the owner of this pistol, and you probably are aware by whom, and under what circumstances, it was last night discharged. Now, if through a selfish dread of consequences you wish to keep this knowledge to yourself, why come here, and show me the pistol? If, on the contrary, you wish to enhance the value of your information in order to make a more profitable bargain with me, you are only wasting time. I am naturally anxious to know who wounded me, and whether the deed was accidental, or intentional; therefore you have but to name your price, and if I can afford it, I will give it you. I say this because I can conceive no other reason for your shilly-shallying."

During this speech, the unfortunate Sam Jones, shifted uneasily from leg to leg, dropped his cap, stooped to pick it up again, bit his under lip with shame and indecision, and at last exclaimed,

"Bless'd if I can stand this hany longer! out it must come, and if I loses my sitation through it, I suppose there's other places to be got; they can't say nuffin against my character, that's one comfort. It ain't your money I wants, Mr. Arundel, sir; I'm able and willin' to earn my own livin'; but I've got a good place here, and don't wish to offend nobody; still right is right, and knowing what I knows, my conscience wouldn't let me rest till I'd come and told you—only I thort if you would ha' guessed it of yourself like, nothing needn't ha' come out about me in the matter."

"I understand," returned Lewis, with a contemptuous curl of the lip; "I will take care not to commit you in any way; so speak out."

"Well, if you remember, sir, I went with you and Millar up to the barley-stack last night, and when you grabbed hold of Hardy he sung out to the chap as was with him to come and help him, so I thort the best thing for me was to pitch into him, and prevent his doing so. Well, I hadn't much trouble with him, for he was a shocking poor boxer, and as soon as I'd polished him off, I turned to lend you a hand; just at that minute I see the moon a-shining upon something bright, and looking further, I perceived the figure of a man crouching close to the stack, with a cocked pistol in his hand. When fust I see him the pistol was pointed at Hardy, but suddenly he changed his aim, and fired straight at you; as he let fly, the moonlight fell upon his face, and if ever a man looked like a devil, he did then."

"And it was—?" asked Lewis, cagerly.

"Lord Bellefield!" was the reply; "there's none of 'em wears hair on their top lip except the young lord, so it ain't easy to mistake him, ye see."

"Are you quite sure he changed the direction of the pistol? Might not the shot have been intended for Hardy?"

"I'll take my oath it worn't, Mr. Arundel; he pointed it straight at your breast, and if Hardy hadn't given a sudden wrench at the minute, and dragged you out of the line of fire, you'd have been a dead man long before this."

Seeing that Lewis continued silent, the keeper resumed,—

"As soon as you was hit, you let go, and Hardy threw you off. I caught you, expecting it was all up with you, but I still kept my eye on his lordship, for I was curious to know how he'd act. When he saw you fall, he smiled, and then he looked more like a devil than he had done before. As Hardy was a-cutting away, he passed close to Lord Bellefield, and struck against his shoulder, accidentally—and his lordship in a rage flung the discharged pistol after him, and it would ha' fetched him down too if it had'n't a-hit against a branch; however, I marked where it fell pretty nigh, and as soon as it was light this morning I went and found it. There's his lordship's arms upon it, same as them on his phealon."

Completely overpowered and amazed at this recital, Lewis, desiring to be alone with his own thoughts, obtained from Sam Jones a promise of the strictest secrecy in regard to the affair, and having liberally rewarded him for his discreet behaviour, dismissed him. He then, concealing the pistol in his pocket, withdrew to the privacy of his own apartment, and locking the door, sat down to collect his ideas. At first he could scarcely realize the fact with which he had become acquainted. True, he had suspected that it was from Lord Bellefield's hand that he had received his wound, for he had previously observed the butt of a pistol protruding from a pocket in his lordship's great-coat, his attention being particularly called to the fact by the eagerness with which its owner immediately hastened to conceal it more effectually; still, he had believed that he had been wounded by an accident, and that the shot had been fired with the intention of disabling Hardy, in whose capture Lord Bellefield appeared, for some mysterious reason, to be deeply interested. The account he had just received proved that this was evidently not the case, and Lewis could only conjecture, that at the moment Lord Bellefield was about to shoot Hardy, some fiend had suggested to him the opportunity of an easy revenge on the man he hated, and that, in an impulse of ungovernable malice, he had altered the direction of the pistol.

Rising and opening his dressing-case, Lewis took from a secret drawer the ball which had been extracted from his shoulder, and drawing the pistol out of his pocket, tried it; it fitted the barrel to a nicety. Replacing it he muttered, "There is then no doubt;" he paused, but immediately resumed, "'Tis well; he has now filled up the measure of his guilt; the time is come to balance the account." His intention at that moment was to seek out Lord Bellefield, upbraid him with his treachery, threaten to expose him, and demand as a right, that he should afford him satisfaction, forcing him, by some means, to meet him on the following morning.

But even when carried away by passion, Lewis was not utterly forgetful of the feelings of others, and his friendship for Leicester and for Annie, consideration for the General in his present situation, and the interest he took in Walter, rose up before him, and he exclaimed,

"No, it is impossible; a thousand reasons forbid it while I remain under this roof; I must break off all intercourse with this family, before I seek my just revenge. Well, the day of retribution is postponed, then, perhaps for years; but it will come at last, I know; I feel that it will. That man is a part of my destiny. With what pertinacity he hates me! He fears me too; he has done so ever since that affair of the glove; he read in my eyes that I had resolved on—on what? what will all this lead to? Am I at heart a murderer?" He sat down, for he was very weak, and trembled so violently from the intensity of his feelings, that his knees refused to support him.

"No!" he continued, "it is an act of justice. This man insulted me—I bore it patiently; at least, I did not actively resent it: he repeated his injurious conduct, he heaped insult on insult—I warned him; he knew what he was doing; he saw the fiend he was arousing in me, but he persevered—even yet I strove to forgive him; yes, for the sake of his brother's kindness to me, for the sake of the fair girl who is betrothed to him, I had almost resolved to forego my right to punish him. Then he seeks my life, the cowardly assassin! and in so doing he has sealed his own doom."—He rose and paced sternly up and down the apartment. "Frere would say," he resumed, "Frere would say that I ought to forgive him yet; but he would be wrong: he would quote the Scriptures that we should forgive a brother 'till seventy times seven.' Yes, if he turn and repent; repented sins only are forgiven either in heaven or on earth. Does this man repent? let him tell me so, and I will give him my hand in friendship; but if he glories in his wickedness?—why then the old Hebrew law stands good, 'An eye for an eye.' He owes me a life already, and if I offer him fair combat, I give him a chance to which in strict justice he has no right; but I am no mean assassin;—and now to return his pistol, and inform his lordship that I am aware of the full extent of my obligations to him."

So saying, he drew pen and ink towards him, and hastily wrote as follows:

"Mr. Arundel presents his compliments to Lord Bellefield, and begs to return the pistol with which he did him the honour to attempt his life in the wood last night. Mr. Arundel reserves the pleasure of returning the shot till some future opportunity."

He then rolled up the note, and inserting it in the barrel of the pistol, formed the whole into a small parcel, which he carefully sealed, and, ringing for Lord Bellefield's valet, desired him to lay it on his master's dressing-table before he prepared for dinner.

Reader, when your eye falls upon this page, which lays bare the heart of one whom we would fain depict, not as a mere picturesque brain-creation of impossible virtues and startling faults, but an erring mortal like ourselves, swayed by the same passions, subject to the same influences for good or for evil—when you perceive how this one wrong feeling, permitted to take root in his mind, grew and flourished, till it so warped his frank generous nature, that the fiend of sophistry, quoting scripture to his purpose, could blind his sense of right with such shallow reasoning as the foregoing,—resolve, if a single revengeful feeling lurk serpent-like in your bosom, to cast it from you at whatever sacrifice, lest when you pray "Our Father" which is in heaven to "forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us," you unawares pronounce your own condemnation.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT MR. SIDNEY HERBERT'S EMIGRATION SCHEME.

BY J. M. W.

"To know the art of alms is greater than to be crowned with the diadem of kings."—St. Chrysostom.

DURING the last few years the attention of the higher classes in this country, especially of noble and fashionable ladies, has been turned to the condition of the distressed needlewomen of the metropolis. Charitable funds and associations of various kinds have been formed for their benefit. Bazaars, and balls, and public dinners have been got up on their behalf, in various parts of the united kingdom. Eloquent, sensible, and clever articles have been written in every sort of newspaper and magazine, giving abundant testimony to the fact, that they are a hard-working, long-suffering, degraded, and half-starving class; that it is with great difficulty they can keep body and soul together; that sometimes, as not a few coroners' inquests prove, the hopeless, utterly prostrate soul refuses to keep company with the emaciated body any longer, and we read the awful verdict, "Death by Starvation." a verdict, that ought to set all benevolent men and women in a civilized, Christian country thinking, with some degree of vigour, upon the possibility of preventing its recurrence. Sometimes, too, after the most pathetic humourist of our own times has made the heart-strings thrill almost to agony with his "Song of the Shirt," and we dare not think how all this sadness, and desolation, and physical suffering will end, we have to chant within ourselves that solemn dirge:—

"One more, unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate,
Gone to her death."

Mad from life's history,
Glad to death's mystery
Swift to be hurl'd,—
Anywhere, anywhere,
Out of the world."

"Anywhere!" indeed. And some, too, gentle and kind-hearted, who sit secure within the environment of a home; with food and warmth and clothing, with something like good moral education; some who can talk easily and wisely of rights and duties; who speaking with reasonable severity of the wrong-doing and its evil results, but cannot calculate (for they have not the necessary experience) the crushing, maddening, God-and-heaven-forgetting effects of the woe endured by such an one before she went "to her death;"—these, when they hear that solemn dirge, shrink, and cry "Anywhere! anywhere! out of the reach of those sounds. They are too dreadful!" Not so, fair ladies! By your leave, it must not be so. You must listen, that you may learn to know, and knowing, you may study with all earnestness and diligence how to alleviate some of this suffering among the poor, and friendless, and uneducated of your own sex. This is, be assured of it, part of the work God sent you on earth to do. Anything that will help you to the accomplishment of these social duties, concerns you intimately. First of all, there must be the hearty recognition, in thought, word, and deed, of the claims of these suffering thousands, (among many others, neither to be over-looked nor forgotten,) upon the active benevolence of the more fortunate classes of the community. Englishmen have been forward lately in the work of seeking out misery and its causes. Englishwomen, under their guidance, can do very much towards diminishing the existing evil, especially as it affects their own sex; and to our female readers we earnestly recommend a careful consideration of Mr. Sidney Herbert's scheme for female emigration.

Many remarkable letters on the state of the labouring classes in England have been published in the Morning Chronicle during the last half-year. These letters have been full of the most painful details; and from these it has appeared to many benevolent-minded persons, that one of the most afflicted and hopeless of these classes, if not the most afflicted and most hopeless of them, throughout the whole length and breadth of the land, is that of the needlewomen of the large towns, and especially of London. These persons, at least many of them, sent large sums of money to the Chronicle office, for the relief of those cases in the Correspondent's Reports, which seemed to them to cry out the loudest upon the world for help. These facts being duly noted by Mr. Sidney Herbert, (deeply meditating such things,) he addressed a letter to the editor of the Chronicle, on the 4th of December last, in which he gives a rapid general outline of a plan for the permanent benefit of this unhappy class. This letter, the particulars of which we are about to consider, is written in such a noble, right-minded, benevolent spirit, that it could scarcely fail to sink deeply into the hearts and stir the brains of all feeling and thinking men and women who read it. The men and the women of his own caste have shown a ready sympathy with him. They have subscribed liberally, generously, to the fund for the execution of his scheme; the Queen and Prince Albert have headed the subscription lists with a donation of five hundred pounds; and during the past two months, many in the land, royal, noble, gentle, and simple, have been moved by this letter, to a sacred pity for the sufferings of these thousands, whose woe is to a great extent voiceless, for they cannot speak for themselves. Let us hear some of the things Mr. S. Herbert says for them. And observe, these things require no fine writing, no rhetorical flourishes; the plain truth, without any dressing up, is sufficient. Take it as we find it in the letter:—

"Theirs is the most helpless sex, the most intense poverty, the most fearful degradation. Make every allowance for the natural exaggeration of sufferers relating to their own wrongs, and for the involuntary exaggeration of a benevolent man listening with horror to the detail of those sufferings—strip your correspondent's letters of all but the bare recital of facts—omit all his description of the sufferers themselves—forget, if possible, their own shame-stricken and despairing recitals—and what a picture is left! 33,500 women engaged in this one trade, of whom 28,500 are under twenty years of age; and, of these, a large portion living or attempting to live on sums varying from 4½d. to 2½d. a day."

After showing that temporary alms in such a case can be of little use,—nay, many benevolent and wise persons believe them to be radically pernicious,—Mr. S. Herbert proceeds to inquire into the causes of this great distress. "'The cause,' says every one, 'is the mania for cheap goods, which drives down profits and wages to the starvation point.'" But the mere desire for cheap goods would not be sufficient to ensure its gratification; and there must be other causes at work to make prices low. Mr. S. Herbert is probably right to a great extent, when he says that "the truth is, our wealth and our population have both out-grown the narrow area of our country. We want more room. We have too much capital and too many people." This may not be the whole truth, but it is great part of it. The following passages we believe to be as true as any human truth can be; and we would urge the facts therein set down on the careful attention of the reader.

"But in no trade does the competition of labour with labour exist to the same extent as in all kinds of apparel-making; and for this reason the labour is generally done by women. But the number of women in Great Britain greatly exceeds the number of men. In 1821 the females out-numbered the males, in round numbers, by 117,000; in 1831 by 213,000; in 1841 by 320,000; and at this moment, so great has been the male emigration in the last nine years, that there cannot be less than 500,000 more females than males in Great Britain. Now, women have far fewer trades in which they can engage than men. Their choice is very limited, and, as their field of employment is narrower, so it is, proportionably, far more crowded. This needle-working, which is one of the largest, is the most overcrowded of all trades; in none, therefore, has the reduction in the price of labour and the cost of the article produced been so great."

In fact, this trade of needle-work is adopted by many thousands as the last resource of honest industry when all other means of earning money fail. But it is by no means confined to the lowest and most ignorant;—educated women, penniless gentlewomen, not a few, keep themselves and those belonging to them from starvation, by the finer sorts of needle-work.

"Leave this crowd of women here, and they will destroy one another,—more and more poverty, more and more infamy,—body and soul both destroyed. Why not give them the means of escape? In the southern hemisphere is a vast continent, which is as much a part of the British Empire as Wales. It has been peopled partly by forced, partly by voluntary, emigration. In the first case the disproportion of the sexes (the reverse of course of that which we see in England) is enormous. Philanthropists have been shocked at the results upon society there. But even in the case of voluntary emigration, the greater hardihood and spirit of adventure of the male sex have naturally brought out a greater number of male emigrants. In 1847 there were in South Australia only 13,622 females to 17,531 males, including children, the disproportion among adults being of course greater. In New South Wales, in 1847, of the adult population 83,572 were males, and only 41,509 were females. In Van Diemen's Land the same disproportion exists.

"A redress of this inequality is the crying want of society there; just as the redress of the opposite inequality in this country is the necessity here."

It is the redress of this inequality that Mr. S. Herbert purposes to bring about, by a wisely ordered scheme of emigration. He does not "intend to deal with a few only," he proposes that "we should offer to those who still have health and years before them, and above all, who still have character," the means of escape from the degradation of body and soul in the old country, to a new land where they can live in comfort, honour, and usefulness. No one can deny that such a consummation is devoutly to be wished; nor will any one at all conversant with the difficulties of doing good, doubt for one moment that to execute this scheme as Mr. S. Herbert and all far-seeing philanthropists would wish to have it executed, is by no means an easy task. If to do good were as easy as to wish to do it, we should speedily have a very much improved social state. But all persons who desire to become public benefactors, must be prepared for opposition; and Mr. S. Herbert has already had many difficulties started about this, to all appearance, extremely desirable plan;—difficulties, many of them, grave enough. As Sir Roger de Coverley's truism declares, "much may be said upon both sides;" but we think most may be said upon Mr. S. Herbert's side. In order to say our little say on his side, we think it best to give a fair hearing to the chief objections raised against the scheme, and answer them briefly as well as we are able.

It is asserted that the distress of the British needlewomen is exaggerated; and that other classes of the community stand as much in need of public charity as they. This word exaggeration, is very unsatisfactory and vague. It is scarcely possible to exaggerate what is acknowledged on all hands to be extreme. Other classes of the community stand as much in need of public charity on a large scale. Perhaps so; but would the charity, as in the case of the poor needlewomen, walk abroad armed with two swords for the destruction of evil? Should we get a double amount of evil destroyed in the case of any other distressed class? Could we get thousands of women, young, with "health and character," able and willing to work, and snatching them from starvation and ruin here, send them over to a land where such human beings are wanted as much as they are not wanted here? Certainly not. From no other of the very poorest classes could you obtain a sufficient number of women of good character to supply the want of females in Australia. We say nothing of the right which all charitable people have to select the objects of their charity; because we believe that right involves the duty of selecting carefully the most deserving, in every sense of that word.

It is asserted that the drafting off of so many thousand starving women to Australia, will not materially alleviate the existing evil here; that other thousands will arrive to fill up the vacancies in suffering and crime. Taking that statement at its full value, it amounts to this,—that the thousands thus drafted off are saved from suffering and crime; and that the colonies receive an immense benefit in consequence; these are two actual good things achieved. The other thousands who, it is feared, will come up to London to supply the places of those sent away, will not leave comfortable homes to starve and become vicious here. It is those who are worse off elsewhere who will come to London; therefore the departure of several thousand female emigrants from the metropolis, will not make matters worse for those they leave behind, to become London needlewomen. We have not space to detail them now, but there are many chances in favour of the condition of needlewomen all over England being materially improved in consequence of this Emigration Scheme. At all events, those who go will be benefited, and so will the place they go to; this is, of course, supposing the scheme to be well worked out.

It is asserted that the distress of this and of other classes is the result of bad legislation, free trade, &c., and that certain alterations in the laws would set matters right, without any charitable schemes for emigration. Taking it for granted that this is true, (which we more than doubt,) it must be remembered that the evil exists, and that it takes a long time to obtain new laws. While the grass grows, the steed starves. It would be well in those who see clearly that all this misery is the product of bad legislation, to come forward most eagerly with their charitable assistance in the cause of these victims, not of great general laws, and the inevitable circumstances of social progress, but of special bad government. They of all people ought to be the most enthusiastic in the cause of those whom they believe to be oppressed.

Some people say that the distressed needlewomen of a large city like London are not the class of women wanted by the colonies; that physically and morally their state is bad.

This objection is one that deserves very serious attention. No charitable association will be justified in sending to a flourishing colony ship-loads of women who will be found useless or worse than useless when they get there. London women of the poorest classes have certainly some disadvantage as candidates for emigration,—but they have also some advantages. In the first place, their intelligence, quickness, aptness, is as ten to one compared with that of the lower class of women in rural districts. They are, even in their half-starved state, more awake, more alive; and this mental vigour, as we all know, supplies the deficiency of bone and muscle very well. A London needlewoman or servant of all work, when industrious and of good character, gets through twice as much hard work in a day, as most young countrywomen of twice her size and bodily strength. These two qualities, activity and intelligence, next to a fair moral character and good health, are of the greatest importance to a female emigrant of any class, and especially of the lowest. Of course, good training is highly desirable; but activity and intelligence, stimulated by hope, and the will to work in a fair field for industry, will supply its place tolerably. Stupidity, the grossest ignorance, and habits of vice, should incapacitate young women for election to these Emigrant bands. There are reasons for believing that the London women who work hard for their bread, are more intelligent and better informed generally than the same classes scattered over the country; and we leave our readers to judge from the statistics of crime in England, whether the inferior classes of women in the agricultural districts are really much more moral than those in London. Thus much we would say for the poor London needlewomen.

But, we believe that well-trained young women from the country, endowed with a fair share of spirit, enterprise, and intelligence, and having good moral and religious principles, would be more welcome to our colonies. These, not yet reduced to want, and willing to help themselves, might be helped by the new Female Emigration Association, to a land where they would be placed permanently above want. They might be able to get the cost of their passage paid by their own friends at the low rate of 15*l.* each; and thus another and a superior class of poor female emigrants might be sent out by this Association. It seems clear, that more than one class of female emigrants must be formed.

It is also asserted that the difficulties in the way of managing the whole scheme are insuperable. They are certainly great, but not greater, we believe, than Mr. Sidney Herbert and his adherents in this business are prepared to grapple with, and have a reasonable hope of overcoming. The first difficulty is to get funds adequate to the performance of the work. A very great sum will be required before the whole can be achieved; but the money already contributed will be sufficient to begin with. This sum properly managed will give the scheme a fair trial, and if it prove to be as beneficial as we believe and hope it will, it would be an insult to the British nation to doubt that the money requisite to carry out the scheme will be wanting. We are a greedily commercial and a Mammon-worshipping community; we fear to mention how much could be got out of British pockets for a token of regard and profound respect to Mr. Hudson. But we have our good and generous points too; blinded by gold-dust as our eyes are, and absorbed in a Profit and Loss philosophy of the counting-house as the national mind is, we are a magnificently charitable people. We cannot doubt that an extensive and soundly beneficial scheme of charity will meet with the support it deserves. We need not fear that Mr. S. Herbert's plan will fail for want of funds.

The modus operandi presents the most serious difficulties. The fittest persons must be found to select the emigrants; and they must select the fittest persons for emigrants. The transport by so long a sea-voyage is by no means an easy thing to manage with economy and with a due regard to health, comfort, and perfect propriety of conduct. This last difficulty has been adverted to in a letter to the Times, by its able correspondent S. G. O., whose opinion on emigration matters, as upon many other large social questions, justly commands public attention. There may be a thousand fears to contend with among the very persons intended to be benefited. Some of them may be inclined to say, "No! No!—Let me die of starvation here; but do not send me so far away." Again, all the official persons employed to do the work must be honourable, trustworthy, energetic, and sensible. Last of all, a favourable reception must be secured to the emigrants in their new home. The colonists, generally, must be brought to look favourably upon the scheme; and that can only be done by considering their interests as much as those of this country, or of the persons intended to be benefited. No good can come out of any form of selfishness; and it would be selfish not to do to our Colonies what we in similar circumstances would require to be done to us. Mr. Sidney Herbert has the proper hopeful spirit, which is one of the surest earnest of success. He says,

"Neither will machinery be wanting. The clergy who, in these poverty stricken parishes, (London ones,) themselves unsupported by wealth, are nobly fighting the battle of the Cross; the excellent societies which are labouring for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the poor; individuals also—men like Lord Ashley, whose energetic benevolence sent him years ago through the courts and alleys which your correspondent has now revisited—all these would give invaluable assistance in administering the fund, and in selecting candidates for emigration.

"Communications may be opened with the colonies, with the view to the reception of the emigrants on their arrival. 'Homes' may be established similar to the one founded at Adelaide, by Mrs. Chisholm, whose name is widely and honourably known in connexion with emigration. This will secure to the emigrants protection and guidance, and facilities for placing themselves respectably.

Let us give "honour to whom honour is due;" first, to the man who has taken the lead in this beneficent undertaking; and next, to those who have given him their support and assistance. These are, or were, at the beginning, chiefly members of the aristocracy. There is a peculiar grace and fitness in the origin of this charity. It was not forced upon the notice of the higher classes by political fears, or by the clamours of the sufferers; it originated with themselves; it was a spontaneous condescending to persons of low estate, and shows that the common talk of the insensibility of the rich to the sufferings of the poor is not so true as some folks would have us to believe. We are heartily glad to see the aristocracy of this country take the initiative in any great works for the benefit of the lower classes. In these, as in other important social movements, they are well qualified, as their ancestors were of old, to animate and direct the middle ranks, and to give a higher tone to their exertions. It is a good thing also that the ignorant, the poor, and the low-born, should learn that those who tell them their greatest enemies are the high-born and educated classes, tell them what is false.

In conclusion, let us again recommend to our readers, especially to our female readers, a proper study of this matter; and if they find it worthy of their support, let them give that support, by all the means in their power. How easy it would be for two or three ladies to subscribe the necessary sum for sending out one emigrant; and there are few ladies, either in London or the country, who do not know several young women in every way deserving such kind help, and who would be of the greatest value in a new country, while if left to the natural course of things here they are likely to be ground down by poverty or almost forced into vice.

We believe there are many ladies among the middle ranks who will be thankful for such an object of interest and exertion as the furtherance of Mr. Sidney Herbert's Scheme for the Emigration of Distressed Needlewomen.

HISTORICAL SIGHT-SEEING.

BY AGNES STRICKLAND.

Few things are more amusing than the droll equivokes perpetrated by the local curatii of historical and ecclesiastical antiquities, especially those in unfrequented districts, who derive their information from the oral records of that venerable gossip Tradition. The mistakes of ignorant persons, who, after learning the contents of a printed guide-book by rote, get bewildered in their lesson, are common-place absurdities, like the cross readings of the columns of a newspaper, too dull to provoke a smile. Such people might just as well be wrong as right, for they know nothing of what they are repeating, and go on as mechanically with their story as an organ grinder turns the handle of the machine which produces an unsatisfactory imitation of certain sounds miscalled music.

The village chronicler, on the contrary, who has been imbued from childhood with oral records connected with the local antiquities of his own little world, speaks of them with love and veneration; and what he says, however illiterately expressed, captivates the attention of his auditors, because it has the charm of originality and genuine feeling. He often gives apocryphal or exaggerated versions of historical events, but he does it not in subtlety but simplicity, having no intention to deceive. He tells the tale as 'twas told to him by aged members of a bygone generation who had received the tradition from their forefathers. His erroneous statements are not wilful falsehoods, but literal mistakes; his exaggerations proceed from a faculty peculiarly active in the brains of uneducated yet imaginative persons, which phrenologists have called "marvellousness," one of the elements of poetry, and the source of all the mythological fables in which the early history of every country is shrouded. A pedant is offended at his anachronisms, but a humourist enjoys blunders which have the ludicrous effect of comedy, while the philosophic student of human nature is enabled to trace the source of popular error, and to form an estimate of the moral and intellectual perceptions of the narrator.

A first visit to the Tower of London is always a memorable epoch in the life of a reader of history or even a lover of historical romance; there is so much to excite the imagination and awaken thrilling memories of the past in the very nomenclature of its local features, the Bowyer's tower, the Traitor's gate, the Bloody-tower, the Portcullis, that from the moment one enters within the precincts of the grim royal fortress, one appears to have stepped back full four centuries, and to have become a contemporary of the Plantagenet or Tudor sovereigns. I cannot, however, recall without a smile, how completely the romance of my first visit to the Tower of London was dispelled by the droll proceedings of the warder, whose office it was to explain the mysteries of the ancient armouries. This adventure occurred in the year 1834, before the present improved regulations had been carried into effect, and while the old system of error and extortion was in full force. I was one of a large party, of whom the majority were, like English people in general, in great haste to hurry over the ground at railroad speed, in order to see something of less interest afterwards. Now it happened that the proper official was absent from his post, and could not be found for more than half-an-hour. In the mean time our accomplished friend, the master of the jewel house, took pity on our impatience, and kindly consented to act as our cicerone.

When we had proceeded nearly to the upper end of the horse armoury, the warder, a Waterloo veteran, arrayed in the gorgeous and picturesque costume of a beefeater, made his appearance, and claimed his privilege of showing the ancient armouries, apologizing at the same time for having made the party wait. "But," said he, "to tell you the plain truth, my new dress had just come in; and as I found I should have the honour of waiting on so many ladies. I thought I could not show my respect for them better than by putting it on, and that is not a thing that can be done in a minute," continued he, eyeing all his decorations admiringly as he spoke.

His excuse for the delay being received with a general smile, he requested us to walk back to the door that he might commence his explanations.

"Cannot you proceed from the point where we now are?" cried three or four of the party. He shook his head.

"All in ro-to-tation, ladies, if you please—all in ro-to-tation," replied he, impressively, motioning us to retrace our steps. "I could not possibly begin here—it's out of all reason to expect it."

"What difference does it make," asked one of the party, "where you begin?"

"No difference to you, ma'am, I dare say," replied the poor warder, in a confidential "aside;" "but all the difference in the world to me; for unless I begin at the proper place, turning to the right as we go in at the door, I shall never be able to get through the business at all; and mayhap I may be telling you that good Queen Bess is William and Mary, or King Henry III. John of Gaunt. It all depends on ro-to-tation whether one says right or wrong."

In justice to our Waterloo hero, I am bound to add, that, notwithstanding the pleasant distraction of his thoughts from the glories of our Norman and Plantagenet monarchs, to the glories of his brave new scarlet and purple gaberdine of the veritable Tudor fashion, he went through his chapter of kings better than might have been expected from his preface, save that he increased the number of Henry VIII.'s queens to ten, and accused him of beheading six of them, and turning all the others out-of-doors in very light array. "Ladies," added he, pointing with great solemnity to the ferocious looking effigy of bluff King Hal, "you see he has a cruel eye. Howsomever that there wicked old fellow invented our bee-feater-dress for us; and it was partly his own fashion, too; for, you see he has got just such a ruff about his own neck as this new one of mine, only that it isn't quite so clean. But as to these here red and white roses," pointing to the garland which encircled his own glossy black velvet hat, and of which our historical curator appeared justly proud, "old Harry the Eighth had not anything to do; for it was the wedding favour of his father and mother, as I understand, what made up the quarrels of York and Lancaster by getting married; and in the right of it, too. The white roses are for York—that was the woman; and the red for Lancaster—he was the man—King Henry VII.—there he is. Well, he was nothing in the world, to begin with, but a poor Welshman. Mayhap some of you ladies have heard the song—'Taffy was a Welshman: Taffy was a thief!' but he had the good luck to find the crown of England hanging on a bush.—Mr. Swift takes better care of it now a-days; but then, you know, he keeps it for the right owner, which crooked King Dick was not, as I told you just now."

After this specimen of the information which was afforded, cum privilegio, in the days of our fourth William to the visitors of the White-tower, in return for the enormous fees which were extorted from the public under the old system, a few droll cross readings from the mnemonic tablets of the unlettered daughter of the parish clerk of one of our Suffolk churches, ninety-nine miles from the metropolis, will scarcely appear incredible. The gentle reader will not, I trust, object to shift the scene, and accompany me on a pleasant midsummer ramble to one of the few historic sites in my native county of Suffolk, as yet untrodden by the foot of the modern tourist.

One lovely afternoon in June, some twenty years ago, my sisters and my myself set forth with a grave antiquarian cousin, of the discreet age of sixty-three, on a pedestrian pilgrimage. Our object was to explore the ruins of the Holyrood chapel at Blytheburgh, and make a thorough investigation of the antiquities of the magnificent old church, which, although it has suffered much from the outrages of the iconoclasts of the Roundhead Parliament, and the yet more fatal progress of decay, from the neglect and apathy of the last century, is still entire, and one of the noblest specimens of the ornamented English style of architecture in Suffolk. This stately structure is seated on a gentle eminence, above the river Blythe, in the village of Blytheburgh, once a flourishing place, now reduced to a few scattered cabins. It is supposed to have been built by a company of freemasons, on the site of one of our earliest Anglo-Saxon churches, the burial-place of the brave and unfortunate Ina, or Annas, king of the East Angles, who, after defending his kingdom for nearly as long a period as that of the siege of Troy against the hostile attacks of the warlike King of Mercia, Penda the pagan, was, in the year 655, defeated and slain, with his son, Ferminus, in a bloody battle, which was fought on the adjacent heath of Bulechamp.

The tombs of these royal East Anglian princes are still pointed out in the present edifice, although there is reason to believe that their bones were subsequently removed to the abbey at Bury.

The distance we had to traverse being upwards of three miles, we took the nearest path, and perhaps the pleasantest, through our own paddocks and plantation, and, crossing our neighbour's fields, reached a lane which led us by a picturesque bit of broken ground forming a steep little hill, embowered with fantastic trees and hawthorn hedgerows, from which the woodbine and brier roses flung their wild garlands almost across our path, into the new road from Blytheburgh to Southwold. We crossed a broad cut from the Blythe by Wolsey bridge, so called in memory of Cardinal Wolsey, who, when no greater than the butcher's son of Ipswich, local tradition tells us narrowly escaped drowning, in a rash attempt to ford the muddy waters of the Blythe about a furlong higher, and out of gratitude for his deliverance made a vow if ever he became a rich man to build a bridge there, for the safety of other travellers.

Being reminded of his promise after he became Henry the Eighth's prime minister, he caused the first bridge, which bore his name, to be erected. This votive bridge was unfortunately demolished about a hundred years ago, and replaced by the present modern structure, when the late Sir John Roues made the sluice.

After crossing Wolsey bridge, our road was shaded on one side by the rich woods of Henham, and to the left we had an expanse of salt marshes, bounded by the German ocean, with Southwold Walberswick and the remains of the ancient city of Dunwich in the distance.

"(Oft gazing on thy craggy brow,
We muse on glories gone;
Fair Dunwich, thou art lowly now,
Deserted, drear, and lone.

Unlike when ruled by Saxon powers,
Thou sat'st in ancient pride,
With fanes, and palaces, and towers,
Reflected in the tide.

The stately city greets no more
The home returning bark;
Sad relic of her splendours o'er,
One crumbling spire we mark."

As one of the earliest seats of the Christian Church in England, where St. Felix the Burgundian missionary first planted the cross, and often preaching, with unbounded success, the civilizing truths of the Gospel, in the heathen district of East Anglia, fixed his metropolitan episcopal see in the year 630, Dunwich must ever be regarded as a spot of the deepest interest, even in the midst of the desolation which now surrounds that ancient metropolis of our East Anglian kings. Dunwich could once boast of fifty-two churches and religious houses, a mint, brazen gates, and impregnable walls with defences which were so formidable in the twelfth century, that when Robert earl of Leicester, and his rebel host, who took part with the young king Henry against his royal father Henry II, and intended to have possessed himself of Dunwich, "came near and beheld the strength thereof, it was," says the ancient MS. record, "terror and fear unto him to behold it, and so retired both he and his people."

Dunwich was however destined to fall, but not by human power: of her it might truly be said, "Unless the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Her strong defences have been laid low; her port, her quays, and crowded marts of merchandise, her churches, palaces, and populous streets, have all been swept away by the devouring waves of the German ocean, and her name is scarcely mentioned by any one but antiquarians or the mariners of our perilous eastern coast. Leaving old Dunwich to the left and the fair woods of Henham behind, we descended into the marshy valley of that doleful looking stream strangely misnamed the Blythe, which we crossed by an ill-built narrow bridge, and proceeded to the dwelling of the parish clerk. He was not at home, but his daughter, a garrulous spinster of sixty, volunteered to act as his substitute; assuring us, in that pathetic intonation for which our East Anglian peasantry are noted, that "she would do quite as well if not better than father, who was getting kind of duzzy, being turned of his eighty, and apt to forget his self, specially in time of service. It's a sore pity," added she, "that our master," meaning the clergyman, "won't let me clerk for him, as I knows the whole of it by heart. Howsomever I'll do my possibles for you young ladies, and that 'ere old gentleman, to make you all sensible about our church affairs, if you'll only be pleased to attend to me;"—with these words she detached a huge key, at least half a foot long, from the hook behind the cupboard door, and led the way to the church. To make the most of her time, she obliged us with as much of her own biography as she could detail while we were traversing her little garden, and crossing the stile into the churchyard, where, before she would admit us into the sacred edifice, she took us to see an object of much greater interest to herself, the grave of her first, last, and only love, "who died forty years ago," she said, "the very day their sib-right," the ancient provincial synonyme for banns, "was out-asked; and this," continued she, "was the beginning of my misfortunes, for since then I have had all the afflictions the flesh of man is heir to laid on me, for I am lame, deaf, and dumb."

"Surely not dumb, my good woman," interrupted our antiquarian cousin, who had been a little impatient of her volubility.

"Why not exactly speechless, Sir," rejoined she, "but almost as bad; 'cause you see, Sir, when I gets into a muddle with people breaking into my discourse, I always takes to stammering."

"Well then, be so good as to admit us into the church before your tongue gets out of order with talking so much about your own concerns," said he, smiling.

"Sir, I defy you," she fiercely retorted; "I always minds my own business, and have tongue enough for the whole parish."

"So it appears," was the dry rejoinder.

"I would scorn to be talked down by any man in England," retorted mistress Phæbe Penn, for so, to avoid inconvenient personality, I will call the dumb deaconess of Blytheburgh.

The antiquarian bachelor perceived the expediency of allowing his female antagonist to have the last word, which, like one of the bellicose parties in a duel firing his pistol in the air, had the effect of putting an end to the combat. Mrs. Phæbe had the church key in her hand, so that, if not invested with the supposed infallibility of a successor of St. Peter, she possessed, at least, the power of admitting or excluding us according to her own discretion. Moved however by her hope of reaping a small pecuniary benefit as a compensation for her trouble, as well as the certainty of enjoying the opportunity of holding forth ad libitum on her own ground, she was only too happy to request us to enter.

The pause of silent admiration in which on our first entrance we contemplated the solemn grandeur of this stately relic of a departed age, was too quickly invaded by our garrulous conductor, who snatching the church broom from behind the door, pointed with it to the double row of decapitated angels, which spread their wings from the arches of the central aisle across the lofty roof, and exclaimed, "There, Sir, what do you think of that? This is all the doings of them wicked Romans." "The Romans!" exclaimed my antiquarian cousin in amaze, "you are dreaming, my good woman."

"And ain't, Sir," replied Mrs. Phœbe briskly; "do you pretend to know more about father's church than I do what sweeps it out every Saturday afternoon, and scrubs it out on my own blessed knees the week afore Easter, besides waiting on the people what whitewashes it?"

"My good woman, this church was not built in the time of the Romans. They came over, you know, with Julius Cæsar."

"Yes, that they did, like a set of locusts, under that wicked pope you speaks of, who turned his mad bulls upon all the good Christians who hadn't the mark of his beasts," cried Mrs. Phœbe with great vivacity; "and they do say he was the man of sin that did all this mischief."

Our Suffolk peasantry invariably term the members of the Church of Rome, Romans; and if by any chance mention is made of the invasion of this island by Julius Cæsar, they fancy, like Mrs. Phœbe, that he was one of the most terrible of persecuting popes, and a great ally of bloody Queen Mary. Romanism is indeed so completely obsolete on the eastern coast of Suffolk, that, unless its memory were occasionally revived and enmity excited on the subject by a warning voice from the pulpit, its very existence would be forgotten. Mrs. Phœbe had heard in various sermons "that a superstitious veneration for the images of saints and angels was among the abuses practised by the Roman Catholic founders of our ancient ecclesiastical structures; and also, that they had done a great deal of mischief in the Church of God." Now the words "veneration" and "founders" not being included in the very limited mental vocabulary of either the unlettered clerk of Blytheburgh or his daughter, they did not form a very clear comprehension of the precise meaning of those denunciations; but came to the conclusion that the mischievous propensities of "them wicked Romans," had been more especially manifested by mutilating the venerable ornaments and imagery of Blytheburgh church.

Then she took up her lamentation for the destruction of the beautiful Scripture pictures, which she assured us "had once been painted, in all the colours of the rainbow, on the glass windows, before the time of the Romans, who had broken them all out of envy, because children liked to go to church to look at them, and they kept a sort of poor folks from going to sleep, when the sermon was too fine for them to understand."

As a verification of her assertion touching the existence of such illuminations, she pointed out, here and there, a small pictured-pane, in the higher compartments of the windows, which had escaped the vigilance of Master Will Dowsing and his coadjutors, in the work of destruction to which they were licensed by the Roundhead Parliament in the year 1643.

When Mistress Phœbe, who, as the parish clerk's daughter, and the weekly sweeper and cleanser of the church, regarded herself as one of the guardian angels of the holy fane, had exhausted her maledictions against the parties to whom she attributed the mutilation of the imagery and painted glass, our antiquarian cousin diverted her eloquence to another subject, by inquiring "if there were not an ancient king supposed to have been buried in Blytheburgh Church."

"Yes, Sir, that there was," replied she, eagerly; "please to step this way, with the ladies, and you shall see his tomb; not that his bones are there now,—them wicked Romans commed and carted them away when they smashed our windows, and did all the rest of the mischief, in breaking down all the carved work thereof, with axes and hammers, as king David's Psalms say about them."

"And what became of his bones?" we inquired, willing to hear Mrs. Phœbe's version of the translation of the royal Saxon's remains.

"Why, ladies, people do say, and father says he heard it read out of a printed book, that they buried them and his son-in-law's bones too, under the gallows at Tyburn. True as I am alive, though you are all laughing, young ladies, it was no joke to do such a thing as that. I declare it was a bommabel shame. Howsomever, here be the empty grave."

"And who killed this poor old king you are talking of?" inquired our cousin, who began to enter into the mirth which Mrs. Phœbe's blunders created.

"It was a very wicked pagan, who called hissself king Crummell, what cut off this good king's head, and then got the upper hand of every thing, and laid a tax on malt on purpose to put a stop to we poor people brewing good beer for ourselves, for he was no better than an old broken-down brewer, as I have heard."

Here, then, was another instance of the confusion produced in the mind of an illiterate person by the associations connected with a string of historical names and events, which she had acquired by hearsay.

The name of Cromwell has always been abhorrent to the great body of the people of England; and with reason. Several years of misery were entailed on the poor by the rapacity of Thomas Cromwell, after his diplomatic talents had elevated him from the blacksmith's forge to the office of prime minister to Henry VIII. Popular error has undoubtedly transferred to Oliver Cromwell the reproach of some of the evil deeds of Thomas Cromwell, especially the wanton mischief which was perpetrated by the agents of that personage when vicar-general, to our noble ecclesiastical structures. Mrs. Phœbe Fenn did more; for she confounded him with the ancient enemy of Blytheburgh, Penda the pagan, whose name she had forgotten. "But no matter for that," she said, when our good cousin endeavoured to set her right. "That 'ere Penda lived too long ago for people to know or care anything about his doings. She was sure it was that Crummell who had done all the mischief to the king, the church, and the poor, and none other, and that she would maintain."

A genuine descendant of the stout East Anglian Saxons, who had so obstinately defended their hearths and altars against the superior force and abler tactics of the warlike Mercian invaders, it was all lost labour to argue with Mrs. Phoebe; she had the hereditary organ of combativeness, and what she said, that she would maintain against all opposers. She fancied withal, not that we wanted to set her right on the subject of her Cromwellian blunders, but that we were disposed to justify his evil deeds.

"But my good woman," expostulated my antiquarian cousin,—who, though as much amused as we were at her confusion of persons, could not refrain from correcting her discrepancies in dates,—“you are not aware that Penda the pagan flourished a thousand years ago, whereas Cromwell has not been dead two hundred years.”

"Sir," replied she emphatically, "my grandfather, who lived to be ninety years old, said his grandfather could remember him, and he have often told us, that we had peace and plenty before Crummell's time, and we have never had good times since, for he was the first that ever taxed the poor."

"It was never well seen in England, when men of low degree bare rule," was the pithy complaint of the disaffected multitude, who, goaded by their miseries, directed an insurrectionary movement against the domestic oppression of a previous Cromwell—the Cromwell of the 16th century. Assuredly the people had little cause to change their opinion when under the iron despotism of the brewer of Huntingdon. A glance at the Statute Book of the Commonwealth and Protectorate would do much to correct the delusion of those who fondly imagine revolutions either increase the comforts or improve the happiness of the industrious classes.

The imposition of a rigorous excise on articles of general consumption, which was first instituted by Cromwell, fell peculiarly heavy on the industrious classes. Of these the malt tax continues to be regarded as a serious grievance. The sovereigns of this country, if occasionally at issue with peers and senators, have always been kindly disposed towards that important portion of their subjects whom we emphatically call, the people. It ought for the honour of royalty to be remembered, that not one of our monarchs prior to the days of the selfish democracy strangely misnamed the Commonwealth, ever thought of imposing a tax on the necessities of life. It was a quondam brewer who was the cause of depriving the honest men who sow and mow the barley, of the solace of the national beverage it produces,—a deprivation for which nothing else can compensate our peasants.

THE MERRY DAYS OF ENGLAND.¹

There were merry days in England,
In cottage and in hall,
When Sir John Barleycorn was free
And paid no tax at all;
When Sir John Barleycorn was free
We'd neither want nor woe;
For he fill'd each manly heart with glee,
And cheer'd both high and low.

We'd have merry days in England,
In spite of care and toil,
If Sir John Barleycorn were free
For the men who till the soil;
When Sir John Barleycorn was free
Our peasants were content,
Nor envied men of high degree,
Their wealth and proud descent.

There'll be merry days in England,
For the farmer and his man,
When Sir John Barleycorn is free
To fill the earthen can;
When Sir John Barleycorn is free
All British hearts may glow,
Save those who deal in poison'd loe,
For the malt's pure juice shall flow.

After we had concluded our observations on Blytheburgh church, and closed our conference with Mrs. Phoebe in a satisfactory and profitable manner to her, we proceeded to the picturesque ruins of the Holyrood chapel, seated just below the churchyard, where we observed that the structure, though the walls were very thick, was rapidly wasting away, having been originally built of worn-out materials, consisting of fossil remains, the débris of the antediluvian world. We seated ourselves near a row of ivy-mantled arches, on the trunk of a recently felled tree, and having reposed ourselves for a while, to enjoy the beauty of the evening, began to regret that we had omitted to bring that useful adjunct to a pedestrian pilgrimage—a scrip with refreshments, when we saw three sleek cows issuing from a shed in the corner of the green, attended by a flaxen-headed urchin, shouldering a three-legged stool, and marshalling his charge towards a gate leading into the adjoining marsh with his official staff, singing his directions in a monotonous Suffolk ranz de vaches, of which the refrain was "Co-om a—co-om a—co-o-o-m a-a-h, wool ye!" which the cows perfectly understood to mean "Come hither—come hither—come hither, will ye?"

We approached, and inquired if his mistress would sell us some milk.

He suspended his chant, opened a pair of round blue eyes, and replied, in a discouraging tone of surprise:—

"Why, our mistress make cheese!"

This implied that she had no milk to spare out of her small dairy.

"Perhaps she will oblige us by selling a little milk, as we are thirsty, and have walked a long way," suggested I.

"Do," replied the boy, making use of that genuine East-Anglian idiom, which is an abbreviation of "if she do,"—"she 'on't be able to make a proper cheese to-morrow;—Brindy is dry, you know. However, you can ask her, if you like. She is now coming out of the net-house" (neat or cow-house).

"George, why don't you make your manners to them ladies?" said a mild, primitive-looking old woman, who now advanced, with her milk-pail on her arm. George tugged the rough flaxen ringlet that sported over the tip of his nose, and ducked his droll round head in obedience to the admonition. One glance at the kind benevolent face of his mistress convinced us that she would not deny our request, which was communicated in the following laconic terms by George :—

(1) This song has been arranged to an original and very spirited melody by Blewitt, published under the inappropriate title of "Sir John Barleycorn," by T. Purday, St. Paul's Churchyard.

"They 'out to buy some o' to-night's milk, they say."

"You are kindly welcome, ladies, to all you please to drink," she replied. "I will step in, cleanse it, and put it into a gotch" (Suffolk for a red jug).

She returned with a little tray, covered with a snowy napkin, a new brown loaf, a pat of delicious butter, some plates and knives, and two china mugs, into which she poured the milk, and handed to us. What a delicious meal we made in that pleasant spot, rendered more agreeable by the frank hospitality of the kind widow! She was shocked at the offer of money. "No," she said; "her cows made her comfortable, and she could afford to give a pint of milk and a slice of bread and butter, she hoped, to her neighbours, without being any the poorer." She was the widow of a small farmer, and rented enough land to keep three cows, some pigs, and poultry, and was assisted in her work by a little girl whom she trained up to make a good dairy-maid, and the boy George, whom she was endeavouring to civilize, and render a useful member of the village world, beyond which her thoughts had never strayed.

The mania for large farms has nearly eradicated some of the best, the most worthy, and useful members of the community. There are very few persons who have it in their power now-a-days to bestow a cup of milk on weary pilgrims with the frank kindness of our good Blytheburgh widow.

THE "FOURTEENTH."

PASSING one day through the Rue de Lancry, in Paris, my attention was attracted by a large brass plate affixed to the door of one of the houses. It bore the following inscription :—

"AMBROISE FORTIN, FOURTEENTH."

A mysterious profession it seemed to be. "Fourteenth!" I repeated to myself; "what can it mean?" And I walked past the house several times musing on the puzzling inscription, until my curiosity became so ungovernable, that I made up my mind to knock at the door, and seek an introduction to M. Ambroise Fortin.

Once, in the town of Orleans, I had been almost equally mystified by another door-plate bearing the words,—

"JOSEPH SALMON, HONORARY FIREMAN."

But on inquiring I learned, that this title is granted to those firemen who have served a certain number of years, or been invalidated by severe wounds. The "honorary fireman" is entitled to several privileges and immunities, and appears in uniform with his fellow-veterans on all occasions of public ceremony.

But on no hypothesis of this kind could "Fourteenth" be explained; so when the servant, in obedience to my summons, opened the door, no better formula of inquiry occurred to me, than simply to repeat the words interrogatively :—

"MONSIEUR AMBROISE FORTIN, FOURTEENTH?"

"He is at home from six o'clock in the evening till eight," replied the man.

"Is he always Fourteenth?" I asked coolly.

"Oh! certainly, Monsieur, always," said the servant, in the tone of a person who repels some injurious doubt.

That evening at six o'clock, I returned to the house in the Rue de Lancry. The servant conducted me into an apartment scantily furnished, but adorned with three fine engravings, one representing the Feast of Belshazzar, another Camacho's wedding, and the third, the Prodigal Son at a banquet, ere he wandered forth to feed with swine. A side door opened, and I saw enter a very fine young man, elegantly dressed. He was in the act of drawing on a pair of pale kid gloves. Bowing gracefully, he said,

"I am ready, Monsieur, let us set out, let us go to dinner."

I looked at the engravings, and I obeyed almost mechanically, carried away in spite of myself by the fashionable coolness of his tone and manner. As soon as we were outside the door, M. Fortin said, "The weather is beautiful; if we are not going far, we may as well walk. Where are we to dine?"

"At the Café de Paris," said I, at random.

"So much the better," was the reply; "I detest a city ordinary."

I hoped that some explanation would follow, but it did not; and, somehow, I did not like to ask for it directly. I therefore contented myself with humming the opera air, "What may this mystery be?"

As we walked along, M. Fortin asked no questions; he spoke of the tax on dogs, of the scarcity of fish since the opening of the Havre railroad; of a late importation of Cape crabs, at the flower market; of M. d'Aliger's will; of a new painting by Couture; of Dumas' or Balzac's last novel; in short, he discussed all the topics of the day, and that in a very lively, gay, and pleasing manner. I was just beginning to think that the mysterious Fourteenth would turn out to be a newspaper reporter, when we entered the Café de Paris.

"Monsieur," said I, "allow me to congratulate you on your Parisian erudition; you really speak like a walking journal!"

"Ah!" replied he, "in our profession we must know a little of every thing. One could not be a Fourteenth on any other terms."

Entering the first saloon, I selected a table laid with two covers, and asked him to sit down. M. Fortin looked at me with surprise, and said,

"Where will the other guests sit?"

"There are none that I know of but ourselves," replied I, taking my place.

"Only two!" exclaimed he, drawing back, "then there must be some mistake, and I cannot comprehend the object of your invitation."

"The object of every invitation, Monsieur Fortin—the object of eating your dinner."

He condescended to smile, and seated himself opposite to me. The mystery had really become too oppressive, and I boldly sought an explanation, which, in the natural course of things, did not seem likely to arise.

"How," said he, laying down his knife and fork, "did you come to me without knowing my profession? And yet it has begun to make some noise in the fashionable world."

"Well! Monsieur, I can only say that this noise has not reached my ears."

"You are not then acquainted with the invention of the Fourteenth?"

"No, Monsieur Fortin."

"The Fourteenth," said he, solemnly, "supplies a desideratum in our social state. A statistical examination proves that in Paris invitations to dinner are every day given with so little forethought, that in five hundred houses on an average, guests to the fatal number of thirteen find themselves assembled at six o'clock. What is to be done? Something must be conceded to the prejudices of women; for, let their superstitious fears be once awakened, and adieu to the hilarity of the evening. Well! the Fourteenth is there; always ready to break the ominous number. A knock comes to my door, and I follow whither I am led, without question or delay. For success in this profession, it is necessary, however, that the Fourteenth should be talkative and amusing, a judge both of wine and wit, ready to take the first and to give the second. At present in Paris there are but five Fourteenths; yet I feel certain our numbers will increase rapidly."

After this satisfactory explanation, M. Fortin and I enjoyed as pleasant an evening as though we had really been fourteen. At parting I made him promise that he would often share and enliven my bachelor's dinner, in his own independent personality, and not as a mere supplementary unit.

A NIGHT AND DAY IN VENICE.

THE author of "Childe Harold" has finely described the feelings with which he first beheld Venice:—

"I loved her from my boyhood; she to me
Was as a fairy city of the heart
Rising like water columns from the sea,
Of joy the sojourn, and of wealth the mart;
And Otway, Radcliffe, Schiller, Shakspeare's art,
Had stamped her image in me."

All travellers of any poetical sensibility are similarly affected. Beckford tells us that his heart beat quick when, crossing the mountains, he first saw the dim plains expanding towards the city of his fancy, and breathed the luxury of the soft Italian clime. Mrs. Jameson exclaims, "I feel, while I gaze around me, as if I had seen Venice in my dreams—as if it were itself the vision of a dream. We have been here two days, and I have not yet recovered from my first surprise. All is yet enchantment, all is novel, extraordinary, affecting, from the many associations and remembrances excited in the mind. Pleasure and wonder are tinged with a melancholy interest, and while the imagination is excited, the spirits are depressed." These enthusiastic expressions must not be taken as the common-place affectation of sentiment at a hackneyed scene which we feel called upon to praise. They are real and genuine, and such as the sight of the same objects must call forth in any one at all gifted to appreciate them.

This glorious city in the sea, as it is, or rather was called by Rogers, is now joined to the mainland by an embankment stretching across the shallow lagunes; and where the silent gondola once kept up the communication, the train now thunders across the watery level—useful, indeed, but sadly searing away much of the poetry and romance that hung over Venice, from its unique singularity of site. I thank my stars that I saw Venice before the universal establishment of the reign of steam. No moonlight was ever brighter than that which shone upon the banks of the Brenta as the carriage rolled on from Padua towards the Adriatic. The villas in the Palladian taste, with their antiquated style of gardens, their groves decorated with statues and vases, succeeded each other like the fantastic scenes of the theatre. The distant hills were softly seen through the haze of night, some in shadow, others whitened by the moon. The duldest imagination must have called up the magical creations of Shakspeare, for here was the very scene and hour of his well-known description of the garden at Belmont. The lovely Portia, and her noble lover, with all the characters of his delicious drama, seemed real and living; for, as Leigh Hunt finely says, "the mind hardly separates truth from fiction in thinking of such objects, nor does it wish to do so. Fiction is truth in another shape, and gives as close embraces. What we glow at, and shed tears over, is as real as love and pity."

The sea breeze blew up fresh and salt as we neared the Adriatic gulf, and saw before us the white buildings of the small port, where we were to embark for Venice. There was a crowd of gondolas in readiness; and with a feeling half strange and half familiar we leapt into one of these far-famed barks. Byron has described them to the very letter, as—

"Just like a coffin clapt in a canoe;
Where none can make out what you say or do."

This mixture of familiarity and strangeness, of which most travellers are conscious in viewing Venice and everything about her, carries with it a peculiar charm. For who has not seen innumerable paintings and engravings of every object of interest within her confines?—the pictures by Canaletti, of St. Mark's Place, and the Rialto, and canal scenes by the thousand, all true and exact to a touch, even to the very greenish colour and ripple of the water; besides the more brilliant, but less faithful, works of Prout, and the fantastic and gorgeous idealities of Turner; (which, in spite of the authority of the "Oxford Graduate," we must maintain, beautiful as they are, to be about as unlike the actual Venice as possible.) Who knows not the beautiful lines of Byron and of Rogers? Who has not read, moreover, the inimitable sketches of Beckford, and many a graphic description of this unique city? Prepared with all this, there is much that seems to us familiar. We recognise at a glance the prominent objects as old acquaintances; and infinitely delightful it is thus to find them go so far beyond rather than fall short of our anticipations! But how much is there for which no previous picture or description can prepare the mind! The ensemble, the grouping of these different parts, is something altogether new; they assume a different aspect, and produce a more vivid impression, when seen combined or contrasted with one another. All this is in store for those who are privileged to witness the actual scene.

To return to my narrative. I waited impatiently for the moment when the embarkation of our party should be completed, and the gondolier push out into the open sea. The salt breeze was fresh and invigorating, but scarcely did more than stir the surface of the shallow lagoon and break it into a ripple, against which the sharp prow of the gondola, as it was propelled by the plashing oar of the gondolier, broke drowsily, casting aside a long trail silvered by the glittering moonbeams. There was a strange magic in our movement, as we glided almost noiselessly across the lagoon. A slight haze rested upon the farther extremity of the waters, and straining my eyes impatiently, I could just discern the towers of Venice rising dimly here and there, touched by the light of the moon. As we approached, they gradually came out bolder and brighter, and we were able vaguely to make out the general outline of the city, as it rose, like a vision, from the sleeping waters. With a feeling quite indescribable I found myself gliding into this city of a dream, without gate or barrier—by an avenue of that same salt water, the expanse of which we had just traversed. Pushing the gondola into the mouth of the Grand Canal, we were at once in Venice. And never shall I forget the glorious night on which I first threaded its long winding avenues of palaces and churches.

It was past the hour when even the latest revelers are abroad, and the still waters of the canal were unbroken by any sound but the monotonous plash of our oars. The moonlight "slept" upon one range of the piles which line its margin, and the effect of the light upon the infinitely varied and often fantastic buildings,—the magnificent Palladian palaces of Sansovino, and the Moresco-Gothic façades of others, appearing in long and spectral succession as we slowly advanced along the canal,—was beautiful beyond all power of description. At length we reached the bridge of the Rialto; and shot under the deep shadow of its broad and singular arch, with a feeling almost of awe. Branching off from the Grand Canal, appeared at intervals the openings of the thousand narrower ones which circulate in endless mazes through the city. The perspective down some of these watery avenues was inimitable, and suggestive of many a romantic adventure. They are sunk between lofty marble piles, the doors of which open at once upon the waters of the canal, which slumber in the blackest shadow; the small bridges which span them here and there, with the angle of some storied palace, catching the moonbeams, glittered in the most dazzling contrast. Not far above the Rialto, we passed the Mocenigo palace, formerly occupied by Lord Byron, basking in the light of the moon, which faintly gleamed over the vast and dilapidated pile of the Palazzo Foscari, nearly opposite; a magnificent specimen of the Moresco-Gothic, but presenting an appearance so strangely desolate and ominously mournful, that the mind, even before informed of the sad histories that belong to it, involuntarily associates it with something dark and tragical—a circumstance which might not improbably have suggested to Lord Byron to write the tragedy in which he has immortalized the woes of the unhappy family. Not far from hence, our gondola, leaving the main avenue, shot into a narrow canal, between two ranges of palace walls, dark and silent beyond anything we can imagine in the heart of a city, and after some turnings and windings, arrived at the water-steps of our hotel.

On stepping forth next morning, a few steps brought me into the celebrated Piazza San Marco; a large square surrounded with buildings, which, together with the adjacent Piazzetta, is the only terra firma of any extent in this marine city.

Beckford may well observe that "a more noble assemblage was never presented by architecture." At one extremity is the church of St. Mark, and the three other sides are occupied by majestic ranges of buildings, the most conspicuous being the stately façade of the "Procuratie Nuove," which forms one side of the square, and presents an uninterrupted series of arcades below and columnar designs above. At one angle, near St. Mark's Church, rises the lofty Campanile, which towers abrupt from the pavement of the great square to a stupendous height, overlooking the whole maze of canals and islands comprised in Venice. "The design," says Beckford, "is barbarous; yet in spite of these defects, it strikes one with awe."

From the summit of this Campanile, where the "starry Galileo" used to hold commerce with the heavens, and to which Byron would sometimes ascend to catch the fresh sea-breeze and enjoy the prospect, is a most magnificent view over Venice and its environs. Here one looks down upon the Piazza, with the "busy fry" of its restless population, and the fantastic oriental dome of St. Mark's, and upon the Grand Canal, bordered with Palladian churches, and animated by its crowd of fitting gondolas. The insulated position of this "glorious city in the sea" is understood at a glance ; but it is only here and there that one catches sight of any of the innumerable canals which circulate like veins among the tall piles of palaces, and towers, and churches, by which they are concealed from above. The islands in the vicinity—to which the Romans fled from the main land, to avoid the rapine of Attila—once so beautiful, but now so dreary, peep up at intervals amidst the blue lagunes. Italy is beheld on one hand, the Adriatic expands on the other, and the channel leading to it, by which the war-galleys of the famous Republic issued forth to conquest or returned in triumph ; the Alps of Friuli close in the glorious view. Descending from this aerial post we enter St. Mark's Church, one of the most venerable and curious monuments of Christendom ; exhibiting a mixture of the Greek and Saracenic styles. Its portals are deep and curiously enriched, and it is surmounted by some singularly shaped domes, which, contrasted with the regular forms of the square and tower, have an almost magical effect. "Venice," as another traveller well remarks, "is the proper region of the fantastic ;" and the singularity of its architecture, with its tinge of orientalism, seems to place it on the confines of Europe and Asia, and call up a whole catalogue of romantic histories of the crusading and middle ages. The shops and coffee-houses under the arcades of this immense piazza, are the haunts of all sorts of loungers ; and here the stately, dreamy Turk, the gay and more volatile Greek, mingle with the curious dresses of the Adriatic provincials, and costumes and physiognomies from all parts of Europe. St. Mark's Place has been the scene of almost every stirring event connected with Venetian history. "I envied," says Beckford, "the good fortune of Petrarch, who describes, in one of his letters, a tournament held in this princely opening. Many are the festivals," he continues, "which have been here celebrated. When Henry III. left Poland to mount the throne of France, he passed through Venice, and found the Senate waiting to receive him in their famous square ; which, by means of an awning stretched from the balustrades of opposite palaces, was metamorphosed into a vast saloon, sparkling with artificial stars, and spread with the superb carpets of the East. What a magnificent idea ! The ancient Romans, in the zenith of power and luxury, never conceived a greater."

On entering the portals of St. Mark's, we fully appreciate all the peculiarities of the Byzantine architecture ; its numerous and costly shrines and swelling domes, enriched with a surface of gold, in which seem to float whole legions of saints and angels, as in a halo of glory. Talk as we will of the barbarity of taste of the Lower Empire, there is something infinitely poetic in the interior of this celebrated fane, which boasts the spoils of Constantinople, many of its choicest curiosities having been carried thence by the Latins when they wrested the city from the Greek Emperors ; of which exploit there is a curious ancient painting in the Ducal Palace. Emerging from the rich and solemn gloom of this venerable edifice, we catch sight of the Grand Canal, with its multiform life and movement, beyond a perspective of the Moresco-Gothic arches of the Ducal Palace on the one hand, and a Palladian range of arches on the other ; and, when at length we reach the marble steps, and look out over the broad expanse of the Canal, here opening into a sea-port, the scene is one that can never pass from the recollection of the spectator. The fresh green sea, "ebbing and flowing," dashes freely against the marble steps. The picturesque red-and-white façade of the Ducal Palace ranges majestically along the bluish green water, on which crowds of black gondolas are passing to and fro. On the opposite side of the canal are the splendid church of the Palladio, the noble portal of the Custom House, and a crowd of other objects, from one to the other of which the eye wanders in a sort of fascination, unable to embrace all the details, or to drink in the full effect of the whole. It is, besides, all stamped with history and poetry, and every object thus carries with it a twofold magic to the eye and memory.

Entering the court of the Ducal Palace, which offers the same mingling of Oriental and European architecture, we reach the foot of a magnificent flight of steps, leading to the interior of the building. The colossal statues of Mars and Neptune guard the entrance above, and confer upon the ascending marble staircase the appellation of "The Giants' Steps." Within are cloisters and corridors, conducting into the state apartments, which astonish us by their immense extent and their faded magnificence. The compartments of the heavily enriched ceilings are covered with the works of Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese ; and along the walls are ranged a series of historical pictures, representing the exploits of different doges. The place of the portrait of Marino Faliero is covered with black ; a circumstance which, as Byron informs us, particularly affected him, and, doubtless, set his imagination at work to produce a drama on the history of this unfortunate prince.

From these splendid and stately rooms, the scene of the ancient glories of the republic, we pass into the narrow cells in which prisoners of state were formerly confined ; these communicated, by the covered stone "Bridge of Sighs," which spans a narrow canal, with the deeper dungeons of the Fondamenti Nuove. Here we have thus, as Byron describes it, "a palace and a prison on each hand." These submarine dungeons have now ceased to echo to the groan of the tortured captive, under the old Inquisitorial tyranny of the "Council of Ten." This had ceased to exist in Byron's time ; but Beckford, who travelled half a century earlier, found all these horrors yet in existence. "This is the tribunal," he exclaims, "which holds the wealthy nobility in continual awe ; before which they appear with trembling and terror, and whose summons they dare not disobey. Sometimes, by way of clemency, it condemns its victims to perpetual imprisonment in close stifling cells between the leads and beams of the palace ; or, unwilling to spill the blood of a fellow-citizen, generously sinks them into dungeons, deep under the canals which wash its foundations; so that, above and below, its majesty is contaminated by the abodes of punishment. What other sovereign could endure the idea of having his immediate residence polluted with tears—or revel in his halls, conscious that many of his species were consuming their hours in lamentations above his head, and that a few beams separated him from the scene of their tortures? However gaily disposed, could one dance with pleasure on a pavement beneath which lie damp and gloomy caverns, whose inhabitants waste away by painful degrees, and feel themselves whole years a-dying? Impressed by these terrible ideas, I could not regard the palace without horror, and wished for the strength of a thousand antediluvians, to level it with the sea, lay open the secret recesses of punishment, and admit free gales and sunshine into every den." The latter clauses of this indignant wish have happily been fulfilled, but the palace yet stands a gorgeous but gloomy monument of the dark and dreadful scenes which have stained the pages of Venetian history.

CURIOSITIES OF SCIENCE.

POISONED WATER.

IN 1849, Louis Philippe, and his family, narrowly escaped death by being poisoned with the water conveyed in leaden pipes to the palace of Claremont, in Surrey, at which the ex-royal family of France were then sojourning. Dr. Thomson, of Stratford-upon-Avon, analyzed a pint of this poisoned water, and found it to contain one-tenth of a grain of sulphuret of lead. In other respects, the water was good and pure. It will be recollected that the Princess Charlotte died at Claremont in 1817, under circumstances not hitherto satisfactorily explained; and Dr. Thomson appends to his analysis this "historic doubt:" how long the insidious source of disease and suffering has existed, and who and how many of those who have inhabited this royal residence have been the victims of it, are questions of deep interest, and calculated to awaken suspicions with reference to one whose memory is associated with the name of Claremont, and the immediate cause of whose premature death neither the symptoms preceding it, nor the post mortem appearances, seemed sufficiently to account for.

"THE HARVEST MOON."

Persons who maintain this moon always to appear in harvest, display profound ignorance of the fixed and unalterable laws on which the phenomenon depends; for the time of harvest frequently commences in Kent before the corn is in the ear in Dumfriesshire; and, under such circumstances, we should have, at the least, two moons within the circumscribed limits of the British Isles. The settled rule is this:—in northern latitudes, the harvest moon is the full moon at or near the time of the autumnal equinox; and in consequence of her orbit being nearly parallel to the horizon, there is but a slight variation in her times of rising for several consecutive nights; and as this particular rising can only happen when the moon is in Pisces or Aries, the sun must necessarily be either in Virgo or Libra, and these signs answer to the months of September and October.

TO SPLIT PAPER.

Procure two rollers or cylinders of glass or amber, resin, or metallic amalgam; strongly excite them by the well known means, so as to produce the attraction of cohesion, and then with pressure pass the paper between the rollers. One half will adhere to the under roller, and the other to the upper roller, and the split will be perfect. Then cease the excitation, and remove each part.—Civil Engineer and Architect's Journal.

[POLISH CALCULATING MACHINE.

Some years since, Stern, a Polish Jew, invented a machine, of which he had a model, by which he worked out the first four books of arithmetic, and the rule of three; extracted the square roots, showing the fractions completely reduced, and gave all the logarithmic calculations. With a key, the figures of a problem were set, and afterwards, by turning a small crank, in a few seconds, or if the proposition was long and complicated, in one or two minutes, the product was obtained, which would have been arduous to an accomplished arithmetician.

PETROLEUM LIGHT.

A brilliant light may be produced from a kind of petroleum. From 130 to 150 gallons of this substance are daily collected at Ridding in Derbyshire. By distillation, it yields five per cent. of paraffine, (mineral tallow,) and eighty per cent. of mineral oil. This oil is worth about 4s. per gallon, and when burnt in a common Argand lamp, gives the light of seven candles, at the cost of three-eighths of a penny per hour.

LAND-SHELLS OF THE PACIFIC.

One of the great results shown by the naturalists of the United States Exploring Expedition is, that the land-shells of the Islands in the Pacific Ocean are entirely different in different islands, each island appearing to have a species of shell peculiar to its own formation. These shells could not have been derived from the continent, but must have originated in the respective islands where they are found.

SINGING SHELLS.

Mr. Taylor, when at Bathcaldia, in Ceylon, on going at night on a lake near the fort, was struck by a loud musical noise proceeding from the bottom of the water. It was caused by multitudes of some animal inhabiting shells—at least the natives call them "singing shells." The sounds are like those of an accordeon, or Æolian harp, guitar, &c., vibrating notes, and pitched in different keys. A snail, abundant in Corfu, if irritated by a touch with a piece of straw, will emit a distinctly audible sound in a querulous tone, and this it frequently repeats if freshly touched.

Reviews.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

LET none of our readers infer from the heading of this article that we have forgotten the character of our Magazine, and are bent on trespassing ourselves, and inviting them to follow us, into the ground occupied by the numberless theological periodicals of the day. We hasten to assure them, that we entertain no such intentions; but, instead thereof, are simply desirous of expressing our welcome to the first part of a work that promises to be most excellent; and of showing why we regard this subject as one that deserves warm and serious attention; and this particular treatise, in its plan, and in its performance, (as far as one number enables us to judge,) worthy of its subject.

We are not unwilling to distinguish this Journal from some of its contemporaries, that, infected by the cant of the day, pretend to have climbed to heights of wisdom, whence they look down with sublime calmness on all that the best of men have held to be most sacred, and speak of that which is ineffably holy with a philosophic indifference that would provoke our derision, did we not perceive the baneful effects of such unbecoming familiarity upon those who speak, and upon those who hear and believe, too. This biography seems to us to be an admirable medicament for this disease of the times. Any graphic sketch of such a life as that of the great Apostle of the Gentiles might convict many that have been caught by the fine-sounding words used by our would-be Philosophers,—our Philosophers (bare of wisdom, not lovers of it), as they should rather be called;—it might convict them of the want of wisdom they have shown in being so deluded, by the mere genuineness of the beauty and grandeur it depicted, and lead them to better teachers. From the perusal—or study, rather—of such a life of St. Paul as this before us, however,—one that undertakes to set us, as far as illustration of every kind can avail, in the midst of the very scenes and times in which the Apostle lived and laboured; and to picture him, not merely as history and tradition have represented him to us, but also, as his own still living words portray him,—we can but anticipate the happiest results.

Our authors open their first chapter thus:—

"The life of a great man, in a great period of the world's history, is a subject to command the attention of every thoughtful mind. Alexander on his Eastern expedition, spreading the civilization of Greece over the Asiatic and African shores of the Mediterranean Sea,—Julius Cæsar contending against the Gauls, and subduing the barbarism of Western Europe to the order and discipline of Roman government,—Charlemagne compressing the separating atoms of the feudal world, and reviving for a time the image of imperial unity,—Columbus sailing westward over the Atlantic, to discover a new world, which might receive the arts and religion of the old,—Napoleon on his rapid campaigns, shattering the ancient system of European states, and leaving a chasm between our present and the past;—these are the colossal figures of history, which stamp with the impress of their personal greatness the centuries in which they lived.

"The interest with which we look upon such men is natural and inevitable, even when we are deeply conscious that, in their character and their work, evil was mixed up in large proportions with the good, and when we find it difficult to discover the providential design which drew the features of their respective epochs. But this natural feeling rises into something higher if we can be assured that the period we contemplate was designedly prepared for great results, that the work we admire was a work of unmixed good, and the man whose actions we follow was an instrument specially prepared by the hands of God. Such a period was that in which the civilized world was united under the first Roman emperors; such a work was the first preaching of the Gospel; and such a man was Paul of Tarsus."

All this is most true; but it is not the only view that we may take of this subject. "The history of the world is the biography of great men;" but these "great men, taken up in any way, are profitable company." Without any effort, we grow like the characters we admire. Old age yields to the influence of this plastic force with hardly less pliancy than youth itself. And misplaced admiration of mere "remarkable" men, to the neglect of the great men that "—have been among us; hands that penn'd

And tongues that utter'd wisdom—better none,"—has dwarfed whole generations. Wordsworth's magnificent invocation of Milton, and sorrowful complaint over England, had never been uttered, had we remembered

"The late Sidney, Marvel, Harrington,
Young Vane, and others, who call'd Milton, friend.
These moralists could act and comprehend:
They knew how genuine glory was put on;
Taught us how rightfully a nation shone
In splendour: what strength was, that would not bend
But in magnanimous meekness"

It would be a great thing could we inspire those who are now just springing up into manhood with the belief of what Longfellow has sung in his "Psalm of Life:"—

"Lives of great men all remind us
We may make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time;—
Footprints that, perhaps, another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwreck'd brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again."

But it would be even a greater thing if these,—the hope of the coming age, the true "movement party" of humanity at large,—should, out of this timely publication, learn to look upon Paul, the tent-maker, the apostle, as one of the very first of the world's true heroes. And such he was, if ever there was a hero, a great man at all. His whole soul taken up with one great purpose—a purpose so great that it expanded his soul as it filled it, and occupied it ever more completely as it expanded,—he lived only for that, passing over, as all unworthy of his regard, what did not bear upon the end he had set before him, but neglecting nothing, however trivial, that could help him to attain that end, and seeing before him only "bonds and afflictions," could say, as much by his conduct as by his words, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the gospel of the grace of God."

There is one great advantage in the admiration of a great man of this stamp, which we must not pass by unnoticed. He may serve as a veritable example for men of every age, and of any station. The hero in war, in science, in discovery, invention, letters, or in poesy, can assist but very few to fill up their own place in the world with greatness of heart, and must always, in some degree, inspire those that reverence them with admiration of the means by which each achieved greatness, rather than of the greatness itself. But it is not so with the hero of practical goodness. Every word he speaks, every ray of light he sheds abroad, is heard and is seen by all; and instead of painting the scenery around some other path to glory, with all the splendours of finished fame, makes the commonest duties—nay, mere household drudgery,—appear the very steps by which the purest heights of fame, and the most exalted rewards, may be gained as surely, almost more surely, than they may by those steep and slippery tracks, along which so few have strength and earnestness enough to run in safety; and yet can impart to those called to these rare and difficult undertakings, the clear-seeing and strong-minded resolve, that is the best augury and most certain pledge of success.

Admiration for true greatness may thus prove a source of daily solace and might to any and to all that are toiling in the obscure walks of life; and invest any and every pursuit, that is not in itself unworthy of man, with all the attractiveness and charm that is commonly regarded as pertaining to the few occupations, the din of which, or the splendour of which, makes itself seen and heard of the whole world.

But we must add a few words respecting the aspect of great men, so eloquently described in the passage we have quoted from the work before us. Those "colossal figures," whose undying glory has made them "landmarks in the world's history," are the exponents of the ages in which they lived. Not that they were the creatures of their times; much rather might they be regarded as the creators of what are for us the prominent features of them. But in the general plan and outline which we, each for himself, form of the history of the world, such names as these stand out as the representatives of their epochs; and we read in what these men were and accomplished, the part taken by each epoch in the growth and advancement of the entire race. Yet no one can glance merely at the long muster-roll of the heroes of this world's Walhalla, without seeing great differences of rank and eminence, arising chiefly out of the different significance of the names. One represents a passing phase in the history of some one state; another, a long-enduring empire: one stands for a bold protest against some tyrannical wrong against the hearts or lives of men; another, as the founder of a system of thought or of law, that for centuries determined the destinies of mankind: one is inserted because he achieved the deliverance of his country, by the unaided might of his own right-hand; another, because, as an almost universal conqueror, he swept away an old and effete age, and heralded the advent of a new and nobler era. Now, these differences must, of necessity, affect those who admire their greatness, and are filled with no ignoble longing after it. The significance of the name of the hero we have chosen must tell upon the character which we may work out, through our love for him.

It is therefore not a small matter to have chosen well in this respect. And now we challenge one of the highest places in worth and honour for the apostle Paul. He arose at a period when "the Jew, the Greek, and the Roman appeared to divide the world between them." Our authors well say; "The outward condition of Jerusalem itself, at this epoch, might be taken as a type of the civilized world." And after alluding to various observable particulars in which these three elements were brought into closest proximity in the capital of Judæa, they proceed:—

"The condition of the world in general at that period wears a similar appearance to a Christian's eye. He sees the Greek and Roman elements brought into remarkable union with the older and more sacred element of Judaism. He sees in the Hebrew nation a divinely-laid foundation for the superstructure of the Church, and in the dispersion of the Jews a soil made ready in filling places for the seed of the Gospel. He sees in the spread of the language and commerce of the Greeks, and in the high perfection of their poetry and philosophy, appropriate means for the rapid communication of Christian ideas, and for bringing them into close connexion with the best thoughts of unassisted humanity. And he sees in the union of so many incoherent provinces under the law and government of Rome, a strong framework which might keep together, for a sufficient period, those masses of social life which the Gospel was intended to pervade. The City of God is built at the confluence of three civilizations."

In a most wonderful way did the Apostle also represent "the confluence of three civilizations," even in the most exterior and circumstantial particulars; for whilst he was a "Hebrew of the Hebrews," he was also, by birth, a free Roman citizen, and a native of the Greek city of Tarsus. We shall not develop this; for it is not so much retrospectively, as prospectively, that we assign so high a rank to St. Paul; and not at all on the ground of mere accidents and circumstances, but of what he was most profoundly, and in which he may be taken as a teacher and a leader.

There can be no question on the part of any one, that the "preaching of the Gospel" effected a real revolution in the earth. Nor can there be any doubt that men in general have apprehended that "Gospel" under very different forms, and in very different degrees of clearness and power, in different ages. Yet, notwithstanding all differences, the "Gospel" has been the ground-tone of all the harmonies, and discords too, of the civilized world, from the time of its first and successful promulgation. Now, he that should embody the Gospel clearly [in his own life, would necessarily be, to a degree, a representative of the root and foundation of all the movement and progress of civilized man since our era; and just in proportion as his apprehension of the Gospel should rise in clearness, and his living embodiment of it approach the majestic beauty of the Great Example, so would he be, in a higher degree, and in a fuller measure, a representative of Christianized mankind. And the position we claim for the apostle Paul is the very highest, in this respect, that we can conceive open for a mere man to fill. Ceaseless contemplation of his life has made men despair of finding another to place beside it as a peer and a companion, amongst the followers in all ages of his Lord;—men who denied the divinity of his message have revered the divinity of the man; and ceaseless study of his writings has developed, by the aid of philology (poor and ineffectual instrument as it seems) alone, ever deeper meaning, ever holier and loftier scope;—and men who have treated the history of Jesus as a myth, have borrowed from St. Paul's letters proofs and illustrations of their own boasted philosophy. But, indeed, on such a subject as this there is no proof that can completely satisfy excepting actual trial. And we predict, without fear of a single gainsayer, that if any one of those we address would fearlessly and nobly dare this, that he would find, after years of patient and humble endeavour, when his own knowledge of these things could be doubted neither by himself nor by any other, that the Apostle stood yet in almost unapproachable grandeur of Christian beauty, in wholly inexhaustible riches of heavenly wisdom and truth.

And thus it is that we rejoice at the appearance of this work, and commend it most heartily to our readers. Respecting its plan, we can only say, that it seems to us to be most carefully constructed. A new and somewhat paraphrastic translation of the Apostle's letters will do much to exhibit all the most secret and beautiful traits of his character; a review of all the various features of the world as it then was, will prepare us for appreciating the boldness of the man who dared determine on such a course as his; and a similar review of the different circumstances that surrounded his apostolic journeys, and enhanced the difficulties of his sacred mission, will aid us in feeling what undaunted courage and unshrinking earnestness sustained him to the end. Maps, charts, wood-engravings of coins, sculptures, and of every thing that can elucidate the state of the then world, are promised and given copiously. And in addition to these attractions of scholarship and literature, we have accurate sketches, taken on the spot, which have been so admirably engraved, that we hardly feel the need of colour to enable us to realize the scenes of a climate so different from our own. In typography and general appearance it is all that the most fastidious could desire, and would be amply worth its price to any one who desires to spend the money he has to spare for books wisely and well.

As this is but the introduction of a first part to our readers, we postpone much that we desire to add till the publication of subsequent parts shall demand further notice of us. And very gladly shall we return to the subject.

Meanwhile, we make one remark upon a reason advanced in the preface for producing a new translation of our Apostle's letters, simply for the sake of awakening some thought respecting a subject of greatest interest and concern, that lies rather apart from the common track of men's thinkings.

Our authors say—"The authorized version was meant to be a standard of authority and ultimate appeal in controversy." And again, in a note—"Had any other course been adopted, every sect would have had its own Bible." Now, we will not yield to any in admiration of the elegance and force, nor in appreciation of the general literal faithfulness of the English authorized version; but we wholly demur to the proposition of making a translation a "standard of authority and ultimate appeal in controversy." This would be to stultify biblical scholarship,—to reject, with some appearance of contempt, the original, which has been so wonderfully preserved to us; and lamely to imitate the unwisest proceeding of the Council of Trent, which made their Vulgate the "ultimate appeal," and for that purpose declared it inspired. And then, as to each sect having its own Bible, so far from seeing any evil in this, we believe it would have led to a more general and more careful study of the original; it would have taken away from infidels their favourite and feeble argument against the Bible, drawn from the diversity of sects quoting as authoritative one and the same volume; and it would wholly have prevented that superstitious regard for our translation, which, in cases we well know, is hardly exceeded by that manifested for the Koran by the negroes of Western Africa.

WE esteem ourselves fortunate in having made the acquaintance of Mrs. Margaret Maitland of Sunnyside. A more amiable old maiden lady it has not been our lot to meet with (in a book) for a long time; much as old maiden ladies in books have been given, of late years, to do the amiable, and outshine the resplendent virtue of "the young and lovely" heroines.

Mrs. Margaret Maitland is an old maid of a somewhat new kind in a novel; she does not seem to the reader like an allegorical personification of all the virtues; but she comes before him as a virtuous person, without anything mythical or allegorical about her. The reader believes in her existence while he reads; because she has actually been created upon the paper. The creative art, in a small way, is clearly visible here. We have a picture so natural, that an unpractised spectator would exclaim, "Here is very little talent in this. It is a faithful copy; almost a fac-simile of nature." The truth being that it is a careful composition, not a copy from nature at all; but a work composed in Nature's own spirit; with a reverent regard to her external laws and modes of working. We do not say that there may not be, here and there, a minute trifle which infinitesimal criticism might point out as inaccurate, in the work, like a strap wanting to the saddle in a fine equestrian statue, or a blade of grass turned the wrong way in some highly prized landscape-painting. Such things do not affect the reality, the living personality of Mrs. Maitland. Being a person, therefore, she speaks to us viva voce, as it were, and not like the dead letter. Quaint, primitive and lowland Scotch is the language in which she addresses the reader; a language which is part of herself; and which the tasteful reader would not change for the most elegant English; since it is clear enough that Mrs. Maitland would not be what she is without it. Whatever forms it may be found necessary to do away with in society, forms of speech cannot be destroyed without serious, if not vital injury to the thought they clothe. Now the dialect in which great part of this book is written, being unfamiliar to the general reader, may cause a charge of affectation to be brought against it. Unjustly, we think. It is true that the authoress could have written in ordinary English, (she gives proof of that in various parts of the book where Mrs. Maitland herself is not the relater of the tale,) but it was part of the authoress's plan to make Mrs. Maitland speak for herself; and Mrs. Maitland of Sunnyside could by no effort of the imagination be made to speak pure English with propriety. Setting the fitness of things aside, altogether, we think the plain, nervous, expressive language of this book has two great charms: it is perfectly intelligible to any intelligent reader, and it has a pleasing freshness and novelty. Also, it has good Saxon elements in it; and is an antidote to the Gallicisms and Teuton-Hellenicisms of the modern English, and can do us no harm, but some good, to read once in a way. Take as a specimen the following first mentioning of herself by the supposed narrator:

"I mind well when I was in years little above a bairn, of lying on the grass in a park near the Manse (for my father had a globe of fine land, the like of which, I have heard, was hardly in the parish), looking at the white clouds sailing upon the sky, and thinking no mortal could be happier if I might but have abode there; but it aye so happened that my seam was lying waiting for me in the Manse parlour, or the unlearned lesson compelled me to go in; and when in the summer nights I had a while to myself, there ever came in something to hinder me of my pleasure; for, either the sky was overcast, or the grass was damp, or my brother Claud drew me into more stirring plays,—it being little in the nature of a blythe boy to bide quiet, and look at the sky. That I could speak of him so! that is a man with grey hair upon his head, and a father in the kirk; but the years steal by us fast, and folk forget."

These passages in the life of Mrs. Margaret Maitland relate rather to the history of her brother's children and her pupil Grace than to her own. But while occupied with other people and their affairs, she fully reveals her own character, and gives intimations of "passages" in her former life, (love passages, suffering, or "tribulations" as she terms her sorrows, and the victory of a religious spirit over the fiery trials of the heart,) which the reader would fain know something more of. It is clear that so chastened a spirit, at once so contented and so thoroughly acquainted, not only with "all forms, modes, shows of grief," but with the essence and the latent causes of the deadly thing, must have paid the high price of experience for her knowledge. This price is sometimes ruinous; but not to one like Mrs. Maitland, who has the countless riches of faith in a heavenly Father, and the golden joys of the unseen world to fall back upon when she becomes bankrupt in the happiness of this world. A loving heart, with such a secret store, will not rest without finding objects on which it may expend its capacity of conferring happiness; and it is with those whom she has drawn around her with the bonds of love, and to whom she ministers, that Mrs. Margaret Maitland seeks to make the reader most familiar.

Her father is the clergyman of Pasturelands, "a pleasant country place," in Scotland, (locality not specified.) He was a man of "bye ordinary mildness" and fitness for his position. Her mother was a help-met for him, though of delicate health. Margaret and her elder brother, Claud, are well nurtured in the doctrines of the Presbyterian church, and are gracious, God-fearing children.

"My brother Claud and me were the only ones left out of a flock, and while the folk said that I bare our Mother's outward resemblance, it was an undoubted thing that Claud had the features of her mind. There was a mildness in my father's voice that might have moved the most hardened, when he spoke to them, in the words of the tender-hearted Apostle John, of Him that was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us. But when Claud lifted his head in the pulpit, and preached his first sermon on the grand text, 'Who is He that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah?' there was a glance from below his brow that shot into your heart. I had near said it was a proud day for us, that day that Claud preached his first sermon; and truly it is not to be denied that carnal pride is ill to mortify; but without doubt it was a day of gratitude and thanksgiving.

"Many had been the prayers, and much the anxiety in the Manse, when he went forth from amongst us, a simple boy, to stand by himself, and meet the temptations of that great and wicked city Edinburgh, the very distant sound of which is enough to put folk in mind of the roar of him that goeth about like a lion, seeking whom he may devour. I mind how my mother and me used to look at him when he came home in the spring, for fear there should be any change; and I will never forget how my godly father wrestled in supplication, that the Almighty would be a wall of fire about the lad, keeping him from evil: but that day (I wonder if Claud minds it as I do!) our anxiety was calmed with a measure of sure confidence, and of trust in Him that had brought us hitherto, and kepted us in his way.

"My mother was sitting in the corner of the pew, feared to look up at first; my father sat at the door with his face (I ever thought him like the beloved Apostle, but never more than on that day) turned stedfast to the pulpit, and I cowered in between them, whiles taking a glance round the kirk to see how folk attended, and whiles venturing to look up to where my one brother stood in his youthful prime, and preaching the everlasting word to the folk that had known him all his days. It might be called sinful pride. I know not, but they would have had strange hearts that said so, after hearing as I did my father's thanksgiving at our evening exercise, and seeing my mother lift up her white face (for she was spent with troubles), and take into her own hand the hand of her one son, and say, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.' Truly it was a blessed night, that, to us—the happiest that had been in the Manse of Pasturelands for many a day!"

The character of this brother Claud, who "goes out" with the Free-church party, (to which party Mrs. Margaret herself seems a warm adherent,) is not elaborately drawn, but it is sketched with such delicacy and decision of touch, that one feels it must be very true to nature. Of herself Mrs. Maitland says:—

"The beginning of my own life I need not to dwell on particularly. When I was twelve years old, I finished a sampler which had no equal in the parish, nor nearhand it, the which I have now framed in a frame made for it by James Rule, the joiner of Burrowstoun. And before that I mind not anything past the common, seeing that I had just learned my lesson and sewed my seam like other bairns, though it is Claud's word (and doubtless it behoves folks to believe the minister) that my gifts at that time lay more in the way of the idleness of play than any serious avocation. I mind also that I was set to learn Latin at that season of my life, to encourage Claud, but I am not able to say that I ever had any natural inclination to win into the sepulchre of that dead language, in consequence whereof I never got far on. When I was sixteen, I was sent, for a while, into Edinburgh, to board with a Miss Serymgeour, a discreet gentlewoman, who kept a genteel school for young ladies to learn divers things that were thought needful in those days, and also how to behave myself in polite society. Doubtless there are aye changes in manners as well as in folk, and I have never had much stroke with strangers. Nevertheless, I am bound to say, that I aye found the breeding of the Manse at Pasturelands to serve me better than what I got in the school at Edinburgh."

Simple as our friend Mrs. Margaret seems, she shows no small knowledge of human nature, and of the world and its ways. There is occasionally a quiet, very permissible sort of Christian satire in her manner of relating facts and commenting on them. There is a cunning stroke of the story-teller's art in the following, by which the reader's curiosity is excited, and his attention fixed upon the passages not related.

"Truly if I was going into all that came to pass in the next four or five years of my life, I might soon fill up a printed book; and though I have now gotten into years, and folks may think me past feeling old stounds, yet there are some of these by-gone days that I am not able to write about. Doubtless there are great blessings in the season of youth, but also there are sore tribulations; and seeing it was never my will to set my sorrow in the eye of any mortal but my own self, it is not like that I should write it down here, to be read by folk who never heard tell of me before. The hand of Providence is aye kind, howsoever it may whiles smite. That season was by when the first of our great family afflictions came upon us—that was the taking up of my father into his Master's house."

A year or two before this event, Claud had been ordained his father's assistant and successor, therefore the widow and her daughter do not yet remove from the Manse. "It might be about a year after that," says the faithful chronicler, "that we began to discover that Claud's pony had a particular gift' of trotting to Bourtree, and, indeed, when it was brought out to the Manse door, would scarcely ever (for it was a most sensible beast,) turn its head to any other airt. And also by and by we found out that Claud himself looked down into the seat of the Bourtree family on the Sabbath days, in an uncommon manner, and that Mary Elder, instead of looking straight up at the minister during the time of the sermon, as she should have done, hung down her head and played with her Bible." Sufficient signs these to the discerning eyes of a mother and sister! So before very long we have Claud married to Mary Elder, and Margaret with her mother and their maid Jenny flitting to Sunnyside, a pleasant cottage close to the little town of Burrowstoun, and a few miles from the Manse of Pasturelands. For three or four years the home at Sunnyside is peaceful and happy, for the mother and daughter were of one mind, "and there is no fellowship that can be in the flesh, like the fellowship of a mother and her only daughter." After that time the mother died, and Miss Maitland is left alone. Then an old Edinburgh schoolfellow of hers, one of those excellent, active-minded busybodies, who are always exerting themselves in other people's affairs, (let us do them the justice to say, that they do more good than evil in the world, though they are not agreeable members of society;)—one of these strong-minded, business-like women thinks it will be better for Miss Maitland to occupy herself with the charge either of an insane lady or a little girl. Miss Maitland submits without any altercation to take charge of a little girl, (indeed she feels that such an employment will sweeten her life,) but she, strongly urged by Jenny, refuses to have anything to do with the "daft body." Almost immediately after Miss Maitland's consent to take charge of the child, little Grace arrives. Her name too, is Maitland, but she is not related to Mrs. Margaret. The latter knows nothing about the child, except that she has no mother, and is said to be an herress. The domestication of Grace at Sunnyside is a great increase of happiness to both mistress and maid, as well as to the child herself, who has been unkindly treated by her father's sister, and is at first proud and somewhat intractable, offending the pious Miss Maitland by assertions that she "hates her aunt," and that her father is "a very bad man." Little Grace is left to the sole guardianship of her new friend for nine or ten years, and is brought up in constant intercourse with Claud and Mary, the children of the brother at Pasturelands. There is nothing remarkable about the young people. Grace is "qucenly," Mary very pretty, and Claud an amiable, handsome, and well-conducted young man. They are all attached to each other, and, of course, Claud and Grace are in love without knowing it. Mrs. Margaret has done her best to make her "dear bairn" as accomplished as circumstances at Sunnyside will permit, and Grace has talent, and improves all her opportunities. At length, Mrs. Lennox, Grace's aunt, sends for her, without previous warning, and Jenny and her mistress are again left alone. There is no complicated plot to unravel, as the reader is led to expect from the peculiar position of Grace; indeed, expectations are sadly disappointed as regards the story. The wickedness of Mrs. Lennox and her brother promise something tragic, but there seems to be no power of passionate or dramatic writing in the good old lady of Sunnyside; and though there is scope for it in the outline of Grace's story, it ends in smoke, and there is, properly speaking, no story at all. The circumstances are highly improbable, and no attempt is made to account for them. We are also left in the dark as to the future career of Grace's nearest relatives, after she has been rescued from them by Mr. Monteith, who is the lover of Mrs. Margaret's youth, and by a chance not accounted for, is Grace's guardian in the lifetime of her own father. Grace is very unhappy in her aunt's house, and finds her only comfort in writing to her dear friends at Sunnyside and Pasturelands, and they also write frequently to her. Mrs. Lennox keeps her niece as much as possible in retirement, as her object is to keep the fact of her being an heiress concealed. It seems as if some foul play were meditated against the girl. She, however, miserable as she is in her solitude at her aunt's fashionable house, writes thus to Mary:

"Well, I find I have nothing to tell, and so betake myself to answer your questions. What do I do?—(hy-the-bye, that is by no means elegantly expressed; you should have said "How do you employ yourself")—What do I read? What do I think about?—I shall take them in their regular order.

"In the first place,—What do I do? Wondrous little, sister Mary, to be a creature endowed with certain capabilities, and made more for use than ornament, the only employment tolerated here being better adapted to creatures made for ornament and not for use. Netting of purses, embroidery, resplendent in all the colours of the rainbow, silken and woollen; the only restriction to one's taste and ingenuity in the manufacture thereof being, that it shall be absolutely of no service to any mortal.

"In these, if it so pleased me, I might consume day after day, but unhappily it does not please me, and so, in answer to your first question, I am compelled reluctantly to admit (tell it not in Sunnyside, my dear Mary, lest my aunt be utterly shocked!) that I—read novels!

"Furthermore, that the novels are sad rubbish, many of them,—fashionable, flippant, insipid chronicles often of some circle of great people, whose country-seats lie near each other; who duly go to town for the season, and duly return when the season is over; intersperse which with one or two fallings in love, one or two disappointments, gossiping and scandal without measure, and a few moral essays broken into bits, and scattered here and there through the three volumes, and you have them in their full proportions before you.

"Moreover, many of these books are written by women, yet they are often perfectly unwomanly—especially when they become what Claud would call subjective, and profess to reveal the inmost hearts of these sorely tried love-sick heroines of theirs. I can imagine how you would in your own words think shame to speak to me, as the young ladies in those books speak to their friends. I will tell you one story of this vehement kind:—

"There are two young ladies—a model girl, one—the other a high-spirited, beautiful, uncontrollable person of the Die Vernon class; they are friends, but unawares both devoted to the same fortunate gentleman. After various adventures on both sides, the climax comes, by which they discover their rivalry, and thereupon follows a fight. The model girl, whose attachment is returned, is content to give him up and be broken-hearted—the vehement girl, whose attachment is not returned, holds by him fast, and the unhappy lover, engaged to both, vibrates painfully between the two; the dénouement, however, is accomplished by a device not of the newest. The model girl saves her rival's life, the heart of the beautiful uncontrollable melts, and the curtain falls on her vehement dancing at the wedding-ball. What think you of it? yet that is one of the best of all; and there are floods of smaller romancers who tell the same story not so well. And these trials they call the discipline—the battle of life. Do you not think very embroidery would be greatly more profitable than this unhealthy occupation?

"As to what I read, Mary, in the sense in which we at Sunnyside understood reading, the earnest affection with which we used to travel over the well-known brown volumes on the study shelves, or in my aunt's old oaken book-case,—the process has become extinct for me, and I answer this your second question as I answered your first—I read novels!

"And, "what do I think about?" I dare not begin to tell you, lest I should never end—only it is by no means good to be left to converse uninterruptedly with one's own thoughts, day after day; it breeds melancholy and all manner of evils.

"By-the-bye, I have picked up an uncouth German book and an old dictionary, and have found the greatest possible relief in working at that—but that should have come under my first head. Beg our father to send me a Hebrew lexicon, sister Mary, and see if I am not more learned when I return to Sunnyside than Claud himself.

"See how my dark cloud has dispersed into the air! But for all that, I think of home sadly enough sometimes, as of a place I shall never see again—and yearn for it. Sometimes, as holy Samuel Rutherford did of old, I fancy, when he thought the swallows that built their nests in the eaves of the old kirk at Anworth, were blessed birds."

A young lady who thinks and feels thus was not likely to have her spirit broken by small unkindnesses or great ones from people whom she despised. She seems to feel no regret for the wickedness of her profligate swindling father, nor does the memory of his bad actions oppress her soul. In this respect she behaves very much as if she had not been brought up by the godly Mrs. Margaret. In the meantime her friend Mary has her "tribulations" too, though they certainly are not very heavy or very enduring. Her trouble is this. She is beloved by a lively amiable young man, Mr. Allan Elphinstone of Lilliesleaf, a rich landed proprietor, and the son of her aunt, Mrs. Margaret's friend, Mrs. Elphinstone. This lady wishes her son to make a higher match, and Mary, though she loves him, is too proud to give him encouragement. After this, too, comes the greater trouble of suspecting that he is not worthy to be loved. He proves that he is light-minded, easily led by dissipated companions; in short, that he wants ballast in his character. Mary will not marry a man whose religious and moral principles are not sound, and she sacrifices her affections for conscience sake. This, however, is only for a time; and we find Mr. Elphinstone accepted as a lover and a husband, without any reasonable proof of reformation, as far as we can see—just as it would be in real life under such circumstances. Mr. Elphinstone is a person of the best disposition in the world, only very weak. In a sudden fit of active benevolence he sets about reforming a bad village on his estate. Many good things, apropos of sudden reforms, are said by Mrs. Margaret in the course of the regeneration of Cruive End. A hint in the following extract we would like to enter into the notebook of many active ladies and benevolent gentlemen.

"And are you not going to pull down the houses, Mr. Elphinstone?" said Mary.

"Yes," said Mr. Allan, "but not now. My mother was planning a village for me, but that everlasting Lady Mary heard of it, and so it is shipwrecked. They want to have Swiss cottages! If you would only help me with my plan, Miss Mary, we might make a decent thing of it yet. Will you let me bring down my mother's sketch to-morrow?"

"I cannot draw," said Mary quietly, "and I have seen far too little to be of any use; but just now you are not going into the people's houses, Mr. Elphinstone! They say charitable people do that, and lecture them if they are not clean. Now, perhaps that is right—I don't know; but their houses are their own as well as ours—I do not feel comfortable about it."

"I do not feel comfortable about it either, Miss Mary," said Mr. Allan, "I'm glad we agree in that at least. I do not feel at liberty to pry into the domestic concerns of these people, even though I wish to do them good. So I propose that we refer our difficulty to my most wise and excellent counsellor at your right hand, to whom the honour of originating the scheme belongs, and not to me."

"Indeed! Mr. Allan," said I, "that has aye been a difficulty with me too. I am not one of the folk who could go into a cot-house, and preach to the mistress of it—may be a distressed woman toiling among a big small family—about having bright plates on her shelf, and scoured things hanging on her wall, like what are in the houses bairns have for toys. And my thought, Mr. Allan, concerning Cruive End, was that you might do something to get them to turn to honest work, (foridleset seldom heeds about being clean,) and chiefly that you might endeavour to bring the Word to bear upon that benighted and dark place, that which is an effectual cleanser of both hearts and houses, and never fails to work a change—that was my thought of it."

The shrewd sagacious remarks of Mrs. Maitland upon the new modes of educating the Cruive End folks are worth attention. Grace's story is very lamely told, by letter, as we have intimated above; and just when the reader is beginning to forget her altogether, she turns up again at Sunnyside, as unexpectedly as she went away.

"So I sat there and sewed, as I was saying, most part of the afternoon, till just when I was thinking of crying upon Jenny to bring her the tea, I heard some kind of a conveyance stop at the gate, and then somebody came to the door. I was feared that it might be Mrs. Elphinstone, so I just sat still and listened, and lo! at the very end of Jenny's croon, there arose a perfect babel of noises, so that I thought not but Jenny had lost the pickle of ordinary sense she had in common times. So with that I went cannily to the window and looked out, and I had only time to notice that it was a post-chaise that had driven to the door, when somebody came fleeing into the room, and I was straightway gripped on either side. I know not what came over my eyes."

"Mary!" said I, "bairn, is this you?"

"But there was one also on my other hand. Bless me, it was my dear bairn Grace!"

"I could not say a word. The two young things were there. I had only a perception of that, and by and bye they set me in my chair with their arms, poor bairns, meeting round about me; and it was hearing a sob from one of them—I mind not whether it was Grace or Mary, that brought me to myself again."

"And the joy of the two was just like to overwhelm me—in especial Mary's—for the bairn Grace, though she had gotten a womanly look that made me wonder, just lifted in her stool, and sat down at my feet, the way she had done when she was a little bairn, and drew my hand over her shoulder, and seemed as if she would have been content to sit that way for hours, and was not caring for speech; but Mary was mostly out of herself. It seemed to me that she could not bide still nor be silent a moment. And no mortal can tell the joy and the trembling that were together within my spirit."

"Grace, my dear bairn," said I, "how is it that you have gotten home! My mind is troubled within me for all my joyfulness. Have you come away in a secret manner? Tell me, like a good bairn."

"Grace looked up into my face with eyes like sunshine and the blithest smile I ever saw."

"No, aunt," she said, "I have not run away."

"But, Grace," said I, "it's no right to tantalise me in this manner. I can scarce believe my own very eyesight, and till you have told me, I cannot be sure in my spirit that the Lord has indeed brought my own bairn back to me."

"There is no fear, aunt," cried out my niece Mary. "Grace is quite safe, though everybody in Borrowstown was a Lennox. Grace, begin at the beginning, and tell my aunt the whole story."

"Grace laughed."

"Aunt, I have come home, my whole great self—clothed with the mightiness of Oakenshaw—and only encumbered with a guardian, who has committed his guardianship into your most kind and gentle hands."

"To me?" said I; "was it your father?"

"No, aunt," said Grace, lifting up her head in her old stately way. "A charge that had been in his hands, would do but little honour to you. It was not my father."

"Whisht bairn!" said I, "it is your part to honour him, whatever other folk may do."

"But the story, Grace, the story!" cried out Mary.

"Are you not weary of hearing it, Mary?" said Grace. "Aunt, Mary is the most unsympathetic of girls. All yesterday and all to-day has she been rejoicing over a young lady, to whose kindness I owe my freedom—my well-beloved cousin, Harriet Lennox."

"Bairns—bairns!" said I, "is it your purpose and intent to bewilder me altogether? What has that to do with Grace coming home?"

"Will I bring the tea, mem?" said Jenny, opening the door and looking in with a blythe face. "Miss Grace is sair changed I reckon if she doesna like her tea; and the strange young woman that's ben the house says that neither Miss Grace nor Miss Mary have tasted a thing since seven o'clock in the morning, but a bit nip of nonsense biscuit, and the like o' that is out o' the question for young folk."

"Yes, Jenny," said Grace, "by all means bring the tea. Mary and I were a great deal too pleasantly occupied on the road, to think of such vulgar things as eating and drinking. My aunt says 'Yes,' Jenny, bring the tea."

With the return of Grace to Sunnyside ends the tribulations of "the bairns," for Grace soon makes Mary know her own mind about Mr. Elphinstone, and it is not very long before she herself comes to an understanding with Claud, and we have two marriages. Claud's marriage is a fortunate one, in a worldly sense, because he has given up his living for conscience sake, in the Free-church secession, but his congregation held with him. Mrs. Margaret is a staunch Free-church woman, and is, we think, rather pleased that her brother suffers a sort of petty martyrdom in the cause, yielding up his living at Pasturelands, and coming to live with her at Sunnyside. Matters are, however, set right again after a time, and he goes back to the old Manse. She herself seems to be living in a very happy honoured old age, dividing her time among her "dear bairns," and her quiet cot of Sunnyside.

In conclusion, we have these few words to say. There is a thoroughly healthy tone about this unassuming work, which we should be glad to see spread abroad. It is open to the charge of being unexciting, wanting incident, wit, passion, and brilliancy of style and imagination. We admit this charge; we also think it defective as a story. As it professes only to be selected passages from a life, why should there be among them "passages which lead to nothing?" like that about Mr. Dunbar, for instance. It is easy to write thus, but it is inartistic, and we think Mrs. Margaret shows herself capable of artistic work in the first volume of this book; the two last are inferior, and often the reader finds the interest flag. Still, in spite of all its faults, we like this better than some better books; we like the authoress's mind; it is religious without cant, sensible without hardness, and clear without shallowness. The old age is a fiction, we are convinced. Mrs. Margaret may not have seen thirty yet.

EXCURSIONS IN SOUTHERN AFRICA.¹

WE have ill-treated the Cape colonists. We have sent them convicts, instead of settlers, and their angry resistance has compelled us to recall the obnoxious emigrants. We have given them too much government and too few wives. Pretty towns, snug villages, quite English in appearance, and even pleasant villas with shrubberies, gardens, and parks there are, in plenty; but an abundance of women there is not, so that all those cheerful abodes look desolate; for we hold the maxim of the poet, that "The world is but a wintry place, Save, woman, where thou art!"

and accordingly, we see much reason in the present movement for transporting a multitude of marriageable damsels to people the distant provinces of our empire. The patient toilers, slaves of the needle, who now pine in misery on a wretched daily dole, will look very well, when they come to be colonial wives and mothers, gladdening the desert towns, and hamlets, and solitary farms of our remote possessions, the Cape among the rest. There, as we have said, all places wear a desolate aspect. When we say all, as Sir Arthur Hoadmaddod would express it, we mean many; and therefore, to illustrate the nature of the country, with its aboriginal and foreign population, we may follow our gallant author through some of his amusing experiences, especially as they are enlivened by the account of personal incidents, adventures, perils, escapes, and romantic journeys.

When the troubles of 1846 rendered necessary the employment of several officers on special service, for the purpose of directing the energies of the irregular troops employed against the Kaffirs, Lieutenant Colonel Napier was despatched on the 10th of August to take part in this duty. Within fifty days his vessel floated at anchor under the shadow of that colossal rock above whose head tradition was wont to picture an eternal storm. Since Portugal, jealous of the sea-Cybele's rank among the nations, sent Diaz to contend with the Venetian argosies for the commerce of the East, the Cape has been the scene of continual strife between white and black races, each hating the other, and by a system of mutual retaliation perpetuating the shedding of blood. Our author arrived during the excitement of one of these periods of strife, and immediate preparations were made for his transport, with stores, ammunition and treasures, to the Eastern province. Before, however, commencing his personal narrative, he presents us with a volume of Cape history, which is interesting in itself, although we strongly deprecate the practice, now too common, of mingling history and travel in one work. The relation of his adventures will be popular, and deserves to be so, but it forms a book for a season, and not for a time, whilst the chronicle of events maintains a permanent value, and the work before us will, in the course of a few years, be as a tree, one half decayed, or as a corpse, linked to a living body. Into the details of history, we do not propose to enter; but placing ourselves in company with the Colonel, at Port Elizabeth, we shall follow in his train, as far as space will permit.

Twenty gigantic wagons, each drawn by twelve or sixteen oxen, drew up in single file on the morning of the eighth of October, extending over a space of ground nearly a mile in length. Drivers cracking their whips, oxen lowing, and every one swearing,—the train was not put in motion until mid-day, as tumult and confusion never accelerate. When, however, the wheels creaked round, the whips cracked, and the teams moved forward, it was not long before the unwieldy caravan was tracing the winding wagon-path across an undulating, grassy, monotonous plain, escorted by a body of Malays and a few soldiers, whilst seven field officers gave grandeur and dignity to the cortege, though grotesquely accoutred, and strangely adorned. However, in spite of their uncouth appearance, the travellers made a merry progress over lands once forest-covered, but now converted into magnificent pasture ground, until reaching the banks of a small glassy lake framed amid green knolls and low swelling hills, they halted, but finding the tempting water to be salt as brine, again proceeded as far as the banks of the Zwart Kops river, where a camp was formed. The stream rolled, a deep dark turbulent flood, through a rich green valley. On the level banks were scattered the now teamless wagons, which with their white canvass roofs, are compared to huge gondolas stranded in a verdant valley. The whole formed an irregular village of moving tents, and all around the horses and oxen were secured, whilst the travellers dispersed themselves in search of game and the picturesque, through the beautiful variety of the valley. A short rest was succeeded by the loud cracking of whips as the signal for renewed motion. At this well-known sound the obedient oxen might be seen slowly returning from the green pastures round, and the convoy gradually moved off the ground. Then "amidst the discordant sounds of deafening Hottentot cries, the successive teams were rapidly urged down the steep bank of the ford, and thence into the bed of the river.

"We watched wagon after wagon, as they toiled across the stream; now jolting over large rocks—now sinking up to their axles into a cavity or quicksand; sometimes the entire convoy was brought to a complete stand-still; and the whole progressing so slowly, that I began to speculate on the chance of their all reaching the shore ere night cast its dark shadows around."

However the ford was traversed, and the caravan plunged amid gloomy defiles, glens, and valleys, woody hollows, and lovely expanses of bush, glittering with brilliant flowers, twined with gay creepers, and emitting a rich perfume; and at length emerging upon an elevated tract, they saw once more in the distance, the hoary rock that frowns over Table Bay, and then turning the gaze westward, looked on the dim blue mountains, and the brown forests, now fading in the deepening light of sunset,—that spread away in the interior. Thus ended the first day's journey in the wagons.

Bivouacs, fresh starts, many amicable encounters with wandering families; numerous tales of former horrid incidents; petty discomforts, disasters, and disappointments; new landscapes, and ever varying beauties of scenery, broke the monotony of the journey as far as Graham's Town—very well planned, but very badly built, with streets more formidable than Tipperary bogs, and approaches over mountains of rubbish; the town lies in the centre of a basin-shaped hollow, surrounded by open grassy levels, verdant and abundant, and formerly covered with cultivation, life and beauty; but, when our author was there, dotted with blackened ruins, wasted gardens, and naked orchards. Kaffir irruptions had made the place a scene of frequent desolation, the marauders venturing even in sight of Graham's Town with sword and brand, murdering, plundering and burning, with insatiable ferocity.

"This Arcadian landscape,—beautiful even amid its abandoned ruins, was often the scene of my solitary rambles. On one occasion, after visiting a deserted cottage, the rustic porch of which had been overshadowed by rose-trees, jessamines, and geraniums, now in neglected luxuriance, trailing on the ground, and wasting their fragrance on the desert air, I was surprised, whilst wandering through what had once been the adjoining orchards and gardens, to stumble suddenly on a little boy, who, seated under a shady fig-tree, whilst employed in tending a few lean oxen, was busily engaged in extracting from its prickly covering the fruit of the cactus, apparently gathered from a small hedge of that plant bordering the enclosure in which he was tending his cattle.

"The child's appearance, with his round chubby face, blue eyes, and long flaxen locks, was so truly English, and offered so strong a contrast to the tropical vegetation of the surrounding African solitude—shrouded as he was by masses of the cactus, the aloe, of gaunt and skeleton euphorbia—that I stood for some time, musing in silent contemplation of the scene, before he was aware of my presence.

"At last, raising his eyes, he beheld me, but without evincing emotions either of interest or alarm. 'My lad,' said I, 'what are you doing all alone in this wilderness?' 'I'm herding them oxen, sir.' 'Who do they belong to?' 'To my grandmother.' 'Where does she live?' for the Kaffirs appear to have destroyed all the cottages around.' 'Up the Kloof, yonder. The Kaffirs came and set fire to our house, and killed father; but we had nowhere else to go, so grandmother and I went back there again.' 'And where is your mother?' 'She died broken-hearted after they killed father.' 'Are you quite alone with your grandmother?' 'Yes.' 'But suppose the Kaffirs come again some night, what do you think they would do?' 'I suppose they would kill us.' 'Are you not afraid?' 'No: that would be of no use.'"

Here is a picture of colonial bliss; but peace is now restored, and it may be hoped that a more effectual protection has been extended to the settlers. During the period referred to, however, the whole region was marked at intervals by these records of destruction, and Colonel Napier was speculating on the chances of a new attack, when he received orders to proceed forthwith to Waterloo Bay, and the next morning, at an early hour, was galloping in company with several officers through the wild scenery of the Valley of the Blue Crags, towards head-quarters. Arriving at the camp, a tent-covered island amid an ocean of filth, carcasses and confusion, he encountered an old fellow in a pea-jacket and "a shocking bad hat," whom he took for some store-keeper, not particular about his appearance. Inquiring doubtless in a peremptory military tone where the General could be found, our author was started by the reply, "Why, I am the General, though perhaps not very like one just now. However you must come and dine with me,"—which was done, and matters of business were arranged over friendly glasses, in spite of the pertness of a young civilian in black coat and white cravat, who excited our author's wrath by his confident remarks in affairs of policy about which grey-headed men were doubtful. We can sympathise with the gallant Scotchman, since of all things, conceit is our aversion!

Speedily however we transport ourselves from the General's dining-table at Waterloo Bay to the camp of the first division of the army in Kaffir-land, "on the banks of Chume water," where Colonel Napier, in command of his troops, was very nearly guilty of woman-slaughter. Mistaking some Kaffir ladies, wrapped in hairy garments, for wild beasts, he was about to pull a trigger, when the figures rose, and he saw his error, an incident of which he makes use to bring in an offensive and uncalled for allusion to the memory of Mr. Pringle, whose African poems possess, let us tell him, both power and originality, and our author's reference to him, as a "poetic adventurer, and a broken down schoolmaster," does no credit to his gentlemanly feelings. We are sorry to notice such faults in a work at once so well written and so full of interest as the present; but this is not the only instance in which the friendliness of a kind critic would have advised Colonel Napier to erase a passage. But we quickly enter among wilder and more exciting scenes, and find our author rambling from the camp, during the interval of repose that preceded active operations.

"Wandering on at random, I suddenly came on a Kaffir, as naked as he was born, seated on his kaross with a bundle of spears by his side, and in the act of lighting a fire. I advanced without hesitation, and addressed him with the Dutch salutation of 'Morrow,' (Good morning,) which they all understand, and seating myself on a stone opposite to him, began to watch his proceedings. Having made a good blazing fire, he next took from a bag made of the skin of the wild cat, a large lump of raw meat, and, cutting it into strips, put it on the embers. At this stage of the proceedings he was joined by two other savages, and they immediately commenced operations on the meat, whilst still nearly raw, or at most scarcely warmed through. Like the Bedouin tribes of the Syrian Desert, they despise the use of both knife and fork. A long strip of meat was first cleared of ashes with the blade of an assegai, and after being laid hold of with the teeth, the assegai was again employed, to sever a morsel of a convenient size, which being duly masticated, was swallowed without farther preliminary, until the whole had disappeared. After the termination of this raw-meat feast, my refined acquaintances threw their sheepskin karosses over their shoulders, and quietly departed."

Of this description of a barbarian meal, the author takes advantage to digress a little on the character of the Kaffir, whom, with more vehemence than truth, he condemns as without any redeeming qualities, "rapacious, cowardly and cruel,—besides being the greatest beggar, the greatest thief, and the greatest liar in the world."

Anticipating an active campaign, the soldier's eye rested with ill-disguised dissatisfaction on the signs of returning peace. Groups of peaceful Kaffirs with their women and children assembled in the neighbourhood of the camp. The enemy's chiefs entered into negotiations; but avoided concluding any convention. They demurred, and hesitated, and delayed, prolonging truces, renewing promises, and offers of peace; but finally hostilities were resumed with fresh bitterness and vigour, and Colonel Napier was placed at the head of a troop sent to reinforce the main body intended to act energetically against the Kaffirs. He gladly undertook the command, longing to be in action with the barbarian enemy. There is an affectation of ferocity about his writing, which ill-becomes a British officer; and if all of his family shared his feelings, there would be little credit in being allied by blood to all the Napiers.

"As for the rest,

'Tis powder and ball suits these savages best;
You may cant about mission and civilization,
My plan is to shoot or enslave the whole nation."

But luckily enough the power does not accompany the will of these martial heroes. Still while the war was raging, and conflicts were inevitable, it was well for the national honour that these men, of bull-dog bravery, fought there. The enemy was by no means despicable, and the British force was far from overwhelming; but the skill and courage of our officers and troops levelled all obstacles, whether of nature or art. In one instance when Colonel Somerset's division was encamped in a pleasant spot, between the Keiskhama and Fish River Bush, Lieutenant Bisset, observing a few savages skulking in the neighbourhood, rode out to reconnoitre. Turning about on the slope of a hill, he was about to retrace his way leisurely to the camp, when a body of six hundred Kaffirs appeared below. They had halted evidently with the object of making a secret night attack; but the Lieutenant, with determined courage, galloped towards them, and whilst they gazed in momentary wonder at the single horseman so suddenly appearing, rode wildly by, turned the corner of a hill, and meeting Colonel Somerset at the head of his division, gave notice that the enemy was at hand. He received the news with joy, and lifting his cap from his head, cheered loudly, and gave the word, "Major Gibsons, return carbines, draw swords, and charge."

"This brief 'Charge, Chester, charge!' of the gallant veteran, was nobly responded to by his hearers," says our author, who proceeds to paint the picture of a horrid slaughter, dilating on the manner in which the dragoon sabres gashed the backs of the savages, and how the Fingoe allies waded deep in blood, while

"A party of our weary horsemen had dismounted on the margin of a muddy pond, near a small patch of brushwood; after both men and horses had quenched their burning thirst, the former threw themselves on the grass, still, however, holding by the reins their panting steeds, whilst worn out and listless, they looked on at the movements of some Fingoes, busily engaged in their bloody search. The latter approached a small thicket near which the party was at rest. A burgher who had not dismounted, was then watering his steed at the shallow pool. As the Fingoes approached, the naked form of an athletic Kaffir suddenly sprang from the adjoining covert, and pitched the unguarded cavalier headlong into the pond; next, vaulting into the empty saddle, he urged away the horse at the top of his speed. So unexpectedly was the bold feat performed, that the savage had well nigh effected his escape ere our people had recovered their surprise. A man of the Cape corps, however, regaining his wits just in the nick of time, started on his feet, and covered the Kaffir with his rifle, whilst he was still within musket range. The latter, to expose himself as little as possible, had thrown forward his body on the horse's neck, defeating thus his own object by inadvertently presenting a fair and conspicuous mark for the rifleman's shot," which passed through his body and came out at his collarbone, thus stopping his progress and saving the burgher's horse.

Proceeding towards Fort Peddic, the detachment was met by several dark-skinned ambassadors, or spies, from the enemy's camp, who professed to come with conciliatory purpose; but Colonel Somerset knew them well, and took care they should not return to their tribes before all danger of their craft was at an end. By the way, merely as a suggestion, our gallant author proposes, in case of another war, a system of kidnapping, which strikes us as bold and ingenious, if not exactly proper and practicable; for, as he says truly, men are at a great loss without the wives; but not with so much veracity, that the Kaffir brides would rejoice to be detained from their husbands. For ourselves, we imagine the women are fond of their helpmates, and would possess a poor idea of English civilization, did it encourage kidnapping, after the fashion of Colonel Napier, whose greatest enemies appear to be savages, missionaries, and young civilians in black coats and white cravats. His hatred of the Kaffirs is accounted for by their ferocity, of the missionaries by their meddling manners, and of the civilians by their conceited dandyism; shortly afterwards the General fell within the circle of his wrath, for owing to some arrangements connected with the command of the troops, Lieutenant-Colonel E. Elers Napier felt himself aggrieved, and resolved, since he could not do as he wished, to do nothing at all.

"After a good breakfast, and a thorough cleansing, I went to the General, and respectfully represented that I considered myself hardly used, in having, without any notification to that effect, had my own people taken from me, and placed under the command of another officer; I next begged to be allowed to join the second division, and assume that charge; but on meeting with a refusal, I instantly tendered my resignation of the superintendence of the native allies attached to this part of the force, which was, however, not accepted; and I retired in none the best of humours, from an interview during which his excellency had not even the civility to ask me to be seated, nor to discontinue the operation of writing, in which he was at the time engaged."

Seriously, we consider the author was uncourtously treated; and though inclined to be jocular on his misfortunes, must remark that so far as his qualifications as an officer are concerned his services were valuable and meritorious. As his resignation was not accepted, he was soon again in active service; and although a temporary suspension of hostilities took place between the British force and the Kaffir chief Sandilla, it became evident that the design of this crafty enemy was to protract negotiation until the summer, when the arid soil would afford no forage for the horses, when the water pools would be dried up, and the march of the British force be a road of suffering, privation and disaster. Macaom, an inferior chief, surrendered with his family, some bundles of assegais, a few useless firelocks, a small number of poor half-fed cattle, and some raw-boned ponies. In the meanwhile Sandilla remained in the proximity of the camp, temporizing and negotiating, until the General's patience was exhausted, and he vowed he would suffer no more delay; when the savage took his departure, and vast colonial herds disappeared to join their captive friends, on the far distant pastures beyond the waters of the Kye. Thither it was determined to send a column in pursuit; and one evening whilst the officers were at mess, and the wine was freely flowing, the bugles struck up the Roast Beef of Old England, and a sergeant entering announced that hostilities had recommenced, and that two strong columns were to be in marching order by two o'clock in the morning. The troops were hastily mustered, and put in motion. Progressing without noise, but with great rapidity, they followed the course of the Chume for several miles, and at length came suddenly, at dawn of the next day, upon a large kraal, where hundreds of stolen oxen were luxuriating on fresh green grass. A swift sudden attack; sharp rapid firing; wild confusion, and a plentiful flow of blood ensued; whilst our author had a most critical adventure with a brawny Kaffir, whom he managed to stab through the back; but after accomplishing the achievement, nearly lost his life on a run-away horse. As it was, the whole of the enemy were defeated and scattered, the cattle recaptured, and the village sacked; whilst the poor Kaffir women sat passively at their doors, witnessing the slaughter of their relations and friends, and the ransacking of their homes, without a sigh or a tear. Fifteen hundred oxen formed the prize of that day's adventure.

We now leave for awhile Colonel Napier's narrative, and take up that of another officer, who made a military excursion beyond the Kye. He was encamped near the bank of the river, in charge of six thousand oxen, with a strong line of sentries outside to guard against the Kaffirs, and inside against the bullocks.

"At dark I was seated with two or three other officers laughing at our misfortunes, and admiring the picturesque appearance of our bivouac. We were close to the men's fires, which illumined a thick bush, near which we were stretched at length, or sitting tailor-fashion. A soldier was lying asleep near the root of a tree, his face lit by the sun's rays, arms and accoutrements hanging in the branches, intermingled with sundry tempting morsels of beef; we looked more like savages than British soldiers, with long beards and unwashed faces; for here even water had grown very scarce, owing to the men being too exhausted to fetch it. Well, we were lying thus, enjoying the spectacle of a leg of veal hanging near the fire, under the idea that it would be a dainty treat, such as we had seldom known—when pop—pop—pop! and then bullets began to whistle through the trees. An answer was soon made by the Fingoes, and a regular fusillade commenced. Some officer ordered the men to stand to their arms, and I ordered them to lie close and kick out the fires. In one minute all was confusion. Our picturesque group was broken up, my leg of veal was knocked over, and all was darkness."

The bivouac was resumed quietly, although the Kaffirs continued to pelt a few shots into the camp; but the soldiers were accustomed to such interruptions, and heeded them little. Their situation was one of extreme difficulty. Their only food was beef more tough than leather; a biscuit would have sold for five shillings, and a spoonful of sugar, tea, or coffee, would have fetched a Californian price. Of a cigar not even the most visionary epicure dreamed. By crossing the river they could reach a sort of commissariat, but the swollen waters rolled down with such velocity and power, that the ford was impracticable. After many days, however, the oxen were driven into the stream, and gradually the whole of the soldiers and cattle crossed. But who can tell, says the officer, the joy of eating after twelve days' starvation! A box of raisins was found, and the delighted epicures sat down with glistening eyes to a mouldy plum pudding, of the mile-stone sort, but of colossal size, and were so attentive to its merits that a slight storm of bullets passed over their heads perfectly unnoticed. Having seen the soldiers thus comfortably installed, we leave them and return to Colonel Napier's narrative.

A strange suspicion of traffic in stolen cattle attached to the African auxiliaries, and our author having an idea of some mysterious bivouac of thieves in the Winterberg mountains, started with an escort to discover their secret hiding-place. The result of his expedition was the discovery of a concealed kraal, where the swarthy allies of the British were detected sound asleep, surrounded by multitudes of horses and cattle. They were placed under guard, and marched off to render an account of the misdeed, while the writer proceeded on an excursion through the lesser range, where entering a small pretty valley, well covered with vegetation, and shielded from winds and storms, he saw a number of people busy in the construction of little houses, about six feet in height and diameter, composed of bent twigs covered with plaster, or raw ox-hides, having only a single opening for the ingress of its inmates, with light and air, and the emission of smoke. Looking into one of these simple abodes, he found about a dozen uncouth human beings collected round a fire, over which a vast pot was suspended, full of some simmering stew, whose odours tempted no further inquiry. Reluctant to enter one of these rude dwellings, the wanderer spent the night on an inflated air mattress, out in the open air; but was glad next morning, when half perished with cold, to accept the hospitality of a number of the thievish, beggarly, utterly wicked and lying Kaffir race. One of their damsels, who sat by his side close to the blazing fire, was busily engaged in decorating with beads a curious article of native dress. The gallant author was polite to the maiden, and promised her a roll of tobacco if she would finish and present him with the piece of apparel. She despatched the work, but begged for an English sixpence in lieu of the tempting weed.

At Fort Beaufort, whither Colonel Napier proceeded after his excursion through the mountains, whose wild magnificent scenery is described with little enthusiasm by his pen, he met two officers who had visited the far interior. There they had had accounts corroborative of the tradition that a vast inland sea, or lake, rolls its wide-heaving, glittering waters beyond the tracks trodden by the foot of European discovery. Here also he heard many marvellous stories of Mr. Cumming, the great Sant' Seu, or lion slayer, who was said to have bearded a lion in his den, to wander about in Adam's own costume, and perform all manner of exploits, in all manner of ways, against all manner of mighty wild beasts. Shortly afterwards he met the man himself, and questioning him on the truth of Rumour's tales, was told that the story of his sleeping in the lion's den, with the body of the brute as a pillow, was mere fancy, but that those gentlemen frequently prowled about the sleeping couch during his midnight bivouacs.

"From experience," he said, "I found that the easiest and perhaps safest way of destroying lions was to do so from a hole deep enough to conceal a man's body; and when I shot a large animal, such as a rhinoceros or a buffalo, near a pool of water or a brook, I often had recourse to the device. The hole was dug very near the carcass, and at nightfall, I would ensconce myself therein, to wait till the animals which had come to drink had thoroughly gorged themselves; when they were, generally speaking, easily knocked over from my place of concealment. I have, however, sometimes been so thoroughly fagged on taking up my position as to have fallen asleep, and been awakened by angry discussions, occurring over the mangled remains of the slain. On one occasion, when thus disturbed from my slumbers, I found myself surrounded by five enormous lions, one of which took it into his head to look down over the ledge of the hole which concealed me; but a discharge right in the face caused him to pay with his life the penalty of such impertinent curiosity; and this, perhaps, may be the origin of the story about my nap in the lion's den."

Cumming has journeyed into the interior many hundred miles further than any other white man, and during one expedition alone shot forty-three large elephants, sixty hippopotami, with numbers of the rhinoceros, which, indeed, with buffaloes, camelleopards, elands, gemsboks, rams, antelopes, water bucks, and an immense variety of other large and beautiful animals, were in such abundance, that he rarely expended ammunition on them, except to procure a specimen for his collection—already large enough to form a shipload. We are vaguely promised the publication of his journal; it will be a most singular book of adventure, as this traveller has wandered for years among wild and novel scenes, strange tribes of people, and regions never before seen by the eye of the white man.

One more extract from Colonel Napier's curious and entertaining narrative, and we take leave of his book.

"You will laugh at the manner in which I ushered in the new year. I had pitched my tent as a sleeping quarter close to the cottage in which I used to take refuge during the grilling heat and glare of the day. A lovely moon shone as I was going to rest, and the beauty of the night had even attracted out of the neighbouring huts groups of Fingoes who, in common with the other natives of this part of the world, being extremely partial to the gentle planet, were now singing and dancing in the moonlight. Like Abraham I sat at the door of my tent enjoying the scene, looking at the blue Chume hills, the dense wooded masses at their base, and at the winding Kat River, which like a silver thread glistened through the dark foliage. What a contrast to the scene at home was presented by my little South African encampment, my own tall marquee, and the servants' baggage tent, all glistening in the moonbeams, with several horses picketed around, and the little dark parolle tent occupied by a hungry dog, the only sentinel now on guard!

"Such is a faint picture of the surrounding scene when I retired to sleep, 'perchance to dream;' but my dreams were not to last long, for I was shortly awakened by the most rattling peals of thunder over head, as if all Heaven's artillery had been brought into the field, followed by rain such as one may remember in a Madras monsoon, and nowhere else. Presently one tent-peg gave way, from the ropes and canvass becoming tightened, then another."

Fearing the downfall of the tent about his ears, the dreamer awakened, having vainly endeavoured to command the services of his attendants, sallied out and loosened the ropes himself, while the old year was knelled out by peals of rolling thunder—a point in the narrative which we may select to lay down the volumes, well pleased upon the whole with their valuable and entertaining contents, but sorry that our author should occasionally allow his language to run into "eccentricities" which are far from agreeable, since they detract from the merit of the work, while they diminish our pleasure in its perusal.

ORIGINAL BALLADS BY LIVING AUTHORS.¹

It is a bold undertaking in these days, when the Ballad Poetry of England, rescued from the "stilted decrepitude" into which it had lapsed during the last century, has announced its renaissance in the trumpettones of Macaulay, and the silvery sighing of Alfred Tennyson's magic lyre—it is an enterprise requiring no inconsiderable degree of moral courage, to lay before the Argus-eyed public, a volume of Original Ballads, by Living Authors. No sooner, however, does the slightest indication of a "good opening" appear in the forum of Paternoster Row, than some literary Curtius canters forth, pen in rest, prepared to spur Pegasus into the gulf. Macaulay has of late devoted all the powers of his fertile imagination to invent new facts in the History of England, and Tennyson we can conceive to be watching, with mute astonishment, the realization of his Princess, in that modern manufactory for blue-stockings, the "Queen's College for Young Ladies." At all events, the "Poetry for the Million" has latterly been sung by such very small birds, that the Million have scarcely troubled themselves to listen to it. In this dearth of sweet sounds, Mr. Thompson has come forward to "give the world assurance" that the songs of Bards may yet emanate from living minstrels, and that even these degenerate days, in which steam has superseded chivalry, and railroad journeys have replaced crusades, can afford themes for ballads of a higher order than that sweetly sentimental style of production, of which, "Yes, I have dared to love thee," or Punch's imitation thereof, "Say, wilt thou sew my buttons on?" are average examples. The editor's more particular design in the present volume, may be best conveyed by the following extract from his preface. After glancing at the good service done by Bishop Percy to poetical archæology, by the publication of his "Relics," and showing how the names of Scott, Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, Cunningham, Tennyson, Macaulay, or, to look to the "Vaterland," how those of Bürger, Uhland, Goethe, and Schiller have added their deathless lustre to the modern ballad, he goes on to say,—

"Still the general idea of a Ballad, as entertained at the present day, seems to exclude recent subjects; at least, to a great extent. As ballad poetry is the natural product of early times, it seems to have been allowed some natural, if not necessary, connexion with them. Yet surely such a view is altogether erroneous. The very essence of the Ballad is broad, effective painting of scene, sentiment, or narrative; and these are of no time or region. It is a species of poetry which originates direct from Nature, and therefore is not more appropriate in the days of palfreys and pages, than in those of locomotives and conductors. Wherever Nature is, there the Ballad may be. The present volume is given to the public in illustration of this view. A number of kind friends, to whom the Editor desires to offer his most grateful acknowledgments, have taken an interest in exemplifying this position; and ballads of the most varied character, historical, narrative, imaginative, descriptive, ranging from fabulous antiquity to contemporary history, are the result.

And a very interesting and agreeable result do we pronounce it; nor do we fear that any of our readers who may secure to themselves pleasure and profit by perusing this volume, will incline to dispute our position. That the Editor is himself possessed of poetic talent of a very high order, might be safely deduced from the judgment and good taste he has displayed in this selection, and is amply corroborated by his own admirable contributions.

Amongst the contributors we read the names of the Rev. G. Croly, E. A. Freeman, Esq., the Ven. Archdeacon Churton, the Rev. R. W. Huntley, the Rev. J. M. Neale, &c. &c., each of whom in his different style has displayed a thorough acquaintance with the true spirit of ballad poetry, and added one or more valuable specimens to that branch of our country's literature. The authoress of the Maiden Aunt (S.M.) has contributed a very striking ballad, in the moral of which we most heartily concur. Certain ghostly incidents of Indian life on the wild prairie, have been pleasingly versified by F. R.; nor, while casting our glance on the "Night side of Nature," (with which chronicles of the spirit-realm, this volume contains passages that might vie in alarming sensitive nerves, on which account we warn timid readers against perusing it after night-fall,) must we omit to notice a ballad by Annabel C— prefaced by a suggestive motto from Hood's Haunted House. A dreamy spell hangs about the opening verses of this contribution, which inspires a vague sense of dread, far more effective than any positive horrors could have produced. In the ballad of "Wulfstan" by this lady we also recognise great merit. The tale is a striking one, and it is simply and touchingly told. We cannot conclude our remarks on this agreeable volume better than by introducing one more specimen to the notice of our readers. "The Martyrdom of the Archbishop of Paris, June 25, 1848," entitles its author, the Rev. J. M. Neale, to hold foremost rank among the ballad poets of the age:—

THE MARTYRDOM OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF PARIS,
JUNE 25, 1848.

"A DAY of clouds and darkness! a day of wrath and woe!
The war of elements above, the strife of men below!

(1) "Original Ballads by Living Authors." Edited by the Rev. Henry Thompson, M.A. Cantab. J. Masters, London, 1850.

Through the air ring shouts and outcry,—through the streets a red tide pours,
 To the booming of the cannon the ancient city roars;
 For wilder than the tempest is human passion's strife,
 And deadlier than the elements the waste of human life:
 No breathing time for pity;—'tis the long stern tug of might:
 The war of poor against the rich, and both against the right.
 Each street and lane the artillery sweeps, the rifle enfilades,
 With stone and car, with beam and spar, they pile the barricades;
 And women-fiends with blood-speck'd arms, fierce eye, and frenzied mien,
 Cry "Up the Red Republic!" and "Up the Guillotine!"
 Now forth and on them, Garde Mobile! stout heart, firm hand, quick eye!
 No mercy know, no quarter show; to pity is to die!
 To the last worst fate of cities,—the murder and the rape,
 'Tis yours to give one answer, the cutlass and the grape:
 Where'er the strife is hottest, on, first and foremost, there!
 On to the Quai du Palais! on to the Rue d'Enfer!
 Where'er on high the blood-red flag and the Marseillaise may be,
 Beneath must come the tricolor, and 'Mourir pour la Patrie!'
 There is tearing up the pavement, there are shrieks of them that bleed,
 There is firing from the windows, there is spurring of the steed:
 There is stepping into places of the fallen in the rank,
 There is breaking down the house wall to take the foe in flank;
 There is lust, and hate, and murder; they have fill'd Rebellion's cup,
 And to the God of vengeance the city's cry goes up!
 And more and more, on, on, they pour; there's the battery's thicker flame,
 And the quicker ring of musketry, and the rifle's deadlier aim;
 Go, hurry to the Assembly, for the bravest chiefs are there,
 Bedeau, and Brea, and Cavaignac, and Lamoricière:
 And in and out the frequent scout goes hastening as he may:
 'At the Rue d'Antoine the Garde Mobile have the better of the day.'
 'Some succour to the Port au Bled, they scarce can hold their own.'
 'Help, help! or all is over at the Barrière du Trône.'
 And out and forth, east, west, and north, the hurrying chiefs advance,
 To combat with the combatants, and to die, if needs, for France.
 Who come toward the barricade with steady steps and slow,
 With prayers, and tears, and wishes to aid them as they go?
 Among the arm'd, no armour the little cohort boasts,
 Their leader is their Prelate, their trust the Lord of Hosts!
 And the brave Archbishop tells them, in voice most sweet and deep,
 How the Good Shepherd layeth down his life to save the sheep;
 How some short years of grief and tears were no great price to give,
 That peace might come from discord and bid these rebels live;
 Rebels so precious in His eyes, that He, whose word is fate,
 Alone could make, alone redeem, alone regenerate!
 One moment's lull of firing,—and near and nearer goes That candidate for martyrdom to the midmost of his foes,

And on he went with love unspent toward the rifled line,
 As calm in faith, in sight of death, as in his church's shrine;
 And the war closed deadlier round him, and more savage rose the cheer,
 And the bullets whistled past him,—but still he knew no fear:
 And calmer grew his visage, and brighter grew his eye:
 He could not save his people—for his people he could die:
 And, following in the holy steps of Him that harrow'd hell,
 By death crush'd death, by falling, upraised the men that fell.
 They bear him from his passion, for the prize of peace is won;
 His warfare is accomplish'd, his godlike errand run:
 They kneel before his litter in the midst of hottest strife;
 They ask his prayers, the uttermost, who gave for them his life.
 So offering up his sacrifice to God with free accord,
 The city's martyr Bishop went home to see his Lord!
 Now God be praised that even yet His promise doth not fail!
 The gates of hell can never more against His Church prevail:
 When human ties are slacken'd, and earthly kingdoms rock,
 And thrones and sceptres crumble like potsherds in the shock:
 There's that, unearthly, though on earth, that ne'er shall be o'erthrown:
 Laud to the King of martyrs for the victory of His own!"

The illustrations to "Original Ballads" are for the most part exceedingly good, and the whole getting up of the work reflects the highest credit on its publisher.

"The Juvenile Calendar and Zodiac of Flowers." By Mrs. T. K. Hervey. Profusely Illustrated by Richard Doyle. Arthur Hall, Virtue & Co. Price 5s.

"The Illustrated Year-Book of Wonders, Events, and Discoveries." Arthur Hall, Virtue & Co. Price 5s.

Here are two books adapted for presents, both cheap and excellent in their way. The first, addressed more especially to children, is distinguished by a graceful blending of fact and fancy in its letter-press, and corresponding affluence of delicate invention in its illustrations. The plants, birds, and herbs of each month, its festivals, customs, and noted days are enumerated, and with these accurate notices are mingled short stories suggested by them, very pleasing and original in conception, refined in execution, and pervaded by a delicate morality. In the cuts Mr. Doyle has eminently displayed the characteristics of his peculiar style. One would suppose that he had been admitted to the court of Titania, so ethereal are his sprites and fairies, disporting themselves amidst a luxuriant network of flowers, and grasses, and birds, and beetles, and mushrooms. A rare spirit of invention and exquisite delicacy of execution are manifested in these exuberant phantasies. The elegance of the typography and "getting up" leave nothing to be desired in this very beautiful little book.

"The Illustrated Year-Book," with far less elegance of typography and illustration, is full of what will be more acceptable to many—the actual doings of the past year, with its "wonders, discoveries, and adventures." The author passes in review the selfish gold-hunting of California, and the disinterested benevolence of Ragged Schools—describes the progress of the Britannia Tube-Bridge, one of the greatest marvels of our age,—and gives a lively picture of the splendours of Constantinople. The Coal Mine on Fire, and the Expedition of Sir John Franklin to the Polar Regions, make a striking contrast. The Queen's Visit to Ireland is a lively paper, and the article on Layard's Discoveries at Nineveh as comprehensive as its length allows. The War in the Punjab, the French Expedition to Rome, and a review of the rapid Progress of Emigration, complete a most interesting selection of topics, treated at once with clearness and succinctness, and described in graphic but not exaggerated language. The idea and execution are alike excellent.

"The Art Journal." A Monthly Journal, price 2s. 6d. To those who live in the metropolis it would be almost superfluous to say that the "Art Journal" is among the most surprising publications of our day. In mere quantity of matter it far exceeds any other, but the quality is that by which it is chiefly distinguished. Its engravings and wood-cuts are among the very highest specimens of art. The former consist chiefly of large copies of the magnificent series of master-pieces of the English school, presented to the nation by the late Mr. Vernon, and which the Editor of this publication alone had express permission to engrave. Of these engravings, all are more than respectable, most are excellent, and some among the very highest efforts of the English burin. The number of woodcuts given in each part is indeed surprising. The text embraces an immense variety of topics, and though, of course, addressed principally to those who have already acquired some knowledge of art, there is much of interest for the general reader. Mrs. Hall's "Visits to Remarkable Places," are of this class; also, the "Autobiographical Sketches of different Painters." Such a publication as this must have an immense influence in refining the national taste, every department being conducted with an elegance and costliness of style which does equal credit to the accomplished editor and to the enterprising publisher; and yet the price places it within everybody's reach.

"The Squire Papers," &c. Mr. Carlyle, in his recently published third edition of "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," has appended to the second volume "the Squire Papers," which first came before the world about two years since in "Fraser's Magazine." For the benefit of those who purchased the former editions, they have also been published separately in a thin volume, uniform with them. Many of our readers were probably among the multitude who were sorely mystified by Mr. Carlyle's account of the Squire Papers, and by the very genuine-looking thirty-five letters from Cromwell's own hand which appeared in Fraser. The account was, no doubt, extraordinary enough to warrant a very careful scrutiny into the internal evidence for the truth of the thing, no other evidence being accessible. Nor is it very astonishing that a great many rather sharp-seeing people looked upon the thing as unworthy of credit, and believed the letters to be forgeries. But none of Mr. Carlyle's personal friends, and very few of those best calculated to pronounce judgment in the matter, had any doubt as to the genuine nature of the letters and the truth of Mr. Carlyle's statement of the way in which they came into his possession—strange and unprecedented as it was. We have now in this new edition of the "Squire Papers" a very characteristic preface, in which Mr. Carlyle says, "Scepticism, learned doubt, in regard to these 'Squire Papers,' I understand, is still the prevailing sentiment; and also that silence, and the reflection how small an interest, if any whatever, is involved in the matter, are the only means of removing doubt, and of leading us to the least miraculous explanation, whatever that may be. To myself, I confess, the phenomenon is, what it has always been, entirely inexplicable,—a miracle equal to any in Bollandus or Capgraves,—unless these Squire Papers are substantially genuine: and if their history on that hypothesis is very dim and strange, on the other hypothesis they refuse, for me at least, to have any conceivable history at all. Antiquarian philologies, &c. such as appeared in the late universal grand Squire controversy, never to be revived, had, naturally, no effect in changing one's opinion, and could have none. I have since had a visit—two visits—from the gentleman himself; have conversed with him twice, at large, upon the letters, the burnt journal, and all manner of adjacent topics; and certainly, whatever other notion I might form of him, the notion that he either would or could have himself produced a forgery of Cromwell letters, or been the instrument (for any consideration, much more for none,) of another producing it, was flatly inconceivable once for all. Nay, to hint at it, I think, would not be altogether safe for able editors within wind of this gentleman! So stands it as it has always stood, with myself, in regard to this small question."—Mr. Carlyle concludes his present remarks on the "Papers" by expressing a hope "that the public thinking of them (in silence, if I might advise) exactly what it finds most thinkable, will please to excuse me from further function in the matter; my duty in respect of them being now, to the last fraction of it, done; my knowledge of them being wholly communicated; and my care about them remaining, what it always was, close neighbour to nothing."

This Appendix contains besides the Squire Papers two things which will be of considerable utility to the student of the History of the Great Rebellion (or First Great Reform Movement); viz.—an alphabetical List of the Names of the Members of the Long Parliament, and Lists of the Eastern-Association Committees. The list of the Long Parliament was constructed by Mr. Carlyle for his own use while writing his book—"Cromwell's Letters and Speeches,"—The Committee Lists of the Eastern Association are taken, we are informed, from Husband's second Collection of all the Public Orders, Ordinances &c. of Parliament, from March 1642-3 to December 1646.

"A Class Book of English Poetry." By Daniel Scrymgeour. This is a work of some merit, and will, we have little doubt, become a regular school book. It consists of an Introductory Essay on the rise and progress of English Poetry, and of selections from the principal British poets from Chaucer to the present time, with short biographical notices. The Compiler seems to have considerable feeling for his subject and a knowledge of the ways and means best calculated to set the pupil thinking upon the art of building "the lofty rhyme."—His selections are generally good; but not always; there is a want of breadth, of taste, and maturity of judgment in some of the selections, and in the notes and biographical notices. We are afraid posterity will not concur in his opinions concerning the later Poets, especially the living ones; some whom he mentions among them, will not, we imagine, be found worthy the name of Poet fifty years hence. Besides several faults of taste and judgment throughout, there are inaccuracies which, in a book of this kind, cannot be overlooked. We have not space to note down the chief of these; let the following suffice as a specimen. In his preface the Compiler says that he has thought it "preferable to modernise the orthography of the earlier writers, except when old forms are required by the versification." It is certainly desirable to do so in a book for school-boys; but on what principle does he spell and accentuate the following lines which occur in his first extract from the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales?—

"Whanné that April with his showers sote."

why not (on his own principle) showers, and smallé? The rhythm absolutely requires this, and no good edition of Chaucer can authorize the other. There are many faults of this kind; and as the proper accentuation is professed to be set down for the benefit of the student, they are the less excusable.

"From Advent to Advent." By Mrs. Burbury. It is scarcely more than twelve months since we were called upon to speak in very high terms of a former work by this lady. The book before us is admirable, not alone for its really valuable and important instruction, but for the beautiful spirit of piety and christian love in which it is written. The weekly conversations with the children are gems, and show the authoress's deep knowledge of the temptations, trials, and tenderness of the childish heart. To all parents and teachers who have the welfare of their pupils at heart, we earnestly recommend it. It is a treasury of knowledge each one should possess, a guide to mothers in leading their children to loving and holy lives, and at the same time a family history so amusing that the great difficulty will be, not to induce young people to read it, but having once commenced, to lay it down.

"Scenes where the Tempter has Triumphed." By the author of "The Gaol Chaplain." 8vo. The object of this publication is to prove that there is no such thing as successful villany. This the author fails in doing, but he succeeds in presenting the world with a volume by no means devoid of merit. The criminal cases which he relates to prove the short-lived success of crime, are curious and extremely interesting, without making the reader in love with the criminals.

GLEANINGS.

FORCE OF CHARACTER.

LET no man doubt the omnipotence of nature, doubt the majesty of man's soul; let no lonely unfriended son of genius despair. Let him not despair, if he have the will—the right will; then the power also has not been denied him. It is but the artichoke that will not grow except in gardens; the acorn is cast carelessly abroad into the wilderness, yet it rises to be an oak; on the wild soil it nourishes itself, it defies the tempests, and lives for a thousand years.

LEGAL OPINION.

The book of deposing King Richard II. and the coming in of Henry IV., supposed to be written by Dr. Hayward, who was committed to the Tower for it, had much incensed Queen Elizabeth; and she asked Mr. Bacon, being then of her learned council, "Whether there were any treason contained in it?" Mr. Bacon, intending to do him a pleasure, and to take off the queen's bitterness with a merry conceit, answered, "No, Madam, for treason I cannot deliver opinion that there is any; but very much felony." The Queen apprehending it gladly, asked, "How, and wherein?" Mr. Bacon answered, "Because he has stolen many of his sentences and conceits out of Cornelius Tacitus."—Bacon.

DEBORAH'S DIARY,

A FRAGMENT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARY POWELL."

Bunhill Fields,
Feb. 17, 1865.

* * * * * something genial and soothing beyond ordinarie in y^e warmth and fitfulle lighte of y^e fire, made us delaye, I know not how long, to trim the evening lamp, and sitt in bemused idlennesse about the hearth; Mary revolving her thumbs and staring at y^e embers; Anne quite in y^e shadowe, with her arms behind her head agaynst y^e wall; father in his tall arm-charm, quite uprighte, as his fashion is when very thoughtfull, I on the cushion at his feet, with mine head on's knce and mine eyes on his shadowe on the wall, which, as it happened, shewed in colossal proportions, while ours were like pigmies. Alle at once he exclaims, "We all seem very comfortable—I think we shoulde reward ourselves with some egg-flip!"

And then offered us pnce for our thoughts. Anne would not tell hers; Mary owned she had been trying to account for y^e deficiencie of a groat in her housekeeping purse, and I confest to such a medley, that father sayd I deserved Anne's penny in addition to mine own, for my strength of mind in submitting such a farrago of nonsense to y^e ridicule of my friends.

Soe then I bade for his thoughts, and he sayd he had beene questioning the cricket on the hearth, upon the extinction of the fairies; and I askt, Did anie believe in 'em now? and he made answer, Oh, yes, he had known a serving wench in Oxon, deponc she had beene nipped and haled by 'em; and, of crickets, he sayd he had manie times scene an old wife in Buckinghamshire, who was soe pestered by one, that she cried, "I can't heare myself talk! I'd as lief heare nought as heare thee;" soe poured a kettle of boiling water into y^e cranny wherein the harmlesse creature lay, and scalded it to death; and, the next day, became as deaf as a stone, and remained soe ever after, a monument of God's displeasure, at her destroying one of the most innocent of his creatures.

After this, he woulde toll us of this and that worn-out superstition, as o' the friar's lantern, and of Loblie-by-the-fire, untill Mary, who affects not y^e unreaal, went off to make the flip. Anne presentlie exclaimed, "Father! when you sayd—

'The shepherds on the lawn
Or e'er the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row,
Full little thought they then
That the mighty Pan

Was kindly come to live with them below;

whom meant you by Pan? Sure, you would not call our Lord by the name of a heathen deity?"

"Well, child," returns father, "you know he calls Himself a Shepherd, and was in truth what Pan was onlie supposed to be, the God of shepherds; albeit, Lavaterus, in his treatise De Lemuribus, doth indeed tell us, that by Pan some understoode noe other than the great Sathanas, whose kingdom being overturned at Christ's coming, his inferior demons expelled and his oracles silenced, he in some sort was himself overthrown. And the story goes, that about y^e time of our Lord's passion, certayn persons sailing from Italy to Cyprus, and passing by certayn islands, did heare a voice calling aloud, Thamus, Thamus, which was the name of the ship's pilot, who, making answer to y^e unseene appellant, was bidden, when he came to Palodas, to tell that the great god Pan was dead; which he doubting to doe, yet for that when he came to Palodas, there suddainlie was such a calm of wind that the ship stooode still in y^e sea, he was constrainned to cry aloud that Pan was dead; wherewithall, there were hearde such piteous shrieks and cries of invisible beings, echoing from haunted spring and dale, as ne'er smote human ears before nor since: nymphs and wood-gods, or they that had passed for such, breaking up house and retreating to their own place. I warrant you, there was trouble among the Sylvan people that day—Satyrs hirsute and cloven-footed Fauns.

". . . . Many a time and oft have Charles Diodati and I discust fond legends, such as this, over our winter hearth; with our chesnuts blackening and crackling on the hob, and our o'er-ripe pears sputtering in the fire, while the wind raved without among the creaking elms. . . ."

Father still hammering on old times, and his owne young days, I beganne to frame unto myself an image of what he might have then beene: piecing it out by help of his picture on the wall, but coulde get no cleare apprehension of my mother, she dying soe untimelic. Askd him, was she beautifulle? He sayth, Oh yes, and clouded over o' the suddain; then went over her height, size, and colour, etc.; dwelt on y^e generalls of personal beauty, how it shadowed forth the mind, was desirable or dangerous, etc.

On dispersing for the night, he noted, somewhat hurt, Anne's abrupt departure without kissing his hand, and sayd, "Is she sulky, or unwell?"

In our chamber, found her already half undrest a reading of her Bible; sayd, "Father took your briefe good-nighte amisse." She made answer shortlie, "Well, what neede to marvell? he cannot put his arm about me without being reminded how mis-shapen I am."

Poor Nan! we had been speaking of faire proportions, and had thoughtlessly cut her to y^e quick; yet father knoweth, though he cannot see, that her face is as that of an angel.

About one o' the clock, was roused (though Anne continued sleeping soundly) by hearing father give his three signal-taps agaynst the wall. Half drest, and with bare feet thrust into slippers, I hastily ran in to him; he cried, "Deb, for the love of heaven get pen and paper to sett something down." I replied, "Lord, father, you gave me quite a turn; I thought you were ill," and sett to my task, marvellous ill-conditioned, expecting some crotchet had taken him concerning his will.

'Stead of which, out comes a volley of poetry he had lain a brewing till his brain was like to burst, and soe I in my thin night cotes must needs jot it all down for feare it s^d ooze away before morning. Sure, I thought he never would get to the end, and really feared at first he was crazing a little, but indeede all poets doe when y^e vein is on 'em. At length, with a sigh of relief, he says, "That will doe—good-night, little maid." I could not help saying, "'Twas a lucky thing for you, father, that step-mother was from home;" he laught, drew me to him, kissed me, and sayd, Why, your face is quite cold—are your feet unslipped?"

"Unstockinged," I replied.

"I am quite concerned I knew it not sooner," he rejoyned, in an accent of such kindnesse, that all my vexation melted away, and I e'en protested I did not mind it a bit.

"Since it is soe," quoth he, "I shall y^e less mind having recourse to you agayn; onlie I must insist on your taking care to wrap yourself up more warmly, since you need not feare my being ill."

I bit my lip, and onlie saying good-night, stole off to my warm bed.

Returning from morning prayers with Anne this forenoon, I found Mary mending a pen with the utmost imperturbabilitie, and father with a heat-spot on his cheek, which betrayed some inquietation. Being presentlie alone with him, "Mary is irretrievably heavy," sighs he, "she would let the finest thought escape one while she is blowing her nose or brushing up the cinders. I am confident she has beene writing nonsense even now—Do run through it for me, Deb, and lett me heare what it is."

I went on, enough to his satisfaction, till coming to "Bring to their sweetness no sobriety,"

"Sobriety?" interrupted he, "satiety, satiety! the blockhead! and that I should live to call a woman soe; sobriety indeede! poor Mary, her wits must have been wool-gathering. 'Bring to their sweetness noe sobriety!' What meaning coulde she possibly affix to such folly?"

"Sure, father," said I, "here's enough that she coulde affix no meaning to, nor I neither, without your condescending to explain it—cycle, empicycle, nocturnal rhomb."

"Well, well," returned he, beginning to smile, "'twas unlikely she shoulde be with such discourse delighted. Not capable, alas, poor Mary's ear, of what is high. And yet, thy mother, child, woulde have stretched up towards truths, though beyond her reach, yet, to the inquiring mind offering rich repast. And now write satiety for sobriety, if you love me."

While erasing the obnoxious word, I cried, "Dear father, pray answer me one question—what is a rhomb?"

"A Rhomb, child?" repeated he, laughing, "why, a parallelogram or quadrangular figure, consisting of parallel lines, with two acute and two obtuse angles, and formed by two equal and righte cones, joyned together at their base! There, are you anie wiser now? No, little maid, 'tis best for such as you

Not with perplexing thoughts
To interrupt the sweet of life, from which

God bath bid dwell far off all anxious cares
And not molest us, unless we ourselves
Seek them, with wandering thoughts and notions vain."

I wish to heaven our step-mother were back, albeit we are soe comfortable without her. Mary, taking the maids at unawares last night, found a strange man in the kitchen. Words ensued; he slunk off like a culprit, which lookt not well, while Betty Fisher, brazening it out, woulde have it first that he was her cousin, then her brother, and ended by vowing to be revenged on Mary when she lookt not for it. I would have had Mary speak to father, but she will not. Perhaps soe best; Polly is in the sulks to daye, as well as Betty, saying, "As well live in a Nunnerie."

When the horse is stolen, shut the stable door. Mary locked the lower doors and brought up y^e keys herselfe, yestereven at duske. Anon dropped in Doctor Paget, Mr. Skinner, and uncle Dick, soe that we had quite a merrie party. Dr. Paget sayd how that another case of y^e plague had occurred in Long-Acre; howbeit, this onlie makes three, soe that we trust it will not spread, though 'twoulde be unadvised to goe needleslie into y^e infected quarter. Uncle Dick would fayn take us girls down to Oxon, but father sayd he could not spare us while mother was at Stoke; and that there was noe prevalent distemper, this bracing weather, in our parish. Then felle a mazing; and uncle Dick, who loves a jest, outs with a large brown apple from's pocket, and holds it aneath father's nose. Sayth father, rousing, "How far phausy goes! thy voyce, Dick, carried me back to old dayes, and affected, I think, even my nose; for I could protest I snelled a Sheepscode apple." And, feeling himselfe touched by its cold skin, laught merrilie, and ate it with a relish; saying, noe sorte ever seemed unto him soe goode—he had received manie a hamper of 'em about Christmasse. After a time, alle but he and I went up, and out on y^e leads, to see the comet; and we two sitting quite still, and father, doubtlesse, supposed to be alone, I saw a great round-shouldered mannish shadowe glide acrossse y^e passage, and hearde y^e front-door latch click. Darted forthe, but too late, and then into y^e kitchen; with some warmth chid Betty for soe soone agayn disobeying orders, and threatened to tell my mamma. She cryed pertlie, "Law, Miss Deb, I wish to goodness your mamma was here to heare you, for I'd sooner have one mistress than three. A shadowe, indeede! I'm surc you saw no substance—very like, 'twas a spirit; or, liker still, onlie the cat. Here, puss, puss," . . . and soe into y^e passage, as though to look for what she was sure not to find. I had noe patience with her; but, returning to father, askt him if he had not hearde y^e latch click? He sayd No; and, indeede, I think, had been dozing; soe then sate still and be-thoughte me what 'twere best to doe. Three brains are too little agaynst one that is resolved to cheat. 'Tis noe goode complayning to a man; he will not see, even though unafflicted like father, who cannot. Men's minds run on greater things, and soe they are fretted at domestic appeals, and generally give judgment y^e wrong way. Thus we founde it before, poor motherlesse girls, to our cost; and I reallie believe it was more in kindnesse for us than himself, that father listened to y^e doctor's overtures in behalfe of Miss Minahull; for what companion is soe illiterate a woman to him? But he believed her gentle, hearde that she was a goode housewife, and apprehended she woulde be kind to us . . . Alas the daye! What tears we three shed in our chamber that night! and wished, too late, we had ne'er referred to him a grievance, nor let him know we had a burthen. Soone we founde King Log had been succeeded by King Stork; soone made common cause, tried our strength and founde it wanting, and soone submitted to our new yoke and tried to make the best of it.

Yes, that is y^e onlie course, we alle feel it; onlie, as ill luck will have it, we do not always feel it simultaneously. Anne, mayhap, has one of her dogged humours; Mary and I see how much better 'twould be, did she overcome it, or shut herself up till in better temper. Mary is crabbed and exacting; Anne and I cannot put her strait. Well for us when we succeed just soe far as to keep it from the notice of father. Thus we rub on; I wonder if we ever shall pull all together?

Like unto a wise master-builder, who ordereth the disposition of each stone till the whole building is fitly compacted together, so doth father build up his noble poem, which groweth under our hands. Three nights have I, without complaynt, lost my rest while writing at his bedside; this hath made me yawnish in the day time, or, as mother will have it, lazy. However, I bethink me of Damo, daughter of Pythagoras.

Mother came home yesterday, and Betty, the picture of neatnesse, tooke goode heede to be the first to welcome her, with officious smiles, and prayses of her looks. For my part, I thoughte it fullsome, but knew her motives better than mother, who took it alle in goode part. Indeece, noe one woulde give this girl credit for soe false a heart; she is pretty, modest looking, and for a while before my father's marriage, was as great a favourite with Mary as now with my mother; flattered her y^e same, and tempted her to idle gossiping and confidences. She was slow to believe herself cheated; and when 'twas as cleare as day, could not convince father of it.

On Mary's mentioning this morning (unadvisedlie, I think,) the kitchen visitor, mother made short answer, "Tilly-vally! bad mistresses make bad maids; there will be noe such doings now, I warrant. . . I am sure, my dear," appealing to father, "you think well in the main of Betty?" "Yes," says he smiling, "I think well of both my Betties." "At any rate," persists Mary, "the man could not be at once her cousin and brother." "Why no," replies father, "therein she worsened her story, by saying too much, as Dorothea did, when she pretended to have heard of the knight of La Mancha's fame, when she landed at Ossuna; which even a madman as he was, knew to be noe seaport. It requires more skill than the general possesse, to lie with a circumstance."

"Had a Valentine this morning, though onlie from Ned Phillips, whom mother is angry with, for filling my head betimes with such nonsense. Howbeit, I am close on sixteen.

Mary was out of patience with father yesterday, who, after keeping her a full hour at Thucydides, sayd, "Well, now we will refresh ourselves with a canto of Ariosto," which was as much a sealed book to her as t'other. Howbeit, this morning he sayd, "Child, I have noted your wearinesse in reading the dead languages to me; would to God I needed not to be beholden to any, whether bound to me by blood and affection or not, for the food that is as needfull to me as my daily bread. Nevertheless, that I be not further wearisome unto thee, I have engaged a young Quaker, named Elwood, to relieve thee of this portion of thy task, soe that thou mayest have the more leisure to enjoy the glad sunshine and fair sights I never more shall see."

Mary turned red, and dropt a quiet tear; but alas, he knew it not.

"One part of my children's burthen, indeed," he continued, "I cannot, for obvious reasons, relieve them of—they must still be my secretaries, for in them alone can I confide. Soe now to your healthfull exercises and fitting recreations, dear maids, and heaven's blessing goe with you!"

We kissed his hand and went, but our walk was not merry.

PIRATES OF THE INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO.

BETWEEN Australia and the mainland of India lies an island region that bears the palm of beauty from all other quarters of the world. It is alone in its splendour and its wealth. Green isles, without number, rise above calm and brilliant waters, in all diversity of outline, hue, and aspect, now separated by broad and sweeping seas, now clustered in brotherhood, and only divided by narrow winding channels. Coasts clothed with rich fertility, and studded with towns and hamlets, meet everywhere the navigator's view. Lofty mountains, dim and blue, rear themselves into the air; immense valleys and sloping pasture-lands stretch on all sides, and the primeval forest grows on plains and hills, where the traveller's foot has never left its impress. Beautiful rivers flow through these green and abundant lands, where grains and fruits and flowers flourish in a profusion only known in Eastern soils. Every diversity of magnificence, every rich material of commerce, and every form of beauty is there to be seen, for in all the world no more splendid region exists than the home of the Indian Islanders, in the remote and glowing East.

Commerce has sought them as the crown of its ambition, poetry has chosen them as the seat of its wildest fable, and ambition has selected them for the theatre of daring and bloody struggles. All nations that have grown wealthy through trade have flourished on the spoils of the exhaustless East, and fancy could revel in no more glittering scenes than those that abound among the wild Indian waters, while the conqueror's sword never reaped a richer harvest than from the plunder of the Spice Islands. It is not marvellous, therefore, that in all ages, and by all powers, the supremacy of the further East should have been contended for and prized as the rarest privilege of trade. Accordingly, from the period of the Portuguese discovery until the present day, contest has never ceased between the rival nations that have once seized a share in the dominion of the Indian Islands. That struggle has been carried on through different courses. While the rivals were rich, powerful, vigorous, and reckless, they fought by land and sea for the empire of the Archipelago; when their resources of courage, energy and wealth were weakened, they concluded treaties of peace—mere hypocritical conventions—and laboured in the same spirit through intrigues, conspiracies, and diplomatic notes. In course of time, patience and peace became wearisome, and new wars broke out, until, at the present day, it appears probable, after a long succession of such events, that more than one civilized power is sharpening the sword for a fresh conflict. Of course this frequent interruption of tranquillity has retarded trade and civilization at the same time; but there has been another and a more formidable enemy to commerce, an enemy which has from the remotest period preyed upon its vitals, and was threatening to destroy it altogether, when Sir James Brooke appeared upon the scene, and, assisted by his government, took up arms in the defence of trade, in the interest of humanity, and with the purpose of giving security to the peaceful and innocent tribes of the Archipelago.

That great enemy was the piratical system. A glance at it will show its extent, its power, its great and elaborate organization, its evils, and the imperative duty which attached to us, to root up and destroy it. It grew with the growth of time, and became so formidable, that trade, in many quarters of the Archipelago, was swept off the seas; whole tribes of peaceful people were compelled to adopt it in self-defence, and it was rising to such rapid elevation, that even some European powers became unequal to a conflict with it. The pirates of the Archipelago were not petty sea thieves, that roved the waters in solitary barks, and seized on the lonely unarmed trader, or plundered the fisherman's hut on the shore. They dwelt in large fortified towns; they peopled whole islands and provinces; they swarmed along the coasts, and issued from their strongholds in huge fleets, laying waste the maritime districts, burning cities and villages, carrying off the wealth of whole communities, capturing fleets of merchant prahus, taking innumerable heads, and seizing slaves without number. Some were governed by kings, and exercised sovereignty over large provinces; whilst others there were who dwelt in diminutive hamlets, equipped a few small boats, and carried on their petty operations by stealth. Between these extremes of the system were many other classes, occupying different elevations of power, and committing ravages in proportion to their capability. Among the most formidable of the pirate communities are the Illannuns of Magindanao.

They inhabit the shores of a great lake, situated near a bay on the western coast of that island. This is divided from the sea by a narrow strip of land, densely clothed with mangrove jungle, with groups of tall trees planted at intervals near the water. Among the branches of these are erected small wooden watch-houses, where sentinels are stationed on the look-out for a prize or an enemy, whose appearance they telegraph to the buccancers below. The mangrove grows down to the brink of the waves, and through its dense masses openings have been made, which are concealed from the eye by piles of bushes. Here ingeniously contrived escapes are constructed, over which the freebooting prahu, when chased by a superior force, is impelled by a simultaneous stroke of all the oars, and then ropes being suddenly attached, is hauled over wooden ways, rendered slippery by a peculiar greasy substance, and launched in the hidden lake. This feat has been frequently accomplished. On one occasion, a Spanish cruiser found on the beach of a barren island a wreck, and some Dyak sailors, who said they had been plundered of all they possessed, and only escaped slavery by the appearance of the European sail, when the Illannun prahu which had attacked them, suddenly made off in the direction of the Great Bay.

The Spaniard resolved to pursue the pirate, and soon saw him bearing rapidly away, with his broad sail extended, and his sixty oars in motion, steering towards Illannun. All the canvass was spread, and a swift pursuit commenced. The buccancer evidently lost ground, and the Spaniard was congratulating himself on the prospect of a prize, when lo and behold! the prahu, traversing the waters of the bay, ran headlong towards the shore; the jungle opened to receive her, and she vanished among the bushes. Of course, the Catholic crew, not accustomed to the piracy of those seas, wrote the affair down as a miracle; but the next moment, a storm of round shot and grape, bursting from concealed batteries among the mangroves, convinced them that some enemy of a most practical nature was ensconced behind; so the captain put his vessel about, and made off, not doubting what sort of ordnance the devil can use.

No traveller has ever seen the economy of the Illannun City of the Lake; but from the accounts of prisoners who have escaped, it appears a place of most extraordinary aspect. In the centre of the vast sheet of water, the vessels of war are moored in formidable ranks, with their lofty double decks, their strange contrivances for sailing, and their bulwarks bristling with small guns. When required for service, the prahus are equipped and stored, and when the fighting men in their scarlet attire have taken their stand on the upper deck, are rowed to the shore of the lake, and dragged upwards on the tramway, over which, impelled by numerous hands, they glide into the sea. Around the margin of the water are arranged the old vessels, which are unfit for war, and these form the habitations of that part of the community which rests at home while the others are abroad in quest of plunder. The Illannuns possess considerable wealth, and enjoy much comfort in their secluded abode. They extend their depredations through the length and breadth of the Archipelago, robbing, murdering, capturing ships and slaves, and, not even confining their attacks to native craft, frequently assault the European flag, and sometimes with success.

Next in power and atrocity to these are the Balanini, inhabiting the island whence they derive their name, which is merely a ring of land enclosing a lake, screened from observation, like the Bay of Illannun, by dense growths of mangrove. Instead of artificial escapes, however, these pirates use a narrow channel, so bristled with stakes, that only one vessel can pass at a time, and that only when steered by a pilot so intimately acquainted with the passage, as to keep the keel exactly in the centre. Thus the Spanish cruisers almost always fail to effect an entrance; and even did they by chance succeed, batteries, mounting more than a hundred guns, which point directly on the spot, would probably sink them without difficulty. At certain seasons, however, the whole of the men fit to carry arms, embark in their war prahus, and depart on a plundering cruise, leaving the defence of their stronghold to nature, accident, old men, women, and cripples. On one occasion, when Balanini was thus deserted, two Spanish vessels actually passed the channel, and entered the lagoon; but the heroes felt their ardour damped by the aspect of the pirate city on the lake, and effected nothing but—a precipitate retreat.

The Sarchas and Sakarans—ferocious buccancers of Borneo, whom some sympathetic gentlemen persist in styling simple and innocent—with other tribes and races, of whom an enumeration would exceed our limits, swell the numbers of the vast pirate population of the Indian Archipelago. Some dwell in enormous buildings on the banks of rivers, where they spend one portion of the year in retirement, living in luxury on the fruits of plunder, and then leaving their haunts to pillage and massacre wherever the weakness or wealth of the trader is sufficient to tempt or encourage their attacks. Others live in clustered huts amid the jungle on the beach; others inhabit small, remote islands; and others, building large towns at the mouths of rivers, defied, until recently, every force brought against them. They placed whole coasts in a state of complete blockade; they intercepted the merchant on the high seas; and many branches of commerce were completely destroyed by their ravages. To detail, however, all the features of the system, would require more space than we can now bestow on the subject, and to describe it imperfectly would be of little use. Perhaps, therefore, the reader will be interested by a few anecdotes, incidents and adventures, illustrating the simple innocence of the pirates in the Indian Archipelago. Some of these have already been told in other quarters, but some we derive from private sources. They may be related at random.

Raja Raga, a distinguished pirate chief, was accosted, some years ago, to devastate the coast of Java, and once attacked a large English brig, with two Europeans and thirty Javans on board, and captured it. Emboldened by this success, he sailed towards Celebes, and, when within one day's sea-journey of Macassar, saw a huge square-rigged vessel slowly steering away. She appeared some leviathan merchantman. Not a sign of martial purpose appeared; not a gun, not even a swivel could be seen, and she seemed desirous of escaping to Singapore. Elated by the prospect of so grand a prize, Raja Raga loaded all his cannons and small arms, ordered his crew to make ready, and steered close beneath the shadow of the strange ship. A shower of balls was poured in, and the pirate prepared to board. But the next moment a sight presented itself at which his heart must have sickened. Along the whole length of the disguised man-of-war a double line of ports slowly opened, and the muzzles of her ponderous guns protruded with fearful significance. A tremendous volley burst from the side of the English vessel, and she sailed on her way alone,—for the pirate prahu was at the bottom of the sea, leaving only on the surface a few fragments of wreck, and two or three of her crew, who were picked up by some humane fisherman. This is a commentary on the assertion made by certain statesmen, that the freebooters never attack square-rigged ships. They do attack them; and vessels sailing under Dutch, Spanish, American—ay, and English flags, have been the prizes of their boldness.

Most readers have heard of the sea-gipsies of the Indian Archipelago. Their innocent and primitive life has been the fertile theme of fable. In their little white-sailed barques they used to skim over the placid waters of narrow and sheltered seas, subsisting on fish, fruits, roots, and grains, and passing their time in merry voyages through those sunny waters, with songs and music, making sweet melody in every spot they visited. But they have now been almost wholly scattered or destroyed. The pirates, attacking their defenceless fleets, have slaughtered the men, and borne the women and children into slavery; so that now only a few solitary families—and those degraded from their original innocence—maintain the memory of the gipsy race. The tribes of the Archipelago have preserved many of their adventures in the unwritten records of tradition. There was once, they say, a chief of the sea-gipsies, who sailed from place to place with more than a hundred boats. One night this fleet anchored in a pleasant creek, overhung with a drapery of foliage, and lit up by the moon, where the barques were arranged in regular order to pass the night. Fires were kindled on deck, and soon the whole scene was illumined by their flames; while the gipsies, after preparing and partaking of a simple meal, sat down to sing and play on their rude instruments of music. So the time was spent until midnight, when most of them, wearied by the fatigues of the day, had gradually withdrawn from the convivial groups, and sought rest in the arms of sleep. At length only two young men were left sitting by the fire, and these, being sleepless, descended on the land, and sought among the jungle for fruits, as the moonlight fell brilliantly on the whole landscape. Suddenly a wild shrill cry sounded along the shore; hundreds of dark forms were seen tumultuously hurrying down the surrounding slopes, and a multitude of large, cumbrous prahus bore up to the entrance of the creek; while gongs, rattawas, and drums maintained a hoarse concert of martial tones, to animate the warriors to their task. These were the pirates of Mambakut, who had left their river on a kidnapping cruise, and fallen in with the gipsies, directed by the light of the fires, and the sounds of merriment. The startled sleepers sprang from their slumbers, rushed to seize their arms, but fell by scores before they knew the nature and number of their enemies. But the young men on shore joined fiercely in the fray, which lasted until dawn, when the gipsies were all captured, slaughtered, or so maimed that they were helpless. Then the pirates embarked with their captives, gave the coup de grace to those who were dangerously wounded, and went rejoicing on their way. The two young men, however, escaped, and joined a fleet of Bugis merchants, near Kylie, in Celebes. Assisted by some of the Koti traders, they pursued the buccanering fleet, came up with it at the entrance of the river Mambakut, in Borneo, and fought a battle, in which they remained victors. But the gipsy chief, with his tribe scattered, his wife killed, and most of his friends dead, abandoned the simple life which his forefathers had led for years, and, not long after, was himself in command of a buccanering squadron, revenging on the peaceful traders of the Archipelago the wrongs he had suffered from the pirates of the Mambakut. This relation illustrates the corrupting influence of the freebooting system on the populations of the Archipelago. It is a fact placed beyond doubt by experience, that numerous tribes, formerly addicted to the pacific pursuits of commerce, have taken to piracy, when, unable to trade in peace, they have found themselves without other means of subsistence. Several chiefs of large communities have declared that they preferred traffic to plunder; but that the only way to be secure from pillage was to unite in the brotherhood of robbers.

The atrocities committed by the Sarebas and Sakaran pirates are equal in ferocity, if not in extent, to those of any class among the Indian pirates. Any traveller that sails up the Kaluka river in Borneo may observe the speaking evidence of their harmless innocence. The river rolls its broad current between banks once beautiful and fertile, now red with blood, and black with ashes. Wasted fields alternate along its course with forests of the sago palm, while gardens and plantations lie in neglected luxuriance, without a soul to tend them; at intervals, the charred skeleton ruins of burnt towns mark the scenes of former prosperity. The shores of this stream were once peopled by peaceful and industrious tribes, who annually collected the produce of their soils, floated it down over the waters to the sea, and delivered it there to the charge of the traders bound for Singapore. These transported it to that settlement, and there exchanging it for articles of English or Indian manufacture, bore back to the tribes of the Kaluka the well-earned price of their industry. But the Sarebas and Sakaran pirates, witnessing the flourishing condition of those communities, attacked them by sea and land, and enforced a heavy tribute. This was frequently repeated during a long period, until at length the Kaluka people, robbed of their gains, and dispirited by frequent pillage, abandoned their lands, and fled ere the next visit of the freebooters, who satiated their ferocity by the destruction of all the towns, villages, and plantations. The sago and cocoa groves were left, but their riches decay with every season, as none dare come to collect the fruit. At this day, therefore, the banks of the river present the melancholy spectacle of an abandoned region, once fertile, and the home of a happy population, now desolated by the irruptions of "meek and harmless natives." Probably the Kaluka tribes have at length themselves turned pirates.

One profitable branch of the pirate traffic illustrates a singular feature in the civilization of those regions. The Chinese emigrate in great numbers from the Celestial Empire, and settle among the Indian Islands, especially at Singapore, where their national talent for cheating is offered a wide scope. They erect for themselves comfortable habitations, and amass large fortunes. At first they usually came with the idea of returning to their own country, but gradually settled down as colonists in their snug homes, with their money-bags and opium pipes. But with a Chinaman at Singapore, as with all other men in any other part of the world, a good house, a full purse, and a pleasant pipe, cannot compensate for one deprivation—a wife. So, at least, these settlers thought, and revolved in their minds how the loss was to be supplied. We all know the rigorous laws of China on this subject. No woman is allowed, under any circumstances, to emigrate; and the edicts of the barbarian despot are sufficiently rigorously enforced, so that a case of elopement is unheard of. The merchants, indeed, say that should such an event occur, the friends of the frisky lady, if they were not put to death, would be compelled to pay an amount of what is ingeniously called hush-money, that would ruin a rich man. Consequently the damsels of China, though they elope from their parents,—and sometimes from their husbands,—among themselves, never quit the soil of their birth, and the Singapore colonists must look elsewhere for wives. But the ready wit of a Celestial, assisted by the elastic conscience of a Malay, has obviated the difficulty. The respectable Chinese merchants of Singapore entered into a convention with the pirates to take annually so many score of youthful maidens, at a fixed price, to be educated as their future wives. The kidnapping of these children, therefore, is carried on to a great extent along the coasts of the larger islands, and among the little groups near the Anambas and Natunas. The damsels of the Indian Isles are also in request at Sulu, at the courts of all the petty chiefs, and, probably, in the Dutch towns. When, therefore, a pirate-fleet puts to sea from any island, one of the chief purposes of its equipment is the capture of slaves. With some communities, indeed,—the Illannuns among them,—it is a rule to take only prisoners, gold, silver, gums, spices, and such other costly merchandise as is easy to transport and difficult to identify. With those of Borneo, however, when the recent operations took place, our countrymen discovered in some of the towns English anchors, guns, barrels of powder,—some marked with the broad arrow, as government property,—with an immense quantity of other cumbrous and heavy stores, evidently the plunder of European ships. A little girl, probably English or German, has been found and placed in charge of a missionary at Sarawak. She is too young to tell her tale, but doubtless it is singular and strange. Perhaps her parents have been murdered; perhaps they still sorrow for her loss, and hope for her recovery. Where they are, and how long the child may have been a forced rover with pirates, is a mystery.

The description of a pirate cruise may illustrate the formidable features of the system, and we give it as collected from the information supplied by recent writers on the spot. We may suppose a large fleet, similar to that lately destroyed by Sir James Brooke, to be collected on the coast of Borneo. Messages are despatched to the chiefs of the allied tribes to prepare their prahus, their arms, and their warriors. The large vessels are usually kept in creeks, near the mouths of rivers, under the guardianship of a town or village, embosomed amid masses of jungle and forest, and defended by booms and stakes. The dwellers on the most distant banks of the streams are summoned by messengers. They muster their forces, and embark in canoes. Should their course lead them past any powerful communities inimical to them, they case their paddles in soft bark, and, putting themselves in motion at sunset, drop down the river by night. No dip, no word, no other sound breaks the stillness. One by one the little boats are impelled along, swiftly but noiselessly. Avoiding the open waters, they creep under the shadow of the woody banks, and at break of dawn screen themselves in the jungle. Monkeys, wild hogs, and serpents, form during these few days their simple food, and are killed with poisoned darts blown through sumpitans, or hollow reeds. Occasionally even these supplies fail, and, as there is no room in the canoes for provisions, want is severely felt. Among the pirates of the Koti river, the chiefs have been known on such emergencies to cut off the head of a man, hang it up among the trophies of the tribe, and eat his flesh. If by the way a small hamlet is discovered at a safe distance from any powerful settlement, it is attacked by night, wrapped in flames, and desolated by these fierce but stealthy marauders.

Reaching the point of rendezvous, the freebooters throw off concealment, rush on board the prahus, sound their martial instruments, hoist flags, and fire guns in anticipation of triumph. Then the squadron is unmoored, and, one after the other, the prahus put to sea, proceeding to join the great fleet at some appointed place of rendezvous. Thus a formidable armada is collected, which takes its departure, and seldom separates until scenes of death and devastation have taken place, on which none can dwell without a shudder. For us, indeed, in the security of our island, amid peace, civilization, and Christianity, this piracy has its features of terror. Perhaps many of those who view this sketch may dwell in lonely places, where they are sometimes visited by fear of the midnight burglar. Sitting in the silent house at night, they may think of dangers from robbery and murder. Perhaps a rustle, a creak, a footstep may break the stillness, and the blackened face of some huge villain may peer in at a door or window. On such occasions they know their own thoughts better than we can describe them; and if so, what a miserable state of existence must be that of the simple tribe of fishermen, in constant dread of pirates! The hamlet stands on the shore, peaceful, defenceless, and exposed to all attacks. The villagers are harmless, innocent, industrious. They do wrong to none, and deserve no injury from others. But when the day dawns they know not whether the sun may not set on a smoking pile of ruins; and when the evening closes whether it may not rise on a little wilderness, where the blackened remnants of their dwellings, dead bodies of men, women, and children, the humble wealth of the tribe strewn about, betoken the visit of a pirate fleet, while those who have escaped the massacre have been hurried into hopeless slavery.

From such dangers Sir James Brooke, aided by our brave countrymen in the naval service, is seeking to deliver the innocent tribes of the Archipelago, and, while he has their thousand blessings on his head, he will despise the slanders of a few jealous enemies. The opinion of the English nation is with him, and this, with the grateful attachment of the peaceful islanders, will be his support against the attacks of a handful of pseudo-humanitarians, ignorant, as they are of the real facts of the case.

The fleet sails out to sea. It presents a splendid spectacle. Perhaps a hundred and forty war prahus of large size and powerfully armed, with more than two thousand men on board, are arrayed and equipped for plunder. The vessels are of various builds, some with lofty decks, crowded with warriors in bright scarlet attire, profusely accoutred with flashing arms; some broad, cumbrous sea-carriages; some, graceful, tapering vessels, adorned at the lofty pointed prows with plumes, as it were, of the palmetto palm-leaf; while the buccaneers themselves, variously clad with a diversity of weapons, throng the decks. Below, ranged in banks, as in the galleys of classic times, on Salamis, the oarsmen ply their labour, and impel the barques along. The fleet sails for its first destination. If this be a town or village—generally built on the shores of a bay—on the coast, the vessels are ranged along the outer waters, while a few are detached to the attack. If the enemy be weak, the assault is made by day, when the pirates crowd to the shore, land, surround the place, fling brands among the houses, and killing the old, the weak, the maimed, and the useless, with all who resist, make captives of the rest. These are bound and taken on board. In case of an overwhelming attack from an English vessel, or rival pirate, or a powerful trading chief, they slaughter the women thus taken, cutting off their heads, and gashing them from shoulder to heel with ferocious cruelty. This occurred in the late conflict. The piratical Malay is so bloodthirsty, that in the last hour of his life he will satiate his horrid appetite on a defenceless victim in revenge for the punishment inflicted by a superior enemy. Injured lambs!

Perhaps the next object of the expedition will be the communities on the bank of some river like the Kaluka. Then the pirate fleet, extending itself in a long line, boldly dashes along; the first prahu enters the stream with flags displayed, music sounding, and shouts echoing back from the banks. Sometimes a fleet of equal power is encountered by the way, when a friendly barter in the profits of plunder takes place. One after the other the vessels push up the stream; a brilliant, lengthened, strange array, leaving on both sides tracks of plunder, collecting heads for trophies, and merchandise for booty. On the return voyage, any village that may have escaped is ransacked, and when the freebooters again emerge on the sea, the river rolls through a melancholy waste, deserted, blood-stained, and desolate. A new infliction has fallen on the peaceful tribes; a new triumph is added to the bloody records of pirate history; and the civilized friends of the system have new facts to add to their accounts of the simple innocence of the Borneo buccaners.

But it is the night attack that is most fearful. A body of pirates, landing after sunset, on the shores of some thinly peopled province, conceal themselves until all the population has sunk in slumber. The night in those regions is beautiful beyond fancy. The stars are large and lustrous; the moon's broad, bright face, silvers the wood and the water with her smiles, and the soft winds, sighing among the forests, lull all nature to sleep. Some doomed village lies in the repose of a sequestered glade, in the depth of a shady wilderness. The tribe, having enjoyed the evening repast, with the song, the music and the dances which are hereditary with those savages, as wisdom is with our peers, is scattered in groups in the long building, elevated on posts, which forms the dwelling of the whole community. The Dyak has retired to the comfort of the hollow tree, suspended against the wall, that serves as his couch. Covered over with a fine mat, he sleeps, and dreams of Sabayan—the happy hunting-ground of the Indian Islander. The fire, which is never allowed to expire, smoulders, and emits only a dull red glow that lightens through the dusky room. Now and then a form rises from one of the coffin-shaped receptacles along the wall, and a Dyak comes forth to blow up the embers and warm himself.

Meanwhile, the scene without is still more wild and strange. Encircling the village, but concealed in the gloom of the jungle, the pirate host has spread itself around, strongly guarding every path, and preparing to celebrate with the din of triumph the fiery and bloody sacrifice. Now they lie silent and motionless grasping their arms, and awaiting the signal of assault. The village has relapsed into utter stillness. Nothing but the low whisper of the wind, and the ripple of the neighbouring river, can be heard. Then one crafty robber, drawing the ready-kindled brand from its concealment behind a bush, crawls with stealthy steps towards the building, and dexterously throws the lighted billet on the roof of thick Atap thatch—combustible as straw. Others follow his example, and soon, from several portions of the structure, rise small light flames, that creep upwards and spread with a low hissing sound, until, communicating with the timbers and the walls, they join each other, and the whole edifice bursts into a blaze that shines far and wide over the forest, with a roar that calls up its inmates—too late for safety. The pirates now, with yells and shouts, rush forward, and as the startled wretches leap madly from the raised platform on which the dwelling is elevated, seize or cut them down without mercy or remorse. There is little struggle. The buccaners enjoy an easy triumph, and before dawn the village is level with the earth; its site is a black spot, strewn with the headless and mangled dead; the captives are in the pirate-prahu, and the pirates themselves are again on their bloody track, to earn new trophies and new wealth, by new atrocities and new destruction of life. Thus are the peaceful islanders immolated at the shrine of that gigantic system whose savage votaries may find something to plead in excuse, in the truth, that they are encouraged by writers and orators in civilized and Christian lands. In picturing the outline of these scenes, whose minute details are too horrid to describe, we merely sketch incidents as common in Borneo, as highway robberies were once on Hounslow Heath.

In those portions subject to Sir James Brooke, the system has been ended, and the peaceful tribes bless him for it; but in other districts it continues with little abated vigour, while the pirate-powers lately defeated have sent ambassadors to promise that they will never again equip piratical fleets: a sufficient answer to those gentlemen who have had the temerity to describe them as innocent and simple traders. They should have instructed their protégés to plead, Not guilty, since the accused, conscious of injured and maligned innocence, seldom acknowledge their crimes, profess repentance, and vow amendment.

Our readers have probably already heard the account of the destruction of Palo, a village of houses erected on posts forty feet in height. The Kanowit people—allies of the Sarebas and Sakaran pirates—required the inhabitants to join them in a plundering cruise. They refused, and in revenge, the freebooters marched by night to their dwellings, crept along the ground under shelter of huge shields, hacked away the lofty wooden pillars, and retiring just as the buildings tottered to their fall, enjoyed a massacre of the maimed and helpless, who lay struggling among the ruins. All they could capture alive and uninjured, they carried away as slaves.

To acquire an idea of the imperial manner in which the pirates carry on their depredations, it may be mentioned, that in 1834 the Illannuns descended on an island near the Straits of Rhio, and swept off the whole population to a man; while, ten years later, Sheriff Hausman, a noted buccaneer, equipped a fleet of two hundred war-prahus, and committed such havoc that whole coasts were deserted by their peaceful populations, and scores of merchant vessels were prevented from carrying on their usual trade. The injury thus done to commerce is beyond calculation, and until the recent active operations the system, so far from declining, was in a rapid growth. In 1843, indeed, the Dutch war-ships off the Java shores were repeatedly attacked and worsted, while the armed vessel stationed at Ternate is hailed with mock compliments by the sarcastic rovers, who make every demonstration of contempt as they sail by. English vessels disappear, and are never heard of. Their crews vanish, and no record of them is ever found, unless, as in recent cases, on the attack of some pirate town, an anchor, a cask, a bale of merchandise, a parcel of woman's apparel, or, as already noticed, a fair-skinned child, with blue eyes and bright locks, is found, as the memento of some fearful disaster.

Doubtless, the whole country is well acquainted with the details of the recent conflict, but from a private letter from an eyewitness, which was published in the United Service Magazine, it will be noticed that the pirates actually fired the first shot, and maintained their furious and incessant volleys for five or six hours. That they failed in committing slaughter was, therefore, the fault of their bad gunnery, not the result of their harmless innocence. But we need not insist on these points. Our readers, we feel assured, have no connexion with that small cabal of pseudo-philanthropists whose sympathies are all for the thousands of bloodthirsty Malays, Illannuns, and Balanini pirates that prey on the millions of peaceful, trade-loving natives.

Every work, by every author, published within many years, corroborates the view we take, and while so many authorities combine to show the necessity for destroying this system, the British public will not be deluded by the misrepresentations of ignorant economists, who take part with the shedders of blood against the harmless and the peaceful. But the natives by myriads bless England for her assistance. Peace and prosperity follow the operations of our countrymen, and the gratitude of those races will be their ample reward. "The Dyak knows—the whole world knows, that the white man is a friend of the Dyak," is an expression which has passed into a proverb, a household word, by a thousand happy hearths, once in constant danger of desolation by pirates, now secure under the shadow of British power. Therefore, we repeat, in spite of the enmity of a clique of ignorant babblers, let Sir James Brooke pursue the course he has commenced, and while his name is blessed by millions of the Indian Islanders, he will find it no less respected by the sensible, the unprejudiced, and the humane English public.

GARLANDS AND THEIR USES.

BY MRS. WHITE.

THE adoption of flowers as ornaments is, probably, as old as the history of Paradise, where they first blossomed, and where we could imagine Eve, with the sinless love of beauty which prompts the same action in innocent childhood, weaving them in her hair, beside her shadow, glassed in some still pool of that river that went out of Eden to water it. In later days, their ever-rejoicing looks made them the natural accompaniments of triumph and gladness, while their innocence and fragrance rendered them, with as beautiful a propriety, the peace-offerings of welcome and good-will. Of all these uses we have evidences old as Scripture history; and it was doubtless from the ancient Hebrews that the Persians borrowed their fondness for floral adornment, just as the Greeks, with their quick sense of the beautiful, carried the taste (a fair spoil for war!) home to the Athenian cities, whence it diffused itself to Rome, and, in the course of time, became transplanted wherever her conquering cohorts or her colonies appeared. The poetical exclamation of Solomon, so highly Anacreontic, without its context,—“Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds before they be withered, and let no flower of the spring pass by us!”—alludes to the custom of wearing garlands as distinctly as does Horace in his charming ode, where, affecting to scorn the grandeur of a Persian feast, and the effeminacy of flowery chaplets, he confesses to displaying a wreath of myrtle at his bachelor-board. Not less illustrative of their charmed uses in those early days is that graphic passage in the apocryphal Book of Judith, which describes the terrified inhabitants of Ascalon and the sea-coast, when the armies of the Assyrian swept the plain of Damascus, in the “time of wheat harvest,” with fire and sword, sending out ambassadors to Holofernes, captain of the king's host, and receiving him with garlands instead of a flag of truce;—precisely the picture which Forbes gives us, in his “Oriental Memoir,” of the reception of travellers in the hospitable province of Guzeret, where the stranger is not only offered all the simple necessaries of Eastern life, but the women and children come forth to meet him at the entrance of the village, and present him with wreaths of flowers. How curiously corroborative of the fidelity of Biblical description, and the slow change of customs in the East! for Holofernes received his garlands in the fifth age of the world, and Forbes his experiences but a few short years back.

Theophrastus, who wrote a great deal about flowers, has left a list of those used by the Greeks in their decorations, which gives, almost verbatim, the inventory of an English cottage garden, wanting its lavender, pinks, rockets, and carnations. They had their roses, violets, gilly-flowers, and white lilies, with larkspur, hyacinths, Iris and Narcissus,—“an odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds,” but few in number. With these the banquet was adorned, the bride dressed, and the corse laid in the grave; for we read, that when the family of Pericles were one by one perishing of the plague, he, who had hitherto supported his bereavement with uncommon fortitude, gave way at the funeral of his last child; and, while placing (according to the custom of the country) a garland of flowers on the head of the corpse, broke forth into loud lamentations and a torrent of tears. Who does not feel the pathos of this incident, and imagine the anguish of the desolated father, crowning his last-born for the grave? In Italy, they still weave the pale blue blossoms of the periwinkle, which has there the sorrowful name of the death-flower, into wreaths for their dead infants,—a custom, probably, as old as the palmy days of Rome, when the passion for floral decorations was at its height, and laws became necessary to restrain it.

It is a curious fact in the history of flowers, that a parallel circumstance has occurred in modern times; and that, during the prevalence of the tulip mania in Holland, sumptuary restrictions had to be resorted to to prevent persons ruining themselves in their absurd competition to possess them. Amongst the Greeks and Romans the manufacturing of natural wreaths must have been as distinct an occupation as the making of artificial ones with us, and a far more generally encouraged one, since a garland was not then a matter of taste, but of fashion, and each circumstance required its own. How exquisite must have been the taste of these artistes we may infer from the description of a few of their wreaths, and the circumstance that painters occasionally copied them as models. What a delicate image, for instance, is that of a Greek bride!—white lilies interwoven with ears of corn—how chastely elegant, and how propitious! White lilies—in after times dedicated to the Virgin—were at this period sacred to Venus; while the corn in the ear must have implied the same symbolical meaning as the priest scattering its grains over the head of the bride. Our autumn wreaths of corn-poppy and barley, or bearded wheat, without the “bluets” and ox-daisies, which are sometimes added to them, are identical with those used at the sacred rites of Ceres; and, strange to say, the ceremony and the wreaths are not yet wholly exploded, but survive—remnants of Gothic usages, gathered from old

Rome—in some of the most secluded German valleys. Only two years since a friend, describing the bringing home of harvest at Ingelfingen, a village of Württemberg, writes thus:—“To-day the first of the rye was brought home; and I wish you could have seen the pretty ceremony in consequence. The clergyman, schoolmasters, and children (the girls all dressed in white, with garlands of corn flowers on their heads,) met the van on the bridge outside the gate, and entered the town singing—and you cannot imagine anything more touchingly imposing, than the appearance of the procession as it emerged from under the old archway into the open sunshine; the oxen, with festoons of flowers binding their horns—and the wain oscillating under its golden freight, and wreathed with autumn chaplets—while two young girls, who had been helping to reap, walked behind, with their hair bound with wreaths, each carrying a sheaf in her hand. They came to a stand still in the middle of the street, and sang a hymn under our windows; and when the waggon reached the granary, all the people turned into the church to give thanks for the first fruits of the abundant harvest.”

Can anything be more simply beautiful than the images in this written picture? A procession of Ceres in the eighteenth century christianized, if I may so express it. The pastor leading the solemnity, like a priest of old—the white-robed children—the waving sheaves—the oxen (those scriptural helps to husbandry) with strings of flowers on their patient brows—the garlands themselves—offerings from the breast of Tellus to the God of all creation! It is like a bit of antique bas-relief unburied from the gardens of old Rome. There was at Corinth a religious festival, in honour of what divinity I quite forget, at which the boys who preceded the goddess—the Pagan types of Catholic Acolytes—wore white vestures, and garlands of blue hyacinths on their heads. At funeral ceremonies, wreaths of yellow daffodils were used. They were sacred (for every flower was dedicated to the gods) to Proserpine, and were significant of sleep. Shakspeare with classical propriety, makes it one of the scattered garlands she “let fall from Dis’s waggon.” And it served the purpose of a floral chloroform with old herbalists, numbing the sinews, and causing drowsiness.

One wonders, when reading of the profusion in which flowers were used, where they could all have come from. The environs of cities in those days, but of Rome especially,—where, as luxury increased, the demand for them became excessive—must have been a recurring scene of rosaries and gardens—fields upon fields of hyacinths, acres upon acres of white lilies, with groves of evergreens, and meadows of asphodelus, and those “eyes of heaven,” as the Egyptians called the Iris—equalling, if not excelling, the flowery plains in the vicinity of Haarlem. Every ceremony, religious, civic, or festal, had its garland; while love, then as now, spoke the language of flowers, and made some local Glycera its interpreter. Wherever festivities or rejoicings were held, garlands were hung upon the gates, the walls of banqueting rooms were adorned with them, and by their presence at the feast they refined the gross pleasures of the table. Certain odours were said to refresh the spirits and facilitate the functions of the brain,—hints that were not lost upon the wits of a party when making choice of their garlands,—while the gourmands (and that such existed in Rome, out of the imperial circle, who can doubt?) knew well where to find those that had the quality of arousing a fainting appetite. The morbid man might, perhaps, come crowned with the fringy green leaves and white-rayed flowers of artemisia or mugwort, which, Pliny tells us, preserved those who wore it from hurtful medicine and evil beasts, but that they should not be merry;—while the lover of temperance might counteract the strategy of the bacchanalians, by twining his roses with an ivy wreath, between which plant and wine there existed, according to Cato, a very great antipathy. Rosemary was supposed to be a strengthener of the memory; and testy, disputatious old gentlemen, possibly prepared themselves by adopting it; while the esquites chose their wreaths according to their complexions, and revelled through the whole catalogue of floral colours.

(1) The mistress of the painter Pausias, celebrated for her taste and ingenuity, in making flower wreaths.

As luxury is, in point of fact, the opposite of content—never satisfied with what nature freely offers, but valuing things chiefly for the difficulty and high price at which they are attained,—the Romans prized flowers most, as vegetables are prized at Covent Garden, when out of season; and we hear of Nero expending the almost incredible sum of 30,000*l.* on roses for a single supper. It was an occasional caprice of this delicate monster, to have a shower of them poured over him while he feasted,—a piece of recherche extravagance, which throws Cleopatra's banquet chamber, strewed to the depth of a cubit with their petals, quite in the shade; but Helioabalus surpassed them both; and, not contented with the flowery carpet of the Egyptian queen, or the fragrant bath of the imperial player, caused an apartment to be half filled with them, and amused himself by smothering his courtiers amongst them. Horace speaks of beds of roses; which accounts for the Sybarite's complaint of the crumpled leaf; and Cicero reproaches Verres for having made the tour of Sicily in a litter, seated on roses, and festooned with flowers. Amongst the ancient Jews, houses were decked at Easter with wreaths of roses; and "feasts of roses,"—the probable type of the Roman Floralia, vestiges of which survive with us wherever village children still bear about the May-day garland,—were amongst the most gorgeous of the Persian festivals. The constant presence of these flowers at the banquets of the Romans eventually rendered the rose symbolical of secrecy; because it was a law of social honour, that whatever was said beneath these festive chaplets went not beyond the walls they decorated. A rose was anciently sculptured over the doors of the sacristy in Catholic churches; and hence came the term "sub rosa." As the beauty and odour of this flower in Pagan times, caused it to be dedicated to Venus, it afterwards reverted to the Virgin, and in ecclesiastical architecture we find an ornament composed of the wild single species "rosa eglantaria," such as appears in the borderings of the Cathedral de Notre Dame of Amiens, especially dedicated to the blessed Marie, whose chapels are ever redolent of rosy offerings, and her image generally adorned with them. In almost every country flowers have formed the fitting ornaments of brides; and lilies, with spotless corollas, and golden tongues—white roses—the fragrant jasmine, and the orange blossom, have been the favourite materials for them.

A vervain hat is sometimes presented to brides in Germany, where the belief in the influences of this plant, if not virtually felt, exists in shadows. There the peasants still gather it, and hang it in the sheds, to protect their cattle from witchcraft,—a notion not yet quite extinguished in the remoter parts of England, any more than in Ireland and the Highlands. No one who sees this simply elegant little plant by the wayside, with its dark green branching stems, and slender spikes of purplish or blue-grey blossom, can at all comprehend the source of its mysterious powers. Amongst the Romans it formed an important item in religious decorations; their priests wore wreaths of it, the altars were garlanded with it, and the very brooms with which the ashes of sacrifice were removed, were composed of the sacred plant,—practices undoubtedly borrowed from the Egyptians, from whom the Druids had previously introduced the superstitious use of it into Britain. By them it was only gathered at certain hours, with the magic ceremony of a sword-drawn circle; and a libation of broken honeycomb and new milk was poured upon the earth, as an atonement for depriving it of so sacred a deposit. Its official virtues, doubtless heightened by the faint halo of superstition still clinging to it, gave it a high place in the estimation of the old simplers; and not a hundred years since, it was used as an amulet by persons suffering from scrofula, and worn with a yard of white satin ribbon about the neck.

The use of flowers at funerals is as wide spread, and, in all probability, of as ancient an origin, as their presence at bridal. Traces of the custom are found everywhere throughout Europe, and remnants of it still exist in isolated villages of this country and in different parts of Ireland and Wales. I remember to have seen the funeral of a child in Essex, where the bearers, six young girls, clad in white, had each a bouquet of flowers in her hand, and others were laid upon the little coffin; and in Ireland our flower garden was always put under contribution to furnish forth the funeral tables, on the occurrence of a poor neighbour's wake. Spearmint, tansy, southernwood, rosemary, and rue, seem favourite plants on such occasions; probably from a belief in the sympathy of strong odours which were supposed to draw others to themselves, and in this way they might be looked upon as disinfectants. But in Wales we could almost imagine that rosemary retained the same significance it had in Shakspeare's time, and meant "remembrance;" it is handed round to the different guests at a funeral, and they wear it to the grave, where it is thrown in. Ophelia is a sweet illustration of the practice of "virgin crants¹ and maiden strewments," and the frequent allusions to these pathetic ceremonies show that they must have been customary at this period in England. Juliet's bridal flowers served for her buried corse; those that should have decked the seemingly dead Imogene—beautiful as the poet's conception of herself—perfume and paint his everlasting pages. Perhaps the most tragic use to which garlands have been put is at the burning of Brahma women, who wear their hair bound with them, and dispense them to the spectators at their funeral pile. The custom of decking churches with greenery and flowers must be of immense antiquity with us; it must have come direct from the Romans, who engrafted many of their Pagan ceremonials on the Christian ritual. Every festival in former days, had its peculiar floral decoration, and such charges are quite common in churchwardens' accounts previous to the Reformation, since which time, except in isolated cases, it has resolved itself into the annual display of evergreens at Christmas. These natural offerings appear not to have been confined to any age or creed; the same season that finds the Christian churches decked with the scarlet berries and varnished leaves of the holly, sees bouquets of Narcissus and the branches of the cükianthus hanging in the temples of the Chinese gods, in honour of the new year. The helianthus that shone in the fields of Peru, like earth-born images of the luminary they worshipped, was modelled in gold, and glittered on the breasts and foreheads of the virgins who assisted in the temples of the Sun. The Mexicans also employed flowers in the worship of their gods, and the Greeks and Romans, as we have already said, not only dedicated them to theirs, but used them on all occasions of religious ceremony, adorning even the victims for sacrifices with flowery wreaths.

I might multiply such instances ad libitum; but enough has been said to awaken in our readers those associations that throw the charm of poetry about the simplest subjects, (for our commonest flowers are the most classical,) and refine the humblest garden that ever peasant formed "for the hospital of two beehives, and the feasting of a few Pythagorean herb-eaters," into the dignity of a floral epic.

NIGHT.

A FRAGMENT.

BY JOHN NEALE.

'Tis night,—deep, moonless night; the peasant's cot,
Which, through the day, loud rang with boisterous mirth
Or rude complaint, stands silent mid the gloom,
As if it held in death's unbroken sleep its ruddy horde.

Dim gleams upon the horizon's utmost verge
The distant city's splendours, idly shed upon its slumbering halls,
While crime and woe, labour and luxury, together hush'd,
Give to its wearied streets a brief repose.

(1) Garlands.

Faint sounds the tinkle of the wagon's bells,
As sluggishly it winds its nightly way
Far o'er the outstretch'd plain, and through the grove
Whispers the night-breeze; and the rustling leaves
And rippling streamlet lull the drowsy ear;
Till, high o'er all, at solemn interval,
The lone owl pours its shrill, unearthly wail,
And wakes the muser from his reverie.
'Tis night,—deep, moonless night; but, high above,
Like to a sapphire cup up-turn'd, and showering down
Unnumber'd brilliants from its ample bowl,
A cloudless sky, with all its glories, bursts upon the view.

Oh! what an unexhausted field is here
For mind's best efforts! Seekest thou a task To test thy hard-earn'd lore? Go, mark their constellations,
Tell their size, their motions, and their distance and their laws.

Or would'st thou poise imagination's wing?
Fix thy strain'd eye upon that tiny spark
Which trembles in the deep, remotest blue,
Then mount from earth to reach it;—track thy course,
First parting from thy parent sod, and shaking off
Its life-inspiring zone,—scan the abyss,
Deep, dark, and voiceless, that must gloom around
Thy long, long way,—till now the wish'd-for goal,
With milder, stender, broader lustre, beams,
And a new world's untried, untrodden soil,
Bears the strange pressure of a mortal's foot.

Now rest awhile,—but for a longer flight;
For see, new worlds again beyond the point
Thy daring reach'd; succeed again, and still Fresh toils await thee, till thy flagging wing
Droops in the ocean of infinity.

And what a glorious book of wisdom here unfurls
Its dazzling pages! Dost thou chafe and fret
Amid the little eddies of life's stream?
And dost thou hold thy troubles all-important?
Look thou here,—and it will calm the mimic tempest down,

And make thee smile, in pity or in scorn,
At all that can disturb a worldling's rest.

Or art thou proud, and does thy bloated heart
Think aught exists deserving thy contempt?
Look here again; an atom, whirling round
Through boundless space, is to thy puny form
A world, so vast, that thou and all thy race,
And all their boasted works, together heap'd,
Were on its circled outline unperceived.

Or hast thou dared, in thought, or word, or deed,
To raise the rebel's standard 'gainst that Power
Which, still thou wilt confess, created all?
Look at their countless host, and let thy tongue
Seek hopelessly a fitting phrase to speak
The deep contrition of thy humbled soul.

THE MARTYRDOM OF ST. POLYCARP.

SMYRNA is the paradise of Mediterranean midshipmen, and there are few visitors who do not retain a most pleasurable recollection of its gay and hospitable European inhabitants; who, by frequent intermar-riages, have come to be like one great family, whose various members vie with one another in showing the most cordial attention to the stranger. Here, too, the traveller in coming from Europe, first feels that he is in the East—the land of his dreams: the voluptuous air of soft Ionia—the novel vegetation—the palm, loveliest of trees, gently waving in the perfumed air—the clustering fig and pomegranate—

the camel, symbol of the desert, here seen for the first time,—all strike upon his senses with an intoxication of novelty impossible to describe.

But Smyrna has graver associations than these: nowhere comes home more solemnly the warning, "that in the midst of life we are in death." It were, as Dr. Cavo observes, "an ill-natured" (shall we say rather, impious) "interpretation of the actions of Divine Providence, to attribute the calamities that have befallen this city to the displeasure of Heaven,—yet, as described by a contemporary of St. Polycarp, "by plague, fire, and earthquakes, Smyrna, before one of the glories and ornaments of Asia, was turned into rubbish and ashes, its stately houses overturned, its temples ruined." Such, even to the present day, seems to be the inalienable inheritance of this gay and thoughtless city, for nowhere is their recurrence more frequent.

It was after one of the most serious of these more recent visitations, when the plague had swept off its thousands, and a tremendous fire raging unchecked among the wooden houses and narrow streets, had turned whole quarters of the city into heaps of blackened ashes, that I walked with two of the American missionaries to see the Stadium—hallowed as the place of martyrdom of the venerable Polycarp. Our footsteps echoed among the burnt and blackened walls of silent streets, with their abandoned homes, prostrate mosques, and dried-up fountains, wrecks of the recent conflagration, which had raged as far as rage it could, up to the very fort of the lofty hill crowned by the ruins of the castle, and separated from the city by a girdle of gloomy cemeteries.

Here have been deposited the mortal remains of countless generations of the departed Greek and Roman, Saracen and Turk—the spoiler from the wild steppes of Inner Asia, and the European merchant from the western mart: here, too, had been but recently conveyed by thousands the victims of the plague; the ground yet heaved with its foul and fearful burden. One shrunk with loathing and with dread from the scarce-covered graves, among which the furtive lizard, and the lean and savage dog, were seen to glide and burrow in their loathsome and peculiar haunt. A forest of cypresses, of gigantic growth—that gloomy tree, shrouded with their dense dark shadows the myriads of whitened sepulchres and turban-headed tombstones; some gilt and fresh—memorials of yesterday's sorrow; others broken and yawning, with inscriptions, faded as the memory of those to whom they were erected. These tall and mystic cones, like funeral plumes, stood silent in the sultry heat of noon, or were but momentarily swept into a low and solemn rustle by the fitful breeze in its passage from the mountains across the slumbering waters of the gulf.

———"Whose branch and leaf Seem stamp'd with an eternal grief,"

Through this gloomy approach we reached the foot of the bare, brown mountain, and slowly ascended it to the castle. Saracenic walls, long dismantled, straggle picturesquely about the crest of the eminence; fragments of Greek, and Roman, and Byzantine date, built into them, tell of successive revolutions; while the half savage Turcoman shepherd finds a good fold for his sheep and goats in the ruinous vaults, and takes his siesta, surrounded by his flock, and watched by his dog, in the grateful shadow of its hoary walls. We were standing here to recover our breath after the ascent, when my companions pointing to a hollow in the mountain, but a short distance below, exclaimed, "That is the spot; it was there that Polycarp suffered!" We now descended to it.

The Stadium, or Amphitheatre, hollowed out in the hill side, on a site which catches every breeze that blows, commands a wide and glorious prospect over Smyrna and its far-stretching gulf. Here were wont to assemble the thoughtless multitude of Asiatic idlers—how vacant and how silent is it now! Its sides and hollow are covered thick with turf as the surrounding hill, through which peeps here and there a marble seat, or yawn the orifices of the dens in which the wild beasts were confined. The saying of the poet as to places signalized by human crime or suffering is fully realized:

"That at the coming of the milder day
Their monuments shall all be overgrown."

A few sheep are pastured about the grassy slope, or clustered under the shadow of a lonely cypress, which serves as a landmark to vessels sailing up the gulf.

But, to the story which has invested the spot with such undying interest. This has been told very beautifully, and at some length, in a circular epistle addressed by the church over which Polycarp had so long presided, to that of Philadelphia, or, more properly, perhaps, as an encyclical epistle to all the diocese; a document, so authentic, and withal, moving, that Scaliger declared, that in all the history of the Church he had never met with anything that so transported him, for that in reading it he seemed to be no longer himself.

It was in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, A.D. 167, that the persecution grew hot at Smyrna, and many having already sealed their confession with their blood, the general outcry was, "Away with the impious" (or atheists, as the vulgar regarded them), "let Polycarp be sought for." The good man was not disturbed at this, but was yet prevailed on by the love of his people to retire to a neighbouring village, where he continued day and night in prayer for the Church Universal, under her perilous and trying circumstances. Here, at length, he was discovered by those sent after him, whom, on their approach, he saluted with a very cheerful and gentle countenance, ordering a table to be spread for them; so that they wondered to behold so venerable a person, of so great age, and so grave and composed a presence: and wondered what needed all this stir to hunt and take this poor old man.

After a parting, and a solemn prayer, he set out with his conductors, and on the road towards the city met Herod, with his father Nicetes, the former being Irenarch, or one charged with the maintenance of the public peace, who took up Polycarp into his chariot, seeking to undermine his constancy by representing how trivial a thing it was to sacrifice a few grains of incense to the emperor. Doubtless the duty of putting in force the edicts against the Christians, must often have been painful to men of humane minds. Sometimes, as Gibbon tells us, they were alarmed at the multitude of the confessors, towards whom they used every art of persuasion to induce them to perform some act, of at least an external conformity, which would release them from their painful office. But all persuasion failed to induce Polycarp to comply with their suggestion, upon which they thrust him out of the chariot with insult and violence, so that he was injured by the fall.

"Whereat, nothing daunted," continues the story, "he cheerfully hastened to the place of execution, under the conduct of his guard, whither, when they were come, and a confused noise and tumult was arisen, a voice came from heaven (heard by many, but none seen who spake it), saying, 'Polycarp, be strong, and quit thyself like a man.' The proconsul, before whom he was now brought, sought to persuade him to recant. 'Regard,' said he, 'thy great age; swear by the genius of Cæsar; repent, and say with us, "Take away the impious."' The holy martyr, looking about the Stadium, and severely regarding the idolatrous crowd, looked up to heaven and prayed, 'Take away the impious.' The proposal to blaspheme Christ, with which he was next assailed, was treated with a noble scorn, and drew from the venerable man this generous and touching confession,— 'Fourscore and six years I have served him, and he never did me any harm; how then shall I thus blaspheme my King and my Saviour?' Importuned to swear by the genius of Cæsar, he replied, 'Since you are so vainly ambitious, that I should swear by the emperor's genius, as you call it, as if you knew not who I am; hear my confession; I am a Christian!' To the threats of being thrown to the wild beasts, or of torture at the stake, the intrepid reply was, 'But why delayest thou? Bring forth whatever thou hast a mind to.' So pleasant and cheerful was his confidence, that the proconsul was himself astonished, and having exhausted the arts of persuasion, commanded the decisive proclamation to be made, 'Polycarp has confessed himself a Christian!' The cry was echoed by fearful shouts from the assembled crowd of thoughtless Asiatics and more bitter Jews. 'This is the great doctor of Asia, and the father of the Christians; this is the destroyer of our gods, who teaches men not to sacrifice, or worship the deities.' That blind and blood-thirsty rabble, gorged already with the horrid spectacles of the amphitheatre, now clamorously requested of Philip, the presiding asiarch, that Polycarp should be thrown to the lions, which, being overruled by him, as contrary to the order of the shows, they demanded that he should be burnt alive.

"The thing was no sooner said than done, each one with incredible speed fetching wood and fagots. The Jews were particularly active in the service. The fire being prepared, Polycarp untied his girdle, laid aside his garments, and began to put off his shoes; the Christians ambitiously striving to be admitted to do them for him, and a happy man he that could first touch his body.

"The officers came, according to custom, to nail him to the stake; which he desired them to omit, assuring them, that He who gave him strength to endure the fire, would enable him without nailing to stand immovable in the hottest flames. So, clasping his hands, which were bound behind him, he poured out his parting soul to heaven in prayer. And now the ministers of execution blew up the fire, which increasing to a mighty flame, behold, a wonder (seen, say my authors, by us, who were reserved, that we might declare it to others); the flames disposing themselves into the resemblance of an arch, like the sails of a ship, swelled with the wind, gently circled the body of the martyr, who stood all the while in the midst, like gold or silver purified in the furnace; his body sending forth a delightful fragrant, which like frankincense, or other costly spices, presented itself to our senses." And if our colder reason hesitate to afford implicit credence to this and other marvellous circumstances attendant upon this solemn scene, let us regard with sympathising reverence, rather than with contemptuous pity, that lively faith, and that excited imagination of the first Christians, which represented to them the powers of the other world, as ever present for their support and consolation; and which led them unconsciously to regard a natural occurrence as no less than a miraculous interposition. The miracle, at all events, was unperceived, or unheeded by the spectators, who, finding that the flames were slow in doing their work, urged on a spearman to pierce the martyr with a sword, on which "so vast a quantity of blood flowed from his wound, as extinguished the fire; together with which, a dove was seen to fly from his wounds, supposed to be his soul in visible form;" though these details, indeed, are considered as a subsequent addition to the original narrative. The Christians would have taken away the body, but this intention was defeated by the malice of the Jews, who persuaded the officer to have it consumed to ashes; reverently gathered up by the Christians as a choice and inestimable treasure, and afterwards interred. And they, moreover, resolved to meet and celebrate the birthday of his martyrdom, both to do honour to the memory of the departed, and to prepare and encourage others to give the like testimony to the faith, in which resolution originated those Memorie Martyrum, or solemn commemorations of the martyrs, which were generally kept in the primitive church. Thus died this apostolical man, anno Christi 167, in about the hundredth year of his age; for those eighty and six years to which he alluded as having served Christ most probably commenced with his baptism. He had besides seen and conversed familiarly with the apostle John.

"The pang is vanish'd, and the martyr crown'd."

My companions, though it was not of course the first time they had visited the spot, seemed absorbed in the solemn reflections connected with it. They paced the grass-grown area in silence, and I could well imagine that they breathed to Him who of old sustained the illustrious martyr in his fiery trials, a secret prayer, that some measure of the same spirit might be accorded to themselves, under their own discouragements and hindrances. It was impossible not to be struck with the amazing revolution that had been wrought since the time when this half obliterated amphitheatre witnessed the triumphant confession of the martyr. At that time, paganism, if already indeed undermined—derided by the philosopher—the hollow profession of the great—the dreary and comfortless creed of the vulgar, was yet triumphantly established by the terrible power of the Roman empire, which threatened to extinguish in fire and blood the struggling and persecuted religion of the Cross. But after a lapse of eighteen hundred years, behold the change!—the descendants of a then barbarous and remote set of islanders, and still more strange—the citizens of a region of the globe then undreamed of—missionaries, too, of that very religion which was here so terribly tried and so gloriously triumphant, standing on the same spot, see the last vestiges of that ancient paganism fast mouldering away—its creed forgotten—its cruel and bloody games abolished, and its monumental relics become the obscure theme of the antiquary, while Christianity, with consolation and mercy in its train, has spread, and will continue to extend, its beneficent triumphs over a world unknown to the ancients.

MUSIC IN ITS RELATION TO RELIGION.

[THE following interesting essay is the substance of a lecture delivered by the Rev. John Cumming, D.D. at Exeter Hall; which the lecturer has kindly permitted us to publish. Its practical value, especially to the young, has particularly struck us.]

Music is, in its structure, as profound as any other science; both music and acoustics have a great sympathy with Euclid and geometry; a good mathematician only can thoroughly understand their principles. Yet there is much in music which any ordinary mind can understand, and more which a good ear can appreciate. Much may be attained by a few hours' study, and more still by a few months' practice. A man, however, may be a good singer or performer, and yet not a good musician. The eye is the recipient of the impressions of the beautiful, and the ear the chamber of the impress of music; one is a camera lucida, and the other a music hall. Light reveals to the eye the tints of the flower, the brilliancy of the stars, the splendours of the sky, and the beauties of the landscape; the air carries on its wings the tones, and vibrations, and harmonies of Haydn, Handel, Mozart, and Mendelssohn. Pleasures that really elevate are cheap—those that injure and debase are expensive. The flowers that beautify the earth with colour, and delight the passer-by with fragrance, are everywhere; the poison-berry and the deadly nightshade are found only in the untrodden swamps, where you have no business going. The greatest joys are on the highway. If I gaze on a landscape, I know that various parts of it belong to different owners; but its most beautiful part the beggar at the road-side owns as much as they, and can enjoy it as much as they enjoy it. So of music: any ear may hear the wind. It is a great leveller; nay, rather, it is a great dignifier and elevator. The wind that rushes through the organ of St. George's Chapel at Windsor has first passed through the barrel-organ of some poor Italian boy; the voice of Jenny Lind and that of a street singer have but one common capital to draw on—the catholic atmosphere, the unsectarian air, the failure of which would be the utter extinction of Handel, Haydn, and all the rest. This air or atmosphere—this compound of nitrogen and oxygen, to which we are so deeply indebted—sometimes plays the musician of itself, and calls upon Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Mendelssohn, upon the ocean and in the forest; and they, like invisible, but not inaudible performers, make glorious music. Sometimes the shrouds of a ship, as she rolls on the tempestuous deep, raise wild and piercing sopranos to the skies; sometimes the trees and branches of a forest of gigantic pines become mighty harp-strings, which, smitten by the rushing tempests, send forth grand and incessant harmonies,—now anthems, and anon dirges. Sometimes the waves of the ocean respond, like white-robed choristers, to the thunder-bass of the sky; and so make Creation's grand oratorio, in which "the heavens are telling," and the earth is praising God. Sometimes deep calls unto deep, the Mediterranean to the German Sea, and both to the Atlantic Ocean; and these, the Moses and the Miriam of the earth, awaken rich antiphones, and form the opposite choirs, responding from side to side in Nature's grand cathedral, praising and adoring their Creator and Builder. Were man silent, God would not want praise.

It is remarkable that almost all the sounds of nature—the bleating of sheep, the lowing of cattle, the noise of the waves—are all in the minor key, plaintive, sad. This is creation itself, giving proof of the apostle's assertion, "All creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together." She feels that the curse is on her, cold and heavy on her heart, and, longing for deliverance, she gives utterance to her ceaseless, deep, and heart-rending Miserere; and she will continue to do so, until her Lord bid her assume the major key, and Himself give the key note; and then, spheres above, and floods below, and the mighty redeemed hearts and re-tuned voices, will raise everlasting Hallelujahs. Sin has thrown all Creation's choir out of tune; we hear only occasional snatches of her grand powers, reminding us of the time when all was "very good." The great Minstrel is the same—the instrument only is out of tune. But there is music, not only in the lower, but also in the higher scale of creation. Everybody is more or less of a musician, though he knows it not. We laugh, and speak, and cry, and ask in music. A laugh is produced by repeating in quick succession two sounds, which differ from each other by a single whole tone; a cry, arising from pain or grief, is the utterance of two sounds, differing from each other half a tone; a yawn runs down a whole octave before it ceases; a cough may be expressed by musical intervals; a question cannot be asked without the change of tone which musicians call a fifth, a sixth, or an eighth. This is the music of nature, and there is not a man who speaks five minutes without gliding through the whole gamut; only, in speaking, the tones not being protracted, glide imperceptibly into each other. In short, every sound of the human lip is loaded with music. One man's voice will pronounce your name, however plebeian, so musically and beautifully, that it will sound grander than a duke's or an earl's; and another man will pronounce your name so unmusically and harshly, that, let it be the Duke of Wellington's, it will sound as common as John Smith or John Anderson. I have gone into a shop, to purchase an article; a lady has served me, and recommended something else, in so musical a voice that the sovereigns, shillings, and sixpences in my pocket have become choristers—contralto, tenor, and bass—and I have found myself an unexpected purchaser of unexpected bargains. Many speak of preachers, whether musical or not. I have heard some start on C, three sharps, or B flat, and chant the sermon, the audience asleep, and the preacher only awake. Yet, some of the most eloquent preachers have had very unmusical voices, as Dr. Chalmers, Robert Hall, and others. Dr. McNeile, if you hear him speak, and not read, has a magnificent voice; but for depth, compass, power, richness, and delicacy of intonation, perhaps the grandest was Edward Irving's. My hair has almost stood on end, on hearing him repeat the 137th Psalm, in the old Scotch version; and a celebrated actor declared, that the richest musical treat in London was to go and hear Edward Irving repeat the Lord's Prayer.

All sounds of nature are, to my ear, singularly suggestive. I never hear a thrush or a blackbird, without thinking of the Grampian Hills or Dee-side, till "Auld Lang Syne" comes up in limpid freshness. The owl, hooting from the hollow of an old tree, reminds me of the Pope speaking ex cathedra, or a fat monk, chanting a midnight mass, in exchange for a mid-day meal. The lark, rising on untiring pinion, and making the air ring with its sweet minstrelsy, ever singing, and ever soaring upward and upward, to the brilliant sun and blue sky, reminds me of the Protestant Christian, who visits the earth only to rest upon it, and again to rise upward with renewed vigour. Creation, Providence, and Redemption are, to my mind, rich in grand harmonies. All human life has seemed to me, as to Longfellow, a vast and mysterious cathedral, amid whose solitary aisles, and under whose sublime roof, mystic tones and melodies perpetually roll. The mood we are in gives meaning to the sound. I hear, at times, from its chantry, a funeral psalm, or psalm of life, that has called up the pale faces of the dead; at other times, mysterious sounds, from the past and future, as from belfries outside the cathedral; and again, a mournful, melancholy, watery peal of bells, as is heard sometimes at sea, from cities far off below the horizon. Walk out on some wild common, on a still frosty night; the deep and overwhelming silence is almost audible; from the measureless heights and depths of air, there comes to us a rich under-tone, half sound, half whisper, as if we could hear the crumbling and falling away of earth and all created things, in Nature's processes of reproduction and decay; the very sounds, as it were, of the lapse and rushing of the sands of life in the great hour-glass of time. So a poet speaks:—

"Your voiceless lips, O flowers! are living preachers;
Each cup a pulpit, every leaf a book,
Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers
From loneliest nook.

'Neath cloister'd boughs each floral bell that swingeth,
And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
Makes Sabbath in the fields, and ever ringeth
A call to prayer.

Not to the domes, where crumbling arch and column
Attest the feebleness of mortal hand,
But to that fane most catholic and solemn,
Which God hath plann'd.

To that cathedral, boundless as our wonder,
Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply;
Its choir the winds and waves, its organ thunder,
Its dome the sky.

There, amid solitude and shade, I wander
Through the green aisles, and stretch'd upon the sod,
Amid the silence reverently ponder
The ways of God."

Another of your own poets says:—

"There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubim;
Such harmony is in immortal sounds.
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close us in, we cannot bear it."

Music is universally appreciated, and scarcely less so felt. The English plough-boy sings as he drives his team, happily ignorant whether protection or free-trade is the best; the Scotch highlander makes the glens and grey moors resound with his beautiful song; the Swiss, Tyrolese, and Carpathians lighten their labour by music; the muleteer of Spain cares little who is on the throne or behind it, if he can only have his early carol; the vintager of Sicily has his evening hymn, even beside the fire of the burning mountain; the fisherman of Naples has his boat-song, to which his rocking boat beats time on that beautiful sea; and the gondolier of Venice still keeps up his midnight serenade. One of our poets hath said—

"The man that hath not music in his soul,
Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, espousals;

The notions of his spirit are as dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus.
Let no such man be trusted."

He is sure to be a long-hour employer. Who has not heard of the all but magic power of Tyrolese song? What terrible excitement has "The Marseillaise" produced in the street of Paris? The old soldier feels young, when he hears the sound of the bugle, or the roll of old England's conquering drum. I have seen an old war-horse in a coal-waggon rear and prance, as ready for the charge, on hearing the note of a trumpet. And what Briton would not feel thankful to God, and happy in his privileges, on hearing what is still, and I pray may long be, the National Anthem, "GOD SAVE THE QUEEN?"

Music was part of the preparatory Pythagorean discipline. Aristides says,—“Music is calculated to compose the mind and fit it for instruction.” Miranda says,—“Music produces like effects on the mind, as medicine on the body.” Plato says,—“Music to the mind is as air to the body.” Homer says,—“Achilles was taught music in order to moderate his passions.” Aulus Gellius,—“Sciatica is cured by music.” Milton says,—“If wise men are not such, music has a great power over disposition and manners to make them gentle.” Chrysostom,—“God has joined music with worship, that we might, with cheerfulness and readiness of mind, express his praise in sacred hymns.” Bishop Horne remarks,—“The heart may be weaned from everything base and mean, and elevated to everything excellent and praiseworthy, by sacred music.” Martin Luther was deeply affected by music. One day two of Luther's friends, on visiting him, found him in deep despondency, and prostrate on the floor. They struck up one of the solemn and beautiful tunes which the Reformer loved—his melancholy fled—he rose and joined his friends in the tune, adding, “The devil hates good music.” The great Reformer was also a strenuous advocate for making music a prominent part in the education of the young, and in 1544, together with George Kham, prepared a hymn book, with music, for schools. Carlstadt objected to harmony on very non-sequitur grounds—“one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and, therefore, only one melody.” Luther's reply was, “By parity of reasoning, Carlstadt ought to have but one eye, one ear, one hand, one foot, and one coat.” Luther's celebrated hymn, “Ein feste burg ist unser Gott” (“A strong tower is our God”), was written in the castle of Coburg, during Diet, at Augsburg, in 1530, when he alleviated his despondency by music. Writing to a friend who was oppressed with melancholy, he said, “Up! strike up a song to my Lord on the organ—the Te Deum or the Benedictus; sing away, as David and Elisha did. If the devil come again, say, ‘Out, devil! I must sing to my Lord!’ Sing a good tune or two, and learn to defy the devil.” No one can assert that Luther was less abundant in labours, because so fond of music. The highest evidence of the power and excellency of the hymns and music of Luther, is the fact that the Roman Catholics adopted them. The people would sing them; and, therefore, the priests introduced them into Romish Churches. A Carmelite friar observed, “Luther's hymns helped his cause astonishingly—they spread among all classes of the people, and were sung not only in the Churches and Schools, but also in the houses and work-shops, in the streets and market-places, in lanes and fields.” I do long to see the wretched rants, that are but too popular, banished from church and chapel, and these grave and heavenly compositions occupying their place; and one object of this lecture is to lead you to hunt all rants out of Christendom, and bring in and popularise the noble compositions, chants, and tunes of the ancient masters. In listening to the music of the great masters, what rapturous flights of sound! what pathetic chimes! what expressions of agony and woe! in short, what an embodiment of all the feelings of suffering and rejoicing humanity sympathised with, and furnished with a voice, and an eloquent tongue, in these grand creations of human genius! How the chorus strikes on the ear in crashes of thunder at one moment, out of which instantly starts a solitary trumpet, like the trumpet of doom. Again the chorus swells and dies like the wind of summer; anon we listen to intricate and mystic passages of music, which wave to and fro like the swinging of branches of trees in the storm; then again cease as if a hush had occurred in the hurricane, and some solitary sweet voice, like Jenny Lind's, darts off like a bird out of the trees, and floats upon the air, and sings in ecstasy a wild sweet solo in the warm sunshine. Poetry, painting, and music, are three great interpreters of nature, each disclosing some hidden beauty, some inner excellency, some long-concealed hieroglyphic; but of the three, music is the mightiest, the purest, truest, heavenliest. Painting is nature smiling, resting, moving, beautiful; poetry is nature speaking, whispering, laughing, crying, “day unto day uttering speech, and night unto night showing knowledge.” Music is nature rendering forth those deep and abyssmal feelings which the first two are unable to express,—nature singing what poetry says and painting seems—the three witnesses to the loss of a beauty, and glory, and perfection that are gone, but prophets, and earnest, and insinuations of a glory, and beauty, and perfection that are promised; not the devil's property, and so to be left in his possession, but God's fallen chiefs yet to be redeemed and reinstated in their place as reflectors of His glory, the trumpets of His praise.

I think the human voice the noblest of all instruments. Organs were not used in the Christian Church till a very late period. In the Eastern Church organs were never approved, and were introduced into the Western Church amid great opposition. My idea of an organ is very simple, and I think very true. I have no sympathy whatever with the ultra-puritanic views of some on this side of the Tweed, or the covenanting prejudice of others north of the Tweed. So strong was the feeling, not half a century ago, in the Church of Scotland, that, on a clergyman introducing an organ, the aged females that sat round the pulpit could scarcely be kept down, on its first sound; and the clamour in the parish grew so terrible, that they were obliged to remove it; and the poor clergyman, on leaving the parish for a more peaceable one at a distance, was represented in prints in the shop windows, in his canonicals, with a barrel organ on his back, and his right hand turning the handle, and playing the well-known tune—"I'll gang no more," &c. Yet the human voice is nobler than the organ. A violoncello or a violin is a nobler instrument than the organ. On the organ, the same key is both the flat of one note and the sharp of another—the transitions are clumsy and abrupt—but the violin not only distinguishes each note and half note from another by different fingers, but can render the quarter or eighth of a tone with unutterable beauty, and pass from one to another with a delicacy altogether unattainable by organ or piano. You have excommunicated the violin and consecrated the organ, and, like many other Papal canonizations and curses, on very unsatisfactory grounds. The organ is a good auxiliary, to lead congregational singing, but like a crutch, when too long used, it prevents walking without it. The human voice is a wonderful organ. Intellect is visible on the brow, the heart is seen looking through the eye, the soul reveals itself in the voice. Man's soul is audible, not visible; as God gave an apocalypse of old, not in the blazing fire, nor in the bursting earthquake, but in the "still small voice." The sound of the voice alone betrays the flowing of the inner and inexhaustible fountains of the soul otherwise inappreciable to man. Mercury may have made the lyre, Apollo the flute, Jubal the harp and the organ; but God made the human voice, and the instrument shares in the perfection of the Maker.

But I am speaking of music rather than musical instruments. Music is in harmony with all other sciences. The painter must borrow its language; in order to describe his painting, he speaks of tone and harmony. The poet's rhymes and cadences are all musical. Eloquence is the master-minstrel, playing on those responsive musical strings—the feelings, fears, and hopes of the human heart. There is an analogy between music and geometry. There is a likeness—a family likeness—between York Minster and Handel's Oratorio—the one represents to the eye, and the other to the ear, a divine thought. The cathedral is the dead stone shaped and fitted to its place, and so vivified by the genius of the architect that the very stone shoots up, and blossoms, and shines, and sparkles in the splendours of rising and setting suns, as if circled with a perpetual aureole of beauty and light; the oratorio is the cathedral of the ear, in which the dull air is seized by the master-minstrel, and reverberating from the string, or rushing through the pipe, or gushing from the human voice, embodies and unfolds all great and glorious thoughts. Even a great poet cannot speak of war without bringing in music to illustrate it:—

"This is the arsenal. From floor to ceiling,
Like a huge organ rise the burnished arms,
But from their silent pipes no anthem pealing,
Startling the villages with strange alarms.

Ah! what a sound will rise, how wild and dreary,
When the Death-angel touches those swift keys;
What loud lament and dismal Miserere,
Will mingle with your awful symphonies.

I hear, e'en now, the infinite fierce chorus,
The cries of agony, the dreadful groan,
Which through the ages that have gone before us,
In long reverberations reach our own.

The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder,
The rattling minstrelsy, the clashing blade,
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, O man! with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest nature's sweet and kindly voices,
And fairest of celestial harmonies?

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wreath bestow'd on camps and sports

Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals and forts.

Down the dark future, through long generations,
The echoing sounds grow fainter and then cease,
And, like a bell with solemn sweet vibrations,
I hear, once more, the voice of Christ say, 'Peace,

'Peace,' and no longer from its brazen portals,
The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies,
But beautiful as songs of the Immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise."

Music has a wonderfully soothing influence; purer than painting, more ethereal than poetry, and the least sensuous of any, it exercises greatest power over the human mind. Are you, young men, worn out with the toils of the day, and anxious to drown the lingering echoes of the roar of the wheels and machinery of mammon? Learn to play the violin. Amusement or relaxation you must have; try this, it will exert on you all the power, and none of the poison, of opium. It has also an inspiring power. If you feel dull, sleepy, and exhausted, a lively tune on the violin will rouse your nerves, and restore them to harmony. Don't have recourse to wine or alcohol; these will aggravate, not cure: try music; it is essentially teetotal, and yet inspiring. We all know the effect produced on the 42d Highlanders at Waterloo, when beginning to waver, by the sound of the pipes. Is the mind haunted with evil thoughts? As Christian young men, you know the sovereign and infallible prescription, but in its place music has a wonderfully expressive power. David played before Saul, and the evil spirit forsook him. Luther, in despondency, used to seize his flute, and revive his spirit, remarking, "The devil hates good music." Are you married? Does your wife lose her temper?—and she would be an angel if she never did—let her take the piano, and you your violin, and try some fine old melody—"John Anderson my Joe," if you can think of no other. Do I address a Scotchman?—and where are Scotchmen not found?—do not "Auld lang syne," "Roslin Castle," and still more, the sacred, venerable, and ancient melodies of your national Zion, make you forget shops, ledgers, gas-lights, troublesome customers, and conjure up before the mind's eye—

"Caledonia, stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child;
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood!"

And have you not, in the enthusiasm of the moment, exclaimed—

"Breathes there a man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land;
Whose heart has not within him burn'd,
As home his footsteps he has turn'd,
From wandering on some foreign strand?" &c.

I recollect lines sung to me by my mother when scarcely four years old. A mother's first words at home are a son's last and deepest recollections on earth. There is not a nobler or holier relationship on earth than that of mother and son, and that son who has no veneration for a mother's memory, and gives no obedience to a mother's last advice, is a discord in harmony, and ought either to repent or abjure the relationship in which he stands. Music is essentially Protestant. The Pope has spared no money in order to Romanise it; but music is not the property of the Pope, or the possession of the devil, or the monopoly of either, but the creature of God, and meant to be, and yet destined to be, the utterer of His praise. Unison is Popery; harmony is Protestantism. Music has its origin in religion, and to religion it must render the tribute of its energies; and such is the glory of Scripture, that no other book can furnish themes equal to the demands of musical genius. Sacred music was heard at the creation, when "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Adam thus addressed Eve:—

"How often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket, have we heard
Celestial voices to the midnight air,
Sole or responsive to each other's note,
Singing their great Creator!"

Adam and Eve, as sketched by Milton, delighted in song; they sang many a beautiful duet, and knew not what discord was, till sin entered, and death by sin. The music of the spheres is intimated by David when he says, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork." The children of Israel, on their escape from the reach of Pharaoh, sang, "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously." David was a great musical reformer. The blessed Saviour, on the eve of his crucifixion, joined with the Twelve in singing a hymn. Paul and Silas in prison sang praises to God. The primitive Christians, as noticed by the heathen, sang hymns. Here is divine precedent—holy sanction—and as long as the music suits the words and subserves the thought, it cannot be too excellent. On a building you may lay out too much money, in an age when many churches, rather than a few magnificent ones, are needed—but you cannot lay out too much money in the purchase of music. Twenty shillings will buy the very choicest specimens. It is the peculiar excellence of music, that it is not an ornament added to praise, but an auxiliary to its manifestation. Music is not for impression—an influence from without, but for expression of inspiration that is within. A soul full of joy instinctively sings. It is remarkable that in every portrait of a future state of joy and felicity, sacred architecture and painting are scarcely alluded to; but in all the disclosures of the glories of the blessed, music, and song, and praise, and thanksgiving, take a prominent place.

I desire now to obviate, or rather anticipate, a few objections to sacred music, as well as try to guard against its abuse. No musical attractions, however excellent, must draw you to join in a worship that is idolatrous, or to unite with company ungodly and profane. This is important; it is the disregard of this that has made pious minds hesitate to recommend the study of music. Pure in its place, it becomes pernicious when thus perverted. At this moment the Jesuits, driven by late revolutions from the Continent, are watching with lynx eyes for any and every plank on which to float into power; and one of the means they are usurping is music in Popish worship. Numbers of Jesuits have become teachers of music ostensibly,—teachers of Popery really. You must resist the devil in whatever shape he comes—whether building grand cathedrals, or writing sublime oratorios,—whether with trowel or with trumpet. The great plan for preventing a musical taste from identifying itself with idolatry, or with the opera, is to point out the need and source of a new heart. Yet it may not be useless to invite Christians—not, indeed, to enter into competitorship with Rome, but to give a little more attention and patronage to this exercise, retaining simplicity, and yet reaching forth to greater excellence. But I do not wish to encourage a mere musical exhibition before the congregation, nor do I identify my advocacy of sacred music with any one way of advancing it. Many spiritual and devoted men entertain strong objections to oratorios, as ordinarily performed. My remarks are not to be interpreted as either laudatory or condemnatory of them. I must say, however, I cannot endure the idea that the sufferings of the Saviour should be turned into a mere musical gratification, and still less the idea that a mere worldly man, fresh from the boards of the opera, should be the performer in such an exhibition. Not less do I dislike to hear an audience shout encore after some deep and piercing delineation and expression of sorrow, as if its music were all its charms, and the words used merely to make room for the music. This is to make use of God for our music, and not to make use of it for the sake of God. But are these things inseparable from music? It has been urged that the study of music leads to dissipation—that musical men are not of the most temperate or domestic habits. If it be so, it is deeply to be deplored. But surely there is no essential connexion between music and wine. Apollo and Bacchus are not Siamese twins—wine-glasses and quavers and semibreves are not sisters, nor even second cousins. In the natural world, music and temperance are plainly sisters. The black-bird, thrush, canary,¹ and nightingale—all exquisitely musical, drink nothing but water, and smoke nothing but fresh air. A grove or wood in spring, echoes with feathered musicians, each a teetotaler—temperate without a pledge, and ever singing, and never dry. I do believe that if music has, in any instance, fallen into bad hands, it is very much the fault of those who are satisfied with music in the worship of God anything but worthy of the sublime themes of Christianity. Why should the psalmody of our congregations be a penance to a musical ear? The Gospel does not call on us to stop the musical ear or blind the tasteful eye, but to enlist the sympathies of both in favour of the grand and sublime service of Christianity. If Protestants will practically despise music, the devil, intimately acquainted with its powers, will seize and secure it for the playhouse: and the Pope, no less acquainted with its attractions, will engage it for the mass-house; and, dissonated from its primeval fellowship with the worship of God, it will become the ally of idolatry, or banqueting, and revelry, and bacchanalian excess. The desecration of purest things is always greatest: an angel falling becomes a fiend—music perverted becomes a ministry to sin and Satan.

SYDNEY SMITH AND HIS WRITINGS.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

THE Reverend Sydney Smith may be properly numbered among the wisest, best, and wittiest men of his generation. His genial and generous spirit has passed away, and left a void which we may never live to see filled. His name has become a kind of synonyme for piercing, good-humoured satire. Apart from the amusement he has afforded us, he has many claims on our gratitude and regard. He was one of those who raised the tone of our modern periodical literature, and who knew how to discuss political questions in a large and liberal and tolerating spirit. Even those who dissent from his views have not refrained from expressing their admiration of his graceful style, polished wit, and abundant humour. In private life he was idolized; and the reputation which he acquired in the social circle, exceeded even that obtained by his writings. His witticisms have been carefully treasured up, and his many "good things" still pass current throughout society. The professed diner-out retails his jokes with satisfaction and success, and enlivens with them many a dull and tedious meeting. Few men, in fact, have played a pleasanter part in the world, or left behind them a more agreeable reputation.

It may, perhaps, be urged, that all his writings and sayings were not strictly consistent with his clerical character. But, on the other hand, it must not be forgotten that he has left behind him pure and chastened models of Christian eloquence, in which he has proved himself no mean champion of our common faith. Few of those who, in later years, have seen his figure in the pulpit of the metropolitan cathedral, will forget his benevolent, unostentatious mien:—

"At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place."

Those who have heard him preach will remember the winning and earnest tone in which he read from the very legible manuscript before him—for his sermons were latterly written in something like large text-hand—and it is possible that his image may have long lingered in their minds as the ideal of an old-fashioned English pastor.

In the present article, however, we have to discuss the character of Sydney Smith neither as a theologian nor politician, but strictly as a man of letters. A new and cheap edition of his collected works has recently appeared,¹ and we embrace the opportunity suggested by its publication to say a few words on the literary character of so distinguished a writer. The time is yet very far distant when his productions will cease to be read and studied. His pure, neat English style, his sly humour, and honest and fearless tone, will find admirers in generations beyond the present; and many regrets will perhaps hereafter be expressed that he dissipated his talents upon subjects of temporary or of trivial interest, instead of employing them on works of a more enduring and lastingly important character. As a reviewer he is beyond all praise. Abhorring from the bottom of his soul all trickery, falsehood and pretence, he resolutely exposed and attacked them wherever they were to be found. The weapon which he was wont to wield, and which he wielded with such signal success, was that of ridicule—keen, polished, cutting humour, which rendered each delinquent he singled out ludicrous as well as contemptible. He always managed to have the laugh on his side, and to make his opponents appear ridiculous. But his wit was eminently tempered by discretion. He excited little personal animosity; and, on the whole, he bore his faculties most meekly. He never descended to personality, or to wanton insult. The talent which he possessed was feared and felt; but it was never abused, as we have too often seen it by more unscrupulous men. Like our great satirical poet, he may well have felt elated by the successful exercise of such powers; and indeed he might have literally echoed the well-known lines:—

"Yes, I am proud, I must be proud, to see Men not afraid of God afraid of me!
Safe from the bar, the pulpit, and the throne,
Yet touch'd and shamed by ridicule alone.
Oh sacred weapon! left for truth's defence;
Sole dread of folly, vice, and insolence!
Rev'rent I touch thee, but with honest zeal;
To rouse the watchmen of the public weal,
To virtue's work provoke the tardy hall,
And goad the prelate slumbering in his stall."²

The Edinburgh Review, with which his name is inseparably connected, was the forerunner of a brilliant race of periodicals. But it is possible, that those who were present at its birth little dreamed of its auspicious career. Sydney Smith was its originator, as well as earliest editor; and in the preface to his collected works, he has thus humorously and graphically detailed the circumstances which introduced him to the honours and cares of authorship.

"When first I went into the Church," he says, "I had a curacy in the middle of Salisbury Plain. The squire of the parish took a fancy to me, and requested me to go with his son to reside at the University of Weimar; before we could get there, Germany became the seat of war, and in stress of politics we put into Edinburgh, where I remained five years. . . . Among the first persons with whom I became acquainted were Lord Jeffrey, Lord Murray (late Lord Advocate for Scotland), and Lord Brougham; all of them maintaining opinions upon political subjects a little too liberal for the dynasty of Dundas, then exercising a supreme power over the northern division of the island.

"One day we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story or flat in Buccleugh-place, the elevated residence of the then Mr. Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a Review; this was acceded to with acclamation. I was appointed Editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the Edinburgh Review. The motto I proposed for the Review was:—

'Tenui musam meditamus avena.'

'We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal.'

"But this was too near the truth to be admitted; and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Syrus, of whom none of us had, I am sure, ever read a single line; and so began what has since turned out to be a very important and able journal."

After Mr. Sydney Smith's retirement from the editorship of the Review, it was committed to the superintendence of Mr. Jeffrey, but he continued for many years to contribute to it. However, in the year 1827 the Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, with a noble disregard of political differences, presented him to the canonry of Bristol Cathedral; and, as a dignitary of the Church, he felt it his duty from that time to cease from anonymous writing.

All Sydney Smith's articles are distinguished by their supreme good sense:—

"Good sense which only is the gift of heaven,
And, though no science, fairly worth the seven."

He is always clear, perspicuous, and rational. He was not, indeed, altogether free from prejudices. He had a rooted suspicion of every species of enthusiasm, and a contemptuous dislike for all enthusiasts, (whom he usually regarded as schemers or madmen,) which sometimes warped his judgment, and rendered him, in particular instances, unfair and unjust. But on the ordinary topics of life he discoursed with admirable temper, force, and effect; going straight to his object, and holding on his course with a clearness of view and an earnestness of purpose which we cannot sufficiently commend.

We have but to turn to the articles in this edition severally entitled, "Too much Latin and Greek," and

(1) Our readers will appreciate this very literal translation; "авана" signifying both the "rustic pipe," and the grain which, according to Dr. Johnson, "in England is given to horses and in Scotland supports the people."

"Female Education," in order to appreciate his thorough good sense, and eminently practical turn of mind. In the first of these he criticises the exclusive attention paid in some of our public schools to the Greek and Latin languages, and classical literature.

At the time that this article was written, the practice of cramming young men and boys with the learned languages prevailed in all its integrity. The modern languages and abstract sciences were universally neglected, and the result is thus ably depicted:—

"The picture which a young Englishman, addicted to the pursuit of knowledge, draws—his beau idéal of human nature—his top and consummation of man's powers—is a knowledge of the Greek language. His object is not to reason, to imagine, or to invent; but to conjugate, decline, and derive. The situations of imaginary glory which he draws for himself are, the detection of an anapaest in the wrong place, or the restoration of a dative case which Crauzius had passed over and the never-dying Ernesti failed to observe. If a young classic of this kind were to meet the greatest chemist, or the greatest mechanician, or the most profound political economist of his time, in company with the greatest Greek scholar, would the slightest comparison between them ever come across his mind? Would he ever dream that such men as Adam Smith and Lavoisier were equal in dignity of understanding to, or of the same utility as, Bentley and Heyne? We are inclined to think, that the feeling excited would be a good deal like that which was expressed by Dr. George about the praises of the great King of Prussia, who entertained considerable doubts whether the King, with all his victories, knew how to conjugate a Greek verb in mu."

The absurdity of such a system is, however, now generally admitted, and since this article appeared, many steps in the right direction have been taken to change or modify it.

But we will now turn to the other subject,—that of female education: a subject on which there still exists a large amount of popular misapprehension and prejudice. It is still assumed that women are intellectually feebler than the other sex. It is still considered foolish and improper to trouble them with any useful or solid information. It has been even urged, with narrow-minded selfishness, that a high degree of intellectual culture is incompatible with the performance of their domestic duties.

"There is a very general notion," says Sydney Smith, "that the moment you put the education of women upon a better footing than it is at present, at that moment there will be an end of all domestic economy; and that, if you once suffer women to eat of the tree of knowledge, the rest of the family will soon be reduced to the same kind of aerial and unsatisfactory diet. These and all such opinions are referable to one great and common cause of error;—that man does everything, and that nature does nothing. . . . Can anything, for example, be more perfectly absurd than to suppose that the care and perpetual solicitude which a mother feels for her children, depends upon her ignorance of Greek and mathematics, and that she would desert an infant for a quadratic equation?"

But it has been supposed that the comparative ignorance of women renders them more agreeable and interesting companions for the other sex,—that if they were competently instructed, there would be danger of their becoming rivals instead of friends.

"It would appear," says Sydney Smith again, "from the tenor of such objections, that ignorance had been the great civilizer of the world. Women are delicate and refined only because they are ignorant; they manage their household, only because they are ignorant; they attend to their children, only because they know no better. Now, we must really confess, we have all our lives been so ignorant, as not to know the value of ignorance. We have always attributed the modesty, and the refined manners of women, to their being well taught in moral and religious duty,—to the hazardous situation in which they are placed,—to that perpetual vigilance which it is their duty to exercise over thought, word, and action,—and to that cultivation of the mild virtues, which those who cultivate the stern and magnanimous virtues expect at their hands."

A retiring modesty is justly appreciated as the most graceful feature of the female character: but we do not expect her, however well-informed, to make a parade of her knowledge. Affectation of learning, whether in man or woman, is detestable, and is more usually observable in the pretender than in the scholar. It may not be so well for ladies to be talked of as prodigies—for "nothing is so honourable to a woman as not to be spoken of at all." But after all, adds Sydney Smith, "we really think those ladies who are talked of only as Mrs. Marcot, Mrs. Somerville, and Miss Martineau are talked of, may bear their misfortunes with a very great degree of christian patience." But the most lamentable fact to be adverted to with regard to English female education, is that so much time and money should be wasted upon frivolous and useless accomplishments. The reverend reviewer has a few sensible sentences on this point, which our readers may not be sorry to see extracted:—

"The object now is, to make women artists,—to give them an excellence in drawing, music, painting, and dancing,—of which, persons who make these pursuits the occupations of their lives, and derive from them their subsistence, need not be ashamed. Now, one great evil of all this is, that it does not last. If the whole of life were an Olympic game—if we could go on feasting and dancing to the end,—this might do; but it is in truth merely a provision for the little interval between coming into life and settling in it; while it leaves a long and dreary expanse behind, devoid both of dignity and cheerfulness. No mother, no woman who has past over the few first years of life, sings, or dances, or draws, or plays upon musical instruments. These are merely means for displaying the grace and vivacity of youth, which every woman gives up, as she gives up the dress and the manners of eighteen: she has no wish to retain them; or, if she has, she is driven out of them by diameter and derision. The system of female education, as it now stands, aims only at embellishing a few years of life, which are in themselves so full of grace and happiness, that they hardly want it; and then leaves the rest of existence a miserable prey to idle insignificance. No woman of understanding and reflection can possibly conceive she is doing justice to her children by such kind of education. The object is, to give to children resources that will endure as long as life endures—habits that time will ameliorate, not destroy,—occupations that will render sickness tolerable, solitude pleasant, age venerable, life more dignified and useful, and therefore death less terrible: and the compensation which is offered for the omission of all this, is a shortlived blaze,—a little temporary effect, which has no other consequence; than to deprive the remainder of life of all taste and relish. There may be women who have a taste for the fine arts, and who evince a decided talent for drawing, or for music. In that case, there can be no objection to the cultivation of these arts; but the error is, to make such things the grand and universal object,—to insist upon it that every woman is to sing, and draw, and dance, with nature, or against nature,—to bind her apprentice to some accomplishment, and if she cannot succeed in oil or water-colours, to prefer gilding, varnishing, burnishing, box-making, to real and solid improvement in taste, knowledge, and understanding."

But we must now proceed to give some examples of Sydney Smith's talents as a humourist. In most of the articles which he contributed to the Edinburgh Review there was a vein of sly humour, of a perfectly original character, and which at once marked their authorship. We need not go far for specimens. In the first paragraph of the first article reprinted in the collected edition of his works, in a review of Dr. Parr's Spital sermon, we find the following:—

"Whoever has had the good fortune to see Dr. Parr's wig, must have observed, that while it trespasses a little on the orthodox magnitude of perukes in the anterior parts, it scorns even Episcopal limits behind, and swells out into boundless convexity of frizz, the μεγα θάυμα of barbers, and the terror of the literary world. After the manner of his wig, the Doctor has constructed his sermon, giving us a discourse of no common length, and subjoining an immeasurable mass of notes, which appear to concern every learned thing, every learned man, and almost every unlearned man since the beginning of the world."

We meet with an admirable homily on the virtue of brevity in a review of the "Characters of the late Charles James Fox, by Philopatris Varvicensis." It is in Sydney Smith's best style.

"There is an event recorded in the Bible, which men who write books should keep constantly in their remembrance. It is there set forth, that many centuries ago the earth was covered with a great flood, by which the whole of the human race, with the exception of one family, were destroyed. It appears, also, that from thence, a great alteration was made in the longevity of mankind, who, from a range of seven or eight hundred years, which they enjoyed before the flood, were confined to their present period of seventy or eighty years. This epoch in the history of man gave birth to the two-fold division of the antediluvian and the postdiluvian style of writing, the latter of which naturally contracted itself into those inferior limits which were better accommodated to the abridged duration of human life and literary labour. Now, to forget this event,—to write without the fear of the deluge before his eyes, and to handle a subject as if mankind could lounge over a pamphlet for ten years, as before their submersion,—is to be guilty of the most grievous error into which a writer can possibly fall. The author of this book should call in the aid of some brilliant pencil, and cause the distressing scenes of the deluge to be portrayed in the most lively colours for his use. He should gaze at Noah, and be brief. The ark should constantly remind him of the little time there is left for reading; and he should learn, as they did in the ark, to crowd a great deal of matter into a very little compass."

His humorous summary of the most striking features in the natural history of Australia—"the fifth or pickpocket quarter of the globe," as he is elsewhere pleased to call it—is also worthy of quotation.

"Such is the climate of Botany Bay; and, in this remote part of the earth, Nature (having made horses, oxen, ducks, geese, oaks, elms, and all regular and useful productions for the rest of the world,) seems determined to have a bit of play, and to amuse herself as she pleases. Accordingly, she makes cherries with the stone on the outside; and a monstrous animal, as tall as a grenadier, with the head of a rabbit, a tail as big as a bed-post, hopping along at the rate of five hops to a mile, with three or four young kangaroos looking out of its false uterus, to see what is passing. Then comes a quadruped as big as a large cat, with the eyes, colour, and skin of a mole, and the bill and web-feet of a duck—puzzling Dr. Shaw, and rendering the latter half of his life miserable, from his utter inability to determine whether it was a bird or a beast. Add to this a parrot, with the legs of a sea-gull; a skate with the head of a shark; and a bird of such monstrous dimensions that a side bone of it will dine three real carnivorous Englishmen;—together with many other productions that agitate Sir Joseph, and fill him with mingled emotions of distress and delight."

The admirable good sense for which Sydney Smith was remarkable is also occasionally conveyed in a most amusing strain. His illustrations are always apt: they are selected and expressed with the greatest care, and rarely fail to tell. We will give an example:—

"It is a strong presumption," he says, "that a man is wrong, when all his friends, whose habits naturally lead them to coincide with him, think him wrong. If a man were to indulge in taking medicine till the apothecary, the druggist, and the physician, all called upon him to abandon his philocathartic propensities—if he were to gratify his convivial habits till the landlord demurred and the waiter shook his head—we should naturally imagine that advice so wholly disinterested was not given before it was wanted, and that it merited some little attention and respect."

From the same article from which we have taken the preceding, we will venture on another quotation. It is the description of a Curate; and few men possibly have ever felt a deeper sympathy for the working clergy of the Establishment than our witty divine. Who can fail to appreciate such a sketch as the following?

"A curate—there is something which excites compassion in the very name of a Curate!!! How any man of Purple, Palaces, and Preferment, can let himself loose against this poor working man of God, we are at a loss to conceive,—a learned man in a hovel, with sermons and saucepans, lexicons and bacon, Hebrew books and ragged children—good and patient—a comforter and a preacher—the first and purest pauper in the hamlet, and yet showing, that, in the midst of his worldly misery, he has the heart of a gentleman, and the spirit of a Christian, and the kindness of a pastor."

There is another description of a country clergyman, perhaps scarcely decorous, but highly characteristic, in his Third letter to Archdeacon Singleton. In humorous contrast to the picture of a model clergyman, he draws the portrait of "an average, ordinary, uninteresting minister; obese, dumpy, neither ill-natured nor good-natured; neither learned nor ignorant, striding over the stiles to church, with a second-rate wife, dusty and deliquescent—and four parochial children, full of catechism and bread and butter!" What a picture! We have not chosen to quote the whole passage; but our readers will see that in humorous description, and in the selection of odd, original, and forcible epithets, Sydney Smith has scarcely an equal in the whole range of our literature.

When an opponent committed a blunder, few men knew better how to expose and take advantage of it than the reverend reviewer. An amusing instance occurred in the case of Dr. John Styles, who published some strictures on two critiques in the Edinburgh Review, on the subject of Methodism and Missions, and in which he had committed a curious blunder, of which the reviewer, in a subsequent article, took a merciless advantage. The mistake was certainly a gross one, and the opportunity for badinage was too tempting to be neglected:—

"In speaking," says the reviewer, "of the cruelties which their religion entails upon the Hindoos, Mr. Styles is peculiarly severe upon us for not being more shocked at their piercing their limbs with kimes. This is rather an unfair mode of alarming his readers with the idea of some unknown instrument. He represents himself as having paid considerable attention to the manners and customs of the Hindoos; and, therefore, the peculiar stress he lays upon this instrument is naturally calculated to produce, in the minds of the humane, a great degree of mysterious terror. A drawing of the kime was imperiously called for; and the want of it is a subtle evasion, for which Mr. Styles is fairly accountable. As he has been silent on this subject, it is for us to explain the plan and nature of this terrible and unknown piece of mechanism. A kime, then, is neither more nor less than a false print in the Edinburgh Review for a knife; and from this blunder of the printer has Mr. Styles manufactured this Dædalean instrument of torture, called a kime! We were at first nearly persuaded by his arguments against kimes;—we grew frightened;—we stated to ourselves the horror of not sending missionaries to a nation which used kimes;—we were struck with the nice and accurate information of the Tabernacle upon this important subject: but we looked in the errata, and found Mr. Styles to be always Mr. Styles—always cut off from every hope of mercy, and remaining for ever himself."

The powerful pen of Sydney Smith was employed upon many topics of philanthropic usefulness. As far back as the year 1819, he drew attention to the condition of yet unpitied chimney-sweeps—the poor climbing boys,—some of whom were annually suffocated in narrow flues. He quoted at large from parliamentary reports the horrible details of their ill-treatment, and powerfully appealed to the public sympathy on their behalf. A few years hence, it will be difficult to believe the relations of the cruelties to which this suffering class was exposed. One very frequent incident is thus graphically narrated in the reviewer's brilliant style:—

"We come now to burning little chimney-sweepers. A large party are invited to dinner—a great display is to be made;—and about an hour before dinner, there is an alarm that the kitchen chimney is on fire! It is impossible to put off the distinguished personages who are expected. It gets very late for the soup and fish; the cook is frantic—all eyes are turned upon the sable consolation of the master chimney-sweeper—and up into the midst of the burning chimney is sent one of the miserable little infants of the bruh! There is a positive prohibition of this practice, and an enactment of penalties in one of the Acts of Parliament which respect chimney-sweepers. But what matter Acts of Parliament, when the pleasures of genteel people are concerned? Or what is a toasted child, compared to the agonies of the mistress of the house with a deranged dinner?"

The subject of prison discipline, and the theory of punishment, the Game and the Poor Laws, were among the topics which engaged the attention of the reverend reviewer; and on these important questions, his opinions will be generally found correct and sound. Of the practices he reprehended many have been abandoned, and some of the improvements he suggested have been adopted. He forcibly exposed every species of legal injustice or inhumanity. He called the attention of the public to the cruelty and absurdity of the law which denied to prisoners on trial for their lives, for felony or murder, the privilege of being heard by counsel. In a solemn issue of life and death, the advocate of the accused was merely permitted to cross-examine the witnesses; but not to address the jury: and this, at a time when so many offences of a secondary character were punished with the loss of life! It is difficult to realize to ourselves the afflicting scenes that must have occurred under such a system. The intolerable harshness of the law must have been apparent to any man of common sense. But, unfortunately, those who are engaged in the administration of justice are proverbially slow to discover defects in a system which they are accustomed to speak of as the perfection of human wisdom. Yet, many enlightened judges—and some still on the bench—must have had to encounter such an incident as the following; for let our readers recollect, it is not many years since it might have occurred:—"It is a most affecting moment," says the reviewer, "in a court of justice, when the evidence has all been heard, and the judge asks the prisoner what he has to say in his defence. The prisoner, who has (by great exertions, perhaps of his friends) saved up money enough to procure counsel, says to the judge 'that he leaves his defence to his counsel!' We have often blushed for English humanity, to hear the reply: 'Your counsel cannot speak for you; you must speak for yourself;' and this is the reply given to a poor girl of eighteen—to a foreigner—to a deaf man—to a stammerer—to the sick—to the feeble—to the old—to the most abject and ignorant of human beings." To render the absurdity greater, in cases of trifling misdemeanour the accused was allowed the full privilege of counsel. This piece of transparent folly and injustice was thus forcibly exposed by Sydney Smith:—"What would be the discipline of that hospital," he says, "where medical assistance was allowed in all trifling complaints, and withheld in every case of real danger? where Bailey and Halford were lavished upon stomach-aches, and refused in typhus fever? where the dying patient beheld the greatest skill employed upon trifling evils of others, and was told, because his was a case of life and death, that the cook or the nurse was to be his physician?" It is difficult, however, to break through established customs, even when they are proved to be cruel and absurd. The worst of follies will find defenders prepared to support them with the worst of arguments. A member upon his legs in the House of Commons is induced to give utterance to some absurdity, which, though scarcely needing refutation, is a godsend to the writer of the review or leading article. It is thus that Sydney Smith disposes of one defence put forward in that assembly:—

"A most absurd argument was advanced in the honourable House, that the practice of employing counsel would be such an expense to the prisoner!—just as if any thing was so expensive as being hanged! What a fine topic for the ordinary! 'You are going' (says that exquisite divine) 'to be hanged to-morrow, it is true, but consider what a sum you have saved! Mr. Scarlett or Mr. Brougham might certainly have presented arguments to the jury, which would have insured your acquittal; but do you forget that gentlemen of their eminence must be recompensed by large fees, and that, if your life had been saved, you would actually have been out of pocket above 20*l*.? You will now die with the consciousness of having obeyed the dictates of a wise economy; and with a grateful reverence for the laws of your country, which prevents you from running into such unbounded expense—so let us now go to prayers.'"

The writings of Sydney Smith are distinguished, in fact, by a superabundance of humour. We pick up dry morsels in unexpected places; we meet with sly witticisms at the end of serious paragraphs. Our attention is arrested in nearly every page by some quaint simile, odd remark, or apt expression. In the review of Waterton's Wanderings in South America, will be found the description of a sloth. "The sloth, in its wild state, spends its life in trees, and never leaves them, but from force or accident. . . . He moves suspended, rests suspended, sleeps suspended, and passes his life in suspense—like a young clergyman, distantly related to a bishop." A little further on, we read of the land tortoise, that it has two enemies—man, and the boa-constrictor. Its shell protects it against all other foes. "Man, however," says the reviewer, "takes him home, and roasts him—and the boa-constrictor swallows him whole, shell and all, and consumes him slowly in the interior, as the Court of Chancery does a great estate." In reviewing Bentham's Book of Fallacies, he speaks of the "necessity of a middleman between Mr. Bentham and the public. Mr. Bentham is long; Mr. Bentham is occasionally involved and obscure; Mr. Bentham invents new and alarming expressions; Mr. Bentham loves division and subdivision." Under these circumstances, he adds, the great mass of readers "will choose rather to become acquainted with Mr. Bentham through the medium of reviews—after that eminent philosopher has been washed, trimmed, shaved, and forced into clean linen." But we need not multiply examples. We have had many writers of brilliant occasional articles, but never one more remarkable for sparkling, pointed wit, and terse, epigrammatic expression.

Four sermons are included in this miscellaneous collection of Sydney Smith's writings. They are replete with noble thoughts, and penned with great care; but the reader will perhaps feel that they are too neat and studied. Sentences, polished with such extreme nicety, are not expected from the preacher's lips. It should be remembered, however, that they were all written for especial occasions; and that it was the author's plan and principle to correct and revise everything he published, with the most diligent attention. The first of these four sermons was preached in York Cathedral, on the 28th of March, 1824, before the judges of assize, and was published under the title of "The judge that smites contrary to the law." From this excellent discourse we will make one short extract, which will serve for a specimen of the preacher's style, and proves, to our mind, that he was equal to the highest flights of eloquence. The whole sermon seems to have been admirably adapted to the place, the occasion, and the audience; and the following passage is a real gem:—

"The whole tone and tenor of public morals is affected by the state of supreme Justice; it extinguishes revenge, it communicates a spirit of purity and uprightness to inferior magistrates; it makes the great good by taking away impunity; it banishes fraud, obliquity, and solicitation, and teaches men that the law is their right. Truth is its handmaid, freedom is its child, peace is its companion; safety walks in its steps, victory follows in its train: it is the brightest emanation of the Gospel, it is the greatest attribute of God; it is that centre round which human motives and passions turn: and Justice, sitting on high, sees Genius and Power, and Wealth and Birth, revolving round her throne; and teaches their paths and marks out their orbits, and warns with a loud voice, and rules with a strong arm, and carries order and discipline into a world, which but for her would only be a wild waste of passions. Look what we are, and what just laws have done for us:—a land of piety and charity;—a land of churches, and hospitals, and altars;—a nation of good Samaritans;—a people of universal compassion. All lands, all seas, have heard we are brave. We have just sheathed that sword which defended the world; we have just laid down that buckler which covered the nations of the earth. God blesses the soil with fertility; English looms labour for every climate. All the waters of the globe are covered with English ships. We are softened by fine arts, civilized by human literature, instructed by deep science; and every people, as they break their feudal chains, look to the founders and fathers of freedom for examples which may animate, and rules which may guide."

We have not yet done with Sydney Smith's felicitous expressions. The selections which we have made from his reviews bear witness to his varied powers; but some of his recent writings were, perhaps, still more exquisite. In his letter on the character of Sir James Mackintosh there is a noble simile, the grandeur and beauty of which we have never seen surpassed. "I have seen him," he says, "in a moment when this spirit came upon him—like a great ship of war—cut his cable, and spread his enormous canvass, and launched into a wide sea of reasoning eloquence." The description of a ballot mob, from his pamphlet on the Ballot, may be cited as a specimen of his humorous vein in later years.

"The noise and jollity of a ballot mob must be such as the very devils would look on with delight. A set of deceitful wretches wearing the wrong colours, abusing their friends, pelting the man for whom they voted, drinking their enemies' punch, knocking down persons with whom they entirely agreed, and roaring out eternal duration to principles they abhorred. A scene of wholesale bacchanalian fraud, a posse comitatus of liars, which would disgust any man with a free government, and make him sigh for the monocracy of Constantinople."

But perhaps the richest productions of the witty divine's declining years were his letters upon American repudiation. Never were any productions received by the public with greater relish. The wit was thoroughly appreciated by every unlucky holder of Pennsylvanian bonds, and the ludicrous invective was felt to be fully deserved. The letters, in fact, were the indignant echoes of the national voice—the genuine expression of our English sense of wholesale swindling and stupendous fraud. When they made their appearance in the Morning Chronicle newspaper, they were received with shouts of delight. There had never been a more palpable hit. The following paragraph, among others, is inimitable:—

"Figure to yourself a Pennsylvanian receiving foreigners in his own country, walking over the public works with them, and showing them Larcenous Lake, Swindling Swamp, Crafty Canal, and Rogues' Railway, and other dishonest works. 'This swamp we gained (says the patriotic borrower) by the repudiated loan of 1828. Our canal robbery was in 1830; we pocketed your good people's money for the railroad only last year.' All this may seem very smart to the Americans; but if I had the misfortune to be born among such a people, the land of my fathers should not retain me a single moment after the act of repudiation. I would appeal from my fathers to my forefathers. I would fly to Newgate for greater purity of thought, and seek in the prisons of England for better rules of life."

And in another letter he says:—

"I see now in my mind's eye a whole army on the plains of Pennsylvania in battle array, immense corps of insolvent light infantry, regiments of heavy horse debtors, battalions of repudiators, brigades of bankrupts, with Vivre sans payer, ou mourir, on their banners, and ere alieno on their trumpets: all these desperate debtors would fight to the death for their country, and probably drive into the sea their invading creditors."

The conclusion is too characteristic to be omitted:—"And now," he says, "having eased my soul of its indignation, and sold my stock at forty per cent. discount, I sulkily retire from the subject, with a fixed intention of lending no more money to free and enlightened republics, but of employing my money henceforth in buying up Abyssinian bonds, and purchasing into the Turkish Fours, or the Tunis Three-and-a-half per cent. funds."

These letters, which were published in November, 1843, were almost his last printed productions. They proved that his faculties never rusted from want of exercise, and that his brilliant wit remained to the last as forcible in its character and undiminished in its lustre. His fate was, on the whole, a happy one. He closed his long life in the enjoyment of that affluent ease for which many a gifted writer has sighed—and sighed in vain. Surrounded by admiring friends, and with a decent command of the comforts and luxuries of life, the witty Canon of St. Paul's found his last years glide smoothly by, and had, in addition, the satisfaction of looking back upon a long life not ill-spent, and of reaping the fame which attends the possession of uncommon talents, neither neglected nor misapplied by their possessor. "It is pleasant," he said, in one of his articles in the "Edinburgh," "to loll, and roll, and to accumulate—to be a purple-and-fine-linen man, and to be called by some of those nicknames which frail and ephemeral beings are so fond of accumulating upon each other; but the best thing of all is to live like honest men, and to add something to the cause of liberality, justice, and truth." This view of life was never absent from his mind; he had too much sense to despise the good things of this present existence, and too good a heart to forget that every man born into the world has duties to perform, and is bound to support his honest convictions of what is good and true, by the constant exercise of such talents as heaven may have endowed him with.

The intellectual giants of the last generation are fast passing away. At the commencement of the present year, Sydney Smith's first and great ally, Lord Jeffrey, died in a ripe old age. We could not conclude this article without adverting to the circumstance; for both men will hold a high place in the annals of English criticism. In both instances, dignity of character was united with high literary attainments; and though the Edinburgh Review has made some mistakes—in its judgment of Byron and Wordsworth, for instance—though it may have failed in some of its prophecies; though its spirit of party may have been sometimes carried too far; its establishment was an epoch in our literary history, and among its recognised contributors, Smith, Jeffrey, Mackintosh, Brougham, Hallam, and Macaulay, it will be readily admitted, are some of the greatest names in our contemporary literature.

THE UTILITY OF USELESS THINGS.

BY J. M. W.

THESE words seem to involve a paradox; and, a paradox has been pronounced to be a half-truth. Now, we should like to say a little in proof of our opinion, that the utility of useless things is a simple and complete truth (as far as earthly truth can be called complete), and therefore not to be counted as a paradox. We do not intend to frighten our readers by the profundity of our observations on the present occasion; but it may not be amiss to intimate that the subject, trifling as it may seem, is, in reality, one of great significance to genuine philosophers; and cannot be exhausted in a fugitive article.

In the business language of the world, things are called useful when they promote the profit, convenience, or comfort of every-day life; and useless when they do not promote, or when they hinder either of these desired ends. A useful person or thing means one of which practical, tangible use can be made;—and hence their high value among all men engaged in the actual business of life;—hence their over-value in certain systems of philosophy, which are based chiefly on the material and mundane well-being of man. Without entering into a disquisition on the fundamental errors of the various forms of Utilitarian Philosophy, ancient and modern (which we take to be a misapprehension of the spiritual necessities of man's nature), we may intimate our belief that they have none of them solved the great riddle concerning the main-spring of human conduct; or that other great riddle concerning "our Being's end and aim." The mot d'énigme in the former puzzle of the wise men is, certainly, not Self-interest; and in the other, as certainly, not Happiness. If there be one creature on this earth that is less guided by self-interest (blind or enlightened) than another, we should say that creature is Man. He does not know in what his interest consists for the greater part of his mortal career; and when he does attain to any knowledge of it, he has rarely the ability or the will to act in accordance with that knowledge. No "greatest happiness principle," no "profit-and-loss philosophy," will be found at the bottom of any wise or good man's actions;—nor of any happy man's either. Nor are the happiest people necessarily the most useful, either to themselves or others, in the usual, i. e. in the "profit-and-loss" acceptance of that term;—they are often what are called emphatically "useless members of society." It may be that "they toil not, neither do they spin," yet is their mission here below, among the higher utilities.

Far be it from us to undervalue the useful things of external life—they are the first things required, but they are not the sole things required, or the highest. Man must have bread, and clothing, and dwellings, in order to live; but, it must also be remembered, that man does not live by bread, clothes, and the conveniences of external life, alone. When any man does live by these alone he has forfeited his claim to the higher form of life which is his glorious privilege, and by which he is distinguished from the unintelligent brute.

The things which minister to the higher, i. e. to the spiritual life in man, have often so remote an influence on his physical existence, that they are generally supposed to have no influence on it at all, by those whose attention has been exclusively directed to the amelioration of that physical existence. This is a mistake; for the spiritual nature acts powerfully and constantly upon the physical one, and vice versa. Nothing with which we are acquainted is simple; all things here are complex, and their various elements act and re-act upon each other. But if it were not so in human nature,—if the things which minister to man's spiritual development had no influence whatever on his external well-being,—they would still be among the higher utilities of his existence; inasmuch as they concern the enduring portion of his nature—the immortal soul; which must, when properly considered, (even in a profit-and-loss philosophy,) be valued far above the perishable life of the body.

Without saying anything about Transcendentalism as a vast system of philosophy, we may safely declare, that the best and highest things transcend the senses;—and that those things and qualities of things which the transcendentalist esteems useful, nay essential to the development of the inner and higher life in man, are frequently such as the utilitarian ranks among non-essential, or even useless things, in themselves; although he may admit, that, as adjuncts of what he calls positively useful things, they may be indirectly useful.

For instance, all beauty which is without any distinct and positive quality of usefulness,—like the gold and crimson glories of the clouds at sun-rise and sun-set; all beauty superadded to those objects of which usefulness is generally recognised as the essential characteristic; as for example, an elegant fender or a field of ripe corn;—in both cases the quality of beauty, per se, has a high degree of spiritual utility. Let not this assertion be confounded with the theory which makes all beauty to depend on recognised utility. We do not say that things are beautiful because they are useful; but, that things are spiritually useful because they are beautiful;—which is a very different matter. To descend to some familiar examples of the utility of useless things. The song of birds, flowers (not used as food or medicine), kittens (not yet able to catch mice), babies, poets with a competence, and beautiful maidens without one, are, probably, in the estimation of sound business-like men, among the most useless things in the world. They do nothing but give trouble or make a noise there. Certainly, for all worldly purposes of “profit-and-loss,” they are worse than useless. But there are higher purposes which must be served on this earth, since it is not a cul de sac of well regulated self-interest,—through which there is no emerging into a wider sphere. There is, as we said before, a much higher utility than the temporary and worldly one in these so-called useless things.

A baby, for instance,—helpless,—useless as it seems, is among the higher utilities of the spiritual life of man. Some people set up a garden, or a carriage, or a library, to promote their moral and physical welfare;—if we may venture to advise those among our readers who are endowed with money and leisure, (two great utilities of this worldly life,) on the subject of their own highest interest, we should say, Set up a baby if you do not possess one of your own. If we are asked, “Cui bono?”—“What is the use of setting up a baby in my house to disturb my comfort?” we reply, Simply this,—that it does disturb your comfort;—that you are obliged to forego habitual self-consideration, self-indulgence. That imperious impotence, that helpless young life, calls with a strong compulsive voice for your immediate and total self-annihilation in its behalf. You cannot be egotistic with a baby in your arms, be you man or woman. It must be attended to; and you must leave off attending to yourself and minister to its wants and feeblest glimmerings of whim. The “thoughts which wander through eternity” must be brought down to the contemplation of an undeveloped spark of intelligence. The voice which loves to utter the golden numbers of immortal bards and the concentrated wisdom of sages, must tune itself to babble sweet, baby nonsense, to soothe the uneasiness of the young conqueror. And this without any conscious reference to his future being;—without looking forward to the time when this soft modicum of pink flesh shall become a graceful, glorious man, or woman,—

“The heir of all the ages—in the foremost files of time.”

No, your subservience is not, consciously, prospective. It is to the present being,—the absolute baby,—witless,—thankless,—totally oblivious, that you devote yourself in the most unqualified manner;—as you never devoted yourself to a rational being who might minister to your self-interest by some equivalent service. Let all those who wish to get away from self,—past and present,—who cry, “Oh! for a draught of lethe!”—let these people set up a baby. It need not be their own; they need not be father or mother to the child (although the profit as well as the pleasure may be doubled if they are); it is sufficient that they take an interest in a baby,—live in the house with it, and be subject to its influence. Great is the influence of that tiny tyrant; it becomes the chief person in the house, and all things give way to it. Perhaps the tyranny of a baby is the only species of tyranny which is of the greatest utility, of the truest benefit, to both parties.

A philosophical writer of considerable repute has said, “It seems a necessary condition of human science, that we should learn many useless things, in order to become acquainted with those which are of service.” So that in the investigations of science useless things are of utility.

Again,—in matters concerning our faith and hope in things above this world; and also, in those which concern our right conduct in it,—that is to say, in religion and in morals, we have received the command to “prove” (i.e. to try—put to the proof) “all things,” and to “hold fast that which is good.” To do this we must be acquainted with wrong—with semblances of goodness, as well as with goodness itself; in order that we may see a distinction, and make a selection, between the two. You cannot prove that with which you are unacquainted. Therefore, in religion and morals, evil—that which is useless in the exercise of faith and virtue, is of great utility in the attainment of both.

In conclusion, we would say a word in favour of the utility of such apparently useless things as trifling articles like the present, which do not undertake to prove any thing, or to inculcate dogmatically any supposed incontrovertible truth. Their utility consists in this, that they may perhaps suggest ideas which are new to a reader and set him thinking, and may indicate, in some measure, the way in which he may work them out for himself. This is the legitimate office of the essayist; and if we have exercised it with any beneficial effect, on the present occasion, we have given, at least, one example of the Utility of Useless Things.

THE HUMAN EYE AND ITS LITTLE INHABITANT.

No organ of the human body has attracted more attention than the eye. It has formed the object of the most careful investigation to the anatomist, of the most diligent study to the philosopher, of the most enthusiastic admiration to the worshipper of nature's God, through the works of his hand. Nor does it deserve less; no language can adequately describe the beauties and perfections of its structure, nor exaggerate its utility to man; and if it has thus received attention, that attention has not been thrown away—has not been unfruitful of the most beneficial results. We are in ignorance still, no doubt, of the exact nature of some of its functions. But we know it better probably than we do any other organ of the body, and hence it is that that branch of the great science of medicine which is directed to the nature and treatment of eye-diseases, as it is the most elegant, is also the best understood. We are more certain of the causes and nature of diseases of the eye, than we are of those of any other organ of the body.

As affording a proof of the wisdom of the Creator, or rather of design in the creation, it has been by men of the highest powers selected as an example. There are many works on the subject, among which the elegant chapters of Dr. Neil Arnott and Dr. Roget are very attractive both in matter and style.

Let not the reader fear lest we should inflict upon him a long lecture on that very dry science, Anatomy, nor on that most interesting one, Physiology. Had he such a fear indeed, he might have also his remedy by turning over a few pages; but we beg of him to stop a few minutes ere he does so.

It is "a wise saw," that one half of the world does not know how the other half lives. We may add that more by far than half of the world is totally unaware, even of the very existence of anything like the other half. Many a bright-eyed lady and keen-eyed gentleman may possibly be quite ignorant of the singular fact, that there has occasionally been found a lively little animal sporting in the clear liquid which fills the inner and fore part of the human eye. The visits of this little animal are extremely rare, certainly; more rare than those of the comet. Four cases of its appearance have as yet only been recorded, and a notice of these singular animals may gratify the curious. In spite of our promise and resolve, we must be indulged in the explanatory style for a few minutes, otherwise we shall be quite unintelligible. Know then, O curious peeper into thy brother's, and it may be thy sister's eye, that there is in the fore part of it, immediately behind the clear window which its centre presents, a considerable quantity of limpid fluid, to which the learned give the name of aqueous humour, and simple folks may call watery; it having, in fact, chiefly the appearance and properties of water. This fluid, when let out by accident or design, very soon forms again; and there is no reason to doubt that it is constantly, by a process of nature, being removed and reproduced. This fact is of consequence with reference to our little animal. Behind the fluid we have mentioned are two bodies, before we reach the actually seeing part of the eye; the first, called the crystalline, tolerably firm, and the second much more extensive and of a medium consistence: of these we do not require to take any farther notice. But it is well we should notice that the first-mentioned, the aqueous humour, is divided into two parts by a singularly beautiful and movable curtain, to which the name Iris has been given, from an ideal comparison with the rainbow. It is this part which gives the colour to the eye, and principally enables it to exercise those remarkable powers of expression which have given rise to so many heartaches, and to some good, and more indifferent, poetry. Each poet, according to his fancy, has sung of "eyes of heavenly blue," or boasted of his own "dark-eyed maid," from the days of Anacreon to those of Thomas Moore; and Homer celebrates the "ox-eyed Juno," and some in less complimentary terms have ventured to speak of "a green-eyed monster."

For ourselves, who have seen much of eyes of all descriptions, but in whom the stern realities of life have tamed much of the romance of poetry, and the hoar frost which renders grey the head in preparation for the snowy winter of old age has taken the place of the sparkling colours in which the youthful fancy used to disport itself—to us the beauty of the eye depends little on its colour. We love that eye the most which beams the most kindly on us. We cannot be singular in this. We dare say nearly every one of our readers would admire above all others the look of affection, whether that of the mother whose soft eye of love beamed into his cradle, or that of the maid whose bright glances first told his young heart that it beat not for himself alone.

"It was na' thy bonny blue een were my ruin;
Fair though thou art, that was ne'er my undoin';
It was the sweet smile when naeboddy did mind us,
It was the bewitching sweet stoun glance o' kindness."

How beautiful the eyes of a long attached wife, on our return from a far journey!

"'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come."

Still farther lovely to him also is the glance of the laughing-eyed girl who climbs her doting father's knee, and prepares an attack upon the paternal purse with "dear papa."

But we have been led astray from our business, as many a wiser man has been, by bright eyes. Still one word for the gallant Peres, whose compliment to a lady's eye stands unrivalled. This gentleman, who was minister to Phillip II., said to Henry IV. of France, that a certain beauty who had only one eye had put all Spain in combustion, and that had she had two, she would have reduced it to ashes.

By this digression then be it understood, that the limpid fluid we have described in the fore part of the eye, and divided by the beautiful Iris, is the local habitation—the native element—of the little animal we wish to introduce to the reader's notice. It has a proper name and surname, and its godfathers being learned men, that name is of course learned. It is called Cysticercus, and by way of surname Cellulosa. We shall adhere to its first appellation.

We commence with that one of the four cases which came under our own notice, and for whose life and history we can therefore best vouch.

About twenty years ago, a girl of seven years of age was under the care of Mr. Logan, a surgeon of New Lanark in Scotland, for inflammation in one of her eyes. After she had been for some time under his charge, he was surprised one day, on examining her eye, to find in its clear part—which is termed pupil, and which is the opening left by the Iris, and admitting communication between the fore and back parts of the aqueous humour—an object which gave evident signs of independent life. The motions were distinct and frequent. As nothing of the kind had ever been known in this country before, he made public his observation. It attracted the notice of Mr. Meikle, a retired East India surgeon, who, the child's parents being poor, took charge of the little girl, and with true scientific liberality, visited, entirely at his own expense, with her, many of the principal towns, that his brethren might have an opportunity of witnessing so interesting a sight. Among other places, he visited Glasgow, where we then had the pleasure of imbibing such knowledge as the eminent university of that city affords. Every one went to see the little girl, who with the Cysticercus in her eye became quite a young lioness; and the eminent oculist, Dr. William Mackenzie, paid great attention to the matter, and published an account of it in the twelfth volume of the Medical Gazette, and subsequently in his great work on the eye.

After quoting Mr. Logan's account,—“I found,” Dr. Mackenzie says, “the cornea slightly cloudy (dim), the eye free from inflammation and pain, and the appearances and movements of the animal quite plain. When the patient kept her head at rest, as she sat before me in a moderate light, the animal covered the two lower thirds of the pupil. Watching it carefully, its cystic portion was seen to become more or less spherical, and then to assume a flattened form, while its head I saw at one moment thrust suddenly down to the bottom of the anterior chamber, and the next drawn up so completely as scarcely to be visible. Mr. Meikle turned the child's head gently back, and instantly the hydatid revolved through the aqueous humour, so that the head fell to the upper edge of the cornea, now become the more depending part. On the child again leaning forwards it settled like a little balloon in its former position, preventing the patient from seeing objects directly before her or below the level of the eye, but permitting the vision of such as were placed above. Mr. Logan had observed no increase, nor Mr. Meikle any change, except that the cystic part was more opaque.”

• Mr. Wharton Jones, who also saw this girl, is perhaps still more minute, but in order to understand the terms these gentlemen use, let us quote a short general description of the animal by Vogel, an eminent German physiologist. “The Cysticercus cellulosa consists of an oval vesicle, varying in length from three to eight lines; it possesses an extensible neck terminating in a head, which together with the neck can be protruded and retracted, and in the latter case may be overlooked. The head is square, and has at each of its four corners a sucker; on the fore part of the head, at the base of a tunnel, is a double row of hooks, amounting in number to about thirty-two. When extended, it may measure from half an inch to an inch in length. The breadth of the head is about a line, of the vesicle about six.” M. Vogel examined the cysticercus taken from animals and from various parts of the human body; for it is not so strange to find it in parts which have any access to the external world. On seeing it in the eye we may exclaim, as was done by the poet—

“Pretty! in amber to observe the forms
Of hair, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms;
The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there.”

Dr. Roget makes very short work of the matter; and his brief description is enough to bear on the mind. A hydatid—he uses the general term—he tells us, is a head furnished with four suckers joined to a neck which terminates in a sac. This sac is, in fact, a stomach. When distended, the head becomes scarcely visible, and the sac is a spheroid. “It is impossible to conceive a more simple organic structure than this, which may in fact be considered as an isolated living stomach.”

These two authorities describe the hydatid generally, for it is found in many parts of the body. The rarity we wish to point out is its being found in the very apple of the human eye. They did not observe it there. Mr. Wharton Jones had that advantage, besides having examined it minutely after its extraction. He tells us, “The tail vesicle of the animal was about one-sixth of an inch in diameter, semi-transparent, and might be seen alternately contracting and expanding, and sometimes undergoing slight changes of form. Besides, the body and head were sometimes retracted within the tail vesicle, sometimes protruded from it—the part of which connected with the body and head was always the most depending. When the body and head were protruding and hanging down, the animal resembled a little balloon.”

A cysticercus, which however had never been seen alive, was brought to Mr. Jones. It had been taken from the diseased eye of a boy ten years of age, in Westminster Hospital. It was carefully examined, and found to be nearly double the size of those before described; hence, probably, the destruction of the eye, the animal being allowed to grow until that mischief resulted. The same was like to be the conclusion of the little girl's case. The eye seeming to be in danger, the animal was extracted by a surgeon in Edinburgh; but it having been found impossible to keep the child steady during the operation, the sight of that eye was unfortunately lost after all the pains that had been taken with her. Two cases previous to this had occurred in Germany; the first is recorded by Dr. Neuman; it occurred in a boy of fourteen. An operation for its removal failed. The second case, in the hands of Dr. W. Soemmering, occurred in 1830; the subject was a girl of eighteen, and the animal was successfully extracted. The instance first given occurred in 1833, and we heard no more of our little cysticercus until towards the end of 1848, when the fourth known case was so fortunate as to fall into the hands of so competent a person as Dr. Mackenzie himself. He sent an account of it to the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, from an abstract of which we learn these particulars:—

A girl aged sixteen applied at the Glasgow Infirmary in September, 1848, on account of obscurity of vision in the left eye. A spherical body, about one-eighth of an inch in diameter, was observed lying close in front of the pupil in the anterior chamber, and this proved on closer inspection to be a Cysticercus cellulosa. The patient stated that in June the left eye had been the subject of inflammation, which occurred immediately before the appearance of the strange thing in her eye. Objects placed in a direct line before the eye, or below it, she saw very indistinctly, but in a moderate light the expansion of the pupil left one-third, at its upper part, unobscured. The position of the hydatid varied to a certain extent, and it was an object of curiosity to many. Its opaque body, its tail, vesicle, and rostellum, together with its four lateral suckers, could be distinctly made out, and it was observed to be the most lively in the morning and when the patient was warm. She was quite unconscious of the motions of the animal, and did not appear to suffer pain from its presence.

On the 14th of October, the little animal was dislodged from its comfortable water nest. An opening was made with a delicate knife through the little horny window in front of the eye, a small hook was introduced, and the cysticercus drawn out. It was placed in tepid water, and continued to move fully forty minutes after its removal from the eye. Had the water been of the same quality and temperature as that in the eye, there seems no reason why it should not have lived on, unless, indeed, as was probable, it was wounded by the hook.

Viewed through a compound microscope, the transparent range of claws surrounding the rostellum were distinctly seen, as were also the corpuscles scattered over its neck and on the four lateral suckers.

Dr. Mackenzie states it as his opinion that the attack of ophthalmia in June, immediately preceding the appearance of the hydatid, was owing to the development of its ovum in one of the blood-vessels of the Iris or an adjoining structure, and that the inflammation ceased suddenly as soon as the hydatid dropped into the anterior chamber, where it lived at its ease and thrived on the aqueous humour. Can we possibly imagine that there may be in this fluid animalcules still more minute which furnished nourishment to this little animal? It is pleasant to learn the fact, and it must have been gratifying to the eminent surgeon himself, that no bad symptom followed the operation, and that the girl was quite well in a week.

Now, in what manner can this animal, at rare intervals, find its way into the eye—into the fine crystal fluid of the most delicate organ of the human body?

The idea of spontaneous production—of being called into life by the mere action of the elements—is not entertained by any sound philosophic mind. The German author whom we have mentioned, Vogel, has some not very intelligibly expressed notions about the cysticercus not being a distinct animal, but merely an imperfect tænia; but this does not explain how it gets into the eye, and has no other foundation than that the head of the one animal is found to be like that of the other.

Dr. Mackenzie seems to indicate the true solution of the question in supposing that, in the case he last observed, the inflammation was caused by the development of the egg of the cysticercus in one of the bloodvessels which nourish the internal parts of the eye. It is by means of the circulation of the blood, then, that we must endeavour to account for so singular an occurrence. The parasite we speak of is by no means uncommon in various animals, such as hares, rabbits, and pigs. Now, it is conceivable that the minute seed may escape the complicated processes of assimilation and find its way into the blood. The nutrient arteries which supply the internal structures of the eye are so minute that they cannot be seen in a state of health by the naked eye. Yet along these minute tubes may the seed, still more minute, be conveyed, and thus the little animal be hatched and brought to light in so strange a situation. How many learned disquisitions have we not had on the faculties of elephants, and dogs, and horses, and parrots! What shall we say to our new acquaintance? Can it think?—can it feel pain and pleasure? Has it any instincts? Alas, for our feeble reasons! how can we tell? Which of us can fathom the works of the Creator? Nothing can be created without a purpose, and, ignorant as we must be of the purposes of such a creature as this, we cannot do wrong should we derive a lesson from its existence. When we find the most elegant organ in our bodies, of the beauties of which the fairest are proud—which has been sung by poets and admired by all—subject to be the habitation of a worm even during life, we may well meditate on our own insignificance, may well prostrate our hearts before the power of our Creator.

HINT FROM NATURE.

The old Dutch painters of flowers mostly worked on a black ground. The value of this arrangement may be easily and pleasantly ascertained by examining natural flowers by the light of a lantern on a dark night. The exquisite beauty of nature's floral gems, when thus exhibited, can scarcely be understood without experiment.—G. J. French.

A FIRESIDE VISIT TO HUGGENS COLLEGE.

BY Q.

If we see that there is a great deal of evil in the world, it is cheering to know there is much good that we do not see. The generation of those who is not extinct. Evil comes to the surface, but good is essentially retiring; and, though it "cannot be hid" when it attains certain dimensions, yet even then it is far less notorious than crime. Fame—moral and religious fame, for I speak not of intellectual—has far weaker pinions than Infamy. The names of Rush and Manning carry horror to every hearth in Britain, and to many beyond; while deeds no less godlike than theirs were satanical are the conversation of a village or a town, or, at most, a county. Every weekly paper is full of murders and atrocities; every assize charge commemorates the increase of crime; every report of our religious societies exhibits the deficiency of religious means, the heathenism of our populous towns, the inadequate efforts which this opulent nation is making to resist the evil. These things are revolting, but they are also encouraging; at least, they should be so. They should inspire the hardy courage which welcomes dangers, which arises at once from the consciousness of heavy odds, internal energy, a good cause, and an Almighty Providence. But it may encourage us further to know that there are heroes in the field—men whose energies are commensurate with the emergencies they are called to meet—and that, if all would do as they have done, or even much less, our land might be, in religion, morals, and happiness, all that it is in opulence and power.

When I visited Sackville College last year but one, I was unaware that there existed a foundation of our own times on a far more munificent scale than even that noble establishment was on its first institution; and, but for the publication of my visit to the ancient endowment, I should not probably have become acquainted with the existence of the other, to which my attention was called by a reader of my paper. Though I am not at present able to inspect Huggens College, and to converse with its beneficent founder on its character and prospects, (a pleasure to which I look forward, however, with no ordinary interest,) yet, so uncertain is this life, that I would not defer to an indefinite period a notice of what all people ought to know: and how should I address all people more effectively than through SHARPE'S MAGAZINE?

The readers of SHARPE, then, are hereby invited, at this season of keen winds but warm hearths and hearts, to accompany me on a fire-side tour of inspection to Huggens College, thereby avoiding the inconveniences consequent on exposure in steam-boats or railway-carriages, while they may accumulate more caloric about their hearts from the contemplation, and, let me hope, imitation, of a noble act of generosity.

We have arrived, then, at Northfleet, a goodly town in the fair garden of England, about a mile and a half from Gravesend, with the lordly Thames on the left, and the bold and pleasant hills of Kent to the right. Here we come in front of a noble range of buildings, with a handsome chapel in the centre,—noble and handsome as far as extent is concerned, and liberal expenditure could make them,—for, so far as a fire-side traveller may judge from the Illustrated London News, the architecture is less pure than imposing and elaborate. But let us enter, and we shall find "lively stones" "built up a spiritual house." In this abode ten reduced gentlemen, and a like number of ladies similarly circumstanced, none under sixty years of age, dwell in comfort befitting their place in society. But this is not all. The benevolent founder contemplates the accommodation of double that number. They have each a comfortable house with four handsome rooms; they have wash-houses and out-houses, and, to make them more comfortable still, they have each fifty-two pounds per annum! a sum which will be increased by an event which we hope may be long deferred—the decease of their bountiful benefactor. It must be delightful to hear him speak, as we are told he does, of the joy his noble scheme has procured for him;—to hear him dwell, not in a spirit of boastfulness, but with that inward exultation which is inseparable from a good work, on the pleasures which the objects of his bounty enjoy,—picture them as gazing happily along the bright valley and busy waters of the Thames, seen from the verdant and flowery foreground of their gardens, and conversing with brotherly and sisterly love on the happiness of early years, and the blessedness of the retreat they have found; for brothers and sisters he calls them, and such they seem to be. Delightful must it be to hear him speak of their approaching departure, which he likens to the setting of a summer's sun, calm and beautiful, in the retreat which he has provided, and of that preparation which is to make it so, for which their leisure allows them opportunity, and their founder's provisions advantage. In a simple and characteristic account of his college, Mr. Huggens says, "That it may be the means of leading one to that happy kingdom, is the continual wish and prayer of its founder! No pains will be spared on that head, as that is one of his first and most stringent orders." Some legal difficulty has, I understand, arisen with regard to the consecration of the chapel, or appointment of the chaplain. With the merits of the question I am unacquainted, and can, therefore, pronounce no opinion upon it; neither with it are the readers of SHARPE concerned. But all, I apprehend, will regret the existence of any such impediment in the carrying out of so glorious a scheme. Mr. Huggens has been invited to place the religious economy of his foundation in the hands of dissenters; but, being a Churchman, he will not consent to this arrangement, preferring patiently to wait a favourable termination, which he is confident his good cause will eventually secure.

The readers of SHARPE may naturally expect from me some account of the author of the noble work to which I have conducted them. On this point I can do little for them at present. Mr. Huggens is a modest, retiring man, who seems thoroughly to have understood and practised the precepts which at once command us to let our light shine before men for the Divine glory, and not to let our left hand know what our right hand doeth, where man alone could be magnified. Of himself he says little, and pleads the number of applications in excuse. But what he does say is sufficiently interesting.—“The founder of Huggens’ College, John Huggens, began business at a very early period of his life. With great economy and increasing industry for sixty years, he saved sufficient to build and endow his college at Northfleet.”

It is seldom that such are the results, much less the objects, of early economy and industry. Too often is it seen, that these virtues, undirected by religion, degenerate into avarice and rapacity. But here they have been worthily consecrated. We have read of men who have toiled hard and fared harder, to earn the neglect and disgust of their few remaining relatives, and to leave their useless wealth a spoil for the officers of the law. But here is an object, indeed, worthy of “great economy and increasing industry;” to be the blessing and the blessed of countless generations! This is something worth working for! Noble John Huggens! there is a day coming when thy wealth shall outstrip all the hoards of all the Rothschilds! when thy fame shall infinitely distance that of Alexanders and Napoleons! Thou hast invested thy capital in an unfailing, an overpaying stock! Thou hast committed thy fame to the universe; to the proclamation of angels, not the adulation of men! Verily, there is small need that thou tell us thy history. All nature shall know it at the great day. And what more can we know of thee now worth knowing, or more significant of thy character and life, than that thou art the founder of THY College at Northfleet?

True it is, that Huggens College is of a different order from the Sackville foundation—of one, perhaps, more common, if we except the grandeur of the scale. Yet it is a kind of foundation for which much can be said. No poverty is so grievous and painful as that which, at the decline of life, succeeds competency and independence. Poverty, to him who has never known any other condition, is like confinement to the caged bird; and experiment shows that riches acquired under such circumstances, are as unmanageable and injurious as liberty to the life-long captive: but where, from long habit, comforts and luxuries have become, in a manner, the necessities of life, it is hard to want them when they are, in a degree, necessary to all. The most painful consideration, however, is that of mental refinement and cultivation, rendering the possessor at every moment more sensibly alive to the rude shocks which he must repeatedly experience, while his natural ability to resist them is diminished. True it is, that, if his training has been spiritual as well as intellectual, these things will be to him as the blessed burden of the Cross, and he will know how to rejoice in them as a healthful penance for past indulgence, or inactivity, or forgetfulness; a salutary correction and discipline for future amendment, and a hopeful token of the Divine love. Still, “no chastisement for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous.” It must be such even to those who know how to apply it best; but wealth is not the best school of preparation; and to those whose minds have been cultivated, but their souls neglected, the visitation may be dangerous, as it is assuredly painful. How kind, then, the hand which rears a shelter against temptation, and pours healing on the rankling wound; opens opportunities of good by softening the heart with kindness; smoothes the path to reflection, to penitence, to submission, to obedience; removes consuming anxieties, and bestows the means of guidance and instruction!

We have travelled to Huggens College, and seen, perhaps, as much as could be expected in a fire-side journey. We turn to the glowing hearth again, and to the bright and loving looks around it—or, reader, perchance no cheering countenance meets thine; and yet thou turnest to no solitary walls, but to walls lined with unfailing, unbetraying friends, the holy and wise of elder days, or of thine own: whose thoughts are stored for thee in those thy precious volumes. And do not these, our comforts, speak to us of reverses that may yet overtake us? when our hearth may be cold and deserted—when those who loved us may be gone, some past returning—when those whom we love shall love us not—when, like Roscoe, we may lament the departure even of those true immortal friends, whom we could trust with no wavering faith? ¹ Let us be prepared for such a time! If we have not closer and dearer claims, let us take courage, from what we have seen in this brief expedition of Fancy to no fanciful region, to make “great economy and increasing industry” lay up treasures in heaven for ourselves, treasures on earth as well as in heaven for those who have been less fortunate! How poor the pleasures of the world, to say nothing of their evanescence, compared to those enjoyed by the benevolent man whose work we have been contemplating! Really, if the voluptuary were true to his character, and desired to live to pleasure in its most exquisite form, thus would he seek it! But though all are not blessed with the means at the disposal of Mr. Huggens, his munificence may be distantly imitated—he that cannot build a college, may afford a house, or, at least, contribute to the funds of a college. And in this view, undoubtedly, if a comparison is to be instituted between the establishments which I have brought forward in these pages, the claims of Sackville College must be regarded as greatly superior, inasmuch as the other amply secures the object at which it aims, while Sackville College is, unhappily, far short of effecting its own purposes, and appeals more eloquently, perhaps, to public support, than any kindred institution. But endowments of these several kinds will be among the most effective conductors which man can erect to guard our country in these electric and cloudy times: the multiplication of means whereby sorrow is relieved and salvation promoted, will be the best preventive and counteraction of crime, and of its effects and judgments. The multiplication of those who build religious and charitable foundations is the diminution of those who would overthrow them, and with them, the monarchy itself. "Mercy and truth preserve the king, and his throne is upholden by mercy."¹

LEWIS ARUNDEL;²

OR, THE RAILROAD OF LIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXXI.

CONTAINS SUNDRY DEFINITIONS OF "WOMAN AS SHE SHOULD BE," AND DISCLOSES MRS. ARUNDEL'S OPINION OF RICHARD FRERE.

LEWIS did not obtain any answer to his polite note, as Lord Bellefield received on the following morning letters, which he said required his immediate presence in London, and in the hurry of departure he no doubt forgot to refute the charge Lewis had seen fit to bring against him; and, as the young tutor preserved a strict silence on the subject, and Sam Jones kept his own counsel with his accustomed closeness, there, for the present, the matter appeared likely to rest. Some little surprise was caused in the village by the sudden disappearance of Jane Hardy, the poacher's daughter, a girl of about nineteen; but, as it was imagined she had gone to take up her quarters in the town of H—, where her father was imprisoned, her absence was soon forgotten. Lewis and Charles Leicester alone, having ascertained her identity with the young person who had assisted in the refreshment-room on the night of the party, connected her flight with Lord Bellefield's abrupt departure, and, although the subject was, for obvious reasons, avoided between them, little doubt remained on their minds as to her probable fate. This occurrence afforded Lewis a clue to Lord Bellefield's sudden interest in regard to Hardy's capture;—by her father's imprisonment would be removed the chief impediment to the success of his designs upon the daughter. The event had proved the correctness of his calculation.

Weeks passed on; the wound in Lewis's shoulder healed, despite the aggravating attendance of Doctors Scalpel and Bistoury, and, with youth and health on his side, he speedily regained his accustomed vigour. General Grant's recovery was a matter of greater difficulty. The fracture had been by no means easily reduced, and the process by which the bones re-united was a long and tedious one. His accident (as is usually the case with such events) had occurred at a most inconvenient moment;—while he was yet confined to his room the election for the county came on, and his opponent, taking advantage of his absence to undermine his influence with the voters, was returned by a large majority. The bribery by which he had obtained his seat was, however, a matter of such notoriety, that, by De Grandville's advice, the General was induced to petition Parliament to annul the election. The petition failed, and the expenses, which, from the prolonged proceedings, were unusually heavy, all fell upon the unsuccessful candidate. During the progress of the affair, Lewis, by the General's wish, acted as his amanuensis and private secretary, a confidential servant being engaged to wait on Walter and attend him during his rides, thus relieving his tutor of much that was irksome in his situation. The London season was at its height before General Grant had recovered sufficiently to leave Broadhurst, but a fortnight before the day on which Charles Leicester's wedding was fixed to take place, Annie and her father started for the great metropolis.

During his attendance on the General, Lewis had been thrown much into Annie's society, and their intimacy had deepened, on the lady's side, into feelings of the warmest esteem and friendship, while the gentleman became more and more convinced that his previous estimate of the fair sex was a completely mistaken one, and altogether to be condemned as the weakest and most fallacious theory that ever entered the brain of a hot-headed boy,—by which opprobrious epithet he mentally stigmatized his six-months-ago self,—and, for at least a week after she had departed, he felt as if something had gone wrong with the sun, so that it never shone properly.

The General had been away about a fortnight, when Lewis received a letter from Rose informing him for the first time of her literary pursuits. Since we have last heard of this young lady she had been growing decidedly blue. Not only had she, under Bracy's auspices, published a series of papers in Blunt's Magazine, but she had positively written a child's book, which, although it contained original ideas, good-sense, and warm feeling, instead of second-hand moral platitudes, and did not take that particularly natural view of life which represents it as a system of temporal rewards and punishments, wherein the praiseworthy elder sister is always recompensed with an evangelical young duke, and the naughty boys are invariably drowned on clandestine skating expeditions, yet found an enterprising publisher willing to purchase it; nay, so well did it answer, that the courageous bibliopolist had actually expressed a wish to confer with "the talented authoress," as he styled poor Rose, in regard to a second work. Whereupon Frere despatched a note to that young lady, telling her she had better come up to town at once, offering her the use of his house in a rough and ready way, just as if he had been writing to a man; and though he did add in a postscript that if she fancied she should be dull she'd better bring her mother with her, the afterthought was quite as likely to have arisen from sheer good-nature, as from any, even the most faint, glimmering of etiquette. Owing to a judicious hint thrown out by Bracy, however, an invitation arrived, at the same time, from Lady Lombard, which Mrs. Arundel had immediately decided on accepting, and the object of Rose's letter was to inquire whether there was the slightest hope of Lewis being able to meet them.

By the same post arrived a note written by Annie from her father's dictation, saying that he found he was quite unable to get on without Mr. Arundel's assistance, that he considered change of scene might prove beneficial to Walter, and that it was, therefore, his wish that Lewis and his pupil should join them immediately after the bustle of the wedding should be over; which scheme chimed in with the young tutor's wishes most admirably, and for the rest of the morning he was so happy as to be quite unlike his usual grave and haughty self, and astonished Faust to such a degree by placing his fore-paws against his own chest, and in that position constraining him to waltz round the room on his hind-legs, that the worthy dog would have assuredly taken out a statute of lunacy against his master, had he been aware of the existence of such a process.

Those who witnessed the marriage of the Hon. Charles Leicester to the lovely and accomplished daughter of the late Peregrine Peyton, Esq. of Stockington Manor, in the county of Lancashire, (they said nothing of Ludgate Hill, and ignored Plumpsteru totally,) describe it to have been a truly edifying ceremony. The fatal knot was tied, and the wretched pair launched into a married state by the Bishop of L—, the unhappy victims submitting to their fate with unexampled fortitude and resignation, and the female spectators evincing by their tears, that the lesson to be derived from the awful tragedy enacting before them, would not be thrown away upon them. Nor were the good intentions thus formed allowed to swell the list of "unredeemed pledges" whence that prince of pawnbrokers, Satan, is popularly supposed to select his paving materials, as, during the ball which concluded the evening, two fine young men of property fell victims to premature declarations, and after a rapid decline from the ways of good fellowship, were carried off by matrimony, and departed this (i.e. fashionable) life, in less than two months after their first seizure.

On Lewis's arrival in town, he found a small packet directed to him in Leicester's hand-writing, containing, besides the glazed cards lovingly coupled by silver twist, a remarkably elegant gold watch and chain for the waistcoat pocket, together with a few lines from Charley himself, saying that to Lewis's good advice and plain speaking he felt he in a great measure owed his present happiness, and that he hoped Lewis would wear the enclosed note, the joint gift of himself and Laura, to remind him of their mutual friendship and regard. Had he known that Annie Grant had noticed the fact of his not possessing a watch, and suggested the nature of the gift to her cousin, he would have valued it even more highly than he did.

The happy pair had determined to test the endurance of their felicity by starting for the Rhine, which popular river it was their intention to go up as far as it was go-up-able, then proceed to Switzerland, do that land of musical cows and icy mountains thoroughly, and finally take up their quarters at Florence, where Leicester had succeeded in obtaining a diplomatic appointment. A letter had been received from them dated Coblenz, wherein it appeared their new-found happiness had stood the voyage better than might have been expected; a fact mainly attributable to their having had an unusually calm passage. Laura considered the Rhine scenery exquisite; Charley thought it all very well for a change, but for a constancy, he must confess he preferred the Serpentine; he was disgusted with the German students, whom he stigmatized as "awful tigers," wondered why the women wore short petticoats if they hadn't better ankles to show, complained bitterly of the intense stupidity of the natives for not understanding either French or English, and wound up by a long violent sentence, quite unconnected with all that had gone before it, setting forth his unalterable conviction that Laura was an angel, which unscriptural assertion he reiterated four times in as many lines.

A change had taken place in Rose Arundel, and Lewis, as he gazed with affection on her calm, pensive brow, and marked the earnest thoughtful expression of her soft, grey eyes, felt that she was indeed altered; he had left her little more than a child, he found her a woman, in the best and fullest sense of the expression. Reader, do you know all that phrase implies? do you understand what is meant by a woman in the true and fullest sense of the term?

"Eh? I should rather think I did, too, just a very little," replies Ensign Downylyp, winking at society at large; "know what a woman is? yes, I consider that good, rather."

"And what, oh! most exquisite juvenile, may be your definition of woman as she should be?"

The Ensign strokes his upper lip where that confounded moustache is so very "lang a comin," rubs his nose to arouse his intellect, which he fails to do because that faculty is not asleep, but wanting, and replies.

"Ar—well, to begin with; woman is of course a decidedly inferior animal, but—ar—take the best specimen of the class, and you'll find it vewy pwitty, piquante, devoted to polking, light in hand, clean about the pasterns, something like Fanny Elsler, with a dash of Lady — to give it style, (I can't stand vulgawity,) decidedly fast! I hate your cart-horsey gals,) plenty of bustle to make it look spicey, ready to go the pace no end, and able properly to—ahem! appreciate "Your's truly"—ar—that's about the time of day, ch, Mr. Author!"

"No such thing, sir," replies Cœrulea Scribbler, who is so very superior, that she is momentarily expected to regenerate society single-handed; "No such thing, sir; I know what the author means; he justly considers woman as a—that is, as the concentrated essence of mind; nothing low, base, earthy—but—in fact,—definitions should be terse—you'll excuse my mathematical tastes, but—ahem!—three terms at Queen's College, and that dear Professor Baa-lamb! naturally produce a logical habit of thought—you require a perfect woman."

"No, madam, I am not so unreasonable."

"I mean, you require a definition of a perfect woman; here you have it then—the maximum of mind united to the minimum of matter; or, to speak poetically, a 'thing all soul.'" And, having thus given her opinion, Miss Cerulea, who measures barely five feet, and is as thin as a lath, shakes her straw-coloured ringlets, and subsides into the Sixth Book of Euclid.

But neither the red-jacket nor the blue-stocking, albeit each the type of a not unnumerous class, has exactly answered our question as we would wish it replied to. We do not agree with Charley Leicester in considering woman an angel;—first, because our ideas with regard to angels are excessively vague and undefined, wings and white drapery being the only marked features which we have as yet succeeded in realizing; and, secondly, because, to verify the resemblance, woman should be faultless, and we have never yet met with one who had not some fascinating little sin left to show that she was not too good for this world. Our notion of a woman, in the best sense of the word, is a being fitted to be a help meet for man; and this would lead us into another disquisition, which we will dismiss summarily by stating that we mean a man worthy of the name, not an ape in a red coat like Ensign Downytip, or an owl in a sad-coloured one like Professor Baalamb; but a man whom it would not be mere satire to call a lord of the creation. A help meet for such an one as this, should possess a clear acute intellect, or she would be unable to comprehend his aspirations after the good, and true, and beautiful,—the efforts of his fallen nature to regain somewhat of its original rank in the scale of created beings. She should have a faithful, loving heart, that when, being foiled in his worldly career, his spirit is dark within him, and, in the bitterness of his soul, he confesses that "the good that he would he does not, but the evil he would not, that he does," her affection may prove to him, that in her love he has one inestimable blessing yet remaining, of which death alone can deprive him, and then only for a season; for,—availing herself of the fitting moment with the delicate tact which is one of the brightest instincts of a loving woman's heart,—she can offer him the only true consolation, by urging him to renew his christian warfare in the hope that together they may attain the reward of their high calling, a reward so glorious that the mind of man is impotent to conceive its nature. But to be able to do this, she must herself have realized by the power of faith, the blessedness of things unseen, and with this requisite, without which all other excellencies are valueless, we conclude our definition of "woman as she should be."

Such an one was Rose Arundel, and countless others are there who, if not sinless as the radiant messengers of heaven, are yet doing angels' work by many a fire-side which their presence cheers and blesses. Happy is the man who possesses in a wife or sister such a household fairy, and if some there be who bear alone the burden of life—whose joys are few, for we rejoice not in solitude—let those whose lot is brighter forgive the clouded brow, or the cynical word, that at times attests the weariness of a soul on which the sunlight of affection seldom beams.

No particular alteration was observable in Mrs. Arundel, who seemed to possess the enviable faculty of never growing older, and who remained just as gay and sparkling as when at sixteen she had enslaved the fancy, rather than the heart, of Captain Arundel.

"My dear Lewis," she exclaimed, after having asked a hundred questions in a breath regarding the internal economy of General Grant's family, the affray with the poachers, Charles Leicester's wedding, and every other event, grave or otherwise, which occurred to her active and versatile mind, "my dear Lewis, what an original your friend Frere is! excessively kind and good-natured, but so very odd. He volunteered to come and meet us at the coach-office, which I considered quite a work of supererogation, but Rose had imbibed such a mistrust of London and its inhabitants, whom she expected to eat her up bodily, I believe, that she persuaded me to accept his offer. Well, when the coach arrived I looked about, but nobody did I see who at all coincided with my pre-conceived ideas of Mr. Frere, and I began to think he would prove faithless, when I descried an individual in a vile hat and an old rough great-coat, perched on a pile of luggage, with a cotton umbrella between his knees, reading some dirty little book, in which he appeared completely immersed. He took not the slightest notice of the bustle and confusion going on around him, and would, I believe, have sat there until now, if a porter, carrying a heavy trunk, had not all but fallen over him; upon which he started up, and, for the first time perceiving the coach, exclaimed—'By Jove, there's the very thing I am waiting for!' then shouldering his umbrella, he advanced to the window, and, thrusting in his great head, growled out, 'Are any of you Miss Arundel?' Rose answered the question, for I was so taken by surprise that I was dying with laughter. As soon as he had ascertained our identity, he continued, 'Well, then I should say, the sooner you're out of this, the better. I'll call a cab.' The moment it drew up he flung open the door, and exclaiming—'Now, come along,' he caught hold of Rose as if she'd been a carpet-bag, dragged her out, and pushed her by main force into the cab."

"Oh, mamma," interrupted Rose, apologetically, you really colour the matter too highly. Mr. Frere was as kind as possible. He was a little rough, certainly, and seemed to think I must be as helpless as a child; but I dare say he's not accustomed to act as squire to dames."

"Indeed he's not," resumed Mrs. Arundel; "but I was determined he shouldn't paw me about like a bale of goods; so I rested my hand on a porter's shoulder, and sprang clean from the coach into the cab, while he was stooping to pick up his wretched umbrella; and finely astonished he looked, too, when he discovered what I had done. Then he dragged down all the luggage, just as he had done Rose, and tried to put two trunks that did not belong to us on the cab, only I raved at him till I obliged him to relinquish them. Of course I was forced to offer him a seat in the cab, but he coolly replied,—‘No, thank ye; there are too many handboxes—the squares of their bases occupy the entire area. I’ll sit beside cabby.’ And, to my horror, he scrambled up to the driving-seat, and taking the dirty book out of his pocket, was speedily absorbed in its contents; and in this state we actually drove up to Lady Lombard’s door. I could have beaten the man, I was so angry with him. And yet, with it all, the creature is a gentleman.”

“Indeed he is,” returned Lewis, “a thorough gentleman in mind, though, from the extent to which he is engrossed by his literary and scientific pursuits, and from the fact of living so much alone, he has not the manners of society. But Frere is a very first-rate man; his is no ordinary intellect.”

“It is impossible to watch the play of his features and doubt that for a moment,” returned Rose, eagerly. “Look at his speaking eye—his noble forehead.”

“Oh! Rose is quite emprise with the monster,” remarked Mrs. Arundel, laughing. “It’s a decided case of love at first sight. Was it the old great-coat, or the dreadful hat, which first touched your heart, ma chère?”

“I’m not bound to criminate myself,” was the reply; “so I shall decline to answer that question.”

While she spoke, a short, sharp double knock, as of an agitated postman, awoke the echoes and the porter in Lady Lombard’s “Marble Hall.” In another minute the Brobdiagnian footman, with prize calves to his legs, flung open the drawing-room door, and announced, in a stentorian voice, “Mr. Frere.”

“Quand on parle du diable on’en voit la queue,” whispered Mrs. Arundel, rising quickly. “Positively, Rose, my nerves won’t stand the antics of your pet bear this morning. Let me see you again before you go, Louis, mon cher,—you’ll find me in the boudoir.”

So saying, she glided noiselessly out of one door, a moment before Frere entered at the other. Lewis followed her retreating figure with a glance half-painful, half-amused. “My mother grows younger, and more gay, every time I see her,” he observed to Rose. A speaking glance was her only answer, for at the moment Frere made his appearance; and a somewhat singular one it was. The day being fine, he had discarded the obnoxious great-coat, and—thanks to his old female domestic, who had caught him going out with a large hole in his sleeve, and sent him back to put on another garment, which she herself selected—the coat he wore was in unusually good preservation, and not so very much too large for him; but the heavy shoes, the worsted stockings, the shepherd’s plaid trowsers, and the cotton umbrella, were all in statu quo; while his bright eyes, sparkling out of a greater bush than ever of untrimmed hair and whiskers, gave him a striking resemblance to some honest Scotch terrier, worthy to be immortalized by Landseer’s pencil. Catching sight of Lewis, he rushed towards him, and seizing both his hands, (in order to accomplish which act of friendship, he allowed the umbrella to fall on Rose’s toes,) he shook them heartily, exclaiming—“Why, Lewis, old boy! this is a pleasure! I hadn’t a notion you would be here so soon. How’s General Grant? and how’s Walter? and how’s Faust? and how’s every body? Well, I am glad to see you!”

All this time Frere had taken not the slightest notice of Rose, who, having advanced a step or two to greet him, had resumed her seat, more pleased to witness his delight in welcoming Lewis than any attentions to herself could have rendered her. Having seated himself on a sofa, and pulled Lewis down by his side, he, for the first time, appeared aware of Rose’s presence, which he hastened to acknowledge by a nod, adding, “Ah! how d’ye do? I’ve got something to tell you presently, as soon as I’ve done with your brother.”

Then, turning to Lewis, he recommenced his string of questions, without regarding Rose’s presence otherwise than by occasionally including her in the conversation with such interjectional remarks as—“You can understand that,”—“I explained that to you the other day;” until at length he abruptly exclaimed,—“Now I must go and talk to her,—she and I have got a little business together.”

“Perhaps I am de trop,” observed Lewis, with a meaning smile.

In reply to this, Frere merely clenched his fist, and having shaken it within an inch of Lewis’s face, marched deliberately across the room, and drawing a chair close to Rose, seated himself in it; then, laying hold of one corner of her worsted work, he said, in a gruff voice,—“Put away this rubbish.”

“I can listen to you, Mr. Frere, and go on with my slipper at the same time,” returned Rose, quietly releasing her work.

“You can’t do two things properly together,” was the reply; “nobody can; for it’s all fudge about Cæsar’s reading and dictating at the same time. What I’ve got to tell you is more important than a carpet shoe.”

Smiling at his pertinacity, Rose, not having a particle of obstinacy in her disposition, put away her work, and, demurely crossing her hands before her, like a good child saying its lessons, awaited her tyrant’s orders. That her attitude was not lost upon Frere, that gentleman made evident by catching Lewis’s eye, and pointing backwards with his thumb, as much as to say—“There! do you see that?”—then, producing a note from his pocket, he coolly broke the seal, opened it, and handing it to Rose, muttered, “Read that.”

The note ran as follows;—

"Mr. T. Bracy presents his compliments to Miss Arundel, and begs to enclose a note of introduction to Mr. Nonpareil, the publisher, as Mr. Frere agrees in thinking that the offer made by Mr. A—of B—Street, for the copyright of her interesting tale, was quite inadequate to its merits."

CHAP. XXXII.

ROSE AND FRERE GO TO VISIT MR. NONPAREIL THE PUBLISHER.

"How very kind of Mr. Bracy!" exclaimed Rose, handing the note with which the preceding chapter concluded, to her brother, Frere having quietly read it over her shoulder. "Lewis, I must ask you to be good enough to go with me to Mr. Nonpareil's whenever you can spare the time."

"You needn't trouble him," returned Frere, gruffly; "I mean to take you there myself; and as there's never any good in putting things off, I vote we go this morning—What do you say?"

"You are very kind," replied Rose, smiling; "but really, now my brother is in town I need not encroach on your valuable time."

"Valuable fiddlestick!" was the courteous reply; "though, of course, everybody's time is valuable, if people did but know how to employ it properly—which they never do. But you don't suppose, if I'd anything very particular in hand, I should be dawdling here, do you? I've got to be at the Ornithological at four, and to call at Moore's, the bird-stuffer's, first; but I can look in there on our way to Nonpareil's."

"Yes; but I'm sure Lewis—" began Rose, in a deprecatory tone of voice.

"Nonsense about Lewis!" was the surly rejoinder. "What do you imagine he knows about dealing with publishers?—they're 'kittle cattle to shoe behind,' as a Scotchman would say. I've had dealings enough with 'em to find out that, I can tell you. As for Lewis, if he were to walk into one of their dens with his head up in the air, they'd take him for Lord Octavo Shallowpate, come to negotiate for another new novel, written with a paste pot and scissors, and when they found he had not a handle to his name, with which to shove his rubbish down the public throat, they'd kick him out of the shop again."

"Then you really think I look as stupid as a literary lord, eh, Frere?" inquired Lewis.

"Well, that's too strong a term, perhaps," answered Frere, reflectively; "but you don't look like a man of business, at all events."

"Where does this sagacious publisher reside?" asked Lewis; and when Frere had given him the required information, he continued:—"Then we'll settle the matter thus:—my tailor, with whom I am anxious to gain an interview, lives in the adjoining street; accordingly, I'll walk down with Rose and you, and while you negotiate with the autocrat of folios, I'll take "fitting measures" for getting myself "neatly bound in cloth."

"So be it then, most facetious youth," returned Frere, laughing; "and the faster you can get ready, you know," he continued, turning to Rose, "the better."

"I'm all obedience," replied Rose, smiling; "but I think you're rather fond of tyrannizing, Mr. Frere."

"Who, I?" returned Frere, in astonishment; "not a bit of it; I'm the most easily managed fellow in London—I am, upon my word."

"You should see what perfect command his old housekeeper has him in," observed Lewis, with an arch glance at his sister; "the bear dares not growl at her—she's a perfect Van Amburgh to him."

Now, there was so much truth in this charge that it was rather a sore subject with Frere. The old woman in question had lived with his mother, and had nursed him when a child; and for these reasons, as well as from good nature, and a certain easiness of disposition which lay beneath his rough manner, Frere had allowed her gradually to usurp control over him, till, in all the minutiae of his domestic life, she ruled him with a rod of iron. Although her admiration of, and respect for her master's learning was fully equal to her total ignorance of the arts and sciences; and, although her affection for him was boundless, nature had gifted her with a crusty temper, which an interval of poverty and hardship (extending from the death of Frere's mother, till the time when his first act on obtaining a competence had been to seek her out, and take her into his service) had not tended to sweeten. The dialogues which occasionally took place between the master and servant were most amusing, and her power over him was exercised so openly, that his fear of Jemima had become a standing joke among his intimates. Accordingly, on hearing Lewis's observation, Frere hastily jumped up, and strode to the fireplace, muttering—"Nonsense! psha! rubbish! don't you believe a word of it, Miss Arundel; but go and dress, there's a good—" he was going to add "fellow;" for, be it known, the clue to his gruff, unpolished behaviour towards the young lady in question was to be discovered in the fact, that from her quiet composure, freedom from affectation, clear good sense, and the interest she took in subjects usually considered too abstruse for female investigation, Frere looked upon her as a kindred soul, and as all his other chosen intimates were of the worthier gender, he was continually forgetting that she was not a man. Checking himself, however, just in time, he substituted "creature" for "fellow;" and, as Rose left the room, he continued, "Pon my word, Lewis, your sister's such a nice, sensible, well-informed, reasonable being, that I am constantly forgetting she's a woman."

"Which speech shows that amongst your numerous studies, that of the female character has been neglected," replied Lewis; "or that you have taken your impressions from very bad specimens of the sex."

Frere, who during the above remark had drawn from his pocket a lump of crumbling sandstone, which, in order to examine more closely, he coolly deposited on a small satin-wood work-table, looked up in surprise, as he rejoined—"Your opinions, touching the merits of womankind, seem to have suffered a recovery, young man, seeing that the last time I had the honour of discussing the matter with you, women were all perfidious hyenas, or thereabouts. What has wrought so remarkable a transformation?"

Something appeared to have suddenly gone wrong with Lewis's boot, for it was not until he had thoroughly investigated the matter that he replied,—his face being still bent over the offending article,—“The simple fact that as one grows older one grows wiser, I suppose. No doubt Gretchen behaved abominably, and rendered me for the time intensely wretched; but it was folly in me ever to have placed my happiness in the power of such a little romantic flirting half-educated thing as she was; I should not do so now, and to argue from such an individual instance, to the disparagement of the whole sex, was one of the maddest notions that ever entered the brain of a hot-headed boy.”

“Phew!” whistled Frere in astonishment, “you are not over civil to your former self, I must say. If any body else had spoken so disrespectfully of you, you’d have been for punching his head for him; however, I believe your present frame of mind is the more sane of the two, though sweeping assertions are always more or less untenable. The truth is, you can lay down no general rule about it—women are human as well as men; there are a few very good, a few very bad, and an immense number who are nothing particular, in both sexes. There is no authority which would lead us to suppose Adam’s rib was made of ivory, more than any of his other bones. There’s one vice belonging to the fair sex, though; they’re always an unmerciful time putting on their bonnets—your sister’s been five minutes already, and I’d lay a bet we don’t see her for five more.” As he uttered the last words, Rose, fully equipped and looking the picture of neatness, tripped into the room, to Frere’s intense discomfiture, who scrambled his relic of the Era of the Old Red Sandstone into his pocket, with the air of some culprit school-boy, detected in his malpractices by the vigilant eye of his pedagogue.

Lewis, having slipped away for a moment to take leave of Mrs. Arundel, who dismissed him with a parting injunction to take care Ursa Major did not devour Rose, the trio descended the stairs, Frere taking an opportunity to whisper to Lewis,—“She was down upon me then in every sense of the word; didn’t believe a woman could get ready in five minutes on any consideration; but she’s more sense than I ever expected to see under a bonnet, that’s a fact.”

“Don’t you think for once you could dispense with that dreadful umbrella?” inquired Lewis, who had imbibed a few Leicesterian prejudices from his residence at Broadhurst.

“Dreadful umbrella! why what’s the matter with it?” exclaimed Frere, half unfurling his favourite; “it’s water tight, and has a famous strong stick to it; what more do you want in an umbrella, eh?”

“It might have been made of silk,” suggested Lewis mildly.

“Yes, and be stolen and brought back again regularly three times a week,” returned Frere. “I had a silk one once, and the expense that umbrella was to me, to say nothing of the wear and tear of mind it occasioned, was perfectly terrific. I shudder when I think of it; there are not a dozen cabmen in London who have not received half-a-crown for bringing me back that umbrella. It was a regular bottle-imp to me, always being lost and always coming back again. The ’bus conductors knew it by sight as well as they know the Bank; they were for ever laying traps to get it into their possession, with a view to obtain the reward of honesty by bringing it home again. I got rid of it at last, though; I lent it to a fellow who owed me five pounds, and I’ve never seen man, money, or umbrella since. Now, this dear old cotton thing, not being worth finding, has never been lost; however, if you’ll promise to take care I have it to-morrow when I call, I’ll leave it here, and if your sister gets wet to-day, don’t blame me.”

“Rose, will you undertake the heavy responsibility?” asked Lewis.

“I think I may safely promise so to do,” was the reply; “there is a little foot page in this establishment, in whom I have the greatest confidence, and to his custody will I commit it.”

And Frere’s anxious mind being soothed by this assurance, they started on their expedition. Twenty minutes’ brisk walking,—which would have been brisker still if Rose had not gently hinted that ladies were not usually accustomed to stride along like postmen; to which suggestion Frere responded with something very like a growl,—twenty minutes’ walking brought them to the very elegant front of Mr. Nonpareil’s shop, where Lewis left the two others. The nice young man, with Hyperion curls outside his head, and nothing save much too high an opinion of himself within, who lounged gracefully behind the counter, replied to Frere’s inquiry “Whether Mr. Nonpareil was at home,” after the fashion of the famous Irish echo, i.e. by another question. Elevating his eyebrows till they almost disappeared in his forest of hair, he drawled out,

“Wh-a-y? did you w-a-ant him?”

“Of course I did, or else I should not have asked for him,” returned Frere, sharply; then handing his own card and Bracy’s note of introduction across the counter, he continued, “take those to your master, and tell him that a lady and gentleman are waiting to see him.”

At the word “master” Hyperion coloured, and appeared about to become impertinent, but something in Frere’s look induced him to alter his intention, and turning on his heel, he strode into the back shop with an air martyr, which was deeply affecting to the risible muscles of the pair he left behind him.

"There's an animal!" exclaimed Frere, as the subject of his remark disappeared behind a tall column of account books; "now, that ape looks upon himself as a sort of Admirable Orichton, and I'll be bound has a higher opinion of his own mental endowments than ever Shakspeare or Milton had of theirs. I dare say the creature has his admirers too: some subordinate shop boy, or the urchin who runs of errands, takes him at his own price, and believes in him implicitly. Ye gods, what a 'ship of fools' is this goodly vessel of society!"

"I hope he does not rest his claims on the ground of his personal attractions," returned Rose with a quiet smile.

"His strength must lie in his hair, if he does," replied Frere, "like that of the Israelitish Hercules of old. But see, here he comes, shaking his ambrosial locks; and behold, he smiles graciously upon us. Bracy's note has worked miracles."

Approaching with a smirk and a bow, Hyperion politely signified that Mr. Nonpareil was disengaged, then again retreating, led the way through a sort of defile of unsold literature, to the sanctum of the enterprising publisher. This remarkable apartment was of the most minute dimensions, a very duodecimo edition of a room, embellished with a miniature fire-place, an infinitesimal writing-table, and a mere peephole of a window, looking across many chimney-pots into space. In the middle of this retreat of learning, like an oyster in its shell, reposed that Rhadamanthus of literature, the heroic Nonpareil. His outer man was encased in black, as became the severity of his office; a white neck-cloth encircled his august throat; while a heavy gold watch-chain and seals attested his awful respectability. He was of a most respectable age, neither incautiously young nor unadvisedly old; he was of a most respectable height, neither absurdly short nor inconveniently tall; his weight, 12 stone 6 lbs., was most respectable—it had not varied a pound for the last ten years, nor could one look at him without feeling that it would remain exactly the same for the next ten years; he had a most respectable complexion, red enough to indicate that he lived well and that it agreed with him, but nothing more. Nobody could suspect that man of an apoplectic tendency; he was much too respectable to think of dying suddenly; the very expression of his face was a sort of perpetual life assurance; he goes out of the world without advertising the day on which he might be expected to appear most respectably bound in boards! the idea was preposterous. His manner naturally expressed his conviction of his own immense respectability, and was impressive, not to say pompous; while from a sense of the comparative want of respectability in everybody else, it was also familiar, or as his enemies (all great men have enemies) declared, presuming.

As Rose and Frere entered, he stood up to receive them, favoured Frere with a salutation half-way between a bow and a nod, partially extended his hand to Rose, and as she hesitated in surprise, hastily drew it back again, then motioning them to the only two chairs save his own judgment-seat the apartment contained, resumed his throne, and smiling graciously at Rose, leant back, waiting apparently until that young lady should humbly prefer her suit to him.

Perceiving his design, Rose glanced appealingly at Frere, who came to her assistance by plunging at once in medias res with his accustomed bluntness.

"Well, Mr. Nonpareil," he began, "touching the object of our visit to you, I suppose Bracy has told you in his note what we've come about?"

"Yes,—that is, so far,—Mr. Bracy signifies, that your visit has a business tendency," was the cautious reply.

"Why, we certainly should not have come here for pleasure," returned Frere shortly; then catching Rose's look of dismay, he continued, "I mean to say, we should not have thought of taking up your valuable time," (here he gave Rose a confidential nudge with his elbow to indicate that he spoke ironically,) "unless we had a legitimate object in doing so."

In answer to this, the Autocrat merely inclined his head, and revealed a highly respectable set of teeth; so Frere resumed,

"This young lady, Miss Arundel, has determined by the advice of Mr. Bracy and—ahem!—myself, to make you the first offer of a very valuable work which she has written—er—a tale of a very unusual description, peculiarly suited, as I consider, to the present state of society, pointing out certain social evils, and showing how a more consistent adherence to the precepts of christianity, would prove the only effectual remedy."

At these last words, Mr. Nonpareil, who, having apparently lapsed into a state of torpor, had listened with a face as immovable as if it had been cast in bronze, suddenly pricked up his ears and condescended to exist again.

"If I understand you, Mr. — Frere," suggested that gentleman,—"Mr. Frere," continued Nonpareil, "if I comprehend your meaning, sir, this lady wishes to dispose of the copyright of a religious novel?"

"That's it," replied Frere.

"Then my answer must mainly depend on the exact height of the principles."

"On the how much?" inquired Frere, considerably mystified.

"On the exact height of the principles, sir," returned Mr. Nonpareil, with dignity; "there is a regular scale, sir, which I have had worked out minutely, proceeding from the broad outlines of Christianity to the most delicate shades of doctrine, and descending even to the smallest points of the canon law. Such an ecclesiological table is most important in our line. Public opinion, sir, fluctuates in such matters, just like the funds, up one week, down the next, up again the next. Now, I'll just give you an instance. There was a little work we published, I dare say you've seen it, 'Ambrosius; or, the Curate confessed.' It was thought rather a heavy book when it first came out. The public would not read it; the trade did not like it;

it hung on hand, and I expected to lose from £200 to £300 upon it. Well, sir, the Surplice question began to be agitated. Fortunately, the author had made Ambrosius preach in a white gown. I immediately advertised it freely, the thing took, we sold 3,000 copies in a fortnight, and, instead of losing £300 I made £600. But that's not all, sir. Shortly after that, the Rev. Clerestory Lectern, one of the very tip-top ones, went to Rome, and took his three curates, a serious butler, and the family apothecary, with him. This made a great sensation, convulsed the public mind fearfully, and brought on a general attack of the ultra-protestant epidemic. Accordingly, I sent for the author of Ambrosius, offered him terms he was only too glad to jump at, shut him up in the back-shop, with half a ream of foolscap and a bottle of sherry, and in little more than a week we printed off 5,000 copies of "Loyoilana, or, the Jesuit in the Chimney Corner." The book sold like wild-fire, sir. A second edition was called for, and went off in no time, and I believe I might have got through a third, only Lord Dunderhead Downhill joined the Plymouth brethren, and married his kitchen-maid, which brought public opinion up again several degrees, and spoiled the sale; but I made a very nice thing of it, altogether."

So saying, Mr. Nonpareil rubbed his hands gleefully, pushed his hair off his forehead, and looked at Rose as if he longed to coin her into money on the spot. After a pause he inquired, abruptly "What's the name, ma'am?"

"The name of my tale?" began Rose, slightly flurried at the conversation so suddenly taking a personal turn. "I thought of calling it 'Helen Tremorne.'"

"Very good, ma'am,—very good," returned Mr. Nonpareil, approvingly; "euphonious, aristocratic, and vague; just at this time, a title that does not pledge a book to anything particular of any kind is most desirable. About how long do you suppose it will be?"

"Mr. Frere thought it would make two small volumes about the size of a work called 'Amy Herbert,' I believe," replied Rose.

"Quite right, ma'am, quite right, a very selling size indeed," was the answer; "clever book 'Amy Herbert,' very. So much tenderness in it, ma'am; nothing pays better than judicious tenderness; the mothers of England like it, to read about—the daughters of England like it—the little girls of England like it—and so the husbands of England are forced to pay for it. If you recollect, ma'am, there's a pathetic governess in 'Amy Herbert,' who calls the children 'dearest,'—well imagined character, that. She's sold many a copy, has that governess. May I ask, does 'Helen Tremorne' call any body 'dearest?'"

"I really scarcely remember," said Rose, hiding a smile behind her muff.

"It would be most desirable that she should, ma'am," returned Mr. Nonpareil, solemnly. "Some vindictive pupil, if possible, ma'am—the more repulsive the child, the greater the self-sacrifice—people like self-sacrifice, to read about—they call such incidents touching; and just at the present moment, pathos sells immensely. Pray, ma'am, may I ask, are you high or low?"

"My principles would not lead me to sympathise with the very ultra party on either side," replied Rose, slightly annoyed at having to allude to such subjects in such a presence.

"Ah! the viâ media; yes, I see—very good, nothing could be better. Just at the present time, the viâ media is, if I may be allowed the expression, the way that leads to fortune; nothing sells like it—it's so safe, you see; the heads of families buy it in preference to any more questionable teaching. May I ask, have you fixed on any sum for which you would dispose of the copyright of your story?"

Rose glanced at Frere, who responded to the appeal by naming a sum exactly double the amount which Rose, in her humility, would gladly have accepted. She was about to say so, but a slight contraction in her companion's brow, warned her against committing such an imprudence. Mr. Nonpareil, however, did not appear alarmed at the magnitude of the demand, but promising to peruse the manuscript carefully, (which promise he fulfilled by sending it to his paid reader, never even glancing at it himself,) and to give a definite answer on the day but one following, he bowed them out of his den in the most respectable manner possible. As soon as they had quitted the shop, Rose exclaimed,—“Well, if all publishers are like Mr. Nonpareil, the less personal communication I hold with them, the better I shall be pleased.”

"Aye, but they are not," returned Frere; "many of them are men of great intelligence, simple manners, and who possess much out-of-the-way knowledge, which renders them very agreeable companions. There are pompous and narrow-minded individuals in all professions. Nothing is more illogical than to generalize from a single instance; it's certain to lead to the most absurd results. Why, I've actually encountered an honest lawyer, and met with a disinterested radical, before now! But here comes Lewis; I wonder what conclusions he has arrived at about tailors."

ON SHAKSPEARE'S INDIVIDUALITY IN HIS CHARACTERS.

SHAKSPEARE'S LOVERS.

BY MARY COWDEN CLARKE.

IN thinking of Shakspeare's lovers, of course the first who comes to our mind is Romeo. He is the chief of them all. The poet has drawn princely lovers, and princes in love; but Romeo is the prince of lovers. The story of his love is the love-story of the world; and it found its worthy chronicler in the world's poet. Love, in its transport of reciprocity, was never hymned in nobler strain than in this surpassing drama. The bliss of union seems to crown the play in its very title—those two lovers' names intertwined—ROMEO and JULIET. The rapture of mutual passion in its exclusiveness, its all-sufficiency, its dual beatitude, breathes throughout like a rich-distilled perfume. Its odour transcends that of mortality. It embalms those "death-marked lovers," preserving them ever fresh and green in our memories, as types of undying love. The images of Romeo and of Juliet in their young affection, endure beyond their monumental effigies; they survive to us in immortal warmth of beauty, effacing even the remembrance of their early grave, that grave which they themselves preferred to separation. The intensity of their brief happiness consoles us, as it did them, for its close in eternity; and the tragedy of their passion is lost sight of in its ecstasy. We think of them as of the blest.

The first mention of Romeo is marked by extreme beauty of language. His father, old Montague, and his friend, Benvolio, speak of him in words full of grace and eloquence. An atmosphere of poetry is thus flung round the character of the lover, from the very moment of its first introduction to the reader. We are also prepared for his imaginative and passionate temperament; and we first behold him absorbed in an attachment that partakes far more of the first quality than the latter. Romeo's sentiment for Rosaline has been mostly spoken of as a real passion, a first love; now it appears to us to be anything but either passion, or love. All his speech at that season, is in abstract; he talks of love, not of his mistress; the youthful lover seems to think of being in love, rather than of the woman with whom he is in love,—of Romeo loving, not of Rosaline whom he loves. But with Juliet, his thoughts at once assume a substance, a form of desire. He exclaims:—"O that I were a glove upon that hand, that I might touch that cheek!" as he before took that hand, offering to kiss it, and—kissing her lips instead. His new true passion has already taught him the truth which he himself subsequently utters:—"What love can do, that dares love attempt." Before, he spoke thus:—

"Love is a smoke raised with the fume of sighs;
Being purged, a fire sparkling in lovers' eyes;
Being vex'd, a sea nourish'd with lovers' tears:
What is it else? a madness most discreet,
A choking gall, and a preserving sweet."

Even that "What is it else?" suggests the idea of urging his fancy; as if its object were scarcely potent enough to inspire a free flow of eloquence. But now, it teems with rapturous imagery:—

"O speak again, bright angel! for thou art
As glorious to this night, being o'er my head,
As is a winged messenger of heaven
Unto the white-upturned wond'ring eyes
Of mortals, that fall back to gaze on him,
When he bestrides the lazy-pacing clouds,
And sails upon the bosom of the air."

Almost the whole of his first pleading with Juliet, when he woos in earnest, goes to illustrate the practicality of his new passion, which has taken the place of the fantasy of his first inclination. "With love's light wings he has o'er-perched the walls;" and when Juliet asks him, "By whose direction found'st thou out this place?" his answer bespeaks the singleness, the energy, the irresistibility of purpose, with intelligence, which go hand in hand with a true passion:—

"By love, who first did prompt me to inquire;
He lent me counsel, and I lent him eyes.
I am no pilot; yet, wert thou as far
As that vast shore wash'd with the furthest sea,
I would adventure for such merchandise."

No such prompting, no such counsel, no such pilotage, guided his heart whilst Rosaline was its object. It is as if Shakspeare permitted this glimpse of Romeo's first preference, that indication might be given of his susceptible Italian nature—his young impressionable imagination; and also that his passion for Juliet might the better be exalted and set off by the foil of a previous passing enthrallment. It is as if, in this character,—the exemplar of a youthful lover,—the poet desired to combine instances of the emotion in both its phases; the one, a fantasy of the imagination, a wilful captivation, encouraged, perhaps, almost as much in a trick of youth, assuming importance by languishing for an inexorable beauty, as for the pleasurable excitement of awakened feeling; the other, a genuine attachment—affection and passion blent—honest in its warmth of devotion and exaction, intense in its spiritual essence as in its bond of sense,—in one word, love. Romeo professedly adores Rosaline; he loves Juliet. The one is his Dulcinea—his lady-love; the other is the woman he would make his wife. He courts observation, when he is a worshipper of the first lady; he hoards his secret treasure when he has exchanged hearts with the latter. He utters no word of his new mistress to his associates, Mercutio and Benvolio, though they were well aware of his old flame, and joked him upon it; while he received their jests, benumbing himself as an ill-used gentleman. We have one of Shakspeare's sly hints of manner, when he makes Mercutio say, "Why is not this better now than groaning for love?" confirmed by Romeo himself, having said to Benvolio, when he questioned him about Rosaline, "Shall I groan, and tell thee?" as if he were in the habit of bewailing himself Sir Tristram-wise, of calling attention to his sufferings, of being ostentatiously moody—a parade and affectation of being in love. But when he is in love in good earnest, it only reveals itself in the happy spirits, the joyous bearing, the playful wit, with which he speaks to his friends, taking part in their gaiety, bandying jest for jest, and making them exclaim and rejoice at his pleasanter mood. When once he truly loves, the only confidants of his passion are his mistress herself, the good friar, and his own exulting heart, until his lady's nurse comes to him as emissary from her.

There is a circumstance singularly confirmatory of the view we have taken of Romeo's feeling, with regard to Rosaline. Shakspeare has made her actually present at the ball given by old Capulet; but Romeo sees her not,—he has eyes for no one but Juliet, whom he there first beholds. By the way, we may here remark, as one of the instances of Shakspeare's propriety in custom and scene, that the grand entertainment at Capulet's house, the masquerade, takes place on a Sunday; which is true to foreign, though not to English habits. Another circumstance that corroborates our impression of the sort of preference which Romeo feels for Rosaline, is the manner in which she is alluded to in the first scene with the friar. When Friar Lawrence asks him if he have been with her, his answer shows that he has not even thought of her:—

"With Rosaline, my ghostly father? no;
I have forgot that name, and that name's wee."

His whole soul is now possessed with another woman:

"She, whom I love now,
Doth grace for grace, and love for love allow:
The other did not so."

But the very terms in which he speaks of his former mistress, show that what he felt for her was not love. Had he ever loved Rosaline, he would never have called her "the other."

There is a fine tribute to the influence of a genuine affection, in the sway it exercises over the temper of Romeo, where he makes those mild replies to Tybalt's insults. His love instructs him in the divine faith that "a soft answer turneth away wrath." His modest rejoinder, "I thought all for the best," to Mercutio's hasty, "Why, the devil, came you between us? I was hurt under your arm," also bespeaks just such a gentle nature as is best fitted to receive the meek teaching of love and loving forbearance. It is only when he learns that his friend is actually dead of the "mortal hurt he got in his behalf" that he can no longer discipline his resentment. Then it is that he casts from him "respectful lenity," and assaults Tybalt with an impetuosity excused by the incentive.

It has been said, that the poet was obliged to kill off Mercutio so early in the play, on the ground of inability further to sustain his brilliant character. Setting aside the difficulty of conceiving any exigency of composition to which Shakspeare was unequal, may we not find an easy solution of the question of Mercutio's premature death, by considering its dramatic fitness? The poet had to find some means of bringing about the incident of his hero's killing the relation of his "three-hours' wife." Our respect for Romeo is excited and maintained by his being shown reluctant to engage, but unable to withstand the call upon his honour to avenge the death of a valued friend. Mercutio's extreme vivacity makes the event of his sudden death all the more startling in interest to the spectator; while his gaiety, his good-humour, his blithe social qualities, account for the strong attachment which Romeo feels for him, urging even a mortal combat with the kinsman of Juliet. Had Mercutio been less strikingly drawn, these two effects would have been lost; had he not been killed in the Third Act, Romeo's deed and consequent banishment could not have naturally befallen.

We have other indications of the sweetness and gentleness of Romeo's native disposition. His friendship for the good old friar, for Benvolio, and Mercutio; his behaviour to the apothecary (full of kindness—permitting him, even when his own heart is racked, to note that "famine is in his cheeks," and that "need and oppression starveth in his eyes"); his conduct to his rival, Paris, in their encounter at Juliet's tomb; his manner to his attendant, Balthazar; his liberality to the nurse; as well as the estimation in which he himself is held by his parents, and, by all these, in return, are so many testimonies of his worth. A strong evidence in his behalf, also, comes from the head of the rival house, old Capulet, who bears witness that "Verona brags of him, to be a virtuous and well-govern'd youth." Even the rebuke of his friend, the friar, (when he is in the full violence of his grief at the sentence of banishment,) contains an implied tribute to his native gentleness;—"By my holy order, I thought thy disposition better temper'd." This is from one who knows and esteems him. Thus indirectly, but surely, does Shakspeare throw in his touches of character. Here we are at once reminded of Romeo's natural sweet-temper, and of the vehemence of that love which urges him to such unwonted rashness. How unanswerable in its passionate truth is that appeal to his old monitor:—

"Wert thou as young as I, Juliet thy love,
An hour but married, Tybalt murder'd,
Doting like me, and like me banish'd,
Then might'st thou speak, then might'st thou tear thy hair,
And fall upon the ground, as I do now,
Taking the measure of an unmade grave."

In his love-talk with his mistress, Romeo uses some of the most exquisite poesy of diction that ever poet conceived, with which to endow the speech of a lover. It would be merely for the sake of luxuriating in their beauty, were we to indulge in quoting those words of his on the approach of dawn; we all know them by heart; but afterwards, when the actual pang of parting comes, how true to nature are his few, passionate words—simple, unornate, with no room for imagery, or for aught but grief, and the brave endeavour to sustain his mistress by whispers of comfort and hope that he himself scarce feels. There is something inexpressibly affecting in the courage—assumed for her sake, which inspires Romeo to answer Juliet's "O, think'st thou, we shall ever meet again?" by "I doubt it not; and all these woes shall serve for sweet discourses in our time to come." It is the more palpably a feigned hopefulness,—one of those false assumptions of cheer that the strength of affection prompts, sanctifies and makes true, for the moment,—because Romeo is by temperament a foreboding man. His imagination is highly susceptible, and has a tendency to superstition. He twice, in the course of the play, alludes to his dreams. His "mind misgives him of some consequence yet hanging in the stars," on the very threshold of the ball-room; even in the intoxication of discovering Juliet's love for him, he exclaims:—

"O blessed, blessed night! I am afeard,
Being in night, all this is but a dream,
Too flattering-sweet to be substantial."

And in the moment of learning Mercutio's death, his soul predicts more evil still:—

"This day's black fate on more days doth depend;
This but begins the woe, others must end."

We have seen how few are the words Romeo's sorrow permits itself in parting with his mistress; but how terribly fewer are those his despair utters, when he learns that she is lost to him for ever! The concentrated depth of that single cry—"Is it even so? then I defy you, stars!" is made even more profound by the forced calmness which immediately succeeds in the orders to his servant; whose words, "Your looks are pale and wild," tell us the fearful secret of what is passing within, as he reads it written in his master's face.

When Romeo is left alone, the words he utters (recalling all those particulars of the apothecary and his dwelling) are in soliloquy, consequently they represent his thoughts. But they are those thoughts which occupy the active part of a man's imagination, independent of his heart. They represent that state of mind (which at first seems unnatural; but which is in fact most frequently found to exist at such times) that follows a stunning blow of anguish. It is that state of mind so ably depicted by a great writer of our own day, who makes Fagin, the Jew, in the supreme moment of the jury's deliberation, involuntarily busy his mind with conjectures about the new-pointing of a pencil, and the counting, and probable repair of some iron spikes. In such a state of mind, the thoughts will dally with veriest common-places, minutest details of insignificant matters, trivial objects unnoted at the time of seeing them, but presenting themselves abruptly and unbidden, in moments strangely irrelevant. And all the while the mind is playing this mocking game of busying itself with idle toys, within the heart's core burns the spot of fire,—the one haunting real thought. It is as if human volition in its strength of resolve, held the consuming element crushed and pent, allowing the imagination to beguile itself with shows of thinking, in hope to stifle and extinguish grief. But one sob allowed to despair,—one permitted groan, one yielding breath, and the smothered spark bursts forth, a torrent of flame. This after-mood, when the spirit abandons itself to its agony, Shakspeare has exhibited in two pregnant words, when he makes Romeo subsequently say:—

"What said my man, when my betoss'd soul
Did not attend him as we rode? I think
He told me, Paris should have married Juliet."

In that after-mood, his mind, so far from having the power to employ itself with details, could not even take cognizance of the news of his lady's marriage.

Romeo's last speech is indeed a climax of passionate beauty; and that is the highest praise that can be bestowed upon it, after all that has preceded. The idea that "death is amorous," and that the lean, abhorred monster keeps Juliet there in dark to be his paramour, is in perfect harmony with the tone of romantic imagination which characterises Romeo throughout. The lover's fervid words bid us behold "beauty's ensign yet crimson in her lips," and see that "in her cheeks death's flag is not advanced there." They teach us that "her beauty makes that vault a feasting presence full of light," and leave our feelings so impressed with lovely images, that the very horror of the grave is redeemed. Our tears spring from a sense of beauty even more than of sorrow, as we take leave of the lovers, re-united on their bed of death. Shakspeare alone could have woven the chaplet of mingled roses and amaranths that garlands them; for he has given immortality to the voluptuous perfume and grace redolent in the love-blossoms, so that they shall indeed outlive the image of those funeral flowers which fate enjoined him to introduce.

A more complete contrast can scarcely be found with the lover who has formed our theme hitherto, than the four gentlemen-lovers in the comedy of "Love's Labour's Lost,"—the King of Navarre, Biron, Longaville, and Dumain. They are French in name, and thoroughly French in nature. They are holiday lovers; they seem to be as much in fun as in love; their courtship is pastime; their affection is mirth; their inclination is frolic; their attachment is sport; their passion is playful hyperbole; their admiration is to behold their mistresses' eyes sparkle, their cheeks flush, their lips pout and smile in gay talk; their happiness is to hear their own and their ladies' voices engaged in jocularly and mutual rallying. Theirs is philandering, not wooing; gallantry, not love. These lovers, or, more properly, these gallants, are most fortunate in their choice, or rather, their encounter; they meet with ladies who precisely match them. They are, all together, like a parcel of grown boys and girls, playing at being in love. They bandy jests, like a game at ball; they fling wit to and fro; they toss heaps of facetia upon each other, like lads and lasses in a hay-field; they throw flowers of fancy backwards and forwards; they play upon words between them; they chuck showers of sweet conceits hither and thither, like comfits in an Italian carnival; and, to make this simile complete, chalk sometimes compounds with the saccharine matter, for it must be owned that the wit of these conceits is not always of the very highest quality.

The strain of their love-making is sprightly and gladsome; its music is the right dancing measure; a song to the "tune of 'Light o' Love.'"

The play is like one of Watteau's pictures—a fête champêtre, with groups of lords and ladies, lurking amid the trees, seated on the grass, pacing the avenues, lingering by the fountains, or dancing hand in hand. Stately figures, elegant attitudes, rich silks and satins, brocaded and jewelled dresses, glow profuse on all sides; but the scene is French, its occupants are French, and a look of show and artificiality glitters on the surface of the whole. Very graceful, very brilliant artificiality; yet still—artificiality.

It is one of the wonders of Shakspeare's pen, that, itself so earnest and true, it can so to the life hit off this artificiality; but it is for that very reason; it is so true, that it is true even to the truth of artificiality.

See what these amateur lovers' creed is, respecting love itself. One of them says:—

"Love is full of unbefitting strains;
All wanton as a child, skipping, and vain;
Form'd by the eye, and therefore like the eye
Full of strange shapes, of habits, and of forms, Varying in subjects as the eye doth roll
To every varied object in his glance."

Elsewhere this is his theory:—

"Revels, dances, masks, and merry hours, Fore-run fair Love, strewing her way with flowers."

They are such superficial adorers, that they mistake and mis-woo their respective mistresses for a mere masking and change of favours,—a sleeve-knot, a jewel, a glove, and a string of pearls. They declare their worship in rhyme and sonnet; and they prove their passion by tilting at each other (in speech) about the superiority of their chosen lady's charms. They'll "prove her fair, or talk till doomsday."

But passion is out of the question; there is no spark of it, among the whole party. The nearest approach to it, is in the words Biron uses, when he says of Rosalind:—

"A wither'd hermit, five-score winters worn, Might shake off fifty, looking in her eye."

The finest speech in the play, (Biron's also) is a eulogy upon women generally, not upon his own mistress. But it is greatly eloquent, and contains some of the finest things ever said upon the passion of love itself.

This Biron is the principal personage in the play. He is a man of wit, intelligence, and address. He makes the king play an inferior part in the drama, notwithstanding his rank.

The king is represented as courteous, affable, with a characteristic tinge of gentlemanly egotism about him; Longaville, as tall and estimable; Dumain, as good-looking and accomplished.

Thus, Shakspeare has contrived to maintain their individuality by some of his usual artistic touches. They are nicely distinguished; but they are all French lovers, gaily gallant, passing polite, attentively assiduous, complimentary, light-hearted, volatile, witty, conversational, pleasant, and superficial.

However, when the poet has indulged this vein of light humour to the utmost, throughout the comedy (with the exception of the speech already referred to, which is instinct with an earnest beauty all his own), he redeems the preceding levity by one of those serious graces which none so well as he knows how to bestow.

The princess, on hearing the news of her father's death, in the midst of their gaiety, makes this apology, as womanly in its sweet modesty, as it is lady-like, dignified, and befitting her royal birth:—

"I thank you, gracious lords,
For all your fair endeavours: and entreat,
Out of a new-sad soul, that you vouchsafe
In your rich wisdom, to excuse, or hide,
The liberal opposition of our spirits:
If over-boldly we have borne ourselves
In the converse of breath, your gentleness
Was guilty of it."

In Romeo we have beheld passion exemplified in a lover; in the French king and his lords, Biron, Longaville, and Dumain, gallantry, wit, playfulness, gaiety, in lovers. In our next paper, we shall see other individuality in this class of Shakspeare's characters.

THE SCHÜTZEN-FEST.

CLEVES is a pretty place, and three months of the year a pleasant one. Situated in Luxembourg, it is approached on the side of Holland by Arnheim and Nymagen, through the most cheerful looking country possible. Hanging woods on one side, and meadows extending to the Rhine on the other; so green and gay that they freshen up the memory of the traveller, and recall to mind the gladsome fields of "merrie England." No small praise that in any country! Nearer the town the features alter, and the whole place seems consecrated to the goddess of pleasure. Shaded walks, gardens, and groves, abound, and the wild forest of Richwald seems to open its sacred arms to protect its cultured neighbour. How are the mighty fallen! When Claudius Civilis summoned his armed Batavians to this "sacrum nemus," and Julius Cæsar laid the foundation stone of the castle of Schwanenburg, little thought they of the tea that would be drank, and the pipes that would be smoked, by the thirsty Dutchmen, who rub off the rust of the counting-house by a three months' holiday in the pretty town of Cleves. Lovely indeed during June, July, and August, are those long avenues of linden trees, nature's gothic, throwing their shade over the red sand, and tempering but not excluding the rays of the cheerful sun. The hotels too look less like hotels than in other places; no solemn sauntering up stairs to a solitary sole and chop after a waiter with a dirty napkin and a second day's neckcloth; but a cheerful clattering of plates and dishes, the clinking of glasses and long-necked bottles, the chatter of fifty tongues and half as many nations, draw you irresistibly into its vortex; and you find yourself, in five minutes, talking a strange mixture of English, French and German, to a pretty Hollanderinn, who understands neither of the three. And then the dinner: twenty times at least has that waiter been to you with unmentionable dishes, since the "bouille;" and having eaten of every thing or nothing, as the case may be, you are finishing a mouthful of cheese preparatory to your "fläsch of Liebfraümilch," when a huge piece of roast veal makes its appearance, flanked by stewed prunes. I confess that I got cunning at last, and, like an old hunter, reserved myself for making play in the proper place; but often have I seen the unwary freshman's bitter disappointment, when having made a rather plethoric dinner of—what he couldn't tell,—he saw the only thing he could have eaten with appetite, and hopelessly resigned his knife and fork, determined not to begin again. But dinner, the longest dinner, has an end; and then the peculiar disposition of the place breaks out. We walk past—no, not past, (that were impossible,)—but up to the Gästhaus of my worthy hostess, M'Maivalt. Under a covered walk, overlooking the town and river, and defended from the damps of the latter by a hanging wood of great beauty, are about a dozen small tables; at each one of which sit two, three or four persons of either sex, and of every station in society above that of an artizan. Neither is there much difference in appearance between the worthy "burgerschafft" of Cleves, and the good citizens of Rotterdam, unless we except indeed the "schoppen" and pipe of the former, and the more expensive cigar and coffee of the latter. To be sure, those who come to be seen are a trifle smarter than those who have only come to see; but that is a difference so universally admitted and adopted, that it scarcely deserves mention. We ought not to forget the galoppades and waltzes in the evening; when Strauss's music is made the scapegoat for as much lovemaking as would satisfy any reasonable person, north of Italy. But there are other places of amusement besides these: and many a pilgrimage is undertaken to Berg-und-Thal, as much for the shade of its lovely walks, as for the shade of Prince Maurice, who lies entombed there.

(1) "Sacrum nemus" of Tacitus.

In this pretty valley, situated one league from Cleves, my story opens. If I begin it with Sunday evening after vespers, I shall only show a greater respect for truth than prejudice. One fine Sunday evening about the end of July 1839, a greater crowd of persons than usual was wending its way to the gardens of Berg-und-Thal. Conspicuous amongst them was the worthy draper, Herr Liebling: fat, short and rosy, he supported on his left arm his "worse" half, in size, temper, and understanding; on his right he bore what quite made up for the deficiencies of the other, as pretty a girl as could be seen in the Rhenish provinces. Mälchen Liebling was just nineteen, and had been in love one year,—not a successful love altogether; but still Mälchen had more spirit than is said to fall to the lot of blue eyes and light hair: so she neither sighed, nor sat up at night; but kept up her health and her courage, trusting to her own good genius, and her lover's determination to make her some day or other the Frau Willkommen. One might half discover in her very bright and natural smile, some grounds of suspicion, that she knew rather more than the worthy draper or his wife would have approved; or was it only the certainty of seeing her dear Auguste, who had passed her window just one quarter of an hour before Herr Liebling started from home? Perhaps they had a little secret between them, which gave her reason to hope that the jour des noces was not so very far distant as some persons imagined.

Be this as it may, Mälchen looked prettier and happier as she approached Berg-und-Thal: and when she had got her tea under weigh in the very small teacups, and her father's pipe was lighted, and Auguste himself came and sat down at their table with his pipe and tobacco pouch which she had worked for him, she was perfectly contented. Auguste was a bold man, for old Frau Liebling looked daggers at him: however, he behaved pretty well on the whole: that is, he addressed most of his conversation to the worthy Burgher, and only just touched Mälchen's foot now and then under the table; for he didn't wish to get her into trouble with her mother. And what made the old lady look so very black at a good-looking well-behaved young man? Can't you guess? Why, he was poor. Rich people never like poor sons-in-law, and Mälchen's mother was no exception. He was only just gone into a notary's office, and his salary was very, very small. Lately, too, the notary had thought him unsettled; he was a little too gay; too fond of society; and had enrolled himself in the body of the "town riflemen:" what should a notary want with a rifle?

What is it that takes Auguste Willkommen so often over the hill into the forest? We shall see. Mälchen could have told; for love is quick in guessing. And what brings so many people here to-day? To-morrow is the Schützen-Fest, and the little town of Cleves is filling fast. There are plenty of hearts beating; for more than one would like to win the prize, and more than one would like to be queen of the three days' fête.

"Now, don't go to sleep, Herr Liebling, because I want to speak to you. What can make you so civil to that Auguste?"

"Civil, Frau?"

"Ay—too civil by half. Hasn't he been told that he's no match for Mälchen; and that we mean her to marry the rich Heinrich Schneider, the apothecary? If it hadn't been for you, they would have been engaged by now."

"But the girl doesn't like him."

"What business has she with her likings and dislikings, I want to know? A nice respectable young man: he never goes about smoking and drinking, and playing billiards at the casino of an evening. I wish he'd come here a little oftener."

"He's no use when he does come; for he only talks about his thalers; and drinks nothing but water."

"And there's that precious Schützen-Fest to-morrow; I suppose Herr Willkommen will be there; but he can't shoot, that's one comfort, or he'd be coming here for Mälchen to be his queen for the three days."

"Well, we couldn't help it if he did. And very well the dear girl would look; but there's no chance of that; so good night, Frau, for I'm horribly sleepy."

A loud snore shortly announced that the worthy linendraper was in the land of dreams.

The sun and I both entered Herr Liebling's shop at the same moment the following morning—he at the window, I at the door. It was always a favourite lounge of mine; and now I was almost an "ami de la maison." I learnt more German in one day talking to Fräulein Mülchen, than in six weeks of my worthy professor. Here I learnt all the news, as I chatted with the young lady over the counter, or drank a "schnaps" with the old gentleman in the parlour. This day I came upon an errand of inquiry. I wanted to know what was to be the result of the procession which was just moving off through the street to the meadows below the Nymegen road. I found the linendraper's daughter well versed upon the subject, and eager to impart her knowledge.

"To-day," said she, "they shoot at a pigeon tied to the top of a flag-staff, and whoever shoots the best, wins a little silver bugle, and" (here she coloured slightly) "has permission to choose a queen from amongst all the ladies of Cloves; and no one ever refuses, though, of course, we don't like it much. Then they choose officers and dames d'honneur, and sit on a high throne during the ball, and have what they like for supper, and order the music and the dancing, and choose their own partners, and have carriages and four to drive out in; and to-morrow there are all sorts of games,—running in sacks, and diving for oranges, and tilting at buckets full of water from a wheelbarrow; and a grand concert on the third day, and a ball every night—in fact, it's great fun, if you have a nice king, only we do not like it much, because, you know, it makes one a little too intimate for the three days. But you ought to go and see the shooting; and do come back and tell me who wins, for mamma won't let me go this morning, and if it hadn't been for papa I don't think we should have gone to the ball."

In a large meadow were some hundreds of people, of every grade and condition, assembled, (with more of etiquette, the middle classes of German society are less exclusive.) The shooting had already commenced; flags were flying, bands were playing, tents were in the course of erection, and an immense booth, covered with striped canvass, pointed out the supper and dancing-room for the evening's festivities. The rifle-men were shooting in their turn—several had succeeded in hitting the top of the pole, and the bird, now tired with fluttering, was seated upon it. One after the other they still pressed forward, while a flourish of trumpets announced a better shot than usual. The old hands were now drawing to a close, and were making excuses to each other and themselves for their apparent want of skill, whilst renewed hope inspired the more lately enrolled members of the corps. Still the bird remained uninjured, and surely thought that he was likely to remain so, by his composure at the proceedings. At this moment, when all thought that another shot round must be resorted to for a decision, a young man, fair, tall, and good-looking, in a new rifle-green coat and belt, stepped out of the crowd, and placed himself upon the line. He was evidently a favourite with his companions; but as to winning the silver bugle!—perhaps he would not have been quite such a favourite had they thought of such a thing. However, there he stood, rifle in hand; by slow degrees he raised it from the ground, and resting it for a second or two, he pulled the trigger: the report was not heard before the pigeon was seen to flutter in the air for a moment, and then to fall, suspended, lifeless against the staff. Auguste Willkommen had not been walking in the forest to no purpose; his companion had been his rifle.

Having seen the successful competitor safely stowed away in his carriage and four, with his officers and equerries following, I turned to saunter leisurely back to the town, intending to perform my promise to the linendraper's daughter of detailing the proceedings of the morning. I had got to within a hundred yards of the house, when a trampling of horses, blowing of bugles, and cracking of whips attracted my attention. In a minute, a carriage and four dashed past me, which saved me all further trouble; for by the side of Auguste Willkommen sat my young friend Amalie Liebling. The rest followed in due order, and I returned only just in time to see them crowned in the pavilion, king and queen of the Schützen-Fest. I forgot to mention that, at the moment of their departure, Heinrich Schneider sneaked out of Frau Liebling's back room, ill concealing the chagrin which he felt at the result of the morning's work.

And now the business of the day began. The account I received in the morning seemed to have been a pretty correct one. Cigars and hockheimer, and rudeshimer, and all the other "heimers," (pumpenheimer only was excluded,) engaged the attention of the higher classes; pipes and beer did ample duty among the peasants,—all was eating and drinking; but I am "free to confess," as statesmen have it, that I saw no one instance of intoxication. Then came the concert. What music! could it be possible, in so insignificant a place? And glorious was the Schützen chorus with which they finished. The ball, too! how well they danced—peasants and all: not like your English galoppade, where we all tumble up against one another, beg pardon, and go on again; but a real orderly galoppade, in which the king and queen led off, and were followed by a dozen couples, told off in succession by the master of the ceremonies; round and round they go, and, having "put a girdle" round the room some twice or thrice, draw up at the end, to be ready for another turn. And how pretty the queen looked, with her white dress and glittering crown! I felt as proud of dancing with her as if she'd been a duchess; and more than one envied me the luck of being an Engländer and a stranger. Outside of the tent were coloured lamps and festoons of flowers, garlands of roses, and national flags, hanging listlessly in the still, but not silent, night; whilst here and there groups of more staid and business-like characters called for an extra "schoppen," as an occasional breeze bore the sounds of music more distinctly to their ears.

And the next day there was more driving about, and more eating and drinking,—(but neither Germans nor Dutch ever flag at this work)—and another concert, and another ball, and such jumping in sacks, and tumbling down the hill, and tilting at the water-butt, a thaler being the reward of a good ducking; and so it went on to the end of the chapter, while the king took good care to improve this opportunity of holding many a conclave with his lovely queen. The proximity was most dangerous, and the result proved pretty clearly that he did not waste his time in talking about "taxation," though just then his mind was pretty well occupied in thinking how "he was to get the supplies."

One would think that Malchen all this time was quite happy; she certainly had what she wished for, but not everything, for her eye wandered restlessly round in search of something not there. It was not her father, for there he stood in all the glories of a bright blue coat and metal buttons, with a gold pin and shirt-frill of most orthodox dimensions, ogling his daughter through the smoke of his Sunday meerschau, and by no means himself the least part of the pageant. But where was her mother? Alas, the Frau kept her house,—not her bed, for hers was not a spirit to sink under opposition,—but she had made up her mind not to countenance the proceedings, and Malchen was too good a daughter not to have almost repented of the success of her lover's practice.

Whilst gentle and lover-like had been the intercourse between Malchen and Auguste, stormy and loud had been the debate between Herr Liebling and his Frau. Her previous determination in favour of the wealthy apothecary had been confirmed by a positive proposal of marriage at the very time that her daughter was being hurried into the carriage of his rival: his decided partiality for the good-looking and good-tempered notary's writer had been equally strengthened by the success of Auguste, and the avowed preference of his daughter at such a time, when, as he justly observed, he might have chosen any one else in the town; and he loved his daughter too, and had sworn roundly that she should not marry any one she disliked; besides all this (the truth must be told), he was a little superstitious, and he looked upon the fête as a good omen of Auguste's future position.

About a week after the fête was over, and the town began to resume its wonted tranquillity, i.e. when the inhabitants were reduced to their daily modicum of dissipation and two balls a week, instead of three in as many days, I called in one evening upon the worthy Burgher. The door stood as invitingly open as usual, and I followed my knock into the best parlour. To say something was wrong, is a mild form of expression; the Frau and the Fraulein bore evident traces of tears, and the pater familiæ looked not cross exactly, and not melancholy, but something between the two; there had been more than a brush: but there I was, and of the two alternatives, leaving abruptly, or sitting for a few minutes, I chose the latter. It was clearly no night for a pipe, except of the "eye." I tried to say a few funny things; that was a failure: then I chimed in with the apparent disposition of the circle; that was as bad too; then I addressed an observation to Malchen upon the late festivities, and this took a decided effect, for she burst into an overwhelming flood of tears, and left the room. Her mother followed on the same side, and her father, making a virtue of necessity, confided to me all his troubles.

These were what the reader may expect. A warm debate on the subject of the rival lovers led to a warmer quarrel. Both had proposed and both had been rejected, the one by the father and daughter, the other by the mother. As the latter was but one to two, the more she lost in argument and numbers, the more she gained in violence of temper, until she had fairly roused the dormant authority of her lord and master. Being thus far a confidant, I was next to become a mediator, and when the lady returned to the room without her daughter, I began my very difficult task of reconciling the contending powers. How I managed matters it is not easy to say: repeated attacks wore out her patience, and day after day she got more good-tempered about the business. I had two great auxiliaries,—her real love for her daughter, and my own execrably bad German: the latter did wonders. However, at the end of a month the apothecary was utterly chasséd, and my friend Auguste re-established; in another week the Frau Liebling became a rival to her daughter, and an increase of salary was a clencher. Before the winter I saw them married and kissed the bride, and should have remained in Cleves to wish them joy a few years later as Burgomeister and Frau Burgomeisterinn, but that I dreaded the vengeance of the disappointed apothecary, with his sour looks and poisonous drugs, and left the town. Malchen Willkommenn keeps open house for the English, and has christened her eldest boy by my name.

KING LEAR.

THE HISTORY OF KING LEYR AND HIS THREE DAUGHTERS. (From the "Ancient History of Great Britain.")—Llyr or Leyr, the son of Bladud, succeeded him, who reigned sixty years. He builded a cyty upon the ryver Soram, wherein he built a temple to Janus, and ther erected a flamin, and cauled the cyty of his name, Caerlyr (which is Leicester). He had no son, but thre daughters, whos names were Goronilla, Ragan, and Cordeila, whom the fater much loved,—and most of all he loved the youngest, and drawing into his ould age, he bethought him how he should leave his kingdom and wealth amongst his daughters; and therefore he thought to trie which of his daughters loved him most, to the end to bestow her in marriage with the best part of his kingdom. Whereupon he cauled to him Goronilla, his eldest daughter, and asked her how well she loved him. She sware by heaven and earth that she loved him better than her own soule, which he believing, said unto her, "For as much as thou lovest me so wel, I will give thee to a husband in Britaine, as thou shalt choose, with the third part of my kingdom;" and that said, he cauled to him his daughter Ragan, his second daughter, and demanded of her how much she loved him. She sware by the power of God, that she could not declare with her tong, how much she loved him; which he believing likewise, willed her to chose whom she would for her husband, and she should have the third part of this kingdom. And therupon he cauled to him his youngest daughter Cordeila, and demanded of her how much she loved him; to whom she answered him, that she ever loved him as becometh her daughter to love her father, and yet doth, adding, "Thou shalt be beloved as thou are worth or worthli," upon which answer he grew colar, and said unto her, "For as much as thou hast so much despised me, and lovest me not so much as thy other sisters, thou shalt never have part with them of my kingdom," and turning his love of her into hate, he saught not to bestow her in marriage; but his two eldest daughters he bestowed in marriage; Goronilla to Maglawn, Duke of Scotland, and Ragan to Honwin, Duke of Cornwall, with half his kingdom betwixt them in possession, and the whole after his daies. And Aganippus, King of France, (or, as Ziriseus saith, of the third part of Gaule Belgick,) hearing of the fame and great beuty of Cordeila, sent to her father to demande her in marriage. To whos messengers king Leyr answered, that king Aganippus should willingly have her to wyf, but without dowry of his kingdom, for that he had assured the same to his other two daughters and their husbands; which, when Aganippus understood, and of the beuty of Cordeila, he said that he had wealth enough, and that he sought but a virtuous and beutiful wyf, to have children of her to inherit his kingdom. And therupon he took Cordeila to wyf. And afterwards King Lyr living long in his ould age, his two sons in law thought it long to stay for the absolute kingdom of Britain til after his death, thei made war upon the ould king, who had honorably governed his kingdom, and wan it from him, and divided it betwixt them; and thereupon Maglawn, Duke of Albany, toke Lyr to him, with allowance of forty knights to attend him; and after that Lyr had been a certen time with Maglawn, his daughter Goronilla did grudge that her father had such great attendance on him, and spake to her husband to abridge the nombre, who accordingly abridged the nombre to thirty-two, which King Lyr taking in evil part, departed thens to his other son in law, Henwyn, Duke of Cornwall, wher at first he was honorably entertained, but within a year ther fel some strife between the men of Leir and his son in law, by color whereof Ragan frowned upon her father, and willed him to put away al his knights but one to serve him, which Leir toke very heavily, and was very sad, and departed thens with his knights back again to his daughter Goronilla, hoping ther to be entertained again, and when he cam thether his daughter Goronilla sware in wrath, by heaven and earth, that if he staid ther, he should have but one knight to attend upon him, which was yenough for an ould man of his age; and not finding better relief at his daughter's hands, he put away al his knights but one, and having so remained a while, and thinking upon his honorable and prosperous estate, and reputation in times past, he remembered his daughter Cordeila in Gaule, and being weary and ashamed of the reproachful estate he lived in, it cam to his thought to seke relief at her hands, notwithstanding the great unkindness and unnatural cours he had shewed her: and therupon he toke his journey towards Gaule, and going on shipboard, seeing his poor attendance, of two servants only, he brake into these speaches: "O destiny, how doest thou go over the accustomed boundes! How hast thou throwen me down from my long felicity! It is more plain to remember prosperity lost, than never to have had it. I now receave more sorrow and pain in remembering my wealth, honor, and reputation lost, and the unkindness of my daughters and sones in law, than al the adversities which have happened to me: the multitude of enemies with whom in my prosperity I have had to deal withal, troubled me not so much as the ingratitude of thes men. O Goddes of heaven and earth, wil the tyme com wherin I may be revenged of thes men! O Cordeila, my wel-beloved daughter, how true were the woordes thou spakest unto me! That I should be beloved as much as I was worth: for so long as I was in wealth, and prosperity, and able to live, al men loved me; but in truth thei loved not me, but my wealth; and as it passed from me, so did their love. And therefore, O daughter Cordeila, how can I for shame request aid at thy hands, whom I so wrongfully rejected for thy great wisdom, and so unfatherly put thee from me in mariag, rather with disdain than advancement, and like a lost child, never hoping of comfort or joy by thy match. And yet thou now farr surmounteth thy sisters in honor, reputation, virtue, and wisdom."

And thus lamenting and wailing, he approched the cyty wher his daughter remained, and sent a messenger unto her, signifying unto her of his adversity and overthrowen estate, his want of money, apparel, and other necessities, desiring her to have commiseration upon him; which, when she heard, she wept, and demanded how many knights attended him. To whom it was answered, but one or two servants. Whereupon she sent him plenty of goulde and silver, and willed him to go into another towne, and take on him to be sick, till he had provided him apparel; which done, he should send messengers to King Aganippus and her, to certify them of his coming, which he did accordingly; and sent messengers to his daughter and King Aganippus, signifying his coming, and how he was driven out of Britain by his sones in law, and that he was come to seke their aid, to be restored to his kingdom. Which, when Aganippus understood, he and his quene, and al their household cam very honorably to mete with King Leir, according to the worthiness of the King of Britain, and resceaved him with joy, and dnring his abode in Gaule, Aganippus gave Leir the whole rule of his kingdom, to the end that he might the easier levy power ther to recover his kingdom of Britain. Whereupon Aganippus mustered his subjects, and selected an army of his worthiest souldiers, in aid of King Leir, to recover his kingdom. And having al things in a readines, King Leir, and his daughter, Cordeila, with that army, cam into Britain; and, fighting with his sones in law, got the victory, and recovered his kingdom again; and, all his subjects yeilding unto him, he raigned in three yeares afterwarde, and then died, and was buried in a vault or tomb, which he had made under the ryver Sarum. And wheras he had builded a temple to Janus in Cacrlyr, as is aforesaid, when the day of the solemn feast of that temple cam, al the artificers and workmen of the cyty and countrey thereabouts repaired to that temple, wher they began al things which they had to do the year following. And shortly after, Aganippus died also.

Cordeila succeeded her father in the Kingdom of Britain, who have raigned five years in peace; her two nephews, her sisters' sones, Margan, son of Maglaw, Duke of Albany, and Chuneda, son of Henwyn, Duke of Cornwall, levied warr against her, and obtained the victory, and toke her prisoner, and imprisoned her; wher, throw sorrow for the los of her kingdom, her father, and her husband, she killed herself, and was buried at Leicester. Whereupon Margan and Chuneda divided the kingdom between them; by which division Margan had al the North beyond Hunber, and Chuneda had the rest. But within two years after, Margan repented him of this partition, for that Chuneda had the better, who was son of the youngest sister; and therefor, to undo this partition, Margan levied war against Chuneda, and entred his country with fyre and sword; with whom Chuneda, with a great army, encountred, and forced him to fle into Wales, wher they fought a bloodie battel, in which Margan was slaine, and of him the country toke the name, and specially the abbey of Margan. And touching the conquest of Morganwe, by Robert Fitzhamon, I refer you to Powel, whos opinion was, that the country toke the name of Morgan Mwynfawr, great grandfather to Jestin ap Gyrgan, who brought Robert Fitzhamon unto that countrey. Wherof I allow not. For it bare that name in the tyme of Merchiawn Gul, king thereof, above one thousand yeares past, as it appeareth by a charter by him made to St. Eltutus, touching the privilege of his scole in that countrey. By our antiquities it appeareth that eighteen battels were fought in the quarrel of the tytles of Leyr's three daughters.

GILFILLAN'S LITERARY PORTRAITS.¹

MR. GILFILLAN is undoubtedly a smart writer. You may "dig for dulness," in his pages, "as for hid treasure," and never find it. He is as brilliant as a lighted theatre; and his light too, in great part, rather dazzles than illuminates. Though every sentence may contain a determinate meaning in itself, it is extremely difficult to ascertain what, upon the whole, the writer's estimate of several of the characters here delineated, really is. In giving you a portrait, he is apt to draw it with a veil over the face, or with a slouched hat and a theatrical pair of whiskers, or, like the picture of a criminal in the article of execution, with a grotesque looking night-cap over the head. He sketches features much after the style in which the artist in Punch represents the physiognomy of the honourable member for Buckinghamshire; so that the result is rather a striking likeness, with a considerable dash of caricature. He delights in a show of paradox; and not unfrequently approaches what he calls the "brink of the bathos," for the sake of snatching "one of those few, perilous and precious flowers" of originality which bloom in that forbidden neighbourhood. He is an extremely clever writer, and likes to give his readers every possible opportunity for forming an opinion to that effect.

If we were required to indicate Mr. Gilfillan's characteristics as an author, we should be inclined to call him a sort of cross between Hazlitt and De Quincey — Hazlitt preponderating. In regard to insight, and catholicity of disposition, he reminds us a little of De Quincey; while in point of manner, critical ability, and inveterate dogmatism of temper, he closely resembles Hazlitt. He has, however, a certain idiosyncrasy of his own; as indeed most persons have, though in the generality it is disguised, if not obliterated, by the vicious habit of imitation.

No one can deny that Mr. Gilfillan exercises a bold independency of judgment, or that he possesses a fine critical discernment, altogether superior to that of the ordinary run of people who undertake to assay the merits of men and books. He has, besides, an enlarged and generous sympathy with human genius under a manifold variety of shapes—a thing not peculiar to himself, but yet certainly commendable. He utters freely whatever his own demon gives him; and if his utterances can seldom be accepted as oracular, they are commonly marked with sense, discrimination, and often force and beauty. One of his greatest faults is his too decided dogmatism: he almost uniformly speaks as though he were consciously superior to the authors whom he delineates; hurls forth his censures like a Jove playing with his thunderbolts; and often dispenses praise after the fashion in which a schoolmaster would commend a very promising boy. This patronising attitude of criticism, though largely practised by the critical fraternity in general, we hold to be extremely unbecoming; inasmuch as it implies a superiority in the critic which he may probably be nowise entitled to assume. The true business of the critic, as we conceive, is to expound and illustrate his author; to indicate his capabilities, and by them to measure his performances; to show upon the whole what manner of man he is; and to examine into the character and value of his teaching. In drawing his literary portraits Mr. Gilfillan does not always keep this in view: he appears rather to be sometimes desirous of showing his readers how he himself can write; and if anything happens to strike his fancy which seems particularly good, or likely to have a strong effect when printed, he hooks it in with an heroic indifference as to whether it may be appropriate or not. Thus his pictures are nearly all more or less overwrought; and are not so much resemblances of the persons designed to be delineated, as they are representations of their shadows, as they appear in the glowing mist and splendour of the artist's fancy.

In these sketches we have, nevertheless, much just and excellent criticism, together with an abundance of rather fine and often powerful writing. Probably few books have issued from the press this season that are better worth the reading. Anybody inclined to take it up, will be sure to find he has an accomplished and highly intellectual man to deal with; or if not, it will certainly be rather his own fault than the author's. For many a book of even loftier pretensions, we cannot say so much. The mortal that could sleep under this volume, must have an extremely prosy head. With all its faults of execution, of unconscious or wilful incompleteness, it is the work of a lusty and cultivated intellect, and as such is necessarily, to a very considerable degree, interesting. For our part, we confess to have found it, in some respects, rather too exciting. The merciless cleverness here displayed has rendered us uncomfortable. If many a vague surmise has been, to some extent, strengthened into an opinion, not the less has many a conviction which we deemed fixed been at least partially disturbed. We have felt something of the truth of Emerson's fine saying: "In the thought of to-morrow [that is, in every new and original mind] there is a power to upheave all thy creed, all the creeds, all the literature of the nations, and marshal thee to a heaven which no epic dream has yet depicted." Unhappily, in the present case, the effect has been altogether otherwise. Instead of being carried miraculously upwards into some paradise of satisfaction, we have been sent to wander disconsolately in a contrary direction—among the howling and waste places, that are populous with doubts and the ghosts of departed heresies. Our author discusses various grave questions incidentally—such as the Origin of Evil, the present aspects of Religion, and the natural rights and liberties of Opinion: and by his unsatisfactory mode of dealing with them does much to unsettle many things, without contributing anything to settle any. With regard to the modern views of life and man which have sprung out of the Transcendentalism of Germany, he does not appear to have decided for himself how they are related to the general scheme of Christianity—whether they are hostile or confirmatory—but he does not scruple to deprecate the conclusions which the most earnest minds of the age are drawing from them. He neither accepts the old nor the new; nor does he reconcile the two, or anywhere show their irreconcilability. He stands between the orthodoxy and heterodoxy of the times, with a finger extended towards each; now apparently inclining to embrace the one, and then turning with the like intention to the other. This perpetual collision between the moods of his own mind, must be utterly fatal to any confidence which some might otherwise place in his religious notions. His considerate sympathy for such a man as Sterling is "beautiful exceedingly;" but he spoils it by insinuating that the man must have been greatly wrong in mind and heart, though he admits there was every evidence of a sincere purpose in his life that could possibly be demanded. From such conflicting criticism one can gather nothing to advantage us in the way of forming a just opinion. By few things have we been more puzzled than by our author's attitude towards such writers as Emerson and Carlyle. We cannot understand his emphatic admiration of these men, if the doctrines which they teach are so insignificant as he frequently takes occasion to represent them.

It is not, however, with Mr. Gilfillan's shortcomings or critical delinquencies that we are here disposed to be especially concerned. There are many excellent passages in the book, on which it will be more edifying to dwell, than on those points of difference which we find between the author and ourselves. He has taken a tolerably fair and accurate estimate of several of the most popular modern writers of our country; and rather than quarrel with him further, we prefer to introduce our readers to some portions of his work which we doubt not will be interesting.

The name of Thomas Babington Macaulay is at present pretty well familiar to most readers; few, therefore, we apprehend, will object to see what our author has found to say concerning him.

"He is," in Mr. Gilfillan's opinion, "a gifted but not a great man. He is a rhetorician without being an orator. He is endowed with great powers of perception and acquisition, but with no power of origination. He has deep sympathies with genius, without possessing genius of the highest order itself. He is strong and broad, but not subtle or profound. He is not more destitute of original genius than he is of high principle and purpose. He has all common faculties developed in a large measure, and cultivated to an intense degree. What he wants is the gift that cannot be given—the power that cannot be counterfeited—the wind that bloweth where it listeth—the vision, the joy, and the sorrow, with which no stranger intermeddleth—the 'light that never was on sea or shore—the consecration and the poet's dream.' . . .

"He is a gifted but not a great man. He possesses all those ornaments, accomplishments, and even natural endowments, which the great man requires for the full emphasis and effect of his power (and which the greatest alone can entirely dispense with); but the power does not fill, possess, and shake the drapery. The lamps are lit in gorgeous effulgence; the shrine is modestly yet magnificently adorned; there is every thing to tempt a god to descend; but the god descends not,—or, if he does, it is only Maia's son, the Eloquent, and not Jupiter, the Thunderer. The distinction between the merely gifted and the great is, we think, this:—the gifted adore greatness and the great; the great worship the infinite, the eternal, and the godlike. The gifted gaze at the moonlike reflections of the Divine; the great, with open face, look at the naked sun, and each look is the principle and prophecy of an action.

"He has profound sympathies with genius, without possessing genius of the highest order itself. Genius, indeed, is his intellectual god. . . . If we trace him throughout all his writings, we shall find him watching for genius with as much care and fondness as a lover uses in following the footsteps of his mistress. This, like a golden ray, has conducted him across all the wastes and wildernesses of history. It has brightened to his eye each musty page and worm-eaten volume. Each morning has he risen exulting to renew the search; and he is never half so eloquent as when dwelling on the achievements of genius, as sincerely and rapturously as if he were reciting his own. His sympathies are as wide as they are keen. Genius, whether thundering with Chatham in the House of Lords, or mending kettles and dreaming dreams with Bunyan in Elstowe—whether reclining in the saloons of Holland House with De Staël and Byron, or driven from men as on a new Nebuchadnezzar whirlwind, in the person of poor wandering Shelley—whether in Coleridge,

'With soul as strong as a mountain river,
Pouring out praise to the Almighty giver,' or in Voltaire, shedding its withering smile across the universe, like the grin of death—whether singing in Milton's verse, or glittering on Cromwell's sword—it is the only magnet which can draw forth all the riches of his mind; and the presence of inspiration alone makes him inspired.

"But this sympathy with genius does not amount to genius itself; it is too catholic and too prostrate. The man of the highest order of genius, after the enthusiasm of youth is spent, is rarely its worshipper, even as it exists in himself. He worships rather the object which genius contemplates, and the ideal at which it aims. He is rapt up in a higher region, and hears a mightier voice. Listening to the melodies of Nature, to the march of the eternal hours, to the severe music of continuous thought, to the rush of his own advancing soul, he cannot so complacently bend an ear to the minstrel's, however sweet, of men, however gifted. He passes, like the true painter, from the admiration of copies, which he may admire to error and extravagance, to that great original which, without blame, excites an infinite and endless devotion. He becomes a personification of art, standing on tiptoe, in contemplation of mightier Nature, and drawing from her features with trembling pencil and a joyful awe." Macaulay has not this direct and personal communication with the truth and the glory of things. He sees the universe, not in its own rich and divine radiance, but in the reflected light which poets have shed upon it. There are in his writings no oracular deliverances, no pregnant hints, no bits of intense meaning—broken, but broken off from some supernal circle of thought—no momentary splendours, like flashes of midnight lightning, revealing how much!—no thoughts beckoning us away with silent finger, like ghosts, into dim and viewless regions—and he never even hears that divine darkness which ever edges the widest and loftiest excursions of imagination and of reason."

Mr. Gilfillan further represents Macaulay as exhibiting no high purpose in his writings. "Seldom," says he, "have so much energy and eloquence been more entirely divorced from a great and consecrating object." The real purpose of a writer, he conceives, may be best concluded from the effect he produces on the minds of his readers.

"And what," asks he, "is the boon which Macaulay's writings do actually confer upon their millions of readers? Much information, doubtless; many ingenious views are given and developed, but the main effect is pleasure—either a lulling, soothing opiate, or a rousing and stimulating gratification. But what is their mental or moral influence? What new and great truths do they throw, like bomb-shells, into nascent spirits, disturbing for ever their repose? What sense of the moral sublime have they ever infused into the imagination, or what thrilling and strange joy, 'beyond the name of pleasure,' have they ever circulated through the heart? What long, deep trains of thought have his thoughts ever started, and to what melodies, in other minds, have his words struck the key-note? . . . Who dates any great era in his history from the reading of his works, or has received from him even the bright edge of any apocalyptic revelation? Pleasure, we repeat, is the principal boon he has conferred on the age; and without under-estimating this, (which, indeed, were ungrateful, for none have derived more pleasure from him than ourselves,) we must say, that it is, comparatively, a trivial gift—a fruiterer's or a confectioner's office; and, moreover, that the pleasure he gives, like that arising from the use of wine, or from the practice of novel-reading, requires to be imbibed in great moderation, and needs a robust constitution to bear it. Reading his papers is employment but too delicious; the mind is too seldom irritated and provoked; the higher faculties are too seldom appealed to; the sense of the infinite is never given;—there is perpetual excitement, but it is that of a game of tennis-ball, and not the Titanic play of rocks and mountains; there is constant exercise, but it is rather the swing of an easy-chair than the grasp and tug of a strong rower, striving to keep time with one stronger than himself. (Ought, we ask, a grave and solid reputation, as extensive as that of Shakspeare or Milton, to be entirely founded on what is essentially a course of light reading?)"

In reply to such a question, we would observe that an author's popularity is never so much determinable by what ought to be, as by what can be. Mr. Macaulay's extensive popularity is doubtless a proof that there is a large class of readers who can appreciate him, or take an interest in his pages. His popularity is no evidence of his superiority of genius, but only evidence of his acceptability with the public. No popularity is ever more; and it seems absurd to take exception to it because the general taste does not happen to coincide with our individual notions of what is most deserving of approbation. Mr. Gilfillan himself offers a sufficient reason why Macaulay's literary reputation has become so considerable. He says, again:—

"Macaulay's writings have one very peculiar and very popular quality. They are eminently clear. They can by no possibility, at any time, be nebulous. You can read them as you run. Schoolboys devour them with as much zest as bearded men. This clearness is, we think, connected with deficiency in his speculative and imaginative faculties; but it does not so appear to the majority of readers. Walking in an even and distinct pathway,—not one stumbling-stone or alley of gloom in its whole course, no Hill of Difficulty rising, nor Path of Danger diverging, greeted, too, by endless vistas of interest and beauty,—all are but too glad and too grateful to get so trippingly along. Vanity, also, whispers to the more ambitious—'What we can so easily understand, we could easily equal; and thus are the readers kept on happy terms both with the author and themselves. His writings have all the stimulus of oracular decision, without one particle of oracular darkness. His papers, too, are thickly studded with facts. This itself, in an age like ours, is enough to recommend them, especially when these facts are so carefully selected—when told, now with emphasis so striking, and now with negligence so graceful; and when suspended round a theory at once dazzling and slight—at once paradoxical and pleasing. The reader, beguiled, believes himself reading something more agreeable than history, and more veracious than fiction. It is a very waltz of facts that he witnesses; and yet how consoling to reflect that they are facts after all! Again, Macaulay, as we have repeatedly hinted, is given to paradoxes. But then these paradoxes are so harmless, so respectable, so well-behaved—his originalities are so orthodox, and his mode of expressing them is at once so strong and so measured—that people feel both the tickling sensation of novelty and a perfect sense of safety, and are slow to admit that the author, instead of being a bold, is a timorous thinker—one of the literary as well as political juste-milieu. Again, his manner and style are thoroughly English. As his sympathies are, to a great degree, with English modes of thought and habits of action, so his language is a stream of English undefiled. All the territories which it has traversed have enriched, without colouring, its waters. Even the most valuable of German refinements—such as the common one of subjective and objective,—are sternly shied. That philosophic diction which has been from Germany so generally transplanted, is denied admittance into Macaulay's grounds, exciting a shrewd suspicion that he does not often require it for philosophical purposes. Scarcely a phrase or word is introduced which Swift would not have sanctioned. In anxiety to avoid a barbarous and mosaic diction, he goes to the other extreme, and practises purism and elaborate simplicity. Perhaps under a weightier burden, like Charon's skiff, such a style might break down; but, as it is, it floats on, and carries the reader with it, in all safety, rapidity, and ease. Again, this writer has, apart from his clearness, his bridled paradox, and his English style, a power of interesting his readers, which we may call, for want of a more definite term, tact. This art he has taught himself, gradually; for in his earlier articles, such as that on 'Milton,' and the 'Present Administration,' there were a prodigality and a recklessness—a prodigality of image and a recklessness of statement—which argued an impulsive nature, not likely so soon to subside into a tactician. Long ago, however, has he changé tout cela (changed all that). Now he can set his elaborate passages at proper distances from each other; he peppers his page more sparingly with the condiments of metaphor and image; he interposes anecdotes to break the blaze of his splendour; he consciously stands at ease, nay, condescends to nod, the better to prepare his reader, and breathe himself, for a grand gallop; and though he has not the art to conceal his art, yet he has the skill always to fix his reader, always to write—as he himself says of Horace Walpole—"what every body will like to read."

In this wise, as our critic conceives, has Mr. Macaulay become famous; so that now no one need ask, as in the times of the "Noctes,"—"Who is young Macaulay?" nor receive for answer, "The son of old Macaulay;" but every intellectual stripling knoweth him, and the lips of all the Whigs, more especially, do praise him.

Leaving him to stand, as he easily can, on his own basis, let us turn now to our author's sketch of Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

"In the career of Bulwer, we find a faint yet traceable resemblance to that of Byron. Like him, he began with wit, satire, and persiflage. Like him, he affected, for a season, a melodramatic earnestness. Like him, he was at last stung into genuine sincerity, and shot upwards into a higher sphere of thought and feeling. The three periods in Byron's history are distinctly marked by the three works, 'English Bards,' 'Childe Harold,' and 'Cain.' So 'Pelham,' 'Eugene Aram,' and 'Zanoni,' accurately mete out the stages in Bulwer's progress. . . .

"Point and brilliance are at once perceived to be the leading qualities of Bulwer's writing. His style is vicious from excess of virtue, weak from repletion of strength. Every word is a point, every clause a beauty, the close of every sentence a climax. He is as sedulous of his every stroke, as if the effect of the whole depended upon it. His pages are all sparkling with minute and insulated splendours; not suffused with a uniform and sober glow, nor shown in the reflected light of a few solitary and surpassing beauties. . . . All is point; but the point perpetually varies 'from grave to gay, from lively to severe;' including in it rallery and reasoning, light dialogue and earnest discussion, bursts of political feeling and raptures of poetical description; here a sarcasm almost worthy of Voltaire, and there a passage of pensive grandeur, which Rousseau might have written in his tears. To keep up this perpetual play of varied excellence, required at once great vigour and great versatility of talents: for Bulwer never walks through his part, never prosés, is never tame, and seldom indeed substitutes sound for sense, or mere flummery for force and fire. He generally writes his best; and our great quarrel, indeed, with him is, that he is too uniformly erect in the stirrups, too conscious of himself, of his exquisite management, of his complete equipment, of the speed with which he devours the dust; and seldom exhibits the careless grandeur of one who is riding at the pace of the whirlwind, with perfect self-oblivion, and with perfect security."

Along with all this, Mr. Gilfillan detects in Bulwer what he calls "an intense cosmopolitanism and ideal indifference." He has no proper nationality, but shows himself on most occasions as a cultivated "citizen of the world." In this respect he differs remarkably from nearly all our other popular authors: from none more distinctly than Walter Scott and Dickens, whose knowledge and love of the familiar scenes in which they lived stand in curious antithesis to Sir Edward's indifference to home and country.

"Akin to this," continues our portrait painter, "and connected either as cause or as effect with it, is a certain dignified independence of thought and feeling, inseparable from the motion of Bulwer's mind. He is not a great original thinker; on no one subject can he be called profound, but on all, he thinks and speaks for himself. He belongs to no school either in literature or in politics, and he has created no school. He is too proud for a Radical, and too wide-minded for a Tory. He is too definite and decisive to belong to the mystic school of letters; too impetuous and impulsive to cling to the classical; too liberal to be blind to the beauties of either. He has attained thus, an insulated and original position, and may be viewed as a separate, nor yet a small estate, in our intellectual realm. . . .

"Bulwer is not, we fear, in the full sense of the term, an earnest man; nay, we have heard of the great modern prophet of the quality, pronouncing him the most thoroughly false man of the age; and another, of the same school, christens him 'a double-distilled scent-bottle of cant.' In spite of this, however, we deem him to possess, along with much that is affected, much, also, that is true, and much that is deeply sympathetic with sincerity, although no devouring fire of purpose has hitherto filled his being, or been seen to glare in his eye. His later writings exhibit sometimes, in mournful and melancholy forms, a growing depth and truth of feeling. Few, indeed, can even sportively wear, for a long time, the yoke of genius, without its iron entering into the soul, and eliciting that cry which becomes immortal.

"Bulwer, as a novelist, has from a compound of conflicting and imported materials, reared to himself an independent structure. He has united many of the qualities of the fashionable novel, of the Godwin philosophical novel, and of the Waverley tale. He has the levity and thoroughbred air of the first; much of the mental anatomy and philosophical thought which often overpower the narrative in the second; and a portion of the dramatic liveliness, the historical interest, and the elaborate costume of the third. If, on the other hand, he is destitute of the long, solemn, overwhelming swell of Godwin's style of writing, and of the variety, the sweet, natural, and healthy tone of Scott's, he has some qualities peculiar to himself—point, polish, at times a classical elegance, at times a barbaric brilliance, and a perpetual mint of short sententious reflections—compact, rounded, and shining as new-made sovereigns. We know no novelist from whose writings we could extract so many striking sentences containing fine thoughts, chased in imagery, 'apples of gold in pictures of silver.' The wisdom of Scott's sage reflections is homely but common-place; Godwin beats his gold thin, and you gather his philosophical axioms rather from the whole conduct and tone of the story, and his commentary upon it, than from single and separate thoughts. But it is Bulwer's beauty that he abounds in fine, though not far, gleams of insight; and it is his fault that sometimes while watching these, he allows the story to stand still, or to drag heavily, and sinks the character of novelist in that of brilliant essay-writer, or inditer of smart moral and political apophthegms. In fact, his works are too varied and versatile. They are not novels or romances so much as compounds of the newspaper article, the essay, the political squib, the gay and rapid dissertation, which, along with the necessary ingredients of fiction, combine to form a junction, without constituting a true artistic whole."

Mr. Gilfillan enters into an examination of several of Bulwer's individual works; analysing their design and tendency, as we think, with considerable success and justice; though the whole criticism is, probably, chargeable with a straining after pointedness, and runs often into obvious exaggeration. Want of space precludes us from quoting further, otherwise we might have added several other passages which would have given proof of this, as well as of unquestionable penetration and shrewd judgment in the writer.

Bulwer and Macaulay are men of high endowments, of large and elegant accomplishments; but he to whom we now turn was, in our belief, a man of considerably finer genius. Bulwer and Macaulay have both attempted poetry, both more or less successfully, yet it is doubtful whether another generation will admit them to the rank of poets. Thomas Hood, however, belongs unquestionably to this honourable and exalted company. A true poet, though not a great one, all men seem now agreed to reckon him. His position as a man of letters was always very singular. It was his lot, as our author says, "to be born as if in the blank space between Milton's 'L'Allegro' and 'Penseroso,'"—his proximity to both originally about equal, and his actual position determined rather by circumstances than inherent disposition. He has been rightly esteemed "a quaint masquer," wearing above a manly and profound nature, a fantastic disguise of whim and drollery. Many persons who knew him in his lifetime, and who, before becoming acquainted with him, had been familiar with his facetious writings, were much astonished on finding him a serious, and even melancholy man. Perhaps, on few writers of the age did the "weight, the burden, and the mystery of all this unintelligible world" press more heavily than on the mirth-making, joyous-speaking Thomas Hood. His was that deepest earnestness which conceals its purpose through timidity, that abashed and tearful face, which, in shrinking from a too sedulous observation, covers its sad secret under arch and playful smiles.

"As a poet," says Mr. Gilfillan, "Hood belongs to the school of John Keats and Leigh Hunt, with qualities of his own, and an all but entire freedom from their peculiarities of manner and style. What strikes us in the first place about him, is his great variety of subject and mode of treatment. His works are in two small duodecimo volumes, and yet we find in them five or six distinct styles attempted, and attempted with success. There is the classical, there is the fanciful, there is the homely tragic narrative, there is the wildly grotesque, there is the light, and there is the grave and pathetic lyric. And besides, there is a style which we despair of describing by any one single or compound epithet, of which his 'Elm Tree' and 'Haunted House' are specimens, and the secret and power of which, perhaps, lie in the feeling of mystic correspondence between man and inanimate nature—in the start of momentary consciousness with which we sometimes feel that in nature's company we are not alone—that nature's silence is not that of death; and are aware, in the highest and grandest sense, that we are 'made of dust,' and that the dust from which we were once taken is still divine. . . .

"Through these varied numerous styles, we find two or three main elements distinctly traceable in all Hood's poems. One is a singular subtlety in the perception of minute analogies. The weakness, as well as the strength of his poetry, is derived from this source. His serious verse, as well as his witty prose, is laden and encumbered with thick coming fancies. Hence some of his finest pieces are tedious, without being long. Little more than ballads in size, they are books in the reader's feeling. . . . In fact, Hood has not been able to infuse human interest into his fairy or mythological creations. He has conceived them in a happy hour; surely in one of those days when the soul and nature are one—when one calm bond of peace seems to unite all things—when the 'very cattle in the fields appear to have great and tranquil thoughts'—when the sun seems to slumber, and the sky to smile—when the air becomes a wide balm, and the low wind, as it wanders over flowers, seems telling some happy tidings in each gorgeous ear, till the rose blushes a deep crimson, and the tulip lifts up a more towering head, and the violet shrinks more modestly away as at lovers' whispers; in such a favoured hour, when the first strain of music might have arisen or the first stroke of painting been drawn, or the chisel of the first sculptor been heard, or the first verse of poetry been chanted, or man himself, a nobler harmony than lute ever sounded, a finer line than painter ever drew, a statelier structure and a diviner song, arisen from the dust—did the beautiful idea of the 'Plea of the Midsummer Fairies' dawn upon the poet's mind. He has conceived his fairies in a happy hour—he has framed them with exquisite skill and a fine eye to poetic proportion, but he has not made them alive; he has not made them objects of love; and you care less for his centaurs and his fairies than you do for the moon-beams on the shed leaves of the forest."

This is Mr. Gilfillan's pretty, but rather roundabout, way of telling us that these imaginary beings are only conceived, and not created; the poet has not, and could not render them true to the "fairy ideal;" they are to Oberon and Titania what "Frankenstein" might be to a living man. In connexion with this defect, there is, in all Hood's more elaborate poetical pieces, another equally detrimental to their popularity, the want of an effective story. So much subtle and beautiful imagery as he uses needs a "strong distinct stick of support" to bear it up. The jasmine blossoms and ivy leaves of fancy, to yield their natural and best effect, must grow around some substantial stem of incident or supposable reality. It were well if all poets and poetical writers could bear this continually in mind. A clear, definite, and impressive purpose—some unquestionable signification, at any rate, may be fairly demanded of every man and woman who is presumed, or assumes, to be poetically inspired. Of Hood's further characteristics, Mr. Gilfillan proceeds thus:—

"Subtle fancy, lively wit, copious language, and mellow versification, are the undoubted qualities of Hood as a poet. But, besides, there are two or three moral peculiarities about him as delightful as his intellectual; and they are visible in his serious as well as lighter productions. One is his constant lightness of spirit and tone. His verse is not a chant, but a carol. Deep as may be his internal melancholy, it expresses itself in, and yields to, song. The heavy thunder-cloud of woe comes down in the shape of sparkling, sounding, sunny drops, and thus dissolves. He casts his melancholy into shapes so fantastic, that they lure first himself, and then his readers, to laughter. . . . How cheerily rings his lark-note of poetry among the various voices of the age's song—its eagle screams, its raven croakings, its plaintive nightingale strains! And yet that lark, too, in her lonely nest, had her sorrows, and perhaps her heart had bled in secret all night long. But now the 'morn is up again, the dewy morn,' and the sky is clear, and the wind is still, and the sunshine is bright, and the blue depths seem to sigh for her coming; and uprises she to heaven's gate, as aforetime; and as she soars and sings, she remembers her misery no more—nay, her's seems the chosen voice by which nature would convey the full gladness of her own heart, in that favourite and festal hour. . . .

"But best of all in Hood is that warm humanity which beats in all his writings. His is no ostentatious or systematic philanthropy; it is a mild, cheerful, irrepressible feeling, as innocent and tender as the embrace of a child. It cannot found soup-kitchens; hospitals it is unable to erect, or subscriptions to give; silver and gold it has none; but in the orisons of its genius it never fails to remember the cause of the poor; and if it cannot, any more than the kindred spirit of Burns, make for its country 'some useful plan or book,' it can 'sing a song at least.' Hood's poetry is often a pleading for those who cannot plead for themselves; nor has this advocacy of his been thrown utterly away."

One's recollections recur instantly to that memorable "Song of the Shirt," which on its first publication made all hearts throughout the country thrill with sympathy for the poor forsaken seamstress. This and the "Bridge of Sighs" are doubtless the two best of Hood's grave and pathetic lyrics. Some of Mr. Gilfillan's remarks on both are worthy of quotation:—

"And what," asks he, "is the song which made Hood awake one morning and find himself famous? Its great merit is its truth. The poet sits down beside the poor seamstress, as beside a sister, counts her tears, her stitches, marks the gloomy squalor of her garret chamber, sees, that though in rags and want, she is a woman still; and rising up, swears by Him that liveth for ever and ever, that he will make her wrongs and wretchedness a familiar tale throughout the land. And hark! how to that husky, tuneless voice, trembling under the burden of the heart's sorrow, now shrunk down into whispers of weakness, and anon shrieking up into wailings, and the laughter of despair—all Britain listens—listens for a moment—but no longer! . . . Yet not altogether in vain has it sounded, if it have comforted one lonely heart, if it have bedewed with tears one arid eye, and saved to even one sufferer a pang of a kind which Shakespeare only saw in part, when he spoke of the 'proud man's contumely'—the contumely of a proud, imperious, fashionable, hard-hearted woman—'one who was a woman, but rest her soul, she's dead.'"

Not the least striking or impressive thing in this "Song of the Shirt," is its half-jesting tone, its light but sad facetiousness. Hood knew, that there is a sorrow too deep for tears, and which finds its fittest exponent in the lurid lightness of humour. "So, Hood into the centre of this true tragedy has, with a skilful and sparing hand, dropt a pun or two, a conceit or two"—and these quibbles are precisely the things which are most effective. Think, for instance, of,—

"Sewing at once, with a double thread, A shroud as well as a shirt!"

"The 'Bridge of Sighs,'" says Gilfillan, "breathes a deeper breath of the same spirit. The poet is arrested by a crowd in the street; he pauses, and finds that it is a female suicide whom they have plucked dead from the waters. His heart holds its own coroner's inquest upon her, and the poem is the verdict. Such verdicts are not common in the courts of clay. It sounds like a voice from a loftier climate, like the cry which closes the Faust, 'She is pardoned.' He knows not the cause of her crime; he wishes not to know it. He cannot determine what proportions of guilt, misery, and madness have mingled with her 'mutiny.' He knows only she was miserable, and she is dead, dead, and therefore away to a higher tribunal. He knows only that, whatever her guilt, she never ceased to be a woman, to be a sister, and that death, for him hushing all questions, hiding all faults, has left on her 'only the beautiful.' What can he do? He forgives her in the name of humanity; every heart says Amen, and his verdict, thus repeated and confirmed, may go down to eternity. Here too, as in the 'Song of the Shirt,' the effect is trebled by the outward levity of the strain. Light and gay the masquerade his grieved heart puts on; but its every flower, feather, and fringe shakes in the internal anguish as in a tempest. This one stanza might perpetuate the name of Hood:—

"The bleak wind of March
Made her tremble and shiver,
But not the dark arch,
Nor the black flowing river;
Mad from life's history—
Glad to death's mystery
Swift to be hurld,
Anywhere, anywhere,
Out of the world!"

With a feeling of profound affection for his memory, we must here take leave of this our excellent Jacques Yorick, a man whose like—for geniality, candour, wealth of whim and fancy, noble feeling and compassion—we cannot hope to see again for many days.

These extracts will be sufficient to show the reader what kind of book this is, and what is the sort of entertainment that may be expected from its perusal. We thought it better to quote largely from a few single papers, than to pack together a multitude of unconnected sentences from several. Our extracts will exhibit the author as favourably as any that could be selected. The book, however, contains many other beautiful and striking passages. Not the least interesting article in the volume, is the sketch of Dr. Croly—that sound “literary divine,” of whom the Establishment may well be proud; want of space alone precludes any quotation from it, which we should be otherwise disposed to give. The paper on George Dawson, on the other hand, appears to us excessively unfair. When Mr. Gilfillan undertook to write it, he evidently designed to cook a cockney; and he has certainly done him considerably too brown. We have several times heard Mr. Dawson lecture; and readers that will believe us, shall be assured, that the estimate here given of his abilities and aims is almost altogether false, captious, and unjust. Our greatest quarrel, however, would probably lie with the article on Emerson. Him too, we have heard in this country as a lecturer, and have for several years enjoyed an intimate acquaintance with his writings; and though we can acknowledge Mr. Gilfillan’s pretty accurate view of him as a lecturer, we must, nevertheless, protest against his estimate of Emerson as a thinker and a writer. He appears to have utterly misapprehended the man’s philosophical position, as well as the general purport and tendency of his teaching. Let anybody desirous of knowing Emerson rest nowise satisfied with Mr. Gilfillan’s portrait of him: it is as little like the original, as Emerson in mind and character is like an ordinary yankee, or as Mr. Gilfillan himself is like the “precious Jabesh Rentowel.”

Of the remaining articles in the volume we have no room to speak. All of them are more or less clever, ingenious, and ably written; none of them are free from decided blemishes; but all are worthy of being read—provided the reader is prepared to “keep a sharp look out,” and in reading will also mark, examine, and “inwardly digest.”

THE MEDITERRANEAN SEA.¹

A NOBLE theme for “a poem,” as General Paoli said, or for “twenty poems,” as “Southey or Cowper” thought, this, the Sea “whose shores are empires.” And now, at last, it is taken up, and the Lecture before us, (the first of “ten or twenty,” which Mr. Howson hopes to give,) is the introduction, and not an unworthy one, to the History of the Midland Sea.

(1) “History of the Mediterranean; a Lecture.” By Rev. J. S. Howson, M. A. J. Murray.

The class to which this subject belongs is not an extensive one; but it might be extended almost indefinitely. Across the wide field of human knowledge, not only are broad and well-trodden high-ways of scholarship carried, but many wild sequestered paths, that intersect or run beside those mighty roads, and wind round every classic fountain, and bury themselves in every solemn and sacred grove, and climb every height whence a prospect of variety, or beauty, or terror is to be looked upon, cross it too. And this is one of those by-ways of learning; along which if a scholar, or a poet, or one who is no cold-hearted worshipper of both Muses and Minerva, travel, and tell the world what he has seen in it, straightway it is like the “Pilgrims’ road,” or the “Green-way” that led to the shrine of our Lady of Walsingham, in olden times, crowded with admiring votaries. And apart from all fancies, subjects of this class are possessed of this wholly peculiar interest,—they present familiar things in new lights, and new relations; bring into clearness, so that all can apprehend it, what is rarely studied, and yet more rarely mastered, in knowledge, by means of what seems most trite and common-place; and, better than all this, exhibit what we may term the human aspects of scholar-lore, and win general favour for that which as it is usually set forth before practical men, moves them only to mirth or to indignation. But we must justify what we have said of this theme; and in so doing shall endeavour to commend this Lecture to our readers, and to stimulate their hopes respecting the remainder of the course which it introduces.

The first glimpse we catch of our subject startles us. This Midland Sea, about 760,000 square miles in extent,—little more than the 150th part of the marine surface of our globe—continued to be for, at least, 3,500 years the “Great Sea,” and around it circled, and to it converged, every movement that affected the civilization of our race, from the Call of Abraham, to the doubling of the Cape of Good Hope. It is not yet 400 years since the great oceanic spaces were disclosed, and men began to “look on the Mediterranean as on a picture within a frame.” Mr. Howson says, in reference to this feature, (at p. 16)—

“It is true that a distance of some 2,000 miles separates the Straits of Gibraltar from the coast of Myria; but not more than eighty miles intervene between the south point of Sicily and the northern point of Africa. By reference to this scale the eye will at once inform us of the small spaces which separate Rome from Malta, Constantinople from Athens, Antioch from Jerusalem. The Morea is not much larger than Yorkshire and Lancashire together. Palestine is not half the size of Scotland. We see how appropriate a place this Mediterranean was, for the lessons of early navigation, for testing the results of political experiments, for the first rudiments of sacred truth. This sea was the school of the human race. Here civilized man was detained, till he had learned his Latin and his Greek, and his religion too; his Old and New Testament lessons. I hope we are in no danger of letting this be forgotten. For here in the Mediterranean it was that the Greek and Latin languages, which have ever since been the educators of the highest human intellects, were formed and perfected. These waters carried the ship of Jonah from Joppa, and floated down from Tyre king Hiram's beams of cedar wood. By the sea-side on one of these shores St. Peter prayed; on one of these islands St. Paul was wrecked. Across this sea Ignatius sailed to his martyrdom at Rome: at Hippo, on the Carthaginian shore, Augustine wrote those volumes which have instructed the Christian centuries. That which gives school its dignity is, that it is a little world which prepares for the great world; and that which is the dignity and glory of the Mediterranean, is not that it is a majestic expanse of water covering half the globe, but, that it was ordained to be the school of the human race."

Strange though it is to contemplate this narrow sea, with the tracts of land on its borders, not exceeding itself in extent, this was the cradle and school of human culture and civilization. The wide continent of Asia, with its ancient civilizations in China and India; and all the expanded tracts of land and sea, forming—till Columbus first turned his back on the old world, and, steering boldly into the unknown ocean, discovered another continent, a new world—all the earth for men; and no more to do with this schooling of mankind, than the cities whose ruins proclaim the wealth and civilization of the extinct nations of Central America. And it was not till that schooling was complete, that man was permitted to stray at will in the "great world," for which his former "little world" had prepared him.

But we must rapidly glance at the principal physical features of this "historical sea." Humboldt was the first to point out the fact that it consisted of three distinct "basins," or separate seas, connected by wide straits:—the Eastern basin, or Ægean and Levant, with which, by the Dardanelles, the Propontis, and the Bosphorus, the Black Sea is connected; the Syrtic basin, or Ionian Sea, with its offshoot the Adriatic; and the Tyrrhenian basin, separated from the Ionian Sea by the Island of Sicily, and the African Cape Bon. "This triple construction of the Mediterranean," Humboldt says, "has exercised a great influence on the earliest limitations, and the subsequent extension of Phœnician and Greek voyages of discovery."

He also remarks, that the "configuration of the coast line influenced the course of events, the direction of nautical undertakings, and the changes in the dominion of the sea." And, as Mr. Howson says, (p. 13)—

"There is something very striking in the contrast—a contrast not unnoticed by the ancients—between the southern and the northern shores—between Africa and Europe—between the long, dull monotony of that shore where civilization has seldom flourished, and never flourished but to decay, and the endless variety of form and outline on that other shore, where all the powers and graces of the human intellect have displayed themselves through successive centuries—between the country of the Negro and the Moor, and the countries of Plato and Cicero, of Homer and Dante, of Phidias and Raphael."

Independently of the solid, square, but deeply indented mass of Asia Minor, "we find three peninsulas, the Iberian, the Italian, and the Hellenic," giving diversity to the northern shore; while that promontory which ends in Cape Bon, is the only break to the gentle sweep of the African coast. It will be manifest to any thoughtful reader, that not only the general coast-outline, but the outline of each particular portion of both coasts, is reflected in the history of the people who have occupied it.

The number of islands scattered throughout this sea, is another very remarkable feature; and the distribution of those islands is not less remarkable than their number. The Archipelago of the Ægean stands out most prominently, in this respect. "These waters have been the thoroughfare of nations—these islands the stepping-stones of civilization. Here the East and the West became familiar with each other. Xerxes and Alexander passed this way—and here the 'Man of Macedonia,' appeared to the apostle, and said on the Asiatic shore, 'Come over'—into Europe—'and help us.'" (Hist. Medit. p. 15.) But the other islands have each its story of wonder. And one of the least considerable of them all, Malta, has played no mean part in our most modern history.

We can only hint at some others of its natural characteristics; and we must not be thought impertinently minute, for our author says, and well says, (p. 18)—"The mere natural phenomena of this sea,—its vegetation, its zoology, its climate, its currents, winds, and storms,—acquire a new and dignified interest, when we view them as the conditions of human advancement, and the predestinated agents in the growth of civilization." Mrs. Somerville remarks respecting it in her Physical Geography; "The evaporation is excessive; and on that account the water of the Mediterranean is saltier than that of the ocean." "Although its own river domain is only 250,000 square miles, the constant current that sets in through the Dardanelles brings a great part of the drainage of the Black Sea, so that it is really fed by the melted snow and rivers from the Caucasus, Asia Minor, Abyssinia, the Atlas, and the Alps. Yet the quantity of water that flows into the Mediterranean from the Atlantic, by the central current in the Straits of Gibraltar, exceeds that which goes out by the lateral currents." "A shallow runs from Cape Bon on the African coast, to the Strait of Messina, on each side of which the water is exceedingly deep, and said to be unfathomable in some parts." "This sea is not absolutely without tides, but in most places they are scarcely perceptible. The surface is traversed by various currents, two of which, opposing one another, occasion the celebrated whirlpool of Charybdis, whose terrors were much diminished by the earthquake of 1783. Its bed," finally, "is subject to violent volcanic paroxysms," and there are four active volcanoes situate on its shores. And now we must turn our attention to its history.

Mr. Howson has given a rapid but graphic sketch of the great powers that hold sway on these inland waters; omitting from Dr. Johnson's list Assyria and Persia, glancing merely at the Egyptians and Etrurians, and dwelling on the Phœnicians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Saracens and the Crusaders. We shall give our sketch of its history in another method; that we may be able in our own way to exhibit this sea, as "the school of the human race."

Let us begin with what is too commonly thought to be the only theme of history,—Conquest. It is most wonderful how the march of every army seems to shape itself, so as to make the Mediterranean the centre of its movements. Dismissing all the old mythic stories, we begin with the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites, by which that richly endowed people became possessed of the one spot of earth that would enable them to shed abroad their light on civilized man in every known quarter of the world; and next, after a few minatory movements on the part of Egypt, we see the great Asiatic monarchies in succession sending their floods of warriors to the shores of this charmed sea. Dr. Johnson was right in his enumeration;—an empire might be lost and won at Pasargadæ, Babylon, Circesium, Cunaxa, Arbela, but to or from the "Great Sea," the conquerors had advanced, or were sure to advance, as if it had been a small matter to penetrate to the Indus, or the Oxus, or, driving away the Scythian hordes, to discover the Hyperboreans, the Arimaspians, and the Griffins. Thus we have Shalmanezzer, Tiglath Pileser, Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, invading the countries on the Syrian coast, and possessing themselves of almost all the north-eastern angle of the Levant. Next Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius, Xerxes, dared greater things, and even penetrated by the Ægean islands and by Thrace to Hellas itself. Here for awhile this current from east to west ceased. And now, after many a tentative in colonies in Asia Minor, and expeditions of Agesilaus, Greece broke forth under Alexander the Great, and coasting round the entire eastern basin of the Mediterranean, advanced into the very heart of Asia. Meanwhile, none had heard the thunder of war in Italy; yet there a new people had been proving by the sword that they were genuine rulers; and now, as in Egypt and Syria, and Asia Minor, and Greece, it was ever becoming more plain that a master was wanted, the Romans, partly urged by an invasion of Italy from Greece, crossed the Adriatic, overran Greece, and although they first had to destroy Carthage, and in doing so to enter upon Spain, yet eastward they urged their course, and over all the countries round the Levant—nay, to the banks of Euphrates—they passed in their all-conquering career.

Once more the direction of the stream of conquest changes; a movement amongst the tribes inhabiting the most easterly part of the great Asiatic table-land communicated itself, as by a succession of pulsations, to the whole mass of nomade people that girdled the Roman Empire on the northern and eastern sides. After a struggle of a few centuries,—during which these barbarians swept over almost every country bordering upon our Midland Sea, with the ruthless and desolating effect of a fire in an American forest, or prairie,—we find German tribes from the Baltic in Africa and Spain, and Tartars from the wall of China, in Greece and Italy. The next great wave of war, in like manner, flowed westerly. In the deserts of Arabia, Mohammed rose, and firing with his own enthusiasm the wild tribes around him, and the soft Syrians alike, replaced the petty warfare carried on between the effeminate representatives of the Cæsars and of the Sassanidæ, by a sterner struggle; conquered the Persians, and drove the Greeks out of Asia; then, pouring across the isthmus of Suez, raged along the southern coast of the "Sea of Rome;" overleapt the straits that led into the unknown and pathless ocean, penned up the remnants of the Gothic kingdoms in the Asturian mountains; and threatened an attack on the Byzantine Empire by its western borders. And then Charlemagne and his paladins fought and fell at Roncesvalles; and the flood of Mussulman conquest in western Europe was turned back and kept behind the Pyrenees.

Soon through the pillars of Hercules a new host of warriors came into the field we are contemplating,—the blue-eyed sea-kings, north-men—seeking new lands to spoil. Sicily and Apulia felt their might; men wondered which were fiercest, the children of Islam, or of Odin. Years passed on, and a new spirit kindled the desire for war in the hearts of the chivalry of France. Religious fanaticism, such as had subjected so wide a kingdom to the sway of the Crescent, now went forth to overturn that kingdom "streaming the banner of the Christian cross." Jerusalem, Syria, Egypt, Asia Minor—nay, Christian Constantinople, and then the Moriscoes of Spain, and the Albigenes of the Alps, were the objects of these armed pilgrimages—the Crusades. We cannot linger upon them; for from the steppes of Tartary a new conqueror, new conquerors, arise;—Tamerlane a true "scourge of God;" but one withal, that can build as well as destroy;—the Turks also, who with a less brilliant beginning, effect a more momentous conquest. Tamerlane's victories in Syria and Natolia were not followed up by his successors; but the Turks accomplished what the Mohammedan world had so often attempted in vain; the capture of Constantinople. Greece and Rome both fell in this city; and Italy and France perceived that the woes spared them by the heroism of the Frankish Emperor again were imminent. Yet, not till near the close of the period we are glancing over, was Italy or central Europe visited with Moslem war. And before that, Germany first, and France afterwards, had attempted the seizure of the fair and sunny Ausonian land. We have come to the very end of the centuries during which this sea was the centre of the civilized world; and the last achievement of warlike renown was the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, by the united force of the Catholic monarchs Ferdinand and Isabella. We would fain have lingered at many points of our rapid review of these great events, to show the bearing of these scenes of carnage upon the real advancement of man; but our space forbade; and the remainder of our paper must be a yet more brief and rapid indication of the paths and agencies by which the pupillage of humanity was conducted.

Commerce claims our attention next. The trade of Egypt was chiefly domestic; and it was by caravans that it had intercourse with foreign nations; we begin therefore with Tyre and her sister cities. "Of all that series of potentates who ruled in these waters," says our author, (p. 21)—

"First of the throng, with enterprising brow,
The keen Phœnician steers his shadowy prow!
To him, sole hierarch of the secret main,
Had hoary Neptune shown his ancient reign;
And told of realms, and islands of the blest,
Beyond the fabled pillars of the West.
The Tyrian mother, with her boy, would stand
On the wet margin of the shell-strewn sand, Point his ancestral birthright,—bid him roam
O'er its wide plains, and call its waves his home,
Till Ocean loved him like a foster-child,
And commerce on the bold adventurer smiled,
As oft she saw his daring sail unfurl'd,
To found a Carthage, or explore a world."

We cannot dwell upon this subject; the prophetic denunciation of Ezekiel will supply a more living picture of the wealth and adventurousness of these "princes of the sea" than anything we could say. In the western part of the Mediterranean, Carthage, daughter of Tyre, pursued the same course; and ultimately sank with as disastrous a fall. In the eastern and middle basins the Greeks succeeded Phœnicia in the dominion of the sea. From one to another of those little states, that made up the glorious Hellas, the sceptre passed: staying longest in the hands of Athens, and passing from her only when Alexander had desolated Tyre, and reared another Tyre, in Alexandria, at the western mouth of the Nile. Rome never stood so high in commerce as the earlier sea-rulers; or rather, her trade was insignificant beside her military glory, and that nobler glory which she has won as the lawgiver to the world. But while Greek and Roman barks were busy on the main, overland from the farthest east caravans laden with spices, and silk, and all the treasures of India and Cathay, were coming through Persia, and Natolia, and Arabia, to Smyrna, and Ephesus, and Alexandria; and from the farthest south, they were bringing gold, and ivory, and lions, and strange beasts to swell the pomp of the Circus; and from the cold shores of the Baltic, along a sacred way, pale-faced men travelled with stores of amber, wondering what could make so cheap a commodity so coveted by the luxurious mistress of the world.

The crash of this empire, and all the nameless woes attending its fall, necessarily disturbed the peaceful ways of commerce; and when a new order of things had arisen, Byzantium was the great European port; but soon arose Venice, "Queen of the Adriatic," and Genoa, and Florence, and Marseilles, and Barcelona; who, with a host more, shared the task of spreading throughout Europe the riches of the East. Nor was this order of things greatly disturbed till that "Ligurian man," Christopher Columbus, went out from Genoa, and opened a realm of gold, unknown by European cupidity, to the gaze of Europe; and Vasco de Gama struck out a new road to Ophir and the east. The commerce of the Mediterranean languished then; and other lands, not lying on its shores, became in turns the emporia of trade. It is strange, but most remarkably true, that science which took away commerce from this sea, is now apparently restoring it; and future historians of the Mediterranean may have to tell of restored wealth and empire, greater than ever it possessed before. We have not been able to stay to note the effects of the Crusades on the commerce of Europe; but we cannot leave this part of our subject, without indicating it as one of the most interesting studies in connexion with "the Great Sea."

Not less remarkable amongst the various great matters connected with the Midland Sea is civil liberty. The confederate republics of Phœnicia stand earliest on the list; and next comes the divinely-constituted state, that, through the "hardness of heart" of its people, is best known in history as the rival kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The numerous independent polities of Hellas, studding the shores and uplands of Greece and Asia Minor, and scattered over her islands to far Cyrene, and Sicily, and Hesperia, succeed in order of time. Carthage, with its suffetes, is partly contemporaneous with them, and partly with Rome, the Regifuge, whose "citizens," to the first days of the empire even, showed themselves worthy of freedom; for they could and did rule both themselves and others. Alas! that civil tyranny should also walk, step by step with freedom, around these sacred shores; and that even in the palmiest days of classic liberty, slavery should hold its thousands in thralldom where hundreds only were free. The Italian and Spanish republics of the Middle Ages were the last manifestation of civil liberty by this sea before the end of the fifteenth century.

Next after this subject stands law. Ipsæ dixit. So said Dr. Johnson,—“Almost all our law has come to us from the shores of the Mediterranean.” Strictly, perhaps, all our law, though certainly not all our laws. Chiefest in every respect is that great code, so little obeyed amongst the favoured people to whom it was given “by the disposition of angels,” and so grievously misunderstood amongst us even, who ought, with our clearer light, and loftier privileges, to be able to interpret it aright. In Greece, Lycurgus the mythic legislator of Sparta, Solon the sage, with Cleisthenes and Pericles as his followers and interpreters, at Athens, and Zaleucus the Locrian, are names identified with this portion of our theme. And then Rome, proceeding from her twelve tables, humbly borrowed from Greece, to her codes, and pandects, and novels, which are the basis of all modern jurisprudence. Nor ought Spain to be wholly passed over; for, albeit that she has been blasted by more domestic and foreign woes than would have sufficed utterly to destroy any other nation, she has a rich treasure of law in history, and may yet have sons worthy to unfold it, and to invite her to take her place amongst the teachers of mankind.

Science challenges our attention now. And here we are lost in the blaze of great names that shine on us from every coast. Egypt, with her geometry and astronomy; the Phœnicians, with their mathematical navigation, and the letters, money, and weights which they taught to Europe; the Chaldean lore, and the starry wisdom of the Magians, brought to the common hearth of civilized man by Jew and Gentile, who, as traveller or captive, had passed the Euphrates; Thales and his Ionian school; Aristotle and Archimedes; the brilliant constellations of sages which age after age adorned the museum of Alexandria; Pliny, the martyr of science; the Arabs and the Saracens, who, at both extremities of the Mediterranean, kept alive the sacred fire, that Providence has suffered to pass into their hands, through their wide-sweeping conquests; that citizen of Amalfi, through whom the magnetic needle was introduced to European navigators; and those brave men, too, whom the ignorance of the times stigmatized as necromancers and magicians, and sometimes burnt, because they knew more than others;—"twenty poems," "twenty lectures,"—why, twenty volumes would hardly suffice to tell what has been done for the exaltation of man by those who lived around and journeyed on these blue waters. Yet higher still we must ascend.

The fine arts, poesy—but how can we condense what pertains to these questions? The rude and wondrous architecture, sculpture, and painting of Egypt; the yet more wondrous and beautiful temples, and statues, and pictures of Greece and of Rome; the great works of the Italian masters, who appeared as heralds of the new day that was about to burst upon the world, when its long schooling upon the Mediterranean shores was finished; and above all, the poetry,—Hebrew prophets and psalmists, Grecian and Roman bards, and later in time, the undying glory of the mighty masters of song in Provence and Italy; how can we tell of these things here? William Taylor, of Norwich, in a poem little known, has embodied all we feel in a noble figure, which we give instead of any remarks of our own. Ormuz has dried "the flooded world," and summoned the four spirits of the seas before his "throne of flame," to receive their brides from his "immortal train." To "the giant sovereign of the peaceful main" he gives the hand of "the goddess Pleasure:"—

"The humbler spirit of the Midland Sea
Now bent upon the throne his graceful head.
Fair TASTE approach'd; the youth arose with glee,
Gazed, and with transport seized the laurel'd maid.
In his pure wave she bathed her willing feet,
And round its myrtled brink rear'd many a hallow'd seat.

Soon on the shore she cast a dwelling eye,
Where Inspiration o'er Idumean palms
First learnt to wave her scraph-wing on high;
Thence wander'd statelier to Natolia's realms,
Where, with the lightning of empyreal frame,
Her Homer's tongue she steep'd in unrequited flame.

Slow is her lingering way from Greece, averse,
Till not a winding bay or shaded cape
Remains unwater'd with the dew of verse.
Twice to Hesperia's coast she bent her step;
And saw with rapture o'er its olived height,
The foreworld's crimson eve, the dawn of modern light."

Ormuz next bestows on the Baltic genius, Valour; and on the Atlantic, "his last best gift, dear Liberty!" And with this we must turn to our last subject—

Religion. "All our religion," truly says Dr. Johnson, "came to us from the shores of the Mediterranean." We cannot say anything respecting this great theme. But we may deplore, that not only religion, but tyranny over men's souls in the name of religion, also sprang up here. And in token of the depth of darkness to which this tyranny had sunk men's minds, and how great need there was that a wider field should be opened for man to expatiate in, and thus learn to break the chain with which he was so "darkly wound,"—at the end of the period we are contemplating, a Borgia held the keys and wore the tiara of St. Peter; and in Spain, Ferdinand and Isabella had just set up the horrid office, misnamed "holy,"—the inquisition.

We have said not a word of philosophers, historians, orators, voyagers and adventurers,—hardly a word of the arts of life. Our readers must receive this small hint of what we could not find space to insert, and fill up, as we trust they will, the wide outline we have attempted to sketch of the History of the Mediterranean by their own reading and study, aided, as they can be most effectually, by this lecture of Mr. Howson's, and by those which he has engaged to devote to the same subject.

There is but one thought more that we wish to express now, trusting that we shall have some other opportunity of speaking of this matter more satisfactorily. The transitoriness of human things, and the permanence of the great objects of nature, are forced upon our attention by reflecting on such a subject as this. "It struck me much," says Carlyle, in the Autobiography of Teufelsdröckh, "as I sat by the Kuhlbad, one silent noontide, and watched it flowing, gurgling, to think how this same streamlet had flowed and gurgled, through all changes of weather and of fortune, from beyond the earliest date of history. Yes, probably on the morning when Joshua forded Jordan; even as at the mid-day when Cæsar, doubtless with difficulty, swam the Nile, yet kept his Commentaries dry—this little Kuhlbad, assiduous as Tiber, Eurotas, or Siloa, was murmuring on across the wilderness, as yet unnamed, unseen; here, too, as in the Euphrates and the Ganges, is a vein or veinlet of the grand world-circulation of waters, which, with its atmospheric arteries, has lasted and lasts, simply with the world. Thou fool! Nature alone is antique, and the oldest art a mushroom. That idle crag thou sittest on is six thousand years of age."

"Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee—Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, what are they?
Thy waters wasted them while they were free,
And many a tyrant since; their shores obey
The stranger, slave, or savage; their decay
Has dried up realms to deserts—not so thou,
Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow—
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now."

THE PRISON WORLD OF LONDON.¹

THERE is nowhere such a congregation of life, and nowhere more isolation than in London. It is a wilderness where multitudes throng together from the rising to the setting of the sun, while of the crowds that flow with incessant motion through its streets, each man may be a stranger to the rest; all may be pursuing a different end, urged by a different motive, led by a different hope. Still there are only three attracting and one compelling powers, that form the springs of this vast world of action,—Pleasure, Profit, and Compulsion. Withdraw the influence of these, and the whole flood that circulates through this Babylon of gaiety, commerce, and crime, will be motionless and dull. Yet by what different paths those myriads of feet tread the way to the common goal! Every crowd presents numerous contrasting groups; each face in expression, form, and features, differs from all others; and almost every man's fortune has placed him on a level elevated above, or depressed below that of his neighbour. And as with the medley race, so with the medley city wherein they dwell. There the palace and the hovel, the prison and the church, the mansion and the pauper-lodge, the park thickly thronged and the graveyard still more crowded, are mingled in the panoramic view; as the prince and the pauper, the felon and the well-fed unconvicted, the noble and the beggar, the living man and the mouldering corpse, are thronged in constant confusion in every street of this old city, this monument of many ages, busy, populous, tumultuous London.

We have already, carried forward by the rapid and pleasant flow of Mr. Hepworth Dixon's narrative, traced the wanderings of John Howard in his pilgrim path of charity. With him we have entered the dark abysses where crime in those days was flung to fester in more polluting corruption, where misery found its most congenial haunt, and those prolific parents, Ignorance and Poverty, consigned their countless children to be tortured by the capricious cruelty of vindictive rulers. The same author has now unlocked the gates of the London Prisons, rolled back their heavy portals, and revealed the gloomy world where degraded humanity, in suffering and humiliation, is condemned to expiate a guilt not always its own. An air of mystery and dread breathes around these gaunt and frowning structures, that are reared up at intervals amid the confusion of London's streets; and their very appearance, in many instances, would lead the stranger to believe they were the homes of crime, peopled with felons, and overflowing with vice. Dark, dingy and forbidding, the word Prison seems written on every stone; a penal atmosphere is diffused around, and the lull and silence serve to deepen the impression stamped on every feature of the edifice. But passing the ponderous door and stepping beyond the threshold, we find ourselves within a region as different from the world without, as the Pope's pocket purgatory in the palace of the Holy Inquisition, from the vast and splendid halls of the Vatican; the one, a mausoleum erected to the memory of ancient art, the other a subterranean earthly hell, created by the meek successor of St. Paul for the torture of all who disented from the Romish creed, i.e. incurred the anger or jealousy of the followers of the Humble Twelve.

Into that wide and well-debated field, the theory of crime, we shall not enter. The seed sown, and the tree matured, we gather the fruit; corruption is at work among the poor, and continually ripens into guilt. Detection and trial succeed. The culprit is convicted and condemned. He then passes from society into a new region peopled with a race of criminals; and we now propose in a tour of a day through the London Prisons, to inquire into the description of his abode and the character of his treatment. Mr. Dixon is our guide, and in his company we shall find even a journey through this dismal world of crime, enlivened by the curious records of time gone by. Foremost in the long array, the Tower of London rears its colossal strength. Thirty years have elapsed since a victim crossed its threshold; and probably its doors will never again open to receive the victims, guilty or innocent, of power. But there it stands, the Bastille of London, thronged with traditions of cruelty, foul murders, midnight assassinations, secret tortures, long incarcerations, lonely, lingering deaths, and horrors, the records of which lie buried in deep graves that have never been discovered. There the best blood of England has been spilt; and there has innocence languished in repining misery, prisoned within relentless walls, and guarded by iron-hearted gaolers. Many such tales have come down to us, and are told in our national chronicles. Others there are, of which only the most naked vestiges remain, known in their time to none but the actors in the foul drama, and at last for ever lost to the investigation of mankind. The Tower is now only the repertory of old archives, of the spoils of war, cannon, flags, and armour, "trophied for triumphal show," as the monuments of victory by flood and field, the store for warlike provisions, and the casket for the crown jewels. Even to these there clings a story of romance, and a dark hint is thrown out by our author, that "there have been strange doings in that jewel room, since the time of Colonel Blood. All that sparkles is not diamond. It is said, there is a curious story to be told one day thereupon, of which the public as yet knows nothing."

The builders of the Tower, when they mixed blood with the mortar used in the construction of its walls and dungeons, left a prophetic fact to be recorded by the Monk of Canterbury, for the epithet of the Bloody Tower, still attached to one portion of the edifice, clings in imagination to every wall, dungeon, chamber, tower and archway, from that dark low tunnel through which so many of England's best men and fairest women have trodden the way to death, to that dismal structure where the unhappy victim of Queen Mary pined in the last hours of her life, and where she has left the simple record of her captivity graven on the wall thus:—

Our author visits every part of the Tower, describes it, and tells its story, preserving in the pages of his admirable work many curious chronicles of solitary suffering, copied from the walls whereon they were written by the captive's hand. The dungeon is painted first, then we are led back through history, which shows us the cell peopled in succession by each of its miserable inmates, and our author recalls of each some anecdote, some curious incident, some characteristic trait, which contributes to the deep interest of the volume. From the scenes of their suffering we pass to their common bed of rest, in the low, melancholy, sombre church of St. Peter ad Vincula.

"In it are laid the ashes of some of the many victims of the headsman—martyrs and heroes, spotless women and unscrupulous statesmen, generals of armies and leaders of senates. Here for a time lay the headless trunk of the wise and witty Chancellor of England, Sir Thomas More, until the prayers of his devoted daughter, Margaret, succeeded in melting even the callous heart of the tyrant king."

Then succeeds a list of the principal victims buried in this sepulchre of the murdered, and last among them are the three leaders of the Scottish rebellion, a hundred and five years ago. "A stone marked with three circles and a line drawn through them—significant emblem—indicates their grave." After this list of the dead, we have a chronological enumeration of what are quaintly called "the chiefest" of the names connected with the gloomy records of the Tower, from Ralph Flambard, the valiant and mitred hero of Durham in 1100, to the unfortunate Mr. Thistlewood and his companions in 1820. All these details connected with the Tower are full of interest, but they belong now to antiquity, and we leave them to enter the precincts of the prisons peopled in our own days by the criminals of our own generation.

The Queen's Bench possesses an anomalous character. All debtors are not criminals, but many are, and that of a deep stamp; yet no distinction is drawn between the treatment of the unfortunate and the reckless, which is a difficulty hard to be got over. Still, it should not for this reason be neglected, for it is of serious moment, and many of our readers would doubtless feel their humanity shocked by the revelations of oppression exercised by creditors, governors, magistrates, and jailors. Few are aware of the numbers at this moment pining in country prisons, who have been punished for light offences and ordered to find bail to a heavy amount, as security to keep the peace. Their fault has been visited by a slight penalty; but their poverty has subjected them to years of captivity and cruelty, which sits easily on the slumbers of certain rural dispensers of justice.

"Who has not heard," says Mr. Hepworth Dixon—we trust with no sympathetic enthusiasm—"of Queen's Bench Prison? Who, that has come to years of discretion, and inherited that 'right of man,' the privilege of going to gaol for his own debts, has not more than heard of it? Is there a lounge in Pall-mall, a saunterer in Regent-street, who has not had a friend there at one time or another? Has not every one known men prefer it to Rome, Baden-Baden, or Vienna? In fact, where is the statesman, poet, artist, wit, politician, or philosopher, who has not paid a visit to its secluded courts—taken momentary shelter from the storms of life within its peaceful haven—and gathered there new strength to contend against a wasteful world? Queen's Bench! Why, the very words sound like an oracle, and stir the depths of memory as a dream."

Mr. Dixon luxuriates in his, we hope imaginary, memories of Queen's Bench. But as to preferring it to Rome, Baden-Baden, or Vienna, that is a question of taste; and a voluntary journey through the Vatican, not insisting on dull visits to dull German towns, would seem more full of pleasant recollections than a compulsory sojourn in the dreary Queen's Bench. To us, indeed, the prison possesses so little of interest, that we are not tempted to linger with its traditions, curious as they are, but pass to the Hulks, and thence to Millbank Prison, the largest penal establishment in Great Britain. Its area extends over sixteen acres, and around it rises a lofty wall of octagonal shape, enclosing six pentagonal buildings, and entered by a single gateway, fronting the Thames. The whole place has a dull, penal aspect, and many of the cells are horrid dens, full of terror for the criminal, who lies amid their darkness, sullen, scowling, cursing his gaolers, and the society which has consigned him to their equivocal mercies. A vast congregation of the convicted assemble in this model haunt—(the corridors in which the cells are situate are upwards of three miles in length)—but its occupation is temporary, since the prisoners only collect here as in a dépôt, before they are transported to other conservatories of crime, or to those much-loved children of old England, who appear to undervalue the blessed privilege of cherishing the mother's guilt in their young bosoms.

Millbank was erected on a swamp, and half a million of money was expended in its construction, so that it forms a costly, if not a pleasant lodging-house for 1500 convicts. The spectacle presented by this population of criminals is to the last degree painful and repulsive; on the face of each is painted the guilt which has soiled his mind, and many have the satanic villany of the heart written visibly in every feature. The condemned cells of Newgate, with the hideous countenances of the murderers staring through their gratings, alone present a sight of equal atrophy, and it is remarkable, that there is a species of family likeness in the guilty race.

"No person can be long in the habit of seeing masses of criminals together, without being struck with the sameness of their appearance. Ugliness has some intimate connexion with crime. No doubt the excitement, the danger, the alternate penalties and excesses attached to the life of the criminal, make him ugly. A handsome face is a thing rarely seen in a prison; and never in a person who has been a law-breaker from childhood."

Descending about twenty steps from the ground-floor, we find ourselves in a gloomy passage opening into a dark corridor, along which, on one side, the cells—small, unlighted, repulsive dens—are arranged. The sun never throws one ray into these infernal dungeons, and in them the refractory criminals expiate their turbulence by a solitary sojourn of three days, with a bare allowance of bread and water. To these places might be applied the lines formerly written on Coldbath-fields, when the black father of evil, emerging from the warmth of his nether abode, took a lonely walk through London:

“As he went through Coldbath-fields, he saw
A solitary cell;
And the devil was pleased, for it gave him a hint
For improving his prison in hell.”

When Mr. Hepworth Dixon visited these monuments of civilized humanity, there was a man confined in one of these cells.

“He is touched, poor fellow! in his intellect,” said the Warden. His madness was of a mild sort. He loved fraternity, and wished to be friendly with his companions in captivity. He sang hymns, and dubbed himself governor. These were serious crimes; but the consummation of them was so infamous, that the despots of the gaol felt themselves bound to inflict the slow torture of a damp, dark, dull, and dirty cell beneath the earth, upon the unhappy culprit. He was sufficiently audacious to believe in a truth always most repulsive to persons in authority—and often very dangerous in its propagation—that all mankind are brethren,—common heirs of one inheritance—and not only cherished, but gave utterance to this sentiment. Drag him to the dungeon, forthwith, for he is a horrid wretch—a formidable lunatic.

“They said he pretended to be mad, which, seeing that his vagaries subjected him to continual punishment, was very likely! They put him into darkness to enlighten his understanding; and alone, to teach him how unbrotherly men are. Poor wretch! He was frightened with his solitude, and howled fearfully. I shall never forget his wail as we passed the door of his horrid dungeon. The tones were quite unearthly, and caused an involuntary shudder. On hearing foot-steps, he evidently thought they were coming to release him. While we remained in the corridor, he did not cease to shout and implore most lamentably for pardon; when he heard us retreating, his voice rose into a yell; and when the fall of the heavy bolts told him that we were gone, he gave a shriek of horror, agony, and despair, which rang through the pentagon, and can never be forgotten. God grant that I may never hear such sounds again.

“On coming again, after three or four months’ absence, to this part of the prison, the inquiry naturally arose, ‘What has become of the man who pretended to be mad?’ The answer was, ‘Oh, he went mad, and was sent off to Bedlam!’”

Let this pass without comment. But the recollection occurs that in this country we are called humane, civilized,—patterns for the world. We are models, and Nicholas might copy us, to improve on his mild practices.

From the dull dungeons of Millbank we pass to Pentonville, a museum where fine specimens of crime are preserved in hot air, to be admired by the privileged sight-seers of the metropolis. We all of us respect costly things, and this model building having cost 180*l.* for the accommodation of each prisoner, and about fifty for his yearly maintenance, it deserves our deep admiration. It is formed of five wings or galleries, radiating from a centre; and along the sides of four of these, five hundred and twenty cells are arranged. Entering one of these, we commence a mental contrast between the parlour of many comfortable bachelors and the dormitory of the convicted. Roomy, warm, well-ventilated, with plenty of hot and cold water, clean, good bedding, a bell-handle, excellent attendance, dainty food, and all other conveniences, the chamber presents a tempting appearance; yet many criminals fear it next to the gallows. The inmates are of the choicest sort: the most moral, the most healthy, the most orderly, and the most intellectual of all the convicted multitude are selected to adorn it, and do credit to its system of training. Traversing the galleries, the visitor must be struck by the dead silence reigning in every part. No sound, no motion, disturbs the calm of the Model Prison. The criminal sits in his cell, bending over his easy task, melancholy, downcast and subdued. That looks well; but when the observer recollects the probability that the man’s senses may be rapidly evaporating, and leaving him an idiot, the ideas receive an unpleasant direction.

Under Mr. Dixon’s guidance, we now transport ourselves to a rich landscape in the Isle of Wight, where three objects arrest attention. The one is a palace, with its appropriate companion a prison, and the third is the old place of confinement, where a certain great villain was once immured. Our author calls him unfortunate, and rightly. The most atrocious wretch, deep-dyed in blood, that ever walked from the dark condemned cell of Newgate through the debtor’s door to the fatal structure without, was unfortunate, in the same sense of the word. Parkhurst is a handsome building, commanding an elegant prospect, and so inviting in its interior arrangements, as to induce several sanctifying visits from the pretty scabode in its neighbourhood. Consequently, its inmates possess an intimate knowledge, by sight, of the most admired respectabilities. A full description of the place would lead us through a labyrinth of intricate details; but one passage from our author’s account may serve to illustrate the system pursued. Asmodeus would have lifted this roof for his companion’s instruction, and then exposed the dingy, dull, and miserable allotment of the pauper.

“The Parkhurst boy has more hours at school and chapel, than in the workshop and the farm. To get an idea of what is taught in all these hours of study, let us now go into the schoolroom. You find yourself in a large apartment, with galleries at each side, and a black screen drawn across the end. As you enter, a strange strong smell assaults the nasal organ. You sniff, and ask if the rooms are ever cleaned, and if no preparation has been made for the visits of the cholera? Lift the corner of the screen, and as you lift it there is a flash of light, the room is filled with smoke in an instant, and the galleries ring with loud applause. You may well wonder where you are. In a moment or two the smoke and noise subside, and you find yourself in the midst of a lecture on chemistry, illustrated by experiments, such as may be seen any day at the Polytechnic Institution. There stands the lecturer, in the midst of his retorts, his batteries, his receivers. His lecture is on the properties of the simple gases; and very brilliant effects he is able to produce; and much satisfaction he appears to give to his juvenile auditors. They like it much better than working in the field or at the forge. * * * * Is the Home Secretary aware of the introduction of these amusements into Parkhurst?"

Many of the pupils here exhibited apt qualities, and some were witty. They most of them knew all about locks, bolts, bars, screws, wedges and planes, and one clever young man, of a small size, was a grim humorist. When required to explain the principle of the lever he produced a crowbar, and the audience tittered with approbation. Many of them had probably studied the effects of the instrument on a door or window, and knew precisely the power required to force a hinge.

We have introduced Parkhurst as Mr. Dixon has, without apology, among the London Prisons; and now once more return within the circle of the metropolis, to visit grim, notorious Newgate, with its black frowning walls, its ominous portal decked with chains, its dreary cells and its felon population. The atmosphere of death is about this place, and the imagination at once reverts to those dull Monday mornings, when the white-faced criminals are brought out to die in the sight of men, compelled to leave their cells, conducted with pinioned arms along dark passages, and led or forced out upon the scaffold in the open air, before a multitude of fellow-creatures, to hang and swing for murder.

Newgate was a prison as early as the reign of King John, but has been more than once rebuilt. In its cells have languished many good men, as well as countless criminals. Prisoners of all degrees of virtue and vice have been immured in its dark dungeons. The Puritans, those magnificent and noble men, and the most hideous murderers of modern times, have lain in its damp dens; from Leighton, who was tortured with cruelties more fearful than those of the Inquisition, to Greenacre whose punishment was mercy in comparison to his crime.

"Up the narrow steps, into the turnkey's room, and along a darkish passage, we came into a small open court, surrounded by high walls, between which a scanty supply of air and light finds its way downward as into a well. Facing us stands a massive building, chary of windows, and those strongly grated; it is the women's wing of the prison. . . . As soon as the ponderous locks are turned, and the heavy bars removed, we enter the doorway, and ascend the stone staircase. Suites of chambers branch off on either side; these are occupied by the prisoners who are awaiting trial."

These are herded together in most civilized confusion—the young girl without a crime on her head, with the woman who retains not even the memory of shame—until the day of trial, when the innocent are turned forth upon the world polluted by the contact of crime, and the guilty are consigned to their punishment.

"Those sentenced capitally, are taken at once from the court to the condemned cells,—not to leave them again, except for chapel, till the last moment. The condemned cells are built in the oldest part of the prison—at the back. There are fifteen of them in all; five on each of the three floors. The port-holes in Newgate-street let light into the galleries into which the cell doors open; and the man confined in the farthest dungeon on the ground floor, is within a yard of the passer-by. All the death cells are vaulted, and about nine feet high, nine deep, and six broad. High up in each cell is a small window, doubly grated. The doors are four inches thick. The strong stone wall is lined; and altogether these cells present to the eye of the offender an overwhelming appearance of strength. Escape from them was never known."

One of the yards was the scene of a famous escape, that of the Sweep. Around it run walls of lofty height, and composed of rough masonry. The prisoner was with a number of companions in the court, and proposed escape. They ridiculed the notion; but would not give the alarm. The adventurous sweep required no other aid. Placing his back in the angle of the wall, he exercised the ingenuity of his craft in working up his hands and feet, and clinging to the rugged stones, until the giddy height was gained. Hence he carefully crept along the wall, reached a roof, fled over the house-tops, entered at an open window, rushed down stairs, almost frightened a woman to death, passed through the shop, and thence into the street, unnoticed. When his escape was discovered, many would not believe in the mode of it, until a sailor visiting the prison, treated the officials to an exact copy of his feat. Then those dull-witted gentlemen were convinced, crediting their own eyes, when the affirmation of vulgar witnesses carried no weight. The sweep was recaptured.

But it will not do for us to attempt following Mr. Dixon through his interesting descriptions of all the London Prisons. Of each he paints a graphic picture, revealing things of which people in general possess, we venture to say, little idea; telling stories, anecdotes, and traditions, describing the different systems, their characters and their results, reviewing the various classes of criminals, and exposing evils which are a shame to our civilization, a blot on our humanity, and a satire on our national pride. Heaven knows there is enough to excite our self-contempt. All arts, sciences, and professions degraded; thousands of the population miserable; enormous abuses in all departments of public affairs; hideous confusion at home; atrocious mismanagement in the colonies; and besides all these, a patchwork system of prison discipline, in which the good portions only serve to bring out the contrast of the bad, and which, as a whole, is the most wretched, bungling, faulty, inconsistent, ineffectual system that the mind can conceive. Mr. Dixon has painted an elaborate picture, and whoever views it must be persuaded of the truth of what we say. The self-contempt, therefore, which is generated by a consideration of our social economy, is in no way soothed by a glance at the prison-world of London. But our author does not severely criticise some places without commending others, and the Mark system meets with his approbation. Its principle consists in the substitution of labour for time sentences.

The House of Detention in Clerkenwell, a sink of abomination, situated in the very heart of the lowest London district; Coldbath-fields, with its vast criminal population, its excellent arrangements, and its still more excellent governor; Tothill-fields, "a huge and costly blunder," with its graceful exterior and its singular absurdities; Giltspur-street Compter, with its moral and physical filth, and Bridewell, with its quaint and incongruous system, are visited and described. We quote an anecdote from the many with which Mr. Hepworth Dixon has enlivened his curious and valuable work.

"Madam Cresswell, a woman of infamous character, but frequently referred to by the dissolute poets of the time of (the still more dissolute) Charles II., died here. In her will she left ten pounds to the person who should preach her funeral sermon, on condition that he said nothing but what was well of her. A man was found willing to earn the money; after a sermon, therefore, on the general subject of death, he concluded—'By the will of the deceased, it is expected that I should mention her, and say nothing but what was well of her. All that I shall say of her is this,—she was born well, she lived well, and she died well; for she was born with the name of Cresswell, she lived in Clerkenwell, and she died in Bridewell.'"

One of the foulest places in London is Whitecross-street Prison. To all who desire a description of a miserable den, a dirty, close, confined, unsavoury hole, we recommend Mr. Dixon's book, which then ranges over many of the provincial prisons,—after an account of the horrid gaol in Horse-monger-lane, where a modified species of torture is still in practice, where some of the prisoners loll and lounge about "like crocodiles, with their hands in their pockets;" where others pick oakum in degrading communion with felons, others riot in crowds, shouting, laughing, singing, and telling low tales; others sit in solitary confinement, (these, for trespasses on property, most heinous of all crimes;) others lie loaded with manacles in horrid dungeons, with bread and water for their food and darkness for their companion. The cells for the women are unnaturally crammed, and in each is a plank about fifteen inches wide fastened in the wall, with a blanket spread over it. This is the only couch provided for two or three unhappy women, and if no good demon be ready to shrink them to a proper attenuation, "they are compelled to spread their thin bedding on the floor, and sleep upon the hard cold stones." By all means give us credit for mercy.

At Preston Gaol there is a regular system of exercise, and the prisoners, probably at Lord Mountcashel's suggestion, are trotted up and down to keep them in health, whether they like it or not. It must be a curious sight to see them running in gangs, (driven by whips or what?) and considerably edifying besides. The Duke of Argyll should go to see; he knows they don't trot dogs in Scotland, and, therefore, cannot say what he thinks on the subject, but he may now learn that they do trot men at Preston besides teaching them to read. One man, indeed, could read fluently, and went through the marriage in Cana with more facility than Captain Chamier can write a romance; but being asked what was the meaning of marriage, he stared blankly and replied, "They did no' tell me ony o' the meanings." This man was indicated in the report as able "to read well." Had Mr. Dixon, by way of enlightening him, said that Cana meant the House of Lords, and marriage meant nonsense, he would have turned up the whites of his eyes and blessed him for the information. So much for the march of intellect in English gaols.

But we outrun our space, and must lay down Mr. Hepworth Dixon's work, recommending it to our readers' notice. It treats of an important subject, a subject now of great and growing interest, a subject which will shortly be discussed by all classes, but which none should enter upon, unless thoroughly acquainted with the details, the facts, the truths of the question. These are to be found in the volume before us. It is full of value, replete with interest, and displays that ability of writing, that clearness of judgment, and that reach of knowledge, for which Mr. Dixon has already acquired a name. The narrative of John Howard's Life was among the most admirable biographies that have appeared for many years, and the "London Prisons" will enhance the reputation our author established by his first book. Its intrinsic value is great, and its merit in a literary point of view is only equalled by the curious nature of the contents. Those who read it, will be introduced into a world at once strange and mysterious, and will be made aware of things wholly hidden from the observation of the general public.

CONVERSION OF THE DIAMOND INTO COKE.

In a note addressed to the Mining Journal, Mr. John Murray observes, that the discovery of the conversion of the diamond into coke having recently been assigned to Dr. Faraday, he, Mr. Murray, claims the priority, and quotes in proof his "Memoir on the Diamond," Second Edition, 1839, p. 83: "I embedded a fragment of diamond in a nidus of hydrate of magnesia, and having submitted it to the intense flame of the oxy-hydrogen blow-pipe, the diamond parted suddenly into minute fragments, displaying on their surfaces, as determined by the lens, the conchoidal fracture, and became as black as jet."

EPITAPH OF THE EMPRESS MATILDA.

The Empress Matilda was the daughter of Henry I. of England; the wife of Henry IV. of Germany; and the mother of Henry II. of England.

Ortu magna; viro major; sed maxima prole;
Hic jacet Henrici filia, sponsa, parens.

(Imitated.)

Mighty by birth, by spousals mightier;
But mightiest in her offspring: stranger, lo!
The daughter, wife, and—(peace be unto her)—
The mother of a Henry sleeps below.

FRANCIS JEFFREY.

FRANCIS JEFFREY, the prince of critics, has descended to the grave full of years and of honours. This is an event which cannot be permitted to pass in silence, nor be recorded without a tribute of respect by any member of the periodical press, however high or however humble. We had nearly added, without also an expression of regret; but when we recall to mind the happy, the honoured, and the long life which has just terminated after a very brief illness, we find regret occupying but a small portion of our feelings, which are chiefly engaged by thankfulness that he has been spared so long to us and to himself, to public usefulness and domestic felicity;—thankfulness that talents so worthy to be admired, a character so worthy of respect, and qualities so worthy to be loved, have found in this world even a reward and a happiness much greater than are usually allotted to man. Lord Jeffrey was on the bench as a judge of the Court of Session on Tuesday, the 22d of January; on Saturday evening, the 26th, he breathed his last at his house in Moray Place, Edinburgh. Inflammation of the air vessels leading to the lungs, termed bronchitis, was the cause of his death.

Francis Jeffrey was born in Charles Street, Edinburgh, in 1772, and thus was in his 78th year. His father, George Jeffrey, was Depute-Clerk in the Supreme Court, a situation of respectability and of comfortable emolument. The young Francis had thus every advantage, with reference to his education, which money could afford, without the temptation to idleness and dissipation which the prospect of great wealth supplies. He was placed in the most favourable position, and endowed with happy and prudent dispositions of mind which led him to turn his advantages to the very best account. From an early age he fixed his aim on the highest honours of the law, and he held to this aim with a perseverance which, with talents even of a moderate class, accompanied by prudence, rarely fails of its object, but which with him was the certain guarantee of success. And when he made literature the handmaid of his ambition, he probably did not dream that to it he should owe a fame extensive as the Saxon world and the English language, and far more enduring than the name of a judge, however highly he may have adorned the crmine.

Mr. Jeffrey, throughout his whole course, may be pointed out to the youthful aspirant as an example. He owed the high rank which he attained in the world of intellect to cultivation—to assiduous cultivation—of the good talents with which nature had gifted him; and therefore he may be pointed out as a fit model for imitation, with a fair hope that such emulation would not be in vain. It would be in vain, indeed, to tell the young to imitate Scott, or Campbell, or Byron, or others who, urged on by the fire of genius, have reached the pinnacle of fame. Jeffrey attained to greater usefulness, and to perhaps equal fame, by the employment of a refined taste, a sound judgment, and superior intellectual endowments. He was not what we usually understand by a man of genius.

In the history of such a man it becomes of more than usual consequence to trace the progress of his education, since upon the bent given to his mind by that, more than usual must have depended. At about the age of ten he was sent to the High School of Edinburgh; after three years' attendance in the junior Latin classes, he was sent to the senior, or Rector's class, then under the charge of Dr. Alexander Adam, whose name is of some celebrity in the annals of education. Dr. Adam was undoubtedly a learned man, as his works, which are still used, bear witness; and although professedly Latin and Greek were the chief branches taught in the High School, it was the usage to diverge largely into subjects of general knowledge, particularly geography and history; and under these heads, it may easily be seen, a very wide range of kindred matters may be included. Dr. Adam had to boast, and loudly he did boast, it is said, of many highly distinguished men as pupils. Among these were Sir Walter Scott, Francis Horner, and, we believe, Lord Brougham. Horner published an affectionate tribute to his memory, on his death in 1809, when he was succeeded by Professor Pillans.

Dr. Adam was accused of republicanism by the high Tories of his day; and another accusation, probably jocular, was brought against him, of partiality to the sons of influential parents; and a poor lad in his class, it is said, once construed the city motto thus burlesquely:—"Nisi, unless, Dominus, the son of a lord or a laird, frustra, it is in vain to come here!"

Of young Jeffrey's achievements at school we have not heard. In 1788, when he was sixteen years of age, he was entered a student of the University of Glasgow; and to the worth of those teachers under whom he studied there, he took, in after life, a graceful opportunity of bearing a high and eloquent testimony; a portion of which we shall present to our readers, with the double motive of affording a specimen of Mr. Jeffrey's manner in such matters, and of aiding, as much as in us lies, the object that he had then in view, of preserving the memory of men whose services, if not brilliant, were of high importance to their country, and who belong to a class too frequently overlooked in the awards of fame. In his Inaugural Address, as Lord Rector of Glasgow College, in 1821, after alluding to the great metaphysician, Dr. Thomas Reid as, when Mr. Jeffrey entered college, "then verging indeed to his decline, but still in full possession of his powerful understanding; and, though retired from the regular business of teaching, still superintending with interest the labours of his ingenious successors, and hallowing with the sanctity of his venerable age, and the primitive simplicity of his character, the scene over which his genius has thrown so imperishable a lustre,"—he goes on to speak of John Millar, the Professor of Law, who made an impression upon the youthful minds of his time which exercised much influence on the future history of the country. "Another potent spirit was then, though, alas ! for too short a time, in the height and vigour of his strong and undaunted understanding—I mean the late Mr. Millar, whom it has always appeared to me to be peculiarly the duty of those who had the happiness of knowing him, to remember and commemorate on all fit occasions; because, unlike the great philosopher to whom I have just alluded, no adequate memorial of his extraordinary talents is to be found in those works by which his name must be chiefly known to posterity. In them there is, indeed, embodied a part—though not the best or most striking part—of his singular sagacity, extensive learning, and liberal and penetrating judgment. But they reveal nothing of that magical vivacity which made the charm of his conversation and his lectures—of that frankness and fearlessness which led him to engage, without preparation, in every fair contention, and neither to dread nor disdain the powers of any opponent;—and still less, perhaps, of that remarkable and unique talent by which he was enabled to clothe, in concise and familiar expressions, the most profound and original views of the most complicated questions, and thus to render the knowledge which he communicated so manageable and unostentatious as to turn out his pupils from the sequestered retreats of a college in a condition immediately to apply their acquisitions to the business and affairs of the world.”

Mr. Millar, it is well remembered, did not confine himself to the mere technicalities of law. He took a wider range, and inculcated doctrines on constitutional subjects which led many of his pupils to become members of the whig party. Of John Young, professor of Greek, he says :—

“I need not say that I have been alluding to the late Mr. Young, a man whose whole heart was to the last in the arduous and honourable task to which his days were devoted,—and who added to the great stores of learning, the quick sagacity and discriminating taste by which he was distinguished, an unextinguishable ardour and genuine enthusiasm for the studies in which he was engaged, that made the acquisition of knowledge, and the communication of it, equally a delight,—and who with habits and attainments that seemed only compatible with the character of a recluse scholar, combined, not merely the most social and friendly dispositions, but such a prompt, lively and generous admiration of every species of excellence as made his whole life one scene of enjoyment, and gave to the moral lessons which it daily held out to his friends and disciples, a value not inferior to that of his more formal instructions.” He then turned with animation to the venerable Professor Jardine, who sat by his side, and continued :—“I have permitted myself to say this much of the dead. Of the living, however unwillingly, I believe I should now forbear to say any thing. Yet I cannot forbear congratulating myself, and all this assembly, that I still see beside me one surviving instructor of my early youth,—the most revered, the most justly valued of all my instructors; the individual of whom I must be allowed to say here, what I have never omitted to say in every other place, that it is to him, and his most judicious instructions, that I owe my taste for letters, and any literary distinction I may since have been enabled to maintain.”

Having remained three sessions at the University of Glasgow, too short a time to take any degree, which for the profession he had in view was not deemed in Scotland of any importance, Mr. Jeffrey proceeded to Oxford. Here we do not learn that he did much, although we may well suppose that he was not quite idle. One thing we know, that in a fruitless attempt to acquire the English pronunciation, he entirely got rid of his Scotch, and ever after spoke in a fashion altogether peculiar to himself, and which certainly formed no addition to the many merits of his oratory. On this subject, many anecdotes still float about the Edinburgh Parliament-house. On one occasion he alluded to his client as an “itinerant violinist,” in a mincing manner. “A what?” said an old-fashioned judge who presided; “Ou, my lord,” explained John Clerk, (afterwards Lord Eldin,) the opposing counsel, and who spoke broad Scotch, “Mr. Jamphrey just means a blin’ fiddler.”

Mr. Jeffrey remained only a year at Oxford, and returning to his native city, passed at the bar, and assumed his gown as an advocate, in 1794, being then only twenty-two years of age.

So youthful a counsellor was not likely at once to obtain much business. We can only judge by the results that he did not misspend his leisure time.

On the 1st of November 1801, he married Catharine, daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Wilson, professor of Church History in the University of St. Andrews. We may reasonably suppose that so prudent a man would not have taken this step, had he been entirely briefless; and in the course of the following year was commenced the Edinburgh Review, which, while it materially changed Francis Jeffrey’s fortunes, effected at the same time a revolution in periodical criticism, and forms an era in the history of literature. Of the origin of this celebrated publication, the Reverend Sydney Smith, who first started the idea, and who was long one of the brightest stars whose light irradiated its pages, gives us a very amusing and no doubt essentially a true account.

With regard to the altitude of Mr. Jeffrey’s habitation, he has indulged in a playful exaggeration. The house, or rather part of a house where Mr. Jeffrey lived, has often been pointed out to us; and Buccleugh Place may be described as an open and well aired street in the immediate neighbourhood of George’s Square, where the father of Walter Scott lived. Let us hear the facetious divine :—

“When I first went into the church, I had a curacy in the middle of Salisbury Plain. The squire of the parish took a fancy to me, and requested me to go with his son to reside at the University of Weimar; before we could get there, Germany became the seat of war, and in stress of politics we put into Edinburgh, where I remained five years. The principles of the French Revolution were then fully afloat, and it is impossible to conceive a more violent and agitated state of society. Among the first persons with whom I became acquainted, were Lord Jeffrey, Lord Murray, late Lord Advocate for Scotland, and Lord Brougham, all of them maintaining opinions upon political subjects a little too liberal for the dynasty of Dundas, then exercising supreme power over the northern division of the island.

“One day we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story or flat in Buccleugh Place, the elevated residence of the then Mr. Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a review; this was acceded to with acclamation, I was appointed editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the Edinburgh Review. The motto I proposed for the review was—

'Tenui musam meditamur avena.'

We cultivate literature upon a little oatmeal.'

But this was too near the truth to be admitted, and so we took our present grave motto from Publius Cyrus, of whom none of us had, I am sure, ever read a single line; and so began what has since turned out to be a very important and able journal. When I left Edinburgh, it fell into the stronger hands of Lord Jeffrey and Lord Brougham, and reached the highest point of popularity and success. I contributed from England many articles which I have been foolish enough to collect and publish with some other tracts written by me.

"To appreciate the value of the Edinburgh Review," continues Mr. Smith, "the state of England at the period when that journal began should be had in remembrance. The Catholics were not emancipated—the Corporation and Test Acts were unrepealed—the Game-laws were horribly oppressive—steel traps and spring guns were set all over the country—prisoners tried for their lives could have no counsel—Lord Eldon and the Court of Chancery pressed heavily upon mankind—libel was punished by the most cruel and vindictive imprisonments—the principles of political economy were little understood—the law of debt and of conspiracy were upon the worst possible footing—the enormous wickedness of the slave trade was tolerated—a thousand evils were in existence which the talents of good and able men have since lessened or removed; and these effects have been not a little assisted by the honest boldness of the Edinburgh Review."

"From the beginning of the century, about which time the review began, to the death of Lord Liverpool, was an awful period for those who had the misfortune to entertain liberal opinions, and who were too honest to sell them for the ermine of the judge, or the lawn of the prelate;—a long and hopeless career in your profession, the chuckling grin of noodles, the sarcastic leer of the genuine political rogue—prebendaries, deans, and bishops made over your head, reverend renegades advanced to the highest dignities of the Church, for helping to rivet the fetters of Catholic and Protestant dissenters, and no more chance of a whig administration, than of a thaw in Zembla—these were the penalties exacted for liberality of opinion at that period; and not only was there no pay, but there were many stripes. It is always considered as a piece of impertinence in England, if a man of less than two or three thousand a-year has any opinions at all upon important subjects; and in addition he was sure, at that time, to be assailed with all the Billingsgate of the French Revolution—Jacobin, Leveller, Atheist, Deist, Socinian, Incendiary, Regicide, were the gentlest appellations used; and the man who breathed a syllable against the senseless bigotry of the two Georges, or hinted at the abominable tyranny and persecution exercised upon Catholic Ireland, was shunned as unfit for the relations of social life. Not a murmur against any abuse was permitted. . . . Lord Grey had not then taken off the bearing rein from the English people."

Mr. Smith expresses exultation in the part he had played as a reviewer, no regret for the worldly advancement he had probably forfeited, no remorse for his merciless onslaughts upon unfortunate blockheads; he republishes his bitterest articles with infinite glee, and certainly, with, perhaps, the exception of Lord Brougham, he was the most satirical of the party. Lord Jeffrey, on the other hand, although at times sufficiently pungent, was on the whole more gentle "in spiriting," than either of his two friends we have mentioned, and yet he seems in his maturer years sometimes to have had his misgivings lest he should have inflicted needless pain. He collected such of his Reviews as he wished should be remembered, and published them in four volumes in 1840. In the preface to this work he gives his account of the origin of the Review in a more sedate manner, and, what is particularly interesting, states the views and feelings by which he was actuated in his conduct with respect to that celebrated publication. In the dedication to Mr. Smith, he distinctly gives that gentleman the honour of the parentage, but says nothing about the eighth or ninth flat in Buccleugh Place. The two remind us of the story of Dr. Johnson's teasing Garrick by telling in companies where venison and wine abounded, that he had come first to London with only seven pence in his pocket. "Oh, Doctor!" Garrick would say, "you exaggerate, you were not so badly off as that." "That I was, Davy, and you, I remember, had only three-half-pence."

The first number of the Review was published in November, 1802. Jeffrey had been just one year married, was thirty years of age, and may be supposed to have begun to view the business of life with a serious aspect. These are his confession and vindication, if they may be so called, in his own elegant language:—

"The Edinburgh Review, it is well known, aimed high from the beginning; and, refusing to confine itself to the humble task of pronouncing on the mere literary merits of the work that came before it, professed to go deeply into the principles on which its judgments were to be rested, as well as to take large and original views of all the important questions to which those works might relate. And on the whole, I think it is now pretty generally admitted that it attained the end it aimed at. Many errors there were of course, and some considerable blunders, abundance of indiscretions, especially in the earlier numbers, and far too many excesses, both of party zeal, overweening confidence, and intemperate blame. But with all these drawbacks, I think it must be allowed to have substantially succeeded in familiarizing the public mind—that is, the minds of very many individuals—with higher speculations, and sounder and larger views of the great objects of human pursuit, than ever before had been brought as effectually home to their apprehensions; and also in permanently raising the standard, and increasing the influence of all such occasional writings; not only in this country, but over the greater part of Europe and the free states of America; while it proportionally enlarged the capacity, and improved the relish of the growing multitudes to whom such writings were addressed, for the 'stronger meats' which were then first provided for their digestion.

"With these convictions and impressions, it will not, I think, be expected that I should look back from any station, upon the part I took in originating and conducting such a work, without some mixture of agreeable feelings. And while I seek not to decline my full share of the faults and follies to which I have alluded, I trust I may be allowed to take credit, at the same time, for some participation of the merits, by which these were to a certain extent, at least, atoned for."

(1) Preface to the Works of the Rev. Sydney Smith, 3 vols. 8vo. 1839.

(1) Preface to Contributions, p. 9.

His own particular claims to consideration in reference to the Review he thus states with justifiable pride:

"If I might be permitted further to state in what particular department, and generally, on account of what, I should most wish to claim a share of those merits, I should certainly say, that it was by having constantly endeavoured to combine ethical precepts with literary criticism, and earnestly sought to impress my readers with a sense both of the close connexion between sound intellectual attainments and the higher elements of duty and enjoyment, and of the just and ultimate subordination of the former to the latter. The praise, in short, to which I aspire, and to merit which I am conscious that my efforts were most constantly directed, is, that I have more uniformly and earnestly than any preceding critic, made the moral tendencies of the works under consideration a leading subject of discussion, and neglected no opportunity, in reviews of poems and novels, as well as of graver productions, of elucidating the true constituents of human happiness and virtue; and combating those besetting prejudices and errors of opinion which appear so often to withhold men from the path of their duty, or to array them in foolish and fatal hostility to each other."¹

Scattered through the correspondence of the eminent men of those days, to be found in Horner's Life of his brother Francis, Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, and Beattie's Life of Thomas Campbell, are to be found numerous interesting notices of the history and progress of the Review. Smith, and Brougham, and Horner, and Allan, were the most active of Jeffrey's troop of friends, and he had frequent, although not regular contributions from a very wide circle of highly distinguished men. Walter Scott contributed to some of the early numbers, but his tory feelings being offended, or his conservative fears awakened, he withdrew his support, and was the chief promoter of the establishment of The Quarterly Review, the success of which, so far from being an injury, was undoubtedly a service to the rival Journal. They put each other to their mettle like two well-matched coursers; they kept each other in check from the abuse of power, and the literary world and the public were in every respect gainers. But the loss of Scott, giant as he was, was hardly felt where Hallam, and Playfair, and Brown, and Campbell, and Mackintosh, and Brewster, and Chalmers, and Malthus, and hosts besides were proud to be enlisted under the "blue and yellow banner."

The Review now went swimmingly on, and as steadily, but with less observation, did Mr. Jeffrey continue to rise in his profession. It was soon discovered that literature had not caused him to neglect law; he carefully studied every cause committed to his advocacy, and in cases where he had an opportunity of addressing a jury, he soon had few equals, and ere the end of his practice at the bar, no superior. He must by this time have begun to grow rich, for we find him about 1815 purchasing the villa and grounds of Craigcrook, about three miles from Edinburgh, on Queensferry Road. This villa he fitted up in a style of the most refined taste, and in its grounds he amused himself with the idea of being a capital farmer, or at least a proficient in gardening. A change, too, had taken place in his family. The first Mrs. Jeffrey died without leaving any children; and in 1813, having seen, on her visiting Scotland, a young American lady, named Wilkes, he loved, wooed and won; and, not deterred by the fear of death or captivity, he made his way to the United States, during the heat of the war, and bore off his fair bride through hostile fleets in safety to her future home. This lady still survives. The fruit of their union was an only child, a daughter, in whose education the father took much delight. She is married now to Mr. Empsom, a professor at the East India Company's College at Haybury, and who also succeeded Mr. Macvey Napier, as editor of the Edinburgh Review. Rising in fame and in wealth, and possessed of domestic happiness, Mr. Jeffrey's lot was now a felicitous one. Little turmoils he undoubtedly now and then had about the Review. Exasperated authors endeavoured to avenge themselves, some with leaden, some with paper missiles. The poet Moore discharged a pistol, fortunately unloaded, at the offending head of the critic, at Chalkfarm, and Lord Byron sent forth in the heat of his wrath "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," in which, for fear he should miss his foe, he abused with right good will all who had, or were supposed to have, any connexion with the Review. These squabbles, and several others of the same kind, ended in making the contending parties friends.

As a counsel in criminal trials, Mr. Jeffrey stood pre-eminent. One of the first occasions of this kind on which he distinguished himself, was on the trial of a servant girl in Perthshire, accused of murder by poisoning. The ingenuity he used in cross-examining the witnesses, and his eloquent address to the jury, succeeded in raising a doubt where all had previously seemed clear, and saved the prisoner's life. Those of the public who could hardly appreciate his eloquence, were astonished at his fluency—his volubility, for which he became quite proverbial. To a plain man, nothing appears more surprising than the power of talking continuously, on, on, without stop or stammer, for three or four hours, and that in any thing but a tedious manner, and probably, too, on some apparently common-place subject, upon which he would have become tedious in five minutes. We remember an incident connected with this. A respectable Glasgow merchant, and self-appointed preacher, had in his controversial zeal published matter which the Roman Catholic priest deemed libellous. An action was brought. Jeffrey was the priest's counsel, and a verdict was given against the merchant-preacher. But the latter was not a man to sit down quietly under a defeat. He reviewed the judgment in a pamphlet, and among other matters, amused his readers by stating that, with the aid of Johnson's dictionary, he had calculated that Mr. Jeffrey had, in the course of a few hours, spoken the whole English language twice over.

On another occasion, it was said, that at a contested election for Lanarkshire, when it was desirable for his party to gain time, Mr. Jeffrey rose to speak to a point of law, and continued his harangue until a man galloped on horseback to Edinburgh, a distance of more than thirty miles, to bring up a stray elector, upon whose vote the contest of the day turned. The writer of this remembers well the first time he heard Jeffrey speak, when he bribed with his school-boy pocket money a good-natured sentinel, on guard at the Glasgow gaol, to admit him into the court-house. Mr. Jeffrey was then, as afterwards, and we believe is still, an object of the highest admiration and of emulation among the young. A friend of ours, now an ambitious and talented aspirant at the English bar, tells that he used to have a fear that Jeffrey should die ere he could visit Edinburgh; and that when at length the course of his University terms permitted him to visit that city, he hurried to look at the celebrated man's house. He had no introduction, and was too young and modest to introduce himself, but he next waited for hours at the Parliament-house, until Lord Jeffrey took his seat on the bench.

During the twenty-six years that he continued the Editor of the Review, there is hardly any subject in polite learning that he did not touch upon, and touching, did not adorn. Hardly an eminent name in literature occurs which is not found in the list of his reviewed. He was thought by some to be unnecessarily severe on female writers. But the candid reader will probably admit that he dispensed to them equal justice; he wished them to stand upon their merits, not upon the privileges of their sex; and freely expressed blame where he thought it was deserved, that he might dispense praise when due without the suspicion of flattery. Female writers had before been treated either with silence, with contemptuous sneers, or with fulsome adulation. He treated them as rational creatures, amenable like the stronger sex to censure, as well as entitled to praise; and they have risen accordingly both in their own estimation and in that of those whose good opinion is worth the having.

He was supposed also to have been a judge without mercy on what was termed "the Lake school" of poetry, and to have been particularly unjust to Wordsworth. In the volumes already alluded to, he reprints his criticisms on Wordsworth, avowing that he would now use gentler terms, but declaring his judgment to be unaltered. The merits of Wordsworth are still disputed among the readers of poetry; and were we called upon to give an opinion, we confess our agreement in general with Jeffrey; we do not find in the beautiful passages which here and there occur in Wordsworth, any sufficient compensation for the weary wandering through mist which we have to undertake in order to get at them. But a still more frequent source of embarrassment to the sensitive mind of our rigid critic, arose from the necessity of reviewing the works of some of his intimate friends, men whom he esteemed and admired. Had he shrunk from expressing his opinions, he might have been held to have abandoned his critical sceptre, to have been guilty of moral cowardice. Those who look back to his reviews of the works of Scott, Campbell, and other friends, will find that he acquitted himself of his delicate task with equal judgment, skill, and good feeling. The authors themselves, perhaps, and their more enthusiastic admirers, might think him too niggardly of his praise, and liberal of his censure; but to have shrunk from pointing out faults which clouded so many beauties also displayed, would have rendered his praise and blame equally insignificant.

At the period of time when his activity was at the greatest point, and his reputation in full bloom, we are furnished with a minute account of Mr. Jeffrey's personal appearance, and a criticism on his talents and character by one who had every opportunity of judging and a high power of description. In 1818 and 1819, there appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, edited by John Wilson, and supported by the Tories very much as a balance against the influence of the Whig Review, a curious series of papers, purporting to be a Review of "Letters to his Kinsfolk," by Peter Morris, M.D. in which the society in Edinburgh, and indeed, of Scotland generally, was critically dissected. The public were mystified for some time; for no such book was found to be in existence. After the review, however, came the book, in three very curious volumes; and it was soon pretty generally known that the author was Mr. John Gibson Lockhart, since Editor of the Quarterly Review, and one of the most elegant critics and authors of the day. In these letters of Dr. Morris, Francis Jeffrey occupies a conspicuous place; and as the book is not now very generally known, we shall gladly avail ourselves of some of Dr. Morris's very graphic, but, perhaps, highly wrought descriptions:—

"He was within when I called, and in a second I found myself in the presence of this bugbear of authors. He received me very kindly, (although, from the appearance of his room, he seemed to be immersed in occupation,) and asked so many questions, and said and looked so much in so short a time, that I had some difficulty in collecting my inquisitorial powers to examine the person of the man. I know not how, there is a kind of atmosphere of activity about him; and my eyes caught so much of the prevailing spirit, that they darted for some minutes from object to object, and refused, for the first time, to settle themselves even upon the features of a man of genius, to them, of all human things, the most potent attractions. . . .

"It is a face which any man would pass without observation in a crowd, because it is small and swarthy, and entirely devoid of lofty or commanding outlines; and besides, his stature is so low, that he might walk close under your chin or mine without ever catching the eye even for a moment. However, he is scarcely shorter than Campbell; and some inches taller than Tom John Moore, or the late Monk Lewis. . . .

"I have heard many persons say, that the first sight of Mr. Jeffrey disappointed them, and jarred with all the ideas they had previously formed of his genius and character. Perhaps the very first glance of this celebrated person produced something of the same effect upon my own mind; but a minute or two of contemplation sufficed to restore me to the whole of my faith in physiognomy. . . . Mr. Jeffrey, then, as I have said, is a very short and very active looking man, with an appearance of extraordinary vivacity in all his motions and gestures. His face is one which cannot be understood at a single look; perhaps it requires, as it certainly invites, a long and anxious scrutiny before it lays itself open to the gazer. The features are neither handsome, nor even very defined in their outlines; and yet the effect of the whole is as striking as any arrangement either of more noble, or more marked features, which ever came under my view. The forehead is very singularly shaped, describing in its bend from side to side a larger segment of a circle than is at all common; compressed below the temples almost as much as Sterne's; and throwing out sinews above the eyes, of an extremely bold and compact structure. The hair is very black and wiry, standing in ragged bristly clumps out from the upper part of his head, but lying close and firm lower down, especially about the ears. Altogether it is picturesque, and adds to the effect of the visage. The mouth is the most expressive part of his face, as I believe it is of every face. The lips are very firm, but they tremble and vibrate, even when brought close together, in such a way as to give the idea of an intense never-ceasing play of mind. There is a delicate kind of sneer almost always upon them, which has not the least appearance of ill-temper about it, but seems to belong entirely to the speculative understanding of the man. I have said that the mouth is the most expressive part of his face; and in one sense, this is the truth, for it is certainly the seat of all its rapid and transitory expression. But what speaking things are his eyes! They disdain to be agitated with those lesser emotions which pass over the lips; they reserve their fierce and dark energies for matters of more moment; once kindled with the heat of any passion, how they beam, flash upon flash! The scintillation of a star is not more fervid. Perhaps, notwithstanding of this, their repose is still more worthy of attention. With the capacity of emitting such a flood of radiance, they seem to take a pleasure in banishing every ray from their black, inscrutable, glazed, tarn-like circles. I think their prevailing language is, after all, rather a melancholy than a merry one; it is, at least very full of reflection. Such is a faint outline of this countenance, the features of which, to say nothing at all of their expression, have as yet baffled every attempt of the portrait painters. . . . A sharp, and at the same time a very deep-toned voice, a very bad pronunciation, but accompanied with very little of the Scotch accent; a light and careless manner, exchanged now and then for an infinite variety of more earnest expression and address; this is as much as I could carry away from my first visit to the 'wee reeket deil,' as the Inferno of Altesidora has happily called him."

Dr. Morris then gives an account of a visit to Craigerook, where he met with Professors Playfair and Leslie. He admires Mrs. Jeffrey, and her "interesting little girl," and he admires also Mr. Jeffrey's wit and clumpagne.

The following is his account of Jeffrey's powers of conversation:—

"The whole tone of Mr. Jeffrey's own conversation, indeed, was so pitched, that a proser, or a person at all ambitious, in the green-room phrase, to make an effect, would undoubtedly have found himself most grievously out of place. Amidst all this absence of preparation, however, I have never I believe heard so many ideas thrown out by any man in so short a space of time, and apparently with such entire negation of exertion. His conversation acted upon me like the first delightful hour after taking opium. The thoughts he scattered so readily about him, (his words, rapid, and wonderfully rapid as they are, appearing to be continually panting after his conceptions,) his thoughts, I say, were at once so striking and so just, that they took in succession entire possession of my imagination; and yet with so felicitous a tact did he forbear from expressing any one of these too fully, that the reason was always kept in a pleasing kind of excitement, by the endeavour more thoroughly to examine their bearings. It is quite impossible to listen to him for a moment, without recalling all the best qualities of his composition. And I suspect his conversation is calculated to leave one with even a higher idea of his mind, at least of its fertility, than the best of his writings. I have heard some men display more profoundness of reflection, and others a much greater command of the conversational picturesque, but I never before witnessed any thing to be compared with the blending together of apparently little consistent powers in the whole strain of his discourse. Such a power, in the first place, of throwing away at once every useless part of the idea to be discussed, and then such a happy redundancy of imagination to present the essential and reserved part in its every possible relation and point of view—and all this connected with so much of the plain 'savoir faire' of actual existence, and such a thorough scorn of mystification, it is really a wonderful intellectual coalition. The largeness of the views suggested by his speculative understanding, and the shrewdness with which his sound and close judgment seems to scrutinise them, after they are suggested; these alone would be sufficient to make his conversation one of the most remarkable things in the world. But then he invests all this groundwork with such a play of fancy, wit, sarcasm, persiflage, every thing in that way except humour; which again, were they united in any person entirely devoid either of the depth or the justness of Jeffrey's intellect, would unquestionably render that person one of the most fascinating of all possible companions. The Stagyrte who places his summum bonum in having one's faculties kept at work, would certainly have thought himself in Elysium, had he been so fortunate as to discuss a flask of Chian in company with Mr. Jeffrey.

"The mere animal spirits of the man are absolutely miraculous. When one considers what a life of exertion he has led for the last twenty years; how his powers have been kept on the rack such a length of time, with writing and concocting, and editing reviews on the one hand, and briefs, and speeches, and journeys, and trials, and cross-questionings on the other, one cannot help being quite thunder-struck on finding that he has still reserved such a large fund of energy which he can afford and delight to lavish, when even the comparative repose of his mind would be more than enough to please and satisfy every one. This vigour seems to be a perfect widow's cruise, bubbling for ever upwards, and refusing to be exhausted, swelling and spreading till all the vessels of the neighbourhood are saturated and more than saturated with the endless unwaried irrigation of its superfluous riches."—Vol. i. p. 78.

Of his oratory at the bar, Dr. Morris speaks.—

"I have told you in a former letter, that his pronunciation is wretched—it is a mixture of provincial English with undignified Scotch, altogether muffled and offensive, and which would be sufficient to render the elocution of a mere ordinary man quite disgusting; but the flow of his eloquence is so overpoweringly rapid, so unweariedly energetic, so entirely unlike every other man's mode of speaking, that the pronunciation of the particular words is quite lost to one's view, in the midst of that continual effort which is required, in order to make the understanding, even the ear of the listener keep pace with the glowing velocity of the declamation. His words come more profusely than words ever came before, and yet it seems as if they were quite unable to follow, passibus equis, the still more amazing speed of his thought. You sit, while minute follows minute uncounted and unheeded, in a state of painful excitement as if you were in a room over-lighted with gas, or close under the crash of a whole pealing orchestra. This astonishing fluency and vivacity, if possessed by a person of very inferior talents, might for a little be sufficient to create an illusion in his favour; and I have heard that such things have been. But the more you can overcome the effect of Mr. Jeffrey's dazzling rapidity, and concentrate your attention on the ideas embodied with such supernatural facility, the greater will be your admiration. It is impossible to conceive the existence of a more fertile, teeming intellect. The flood of his illustration seems to be at all times rioting up to the very brim, yet he commands and restrains it with equal strength and skill; or, if it does boil over for a moment, it spreads such a richness all around, that it is impossible to find fault with its extravagance. Surely never was such a luxuriant 'copiu fundi' united with so much terseness of thought and brilliancy of imagination, and managed with so much unconscious, almost instinctive ease. If he is not the most delightful, he is certainly by far the most wonderful of speakers."—Vol. ii. p. 59.

Mr. Jeffrey's popularity in the west of Scotland resulted in his being, in 1821, elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow. This election at that time attracted much attention in Scotland. It was almost the only free election then in that country; the representatives of Scotland in parliament, in those days, being appointed by a curious process which future antiquarian historians will have much difficulty in describing, and their readers as much difficulty in believing. The Rector of Glasgow University was elected by the open votes of all its members, professors as well as students; and as the voice of the latter may be supposed in a great degree to express the wishes and opinions of their fathers and friends, the contests which often ensued, excited much interest.

Jeffrey was much gratified with the honour. He might be described as being vain; and the frankness with which he expressed his pleasure, did him honour. Like his friend Campbell a few years later, he seemed to grow young again among the students. If there was vanity, there was no affectation about it; and it was delightful to see him, as he often was to be seen, moving about the courts with some hundreds of youths in their red gowns around him, waving their caps and hurraing for the popular rector. He commenced his installation address in these words:—

"On an occasion where Burke is reported to have faltered, and Adam Smith to have remained silent, it may probably be thought that I should have best consulted both my fame and my comfort if I had followed the latter example."

There was no fear of his following any such example. On such an occasion it was impossible for Jeffrey to be silent; and as for faltering there or any where else, that was out of the question.

The following passage, so warmly bearing testimony to the good he had derived from his education at that university, from one who said, that at Oxford there was little to be got but port and prejudice, deserves a place; but of Oxford of the present time he would have cause to speak with more respect, if not with entire approbation:—

"It was here that, now more than thirty years ago, I received the earliest and by far the most valuable part of my academical education, and first imbibed that zeal and veneration for letters which has cheered and directed the whole course of my after life,—and to which, amidst all the distractions of rather too busy an existence, I have never failed to return with fresh and unabated enjoyment."

Mr. Jeffrey was elected to the office, as usual, for a second year, and in order to commemorate his rectorship founded a gold medal as a prize of merit.

His successor was Sir James Macintosh, and his election placed Mr. Jeffrey in a very peculiar predicament. The votes were equally divided between Sir James Macintosh and Sir Walter Scott, and by the laws of the university, the casting vote devolved upon Mr. Jeffrey. Both parties were men of high literary name, and both his intimate personal friends. Had the retiring rector liked to go to work in a straight forward manner, the matter was easy; but he did not like to confess that he was bound up to decide on party principles; yet such was the case. Those who had elected himself and proposed Macintosh, were whigs. The election was held to be a whig triumph, and Jeffrey could not on any account hand the office over to the tories. His course was plain enough; he had only to say, Sir James is a whig, Sir Walter is a tory; therefore I vote for Sir James. But let us hear what our ingenious (not ingenuous on this occasion) critic and orator did say. The passage is "a curiosity of literature," and we commend it to the notice of some future D'Israeli:—

"Between two such candidates, it might well have been thought difficult to choose; and if the result of our decision had been supposed to depend on any comparative estimate of their general merits, I should certainly have felt the task of selection to be one of infinitely greater difficulty and delicacy, than that which we have actually had to discharge. Sir Walter Scott, in point of inventive genius, of discrimination of character, of reach of fancy, of mastery over the passions and feelings of his readers, is undoubtedly superior, not only to his distinguished competitor in this day's election, but probably to any other name in the whole range of our recent or ancient literature; and to these great gifts and talents I know that he adds a social and generous disposition, which endears him to all who have access to his person, and has led him to make those splendid qualities subservient to the general diffusion of kind and elevated sentiments. By this happy use of these rare endowments, he has deservedly attained to a height of popularity, and an extent of fame, to which there is no parallel in our remembrance, and to which, as individuals, we must each of us contribute our share of willing and grateful admiration. But what I wish to impress upon you is, that those high qualities are rather titles to general glory than to academic honours; and being derived far more from the prodigality of nature, than the successful pursuits of study, have their appropriate reward rather in popular renown, than in the suffrages of societies dedicated and set apart for the encouragement of learning and science. The world at large is Sir Walter Scott's University, in which he studies, and in which he teaches; and every individual who reads, is a concurrent suffragan for the honours he has earned from the public. We, however, are not met to-day as a portion of that public; or to express as individuals what we owe to its benefactors. We are met as members of a learned body, a society consecrated to the cultivation of the severer studies in which the perseverance of the young should be stimulated by the honours which they help to confer on those who have made the greatest advances; and acting in this capacity, and with a due sense of the ends of the institution in which we are united, we ought, it rather seems to me, on an occasion like this, to take care that we are not too much dazzled with the blaze of that broader and more extended fame which fills the world beyond us.

"Now, it appears to me, that, in all the attainments which are to be honoured in a seat of learning, Sir James Mackintosh is as clearly superior to his competitor as he is inferior, perhaps, in the qualities that entitle him to popular renown. In profound and exact scholarship—in learning, properly so called, in all its variety and extent—in familiarity with all the branches of philosophy—in historical research—in legislative skill, wisdom, and caution—in senatorial eloquence, and in all the amenities of private life and character—I know no man, taking all these qualifications together, not merely to be preferred, but to be compared with him whom we have this day agreed to honour and invite among us. And considering him as a great example of the utility and the beauty of those attainments which we are here incorporated to cultivate and exalt, I cannot but feel that we have done right in giving him the preference, upon this occasion, over that other distinguished person to whom he has this day been opposed."

It may be remarked, that Mr. Jeffrey takes it for granted that Scott is the author of "Waverley,"—a secret not at that time divulged. On any other supposition, his eulogium on Sir Walter would be extravagant.

One good turn deserves another. Sir James, on his installation, thus spoke of Mr. Jeffrey:—

"He is a man, at least, as much beloved as he is admired by his readers and his hearers. He is as much the darling of those societies of which he is an individual member, as he is almost a solitary instance of a long and brilliant literary reputation, joined to a professional career of equal length and brilliancy."

In the year 1829, Mr. Jeffrey was elected Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, an office which, although not entailing much labour, is so nearly approximated to the judicial in dignity, that he now thought it respectful to his brethren who had raised him to it, to give up the editorship of the Review. He occasionally, but not frequently, contributed to it afterwards. His last paper, he tells us, was written from regard to the memory of his friend Mackintosh, whose "Life," by his son, he reviewed in the number for October, 1840.

The accession of the whigs to power in 1830, changed altogether the current of his life. He was made Lord Advocate, and returned for the Forfar district of Burghs to the House of Commons. He made his first speech in Parliament in support of Lord John Russell's Reform Bill, on the 4th of March, 1831. From any other man than himself the speech would have been held a good one; but it was impossible that he could reach the point of expectation. Mackintosh said it was the best first appearance any man of fifty-five years of age had ever made. In reality, Mr. Jeffrey was fifty-nine. From Jeffrey it was deemed a failure. Mr. Croker, a writer in the "Quarterly," and long a hackneyed, yet ornate debater, replied in terms that savoured more of pertness than of wit or eloquence. He was, indeed, no match for Jeffrey in any thing deserving Jeffrey's powers. The Lord Advocate's official duties, now of great importance and numerous, he discharged with general satisfaction, until he was raised to the bench in 1834. He had lost his seat for the Forfar Burghs, on account of informality, upon which he was returned by Earl Fitzwilliam for the nomination burgh of Melton. On the passing of the Reform Bill, his fellow-citizens honoured him and themselves by electing him the first representative, freely chosen, of Edinburgh.

Lord Jeffrey's conduct on the bench during the sixteen years he was a judge, was much praised. There were fears that he might not turn out a profound judge, nor, perhaps, a very diligent one. Those who knew him best argued otherwise; and they were right. He has been pointed out as eminent, even on a judicial seat, where all are pure, and where the finger of blame cannot be pointed to any one. We have often seen him on the judgment-seat. He had, to our eyes, a restless appearance, constantly rising, and pacing up and down, and interrupting any puny speaker, who was probably inflicting upon him some thrice-told tale. He was a general favourite, however, and the highest confidence was placed in his decisions. The last time we saw him was at the exhibition of paintings in the Royal Institution, Edinburgh. He had then passed his seventieth year, but looked hale and hearty. His sister¹ and one of his nieces leaned on his arm, and he conversed animatedly with them, and with Professor Wilson, whose large and tall figure afforded a striking contrast to his.

We have already mentioned that in 1840 Mr. Jeffrey republished, in four volumes, such of his essays as he desired to be judged by. We know few volumes which the reader may take up at any time with a greater certainty of being pleased and instructed. Taking them at random, he can hardly fail of lighting on passages worth being remembered. Acting on this principle, we give, as specimens,—we can hardly say, we select,—a few detached passages.

In the following passage is given a beautiful illustration of the progress, or, perhaps, we should say the changes of poetic style, depending on the progress or changes of society:—

"Conversant as poetry necessarily is with all that touches human feelings, concerns, and occupations, its character must have been impressed by every change in the moral and political condition of society, and must even retain the lighter traces of their successive follies, amusements, and pursuits; while, in the course of ages, the very multiplication and increasing business of the people have forced it through a progress not wholly dissimilar to that which the same causes have produced on the agriculture and landscape of the country,—where, at first, we had rude and dreary wastes, thinly sprinkled with sunny spots of simple cultivation—then, vast forests and chases, stretching far around feudal castles and pinnacled abbeys,—then, woodland hamlets, and goodly mansions, and gorgeous gardens, and parks, rich with waste fertility, and lax habitations,—and, finally, crowded cities, and roadside villas, and brick-walled gardens, and turnip-fields, and canals, and artificial ruins, and ornamental farms, and cottages trellised over with exotic plants."¹

After some pleasant remarks on the abundance of good modern poetry,—on the improbability, should it continue to increase, of readers being found,—and on the oblivion which awaits its greater portion, the reviewer says:—

"The thought, we own, is a little appalling; and we confess we see nothing better to imagine, than that they may find a comfortable place in some new collection of specimens—the centenary of the present publication. There, if the future editor have any thing like the indulgence and veneration for antiquity of his predecessor, there shall 'posterity still hang with rapture on the half of Campbell, and the fourth part of Byron, and the sixth of Scott, and the scattered tythes of Crabbe, and the three per cent. of Southey, while some good-natured critic shall sit in our mouldering chair, and more than half prefer them to those by whom they have been superseded.'"²

The following comprehensive and well-written remarks on liberty and abuse of power, occur in a review of Madame de Staël:—

"The abuse of power, and the abuse of the means of enjoyment, are the great sources of misery and depravity in our advanced stage of society. Both originate with those who stand in the highest stages of human fortune; and the cure is to be found, in both cases, only in the enlightened opinion of those who stand a little lower.

"Liberty, it will not be disputed, is still more clearly dependent on intelligence than morality itself. When the governors are ignorant, they are naturally tyrannical. Force is the obvious resource of those who are incapable of convincing; and the more unworthy any one is of the power with which he is invested, the more rigorously will he exercise that power. But it is in the intelligence of the people themselves that the chief bulwarks of their freedom will be found to exist, and all the principles of political amelioration to originate. This is true, however, as Madame de Staël observes, only of what she terms 'la haute littérature;' or the general cultivation of philosophy, eloquence, history, and those other departments of learning which refer chiefly to the heart and the understanding, and depend upon a knowledge of human nature, and an attentive study of all that contributes to its actual enjoyments. What is merely for delight, again, and addresses itself exclusively to the imagination, has neither so noble a genealogy, nor half so illustrious a progeny. Poetry, and works of gaiety and amusement, together with music, and the sister arts of painting and sculpture, have a much slighter connexion either with virtue or with freedom. Though among their most graceful ornaments, they may yet flourish under tyrants, and be relished in the midst of the greatest and most debasing corruption of manners. It is a fine and a just remark, too, of Madame de Staël, that the pursuits which minister to mere delight, and give to life its charm and voluptuousness, generally produce a great indifference about dying. They supersede and displace all the stronger passions and affections, by which alone we are bound very closely to existence; and, while they habituate the mind to transitory and passive impressions, seem naturally connected with those images of indolence, and intoxication, and slumber, to which the idea of death is so readily assimilated in characters of this description. When life, in short, is considered as nothing more than an amusement, its termination is contemplated with far less emotion, and its course, upon the whole, is overshadowed with deeper clouds of ennui, than when it is presented as a scene of high duties and honourable labours, and holds out to us, at every turn, not the perishable pastimes of the passing hour, but the fixed and distant objects of those serious and lofty aims which connect us with a long futurity."—Vol. i. p. 84, 85.

Our next extract shall be in a different strain. Mr. Jeffrey himself professed to be of the Episcopal persuasion; but he imagines himself to be a Presbyterian, as a sound Edinburgh Reviewer ought to be. It is from a review of Bishop Heber's "Travels;" and his aim is to contrast what that amiable and excellent prelate was with what Presbyterians in general suppose bishops to be. One would imagine he had taken a leaf from the book of his colleague, Sydney Smith:—

"The notion entertained of a bishop in our anti-episcopal latitudes is likely enough, we admit, not to be altogether just; and we are far from upholding it as correct, when we say, that a bishop, among us, is generally supposed to be a stately and pompous person, clothed in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day,—somewhat obsequious to persons in power, and somewhat haughty and imperative to those who are beneath him,—with more authority in his tone and manner than solidity in his learning, and yet with much more learning than charity or humility,—very fond of being called 'my lord,' and driving about in a coach with mitres on the panels, but little addicted to visiting the sick and fatherless, or earning for himself the blessing of those who are ready to perish,—

'Familiar with a round

Of ladyships,—a stranger to the poor;'

"Decorous in manners, but no foe to luxurious indulgences; rigid in maintaining discipline among his immediate dependants, and in exacting the homage due to his dignity from the undignified mob of his brethren; but perfectly willing to leave them the undivided privileges of teaching, and of comforting their people, and of soothing the sins and sorrows of their erring flock; scornful, if not openly hostile upon all occasions to the claims of the people, from whom he is generally sprung, and presuming everything in favour of the royal will and prerogative by which he has been exalted—setting, indeed, in all cases, a much higher value on the privileges of the few, than the rights that are common to all, and exerting himself strenuously that the former may ever prevail; caring more, accordingly, for the interests of his order than the general good of the church, and far more for the church than for the religion it was established to teach—hating dissenters still more bitterly than infidels; but combating both rather with obloquy and invocation of civil penalties than with the artillery of a powerful reason, or the reconciling influences of an humble and holy life, uttering now and then haughty professions of humility, and regularly bewailing, at fit seasons, the severity of those Episcopal labours, which sadden and even threaten to abridge a life which to all other eyes, appears to flow on in almost unbroken leisure and continued indulgence."—Vol. iv. p. 294.³

Alluding to German stuffing and cooking vulgarities, he writes:—

"But there is yet another distinguishing quality for which we have not accounted; and that is, a peculiar kind of vulgarity which pervades all their varieties, and constitutes perhaps their most repulsive characteristic. We do not know very well how to describe this unfortunate peculiarity, except by saying that it is the vulgarity of pacific, comfortable burghers occupied with stuffing, cooking, and providing for their coarse personal accommodation. There certainly never were any men of genius who condescended to attend so minutely to the non-naturals of their heroes and heroines as the novelists of modern Germany. Their works smell, as it were, of groceries—of brown papers filled with greasy cakes and slices of bacon,—and fryings in frowsy back parlours. All the interesting recollections of childhood turn on remembered tid-bits and plunderings of savoury store-rooms. In the midst of their most passionate scenes, there is always a serious and affectionate notice of the substantial pleasures of eating and drinking. The raptures of a tête à tête are not complete without a bottle of nice wine and a 'trim collation.' Their very sages deliver their oracles over a glass of punch; and the enchanted lover finds new apologies for his idolatry in taking a survey of his mistress's 'comb, soap, and towel.' Those baser necessities of our nature, in short, which all other writers who have aimed at raising the imagination or touching the heart, have kept studiously out of view, are ostentatiously brought forward, and fondly dwelt on by the pathetic authors of Germany."—Vol. i. p. 207.

We have given the above extract because we think it conveys a reproof to a class of writers of our own day, who fill their pages continually with pompous accounts of feasts and all the details of the dinner-table. Their heroes are continually stuffing, munching manchetts, (a favourite word,) and draining flagons. They imagine perhaps that they are recalling some of Walter Scott's splendid festal scenes; but when he introduces details of this kind, it is in order to illustrate the manners of the times of which he treats; they illustrate nothing but gluttony, for which we need not go beyond our cook shops.

The next extract points to another fault—too common to those who write down to the taste of the sensual, and ape the worst parts of Dumas and Eugene Sue. French indelicacy:—

"We must say, however, that the whole tribe of French writers who have had any pretensions to philosophy for the last seventy years, are affected with a species of indelicacy which is peculiar, we think, to their nation, and strikes us as more shameful and offensive than any other. We do not know very well how to describe it, otherwise than by saying, that it consists in a strange combination of physical science with obscenity, and an attempt to unite the pedantic and disgusting details of anatomy and physiology, with images of voluptuousness and sensuality; an attempt we think exceedingly disgusting and debasing, but not in the least degree either seductive or amusing." 2

The same essay, which contains a notice of Baron Grimm's correspondence as well as that of Diderot, affords ample proof of how much Mr. Jeffrey disliked the heartless immorality of the Voltaire school; although he may have admitted the service, which the boldness of their speculations, tolerated by shortsighted arbitrary power on account of their wit, did to the cause of free discussion.

It is on the wit and heartlessness of polished societies:—

"Whenever there is a very large assemblage of persons who have no other occupation but to amuse themselves, there will infallibly be generated, acuteness of intellect, refinement of manners, and good taste in conversation; and with the same certainty, all profound thought, and all serious affection, will be generally discarded from their society. The multitude of persons and things that force themselves on the attention of such a scene, and the rapidity with which they succeed each other and pass away, prevent any one from making a deep or permanent impression: and the mind having never been tasked to any course of application, and long habituated to this lively succession and variety of objects, comes at last to require the excitement of perpetual change, and to find a multitude of friends as indispensable as a multitude of amusements. Thus the characteristics of large and polished society come almost inevitably to be, wit and heartlessness, acuteness and perpetual derision. The same impatience of uniformity, and passion for variety, which gives so much grace to their conversation, by excluding tediousness and pertinacious wrangling, makes them incapable of dwelling for many minutes on the feelings and concerns of any one individual; while the constant pursuit of little gratifications, and the weak dread of all uneasy sensations, render them equally averse from serious sympathy and deep thought. They speedily find out the shortest and most pleasant way to all truths, to which a short and a pleasant way can readily be discovered; and then lay it down as a maxim, that no others are worth looking after: and in the same way they do such petty kindnesses, and indulge such light sympathies, as do not put them to any trouble, or encroach at all on their amusements,—while they make it a principle to wrap themselves up in those amusements from the assault of all more engrossing or importunate affections.

"The turn for derision again arises naturally out of this order of things. When passion and enthusiasm, affection and serious occupation, have once been banished by a short-sighted voluptuousness, the sense of ridicule is almost the only lively sensation that remains; and the envied life of those who have nothing to do but to enjoy themselves, would be utterly listless and without interest, if they were not to laugh at each other. Their quickness in perceiving ordinary follies and illusions too, affords great encouragement to this laudable practice; and as none of them have so much passion or enthusiasm left, as to be deeply wounded by the shafts of derision, they fall lightly and without rankling on the lesser vanities, which supply in them those master springs of human action and feeling.

"Nothing, indeed, can be more just and conclusive than the remark of M. Grimm himself, upon the utter carelessness and instant oblivion that followed the death of one of the most distinguished, active and amiable members of his coterie: 'Tant il est vrai que ce qui nous appellons la société, est ce qu'il y a de plus léger, de plus ingrat, et de plus frivole au monde.'

"Holding this opinion very firmly ourselves, it will easily be believed that we are very far from envying the brilliant persons who composed, or gave the tone to this exquisite society; and while we have a due admiration for the elegant pleasantries, correct taste, and gay acuteness, of which they furnish, perhaps, the only perfect models, we think it more desirable, on the whole, to be the spectators, than the possessors of those accomplishments; and would no more wish to buy them at the price of our sober thinking and settled affections, than we would buy the dexterity of a fiddler or a rope-dancer, as the price of our personal respectability. Even in the days of youth and high-spirits, there is no solid enjoyment in living altogether with people who care nothing about us; and when we begin to grow old and unamusable, there can be nothing so comfortable as to be surrounded with those who think of nothing but amusement."—Vol. i. p. 329.

One more extract, and we somewhat unwillingly take our leave of Mr. Jeffrey, with the confident hope that some one intimately acquainted with his life, and possessed of the valuable papers which, we doubt not, he has left behind him, will, by the publication of a memoir, give us an opportunity in due time of returning to the subject.

(1) Review of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, Aug. 825.

(2) Review of Diderot, vol. i. p. 348.

Madame de Staël had advocated the doctrine of optimism or perfectibility, and eloquently argued that the progress of science, literature, and morality would banish ignorance, and vice, and misery from the earth. Mr. Jeffrey differed from this soothing view of human destinies. In the course of his argument he says:—

"Take the case, for example, of war, by far the most prolific and extensive pest of the human race, whether we consider the sufferings it inflicts, or the happiness it prevents,—and see whether it is likely to be arrested by the progress of intelligence and civilization. In the first place it is manifest, that instead of becoming less frequent and destructive in proportion to the rapidity of that progress, our European wars have in point of fact been incomparably more constant and more sanguinary since Europe became signally enlightened and humanized, and that they have uniformly been most obstinate and most popular in its most polished countries. The brutish Laplanders and bigoted and profligate Italians have had long intervals of repose, but France and England are now pretty regularly at war, for about fourscore years out of every century." (This was written in 1812.) "In the second place, the lovers and conductors of war are by no means the most ferocious and stupid of their species, but, for the most part, the very contrary; and their delight in it, notwithstanding their compassion for human suffering and their complete knowledge of its tendency to produce suffering, seems to us sufficient almost of itself to discredit the confident prediction of those who assure us that when men have attained to a certain degree of intelligence, war must necessarily cease among all the nations of the earth. There can be no better illustration, indeed, than this, of the utter futility of all those means of perfectibility which are founded on a radical ignorance of what it is that constitutes the real enjoyment of human nature, and upon the play of how many principles and opposite stimuli that happiness depends, which it is absurdly imagined would be found in the mere negation of suffering, or in a state of Quakerish placidity, dulness and uniformity. Men delight in war, in spite of the pains and miseries which they know it entails upon themselves and their fellows, because it exercises all the talents, and calls out all the energies, of their nature,—because it holds them out conspicuously as objects of public sentiment and general sympathy,—because it gratifies their pride of art, and gives them a lofty sentiment of their own power, worth, and courage,—but, principally, because it sets the game of existence upon a higher stake, and dispels by its powerful interest those feelings of ennui which steal upon every condition from which hazard and anxiety are excluded, and drive us into danger and suffering as a relief. While human nature continues to be distinguished by these attributes, we do not see any chance of war being superseded by the increase of wisdom or morality. We should be pretty well advanced in the career of perfectibility if all the inhabitants of Europe were as intelligent, and upright, and considerate, as Sir John Moore, or Lord Nelson, or Lord Collingwood, or Lord Wellington; but we should not have the less of war. We take it with all its attendant miseries. The more wealth, and intelligence, and liberty, there is in a country, indeed, the greater love we fear there will be for war; for a gentleman is uniformly a more pugnacious animal than a plebeian, and a free man than a slave. The case is the same with the minor contentions that agitate civil life, and shed abroad the bitter waters of political animosity, and grow up into the rancours and atrocities of faction and cabal. The leading actors in those scenes are not the lowest or most debased characters in the country; but, almost without exception, of the very opposite description. It would be too romantic to suppose that the whole population of any country should ever be raised to the level of our Fox, and Pitt, Burke, Windham, or Grattan; and yet if that miraculous improvement were to take place, we know that they would be at least as far from agreeing as they are at present, and may fairly conclude that they would contend with far greater warmth and animosity."—Vol. i. p. 93.¹

We suppose the Peace Society will hardly admit the validity of this line of argument,—nor, indeed, do we; although we cannot altogether agree with the benevolent gentlemen of that society, who seem to think that we should best promote peace by disabling ourselves from defence, forgetting, apparently, that we are surrounded by nations who, on that subject, are little better than barbarous. The promoters of peace are on the right track, however, and we wish them all success in spreading their principles. And not to them alone; we wish success to the numerous societies in operation for the benefit of our fellow-creatures. Let the universities be improved; let schools be multiplied and ragged children be compelled to come in and be taught. Let the poor needle-women be sent where they will have room to exist; let the dwellings of the working-men be improved, and all means for improving their health and physical and moral state be encouraged. Let missionary efforts be increased, and, above all, let the Bible be scattered abroad with even a prodigal hand. All the seed will not return to us void; all will not fall on rocky ground. Some of it will bring forth seven, or even a hundred-fold.

The promoters of such things are good men and true. They are the salt of the earth; the benefactors of the human race. They may hope for that which Francis Jeffrey seems to have depared of; but it will not come by the means Madame de Staël supposed. They may be, unconsciously perhaps, obeying the voice of Him who said, "Make ye straight the way of the Lord!" and when the fields are ripe we may rely upon it, "the Lord of the harvest will send reapers to the harvest."

We look upon it as one of the great felicities of Lord Jeffrey's life that he was permitted to spend the evening of his days in the dignified position of a judge. No situation we can imagine more enviable for a serious-minded and intelligent old man, than a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court of Scotland. Without being oppressive to one who well knows the law, the duties are enough to prevent the mind from sinking into lethargy, and from their nature are calculated to lead him to reflect on his past life, and to prepare for a higher than a human judgment. Lord Jeffrey was able to perform his official duties in his usual manner until four days before his death. It was of old said, that we could call no man happy before his death; we can now pronounce that judgment on Francis Jeffrey, and say with pleasure, that his death, as well as his life, has been happy.

OUR COUSINS IN THE COUNTRY.

A SKETCH.

BY J. M. W.

"Go and see our cousins in the country, Mary! why, what put that into your head?" asked John Wood of his sister, as they were sitting together one evening, talking over plans for a short summer holiday.

"Why, I don't know what first put the idea into my head, John; but I found it there just now."

"But who knows whether they would be glad to see us? I dare say they care nothing about us. They never saw us."

"Nay, but, John, you remember what father always used to say,—'Blood is thicker than water.'—He always thought of going 'back to the old place,' as he called it, if he 'lived and did well.'"

The brother and sister were silent for a time; for they thought of that dear father and mother who no longer lived; and who while they lived had not done well, in the worldly meaning of the phrase. No;—old Mr. and Mrs. Wood, excellent, honest people as they were, had not prospered in the world. They had fallen a little behind the time. When they married, they opened a respectable haberdasher's shop in the Borough, which they conducted in a quiet respectable way, as shops used to be conducted thirty years ago. They managed it themselves; and they brought up their two children, John and Mary, to take a part in the business. They had no neo-fangled notions, as they called all innovations, good and bad; they were steady, unambitious, plodding people, who spent little money, and made little, also. Their children were much like themselves; and, though born and bred in London, had not only a shrewd North-country look, but a slight North-country accent in pronouncing some words. These peculiarities they gained from their parents, together with other things more valuable—viz. sincere piety, strong affection for each other, habits of industry, and a sturdy spirit of independence. They had both been to the best day-schools in the neighbourhood; and though Mary could not play on the piano, she could write a sensible letter, and understand some of the best English classics;—though John could not dance, or make Latin verses, which his father did not think necessary for a haberdasher, he was no mean geometrician, and was extremely fond of philosophy and history. With these accomplishments, good health, good temper, and good principles, they were not badly armed for the Battle of Life; into the midst of which they were suddenly thrown, when their father, after several profitless years of trade, sold his business to pay his creditors, and after obtaining good situations for his son and daughter, turned shopman himself, in the very establishment where he had been master for twenty-five years. This reverse in their circumstances wrought a gradual, but rapid change in the honest, simple, old couple. They did not complain; but, within five years, they both died. John and Mary were then left alone in the world; and they clung the closer together on that account. They had risen by degrees to be the head man and the head woman in the large and fashionable West-end shop where their father had first placed them. They received very good salaries, and were esteemed and respected by their employer, who allowed them a fortnight's holiday every year, during the dead season, when, as "there is nobody in London," there is very little to do in the way of selling ribbons and laces.

Mr. and Miss Wood were very unpretending people, and preferred saving some of their money to spending it all; but, they spent judiciously also; and thought it a good outlay of money to enjoy their yearly holiday, and lay in a stock of health and pleasant recollections. They lived plainly, not in the house of their employer, but in lodgings at Chelsea. They had two comfortable bed-rooms, and a pretty sitting-room facing the river; these were furnished with some of the dear old furniture which had made their old home in the Borough so comfortable, and which their parents had been able to rescue from the wreck of their little capital. The house in which they lodged belonged to a funny little old maid, who was very much attached to them, and took a great interest in all they said and did.

On the evening of their introduction to the reader, John and Mary had received an intimation from Mr. Broad, their employer, that they were at liberty to begin their holiday on the following Friday. This was Monday, and they had not yet settled where they would go. They always made a point of going into the country, to spend their holiday; though Miss Carol, their landlady, thought it "a great shame they did not stay and see some of the fine London sights," of which they were deplorably ignorant: and "go to the theatre, or a concert every evening." She thought "that would be making more of a holiday of it, than going into the country, where there was not a living creature to be seen—nothing but cows and haystacks." Miss Carol was a staunch Londoner.

After the pause which we mentioned above, and which we have made use of to impart to the reader this information concerning them, the brother and sister looked up at each other.

"Well, Mary! what are you thinking of now?"

"I was thinking, John," replied his sister, while a tear glistened in her eye,—"I was thinking, how much mother longed to see her relations, during the last year of her life. If she were alive now, John! We are able to afford journeys, now. Things always come too late."

"Nay, Mary, we must not say, or think that. Things may seem to us to come too late; but God knows best; and we may therefore be sure they always come at the right time. If we look long enough, and sharp enough, we shall see that, very often, if not always. Even in this case of poor dear mother's going down into the North, after so long an absence;—remember how she used to talk of the persons and places that were so dear to her in her girlhood. Why, no persons and places could be so perfectly good and beautiful as her memory and imagination painted them. What a golden land, what a happy valley was Lonsdale, as it was in her recollection! How good, and brave, and handsome, were all her brothers, and sisters, and cousins! Now, Mary, I verily believe that father and mother enjoyed the memory of old times, old friends, and old places, with a letter from the dear North once in a year or two, more than they would have enjoyed an actual visit. In reality all would be changed; they would not have recognised their dearest friends. In memory, every thing and everybody was unchanged, and the brightness of youth dwelt with them to the last. It was better for them that they did not have their wish."

"Well, John, you have a way of making out that all evil is good in disguise."

"So it is, Mary; only we are not clever enough to see through the disguise always."

"You are right, dearest, I dare say. But still I cannot help wishing that father and mother were alive again, now; and that we could take them down to Hillbeck."

"They are better off where they are, Mary. But I think your notion of our going down to Hillbeck, and looking up our relations, is not a bad one. We are pretty well versed in their names and localities, thanks to poor father and mother's affectionate reminiscences. We shall find some of them out, I dare say. I dare say, too, they will be glad to see us; for all the letters father and mother had from that part, especially from uncle Ralph Wood, have been hearty and friendly. We want nothing of them; they may be better off than we, but we go among them independent, as far as the pocket is concerned; and so we shall give them no trouble, if they are not disposed to fraternize with their long-lost London relations."

"Oh! John, I am sure they will be glad to see us. All the North-country people are kind and hospitable, mother used to say; and I am sure father was right when he said, 'Blood is thicker than water;' I feel that myself. I quite long to see what sort of cousins we have got. I wonder what has become of little Leonard that was such a pretty baby when mother came away from Hillbeck to be married. He was her eldest brother's first child, you know; and uncle Henry Thornton must have had at least a dozen children, since. There must be a great cargo of our cousins in Lonsdale—Woods, and Thorntons, and Grays!"

"Yes. They must have spread very much in the course of thirty years; for it is just thirty years since father and mother left that part. We cannot expect to find many of their contemporaries alive; and the younger folks may not take much interest in us. So you must not let your warm heart be chilled, Mary, if they do not receive us with open arms."

"Then, it is settled that we go down to the North?"

"Yes, dear, I should like it as well as you. The country is very beautiful thereabouts. I will find out, to-morrow, the way we must go."

"The town nearest to Hillbeck is Kirby Lonsdale, I know."

"Yes, we have heard that often enough in our childish days. Do you remember our playing at going to Kirby Lonsdale, when you were so high, and I overset you into a pail of water?"

They went on laughing and chatting; and presently, Mary invited Miss Carol to supper with them, and told her of their holiday scheme. Miss Carol had no relations herself, and so thought them valuable possessions which should be looked after and never lost. But she did not like the idea of her young friends going two hundred miles from London. It seemed like going beyond the confines of civilization. It was not quite clear to her, that the inhabitants of those remote parts did not dye their bodies with woad, clothe themselves in skins of beasts, and conduct themselves, in all respects, like genuine ancient Britons. She did not think it quite safe to go unarmed among them.

The important Friday came at last. It was a beautiful day at the end of August. I shall not give any particulars of the journey from Euston Square to the Burton and Holme Station, on the Lancaster and Carlisle line. I may just state, as an indication of character, that Miss Carol accompanied her young friends to the large bustling terminus, in order to see them off, and to put into their hands a basket of provisions, which she had prepared for their refreshment on the way; that she was sorely divided between her terror of the engine, and her attachment to the travellers. She firmly believed that nothing short of a miracle would bring them safely to the end of their journey. John did what he could to relieve her mind by promising to send her a line by that day's post, from some station near the end of their journey.

And now we must beg our readers to imagine this long journey accomplished. They have just been put out of the train, with their small quantity of luggage, at the Burton and Holme Station. Mary is sitting on her box on the little platform; while John has gone to make inquiries about the ways and means of going on to Kirby Lonsdale. Mary is a little tired with sitting all day; and has got a slight headache with the incessant noise. She looks round, and sees green trees and fields on each side of the line, and some dark blue hills in the distance: the noisy train has gone on out of sight, and the fresh evening breeze is springing up after the hot day. The bright sun is shining, and is still high above the horizon,—everything is so still and happy-looking that Mary smiles to herself, and begins to feel quite recovered. The headache has actually gone in a few moments, and she is gazing eagerly towards those dark blue hills, and wondering whether she shall ever be on the top of one of them.

A quiet, observant young man, who has been pacing up and down the platform, and is waiting for the next up-train, observed Mary, among other things, and thought there was a pleasant, soft brightness in the face of that intelligent-looking London girl. While he was observing her, John returned hastily.—“Now, Mary, I’ve got something to take us on to Kirby. Here! there is no porter, give me the box, and you take the carpet-bag.”

As Mary was about to do so, the stranger stepped forward and said, “Allow me to carry that.”

Mary yielded it willingly, for she was very tired. The stranger helped John to seat her comfortably on the front seat of the car, and explained to John how he was to ride on the back-seat, so as not to be thrown off. He then called their driver by name, and charged him to point out Morecombe Bay when they came in sight of it, and to tell the travellers the names of all the remarkable points in the drive. He told John he was “very sorry, but he was obliged to run up to Lancaster that evening, or he would have had great pleasure in driving them himself, as he was going back to Kirby; he had plenty of room in his White-chapel, which would have been rather more comfortable than the car for the lady.” Just then the up-train was heard approaching, and he ran off, wishing them a pleasant drive to Kirby.

John liked the look and manners of that young fellow, and thought that, if all the people in the north were as kindly and honest-looking, they should not repent their adventure. John thought this, and said it too. Mary thought it, but did not say it.

Descriptions of scenery are generally anything but descriptive, therefore I shall not attempt to give an account of the eight miles drive between the Burton Station and Kirby Lonsdale. I can only say that it is very beautiful. The three points of greatest interest to strangers are the blue distant hills before alluded to,—the outworks of the lake-district; Morecombe Bay, which is two or three miles off, and the view of Lonsdale or the valley of the Lune, which is one of the richest and most lovely valleys in England; the town of Kirby-in-Lonsdale, or Kirby Lonsdale, is picturesquely situated in one of the finest parts of the valley.

They were driven to the Royal Hotel, the best inn in the town. Here they alighted, and ordered tea directly. John would have ordered beds also, thinking Mary would be too tired to go farther that night; but she forbade him to do so, saying, “No, no; I am a better traveller than that. I shall be quite strong again after some tea; and then let us have the car again, and go on to Hillbeck this evening. I dare say we can get some sort of accommodation for the night here. I long to see that beautiful Fell that mother loved so. I wish we could sleep in her native place to-night. Let us go, if we can, John.”

John was quite ready to go on, that night, to the world’s end, if she pleased. He was not at all tired, and was just getting into the spirit of the journey; only he was tremendously hungry, and begged leave to add a beefsteak to the tea-table. Mary laughed at his passion for beefsteak, and she laughed still more when he declared solemnly after eating it, that there never had been such a capital steak eaten in England before, and that this country hotel ought to be immortalized for it.

On inquiry, it appeared that Hillbeck was only five miles from Kirby, so that though it was “a turble hilly road,” they would get there before it was dark; and that, though there was no inn at Hillbeck, add, indeed, scarcely a village, yet that there was a small, comfortable inn, half a mile further on, among the fells, where they would meet with every attention. These main points ascertained, John requested the landlord to let him have a driver who knew something about Hillbeck and the people who lived there.

“Why, sir,” replied the landlord, “you can have Roger Garner; he was born and bred at Hillbeck. Here, Roger, man, get ready to drive a car to Hillbeck! If you want to know about the Hillbeck folk, sir, Roger’s your man; there’s not a man or woman born in Hillbeck for the last fifty years but he knows all about them. He’s a good hand at a talk, is Roger.”

John laughed, and said Roger was just the man he wanted. In ten minutes more, John and Mary, with their luggage, were once more on a car, and, driven by Roger Garner, departed out of Kirby, going slowly across the beautiful bridge over the Lune, so as to get a good view of the river both above and below. The brother and sister recognised the lovely scene which had been so often described to them by their parents.

“That, at least, is not changed, Mary!” exclaimed her brother. “It’s just as they described it.”

Roger Garner, who had eyed them attentively before, looked round at this, and said, respectfully,—“Yes, sir; there has been little change here ever since I can remember, and I have been here sixty years, man and boy. Do you come from this part, sir? I think I know something of your face, and of this young lady’s, too. I must be mistaken, for I’m thinking of things too long ago for you to belong to them,” he added, half musing.

“Will it help you to remember if I say our name is Wood?”

“That will do, sir,” replied Roger, with an intelligent smile; “I was on the right track. You are a Wood, sure enough; and this young lady is another, or my name is not Garner. She is the very model of John Wood, who went up to London two-and-thirty years ago, and never come back since. I heard tell he died there away.”

“He did,” replied John, “he died in London three years ago. We are his children.”

“Are you, indeed?” And the old man pulled up his horse for a moment, and scanned both their faces with interest. “I should have known her for a Wood, anywhere; you are more of a Thornton. Ah! your poor mother’s dead, I know; she was the finest lass in all Hillbeck, was Jane Thornton!” and the old man paused a moment, and then, giving the reins a jerk, drove on in silence.

"Is my mother's brother, Henry, alive?" asked Mary, softly, for she saw that the old man's feelings were busied with bygone years.

"Ay, Harry Thornton's alive, and like to live many a good year. Are ye going to the Hall? He'll be right glad to see ye. He used often to talk of his sister Jane; she was his favourite. No wonder! she was every one's favourite;" and the old man sighed a little, and then coughed down the sigh.

"Do you think my uncle will be glad to see us if we go without warning or invitation?" asked John Wood, much pleased with his new acquaintance, and inclined to be guided by his opinion.

"Why, what warning or invitation should he want to have or to give? Arn't ye his own sister's children?—It's not the way in our country to stand upon ceremony with our relations and friends. That may be the fashion up in London, but it don't suit us here. The poorest cottager in Hillbeck (and that's my cousin Tom) would be glad to have the children of a Wood or a Thornton under his roof, and to give them the best he had, as long as they liked to stay; let alone the richest farmer in Hillbeck, and that's your uncle Henry Thornton, at the Hall. So, if you thought of going on to the Lowther Arms, to sleep, you had better put that thought out of your head, unless you wish to offend all your relations; and Hillbeck's full of them. You just let me drive you up to the Hall; and if you show your faces to your uncle, I don't think you need tell your names, or wait for a formal invitation."

"Shall we go at once to uncle Henry's house, Mary, think you?"—Mary, in whom there was a spirit of adventure, which had been roused by the novelties of this day, nodded her head eagerly, and said, "Oh, yes! John, let us go, just as we are. Should we not like them to do the same by us, if they came, strangers to London, as we come here? You know we can but come away again, if they do not seem disposed to receive us heartily. After all, why should not their hearts warm to us, as mine, and, I'm sure, yours, does to them?—Blood is thicker than water!"

"Well said, Missy. There's a touch of your father, there!" observed Roger.

That point being settled, the two Londoners had their minds free to admire the wild beauties of the country through which they were going. The bold heath-clad hills, or fells, as they are called in Westmoreland, rose in vast undulating lines all round them. In the midst was a broad cultivated valley, through which their road lay for some time. At last, to the great delight of Mary, whose joy was to be on the top of anything like a hill, they turned out of the road through the great valley of the Lune, and began to ascend a steep road, over one of the Fells. Roger Garner and her brother got down, in order to lighten the load for the horse; they walked on together in amicable communion, and Mary sat by herself in the car, very much too happy to care to talk. Here she was, at last, in the midst of the wild mountain region which her mother and father had so often described to her. Higher and higher they went, and still more and more of hills and mountains could she see; range behind range, they lay,—some green and bright in the light of the setting sun,—others inky black in shadow,—others dim and cloud-covered, all melting, by imperceptible lines, one into the other. There were no corn-fields, no meadows and hedge-rows here. All was moorland, wide, treeless, unenclosed.—No houses to be seen; a few cows and ponies now and then were seen, up and down on the sides of the great Fell over which they were going. The sunset from this elevated point was very fine; but the wind blew cold, and Mary wrapped her shawl closely round her, and thought of the tales which her parents had told her, of the danger of crossing the Fells in winter, when the snow lies on them for weeks together, many feet in thickness. Here and there, on each side along the edge of the road, she observed tall wooden poles, painted black at the top; these, she knew, were placed there to mark the depth of the snow in winter, and to indicate where the road lay. She was pleased to find how well she remembered what her mother had so often described to her in her childhood. As they went on, and John and Roger Garner had again mounted to their seats, the road began to descend into a quiet, secluded vale, on the opposite side of which, rose a steep dark mountainous mass. It attracted attention instantaneously.

"What's that mountain?" asked John Wood.

"Yon's Hillbeck Fell. It's the highest ground hereabouts, and famous enough among the grouse shooters. And there's the place we are going to,—Hillbeck village. There's light enough for you to see it pretty well. There's the Beck, (or stream,) running down from the Fell, and flowing through the village. There ain't a clearer, prettier stream in summer than Hill Beck, nor a noisier, angrier stream in winter. Do you see the chapel yonder, among the clump of dark trees, beyond the cottages?—Now, look out there, a little way up the first rise of the Fell.—Do you see a large, grey stone building?"

"What, the one with curious tall chimneys, half covered with ivy? Yes, I see it very plainly," said Mary, getting more and more interested in what she saw. "What a dear old place! What is it called?"

"It is called Hillbeck Hall," replied Roger Garner.—Your uncle Henry Thornton lives there; and we are going to drive there directly, without going round by the village."

"Are all the farm-houses about here called Halls?" inquired John.

"Many of them are:—for this reason,—they were many years ago the dwellings of the gentry of the country; (for we have no nobles just here;) since they have lost their grand inhabitants, they have kept their grand names, because nobody ever thinks of altering them, I suppose."

"And what is the name of the old family to whom Hillbeck Hall formerly belonged?" asked John, unconscious that he was touching upon a tender point.

Roger turned round to him, with a strange excitement in his fine intelligent features—"Young man, you see all this valley, and these fine opposing Fells.—All this once belonged to an ancient family, among the respectable gentry of this country, and you Hall, where your uncle, the steady industrious farmer, now lives, in great comfort, was their ancestral home. The name of that family was Garner, and I am the last descendant."

The two young people, whose hearts were not chilled by contact with the world, stretched out their hands to the old man, and uttered hurried words of sympathy, and apology, for having excited his feelings by their questions.

"No, no. Never mind! It is all right. How should you know what interest I had in Hillbeck?—Besides, it is the law of God's providence, in governing the world;—a continual, circling change. The high sink gradually, and become low, and the low rise gradually, and become high. The Garners have had their day; it's the Thorntons' turn now. I don't grudge it them; for, you must know, it was not I who lost this property, but my father and grandfather between them, before I was born. I have learned to be a little of a philosopher, you see; though I do feel, sometimes, regretful, when I drive down into this place. To my mind, it's the sweetest place in the whole world."

Mary and John praised Hillbeck heartily, much to the old man's satisfaction; and they treated him with even more respect than before, for they had been taught that it is a noble and kind thing to show respect to those that have fallen in the world, by no misconduct of their own. They had half forgotten their curiosity about their own relations, in their interest for Roger Garner.

Suddenly the car stopped—there was a gate to be opened, and John jumped down eagerly and opened it, to save their driver trouble.

"Now you are in the grounds of the Hall," said the latter.

They looked around, and saw a fine plantation on one side, and a pretty enclosed meadow on the other, and the old grey house, with its barns and out-houses, was before them. Twilight was fast covering the scene, and enlarging the appearance of objects. Mary thought Hillbeck Hall was a grand looking place, and she began to fear that her cousins might be inclined to look down with contempt upon herself and John. Every thing was still; as they approached the house, a light appeared in one of the upper windows, and a young girl flitted across it. "That's a cousin," thought Mary.

There was a large gravelled court in front of the principal door, at which Roger drew up. It was opened immediately; for the sound of wheels had been heard within. Instead of a neat housemaid, with pink ribbons, or a rough serving-man, there appeared within the wide stone doorway a crowd of bright young faces and tall healthy forms male and female.

"Roger Garner! Roger Garner!" cried the younger ones rushing out, and surrounding the car. "Who have you brought?"—and then seeing that the two other persons were strangers, they became silent; some ran back into the house, and the rest looked up, with curious wondering eyes, at the new comers.

"Where's your father, master Ralph?" asked Garner, of a tall, broad-shouldered youth of eighteen, who now came forward from the door-way, with a very pretty girl of a similar build and age. "How do you do, Miss Dora?"

"Here I am, Garner," said a clear, strong voice, from the interior of the mansion. "Do'st want me, man?—Out of the way, young ones!" And in another moment, Mr. Henry Thornton, of Hillbeck, the father of the numerous young folks clustered at the door, came out and stood beside the car. He was a fine specimen of a North-country farmer,—tall, strongly made, with a wide chest and an upright carriage. His head was admirably set on his shoulders; his hair was grizzled, his eyes, bright and keen, his mouth large, but well cut. The union of frankness and intelligence, of good temper and firmness, in the face and the bearing of the man, was extremely prepossessing; and John Wood jumped, at once, from his seat, and stood before him.

"Who have ye brought us, this time, Roger?—It's nobody from Kirby, I'm thinking. I don't quite recollect ye, just now, youngster," he said, glancing at John, "but you're welcome any how, whoever ye be." He glanced again at the young man's face, and this time their eyes met. The honest farmer started, and his sun-burnt face lost some of its usual colour. "Who are ye?"—he cried, laying his hand on John's shoulder, and scanning his features attentively for, at least, a minute. Then he said, in a low, hoarse voice, full of emotion,—"It is Jane's child!" and he could say no more, but wrung his nephew's hand with one of his own, while with the other he dashed away some sudden tears from his eyes.

"I knew you'd want no introduction," said the kind Roger Garner, whose own eyes glistened with something more than their ordinary brightness. "That face speaks for itself, to any one who ever knew Jane Thornton. And here's another that's got John Wood written on it, plain enough for my old eyes to see;" and he helped Mary down, and placed her before her uncle. He folded her in his arms, and invoked a blessing on them both. He looked from one to the other, with ill-concealed emotion; uttering half finished sentences of joy and regret; still keeping one arm round Mary, while his other hand clasped that of his nephew. It was as pretty a twilight scene as eye ever beheld. The three principal figures were surrounded by the rest of the family, in various groups. Mrs. Thornton, a woman whom it did the temper good to look on, stood behind her husband, with her eldest daughter, Jane, and her son Harry. They feared to intrude on the meeting, but looked on with sympathetic faces. The younger members, including even the great twins, Ralph and Dora, before introduced, were not quite so scrupulous; but crowded round their father and their new relations with eager and delighted cries of welcome. As there were four boys among them, and each boy was always accompanied by two dogs, who barked briskly whenever their master showed signs of joy, the noise soon made itself the most important object of immediate consideration.

"Confound the dogs!" cried Garner, and began to lay about him with his whip.

"Nay! nay! Confound the children, say I," cried Mr. Thornton. "Get away with you into the house, some of you; and don't keep your cousins standing here in the cold. Is that the way ye welcome them? There! there! Plenty of time for introducing yourselves, when you've introduced them to the fire. Besides, there's Mr. Garner; take care of him.—You'll stay with us to-night, Garner?—No; I'll be shot if you shall go back to Kirby to-night, after bringing us such a load as this!—Here! Take the chaise off to the stables, some of you boys, and tell the men to make the horse right comfortable for the night.—No! no! Garner; stay you here.—You must let me have my way, and be treated like a gentleman, whenever you come to this house; whatever treatment you may meet with elsewhere. Besides, you can't refuse to come in, and have a long chat with poor Jane's children."

There seemed to be something unanswerable in this last argument; and Roger Garner suffered the boys to take away the chaise, and Miss Dora to lead him into the house, without another word of objection. In the meantime, Mrs. Thornton and her elder children came forward, and greeted John and Mary in the most affectionate way. And whether it were the fatigue, the novelty, the excitement, or the exuberant kindness with which they were received by their unknown relatives, I cannot pretend to say, but the fact is, as soon as they were seated in the comfortable family room, before a large log-fire, Miss Mary's composure broke down, and she burst into tears, with her arms round her cousin Jane's neck. This was, of course, a signal for more tears; and Jane, Dora, and their new-found cousin retired precipitately, under pretence of "taking-off cousin's things." But Mary was not a girl to allow her feelings to get the better of her for very long; and in the course of a quarter of an hour, the three girls went down stairs again, all smiles and animation. The scene that followed was amusing enough. It had been already settled, that John and Mary were not to be teased with any questions that night; but that they were to be allowed to ask all the questions they liked, and to have every member of the family formally introduced to them. Uncle Thornton performed the ceremony of introduction, and he indulged himself in pointed personal remarks, upon each individual he introduced, "for the enlightenment of their stranger relatives" as he said. His introductions were in this fashion—"Now, Mary, my dear, this young man is my second son, his name is Harry, —Young Harry, as he is called, to distinguish him from the old fellow of that name. He is six feet one. His legs are long enough, and so is his head. He might be worse; and he is not a bit better than he should be. Of his face I will say nothing; when he has done staring at yours, perhaps you will do him the favour to look at his, and oblige me by telling the company your opinion of it.—That young woman is my daughter Jane, named after your mother. She's a good girl enough in her way, but she often forgets to fill my tobacco-box. She sticks to her mother through thick and thin. I can never get her to back me; so I hope you'll bear that in mind, and support me occasionally. For her looks, you see them. Let me see, Jane! Which are you, the beauty or the plain girl of the family? I know you are either one or the other, but I can't for the life of me remember which; because, do you see, all my girls are pretty in my eyes. What do you think, nephew? You are fresh in these parts, and likely to be unbiassed!"

Jane laughed and blushed. John laughed, but said that he "could not give his opinion on so momentous a matter without an examination of all his cousins by daylight."

"Very good! You are a prudent young man, I see. Now, then, we come to our first twins, Ralph and Dora. Don't hide yourself, Ralph; merit should be apparent, at all times. There, Miss Mary, what would the folks in London say to that specimen of humanity at eighteen? How many yards are you across the shoulders now, Ralph? Which is the broadest in the back, you or Dora?" Here Mr. Thornton is violently assailed with kisses by his daughter, Dora, and entreated not to make any remarks upon her. "Very well; I will leave your cousins to make their own remarks upon the gentleness of your nature and the extreme delicacy and slightness of your figure." For this he received a pat on the cheek from the rosy Dora. "Next in order comes Roger, named after his godfather, Mr. Garner. Hold up your head, Roger, and show the beard that is already coming on your chin, though you are little more than seventeen, and you do all you can in the way of shaving to keep it under. He's a likely lad, now, at all the dancing parties of the neighbourhood, only he moves about like a young bull, and is never seen out of a shooting-jacket, except at church. He plays the bassoon a little, and practises occasionally under the windows of his cousin, Alice Gray, by way of serenade. Oh! don't be modest, Roger,—you are a 'youth of talents rare.' Next in order come the second twins, Oswald and Margaret. Come here, my dears;—you were fifteen last birthday, were you not? Yes. Ah! Meg, my darling, you look pale. Has she had her wine this evening, mother? Ah, well! we must be particular about this, you know; but cousins don't come from London every evening. That's right, Oswald, get her the wine, and come and sit on my knee, Meg."

"Meg's father's favourite," whispered Roger to his new-found cousin, John.

"She looks more delicate than the rest of you," observed John.

"Yes; and she's the cleverest and the kindest of all the girls; and she's the only one that can sing, except Leonard."

"Mary, my dear," continued Mr. Thornton, addressing his niece, "I have no jokes to crack upon Meg; she's not quite so strong as the others. She is not good for much, you see," and he lifted up her soft fair curls in his huge hand and kissed her cheek affectionately. "But here comes her twin—he can bear jokes for them both. Look with what a boyish (I was very near saying bearish) grace he is bringing her that glass of wine. Bravo, Oswald! not spilt a drop! Oh! don't fight me!" he added, laughing, as Oswald, a merry blue-eyed boy, shook his fist playfully at his father. "This young gentleman's favourite amusement is rat-hunting; and I verily believe he would leave that delightful sport at any time to lead Meg's pony. Oswald and Meg are very fond of each other, and that's the best thing I can say for them. Who comes next? Oh! you, Master Charley. Come here, and bring Kate with you. These are your two youngest cousins. Charley is twelve and Kate is ten. They are both very solemn, grave children, as you may see by the expression of their eyes." He is here interrupted by uproarious laughter from the two, who begin to pull him about without ceremony, a little to the discomfiture of Margaret, who is still seated on one substantial knee. Mr. Thornton goes on:—"My dear niece, one of these two children can read very well and the other very badly; both of them can climb trees and ride without saddle or bridle; neither of them can sew —"

"Oh! father, father!" cries the indignant Kate, "I sewed a whole seam of one of Roger's new shirts to-day!"

"Did you, indeed, my pet? Well, mother, I suppose I may reward such merit as this! I am sure it must have been a hard task, Kate." And putting his hand in his pocket, Mr. Thornton drew out a shilling and gave it to Kate.

Kate looked delightedly at her new cousin, Mary; a moment afterwards she whispered something in her father's ear, which made him look very delighted too. "Read a whole chapter without spelling a word!" he exclaimed. "Nay, then Charley deserves a shilling too."

"More than a shilling, father," said the gentle and just Margaret. "It is much harder to Charley to read a whole chapter in the History of England than it is to Kate to sew a seam of a shirt. Is it not, Kate?"

"Twenty million times, Meg, darling," replied the lively little Kate. "I don't deserve more than sixpence; but I'll keep the shilling to make up for the times when father forgets the rewards of merit."

Every one laughed at this sally of the youngest child. But Mary was much more pleased when she heard the little thing urging her father in a whisper to give Charley half-a-crown, because "he really wanted money very much to buy the things to make a new rabbit-hutch." The half-crown was accordingly given, and Charley and Kate went off to the other end of the room in high glee.

"How late Leonard is, Henry!" observed Mrs. Thornton, when all the younger children had disappeared for a time.

"What, is there another little boy?" asked Mary smiling, for the family seemed sufficiently numerous already. Then, recollecting herself, she said, "Oh! I remember; Leonard is the name of our eldest cousin. Mother used to tell us what a sweet baby he was. She used to think him perfection."

"His mother thinks him perfection now; don't you Eliza, my dear?"

"I have no fault to find with him, certainly," said the happy, proud mother.

"And you are not the only one who thinks there are few young men in the world like Leonard Thornton," said Roger Garner. "You've had your way in introducing the other young folks, Thornton; now let his mother and me tell his London cousins what Leonard is like. He is a good son, an affectionate brother, a kind master. He is clever and well informed without any presumption or pretension. He has not a single vicious inclination. His tastes are all refined, and somewhat above those of young men of his rank. He is very fond of reading; and is the best musician in these parts. He plays the organ very nicely, and is the organist at the chapel. This does not prevent his being a good farmer."

"No, indeed! he is a capital farmer! a better one than I am!" chimed in the father.

"Is my cousin Leonard married or single?" inquired John Wood. "Does he live here?"

"Yes, he lives here; and seems not disposed to marry any one that I know of. He went out upon business this afternoon. He will be back in time for supper, I expect."

"Is Leonard, like you, uncle?" asked Mary; "because if he is, I think I have seen him."

"Well, they do say he favours me, my dear; but you've never seen him. He never was in London in his life."

Mary smiled mysteriously, and said, she fancied she had seen him.

"Well, that point will soon be settled," said Mrs. Thornton, "for I hear his wheels. Now, don't any of you move. Let me go and meet him, and bring him in, and introduce him to his cousins."

She went out, and the others sat still accordingly. In a few minutes the door opened again, and the handsome matron led in her son Leonard. It needed not to remove the wrapping coat for Mary, to be quite certain that her supposition was right—that she had seen her cousin before. He recognised them, too, and stepped forward with a smile to greet them.

"Why, where did you see your cousins before, Leonard?" asked his father.

"At the Burton Station, father. My heart warmed to them at first sight; we did not wait long to make acquaintance. There is a great deal in relationship, after all;" and he looked with affectionate interest at his new-found cousins.

This was Friday evening, as our readers may remember. The next day John and Mary were so occupied with all the novelties around them, with the many other families who claimed kindred with them, as well as with the numerous cousins of the house of Thornton, that they really had no time to write to Miss Carol, who had been most earnest in her entreaty to be made acquainted with the success of their adventure in search of unknown relations. On Sunday, no one at Hillbeck ever wrote letters, and though Mary did not think it wrong to do so herself, yet she avoided doing what she knew would shock the feelings of others. Indeed, she felt no inclination to write letters on that first Sunday at Hillbeck. The two services at the village chapel, a long walk over the Fell with a large party of cousins, and a family gathering for the performance of some sacred music in the evening, occupied her entirely. But on the Monday she found time to write the following short note to her good friend in Chelsea:—

MY DEAR MISS CAROL,—Strange as it may appear to you, we arrived safely at our journey's end on Friday night, and slept under the roof of our uncle, Mr. Henry Thornton, of Hillbeck. Now, I am not going to give you any account of him, or his wife and dozen children, or of anything else I have seen in this beautiful, wonderful, happy valley. My reason for this silence is, that I and John are most anxious to induce you to accept the invitation which my dear, yes, already dear aunt, is writing to you, at this moment. We want you very much to come down here; and she will not be happy until you, who have been so kind to us, are among her family circle. You must, indeed, you must be a strong-minded woman, and overcome your fears of the railway. You are to come down by the train that leaves town at the hour we left, on the earliest day possible after receiving our letters. John is writing, too. Lock up the house, and give the key to Mrs. Smith next door. We will all return together in a fortnight, you know. Remember, you never refused me anything in your life, and so I confidently expect you will come soon to your affectionate young friend,

MARY WOOD.

Miss Carol was thrown into a high state of excitement on receiving this, and the accompanying letters. She was all curiosity about these cousins, and aunts, and uncles; and, really, Mrs. Thornton's invitation was too pressing to be lightly refused. But then, again, that horrid railway! She always had said she never would travel on one. Like Benedict, who, when he said he would die a bachelor, did not think he should live to be married, Miss Carol, when she vowed an avoidance of all railroads, did not think she should live to travel by one. However, her affection for her young lodgers was stronger than her nervousness and her prejudice put together, and she went down that very week to Westmoreland, and great was her joy at finding John and Mary waiting for her at the Burton Station. Cousin Leonard was there too; and as soon as she knew who he was, she surveyed him with a sharp eye, and began to have her suspicions, and glanced in a wonderful way at Mary. She "~~mis~~trusted that tall cousin," as she said to herself. He boded no good to her Chelsea household. Before the drive to Hillbeck was finished, that night, Miss Carol saw that "Mary had come down to Westmoreland for something, indeed!" "To see her country cousins! Why, it was clear enough she was going to be turned into a country cousin herself!"

Perhaps, the reader might like to know; and then, again, perhaps he guesses, or does not care to know; and so, perhaps, I had better leave off.

THE FOREST GLADE.

It would be difficult to surpass the beauty of the scene depicted in the engraving to which this title is attached. It is so truly English in its sylvan loveliness, so calm, so bright, and yet so faithful to nature, that we are constrained to admire, when we only intended to be critical. How vividly does it recall to those who, like ourselves, have been "long in populous city pent," the memory of some half-forgotten, but delightful ramble in the long days of summer, when, after a fatiguing exposure to the fervid heat of a July sun and a cloudless, breezeless sky, we have welcomed with ardour the cool shade of a lofty avenue of trees, whose topmost boughs, over-arching and interlacing each other, shut out the scorching rays, while they gently sway with the slightest current, fanning our sun-burnt cheeks and imparting new vigour to the languid frame. How grateful, then, to the tired feet is the short, smooth, dark green grass, and how favourably it contrasts with the parched meadow or the dusty highway! We feel irresistibly tempted to throw ourselves at length upon the verdant sward, to take our full measurement of mother-earth, and to affirm, with fresh-caught enthusiasm, that green is the prettiest of all colours and grass the best of all carpets. We must not, however, arrogate to ourselves a monopoly of the pleasures of our leafy resting-place. The birds have a life-interest in the branches, from which they may not be ejected, while they pay us a handsome quit-rent in the shape of harmony, and thus gratify an additional sense, and increase our pleasures, while they seek only their own enjoyment.

But we are not limited to the forest, in our present ideal picture. We have another element to admire and enjoy; a glassy lake with boat and sail, tempting us to glide o'er its smooth bosom, and to taste the delights of locomotion in its most tranquil form. The rail and the steam-boat may be preferable when the imperious dictates of duty or business are our taskmasters; but where our aim is recreation only, what kind of travelling can equal that of gently sailing on a clear calm stream, whose shores are dotted with alternations of every variety of rural scenery, and where each receding curve and jutting point opens out new sources of gratification, whilst the slow progress of our little bark gives ample time to examine and appreciate the passing beauties?

In our admiration of woods and waves we must not overlook the castellated mansion that terminates our glade; its frowning turrets, and antique battlements, are in quiet harmony with the fathers of the forest, whose tall stems adorn its porch and shelter its walls. These tell no tale of ruin or neglect, but rather bespeak the abode of modern luxury and retirement, and would seem, by the figures in the foreground, to be the favoured retreat of the sex whose charms must ever enhance the fairest of nature's creations. But space forbids our entering upon a theme so exhaustless as that of ancient castles and fair dames. We have brought what we deem the beauties of the engraving before the reader, and must now leave the remainder to his imagination.

NOTICES ON THE HINDU DRAMA AND CONDITION OF THE WOMEN OF INDIA.

BY MRS. POSTANS.

THE Twenty-third of September being the "Shavul Eed," or end of the fast of Ramzan, with the Mohammedans, every thing wore a gay and cheerful aspect as we drove through the great Bazaars of Bombay, on our return from a country visit to the house of our friend Meer Jaffur Ali. The hair of the women was dressed with peculiar care; all wore fresh dyed garments. The children were laden with ornaments, and decked with tinsel, while all were chatting and jesting with each other. Every moustache looked fresh oiled, and every zuluf was redolent of perfume. Swordsmen wore chaplets and necklaces of mogree blossoms, and set their turbans jauntily above one ear, while bunches of roses were tucked in over the other. It was a season of universal satisfaction. On arriving at the Meer's, he came down to receive me, in new robes of most spotless purity, but he looked thin and unwell, from the effects of the long fast. The drawing-room I found filled with guests, it being customary with Orientals to exchange visits of congratulation at this season. Soon after, Nana Narain called on me, and expressed his regret that there was so little of a kind calculated to entertain, now to be seen in Bombay. At the Hooli (spring festival), he said, I might have been amused with the players, who came from the southern parts of the Mahratta country, and acted in the gardens of rich men; but as these people travelled from place to place, nothing of this kind was to be found. Now, that it was not, was matter of great regret to me, for it would have had all the charm of novelty. At the court of his Highness the Nuwaub of Junaghur, several years since, a buffoon, clever enough in his way, had attempted with considerable success, a sort of monologue, descriptive of his own adventures, as a traveller in Central India. And I had seen puppets cleverly managed, and acting scenes of ludicrous caricature; for the people of India are as fond of puppet theatres as Wilhelm Meister is represented to have been; but the dramatic art, I fancied to be entirely lost. Nana Narain, however, proved my error, and he enlarged much on the humour of these strollers, their changes of costume, and how suddenly he who represented Khristna, for example, would add a certain number of stuffed arms to his costume, and re-appear as the mountain goddess, the slayer of the giants, Devi. I asked him if this was not considered very profane, and if the Hindoos were not shocked, to have the attributes of their deities sported with, and their acts thus caricatured by mummers; but he satisfied me on this point at once, by saying, "Oh no! the opinion of the Brahmins was, that if the players only represented such acts as the gods really performed, there could be no harm in it; on the contrary, both acting and listening to such things was considered praiseworthy." Nana Narain told me, that the dialogue was always given in Mahratta, and the actors acquired their parts orally,—as legends, in fact. The practice of the dramatic art had become the profession of a caste, and the idea was common among educated natives, that it was from Southern India that the dramatic art first sprung.

The species of drama, so described by Nana Narain as a favourite diversion, not only of laymen but of priests in India, appears to bear strong affinity to the scriptural dramas, long known to the ecclesiastics of Europe, who thought it no desecration of sacred things, to render them familiar, as "mysteries," by means of the humblest species of the histrionic art. The monks of England, like the Brahmins of India, delighted in this species of drama, and brought in their Angel-land, and their Inferno, with all its concomitants, to this species of composition, with feelings of as much indifference to their character as the priests of Hindooism their Mount Meru and their Khristna. The "mysteries" of England, we know, were adapted to the seasons, and equally so are the plays of India: during the Hooli, the pastoral history of the Indian Apollo, surrounded by the love-enchanted damsels, and piping upon the reed with which he entranced all ears, is the chosen subject; at the Dussera, Devi, in her form of Parvati, or Bhowani, now as an Amazon, now as the Queen of Heaven, and again as she resembles the Grecian Venus, is selected; and in this change, the drama of India, to a certain degree, seems to resemble those autos sacramentales, not peculiar to Spain and the times of Cervantes, but known over the whole of Europe, in monkish days. The players, we learn, had "properties" also, grey beards for old saints, "wigs for the Apostles, and vizards for devils," so that the arms for Devi, and the blue dress for Khristna, are also not without resemblances in the parallel I would draw. On one occasion we are told of an English mystery, that "the devils played most pleasantly." These personages appear to have been jesters, acting as foils to the general seriousness of the play, and carrying on a series of running pleasantry upon the actors. In all primitive dramas, we observe this peculiarity; we have it not only in the "mysteries" of the monks, but in the later plays of the Elizabethan age, in the Pulchinelle of the Italian stage, and in the ancient dramas of India. The jester took in all a prominent part, and in Italy and India it frequently happened, as with the Pulchinello of Naples in our day, that this worthy had no written part prepared for him by the author; but exercised his wit as he would, on the sayings and doings of the rest. This afforded variety, where plays were few in number, or often re-acted, and the jester was required to possess readiness and talent of no ordinary kind, to meet the demand upon this species of extemporaneous wit. It might be difficult to find jesters for our modern plays, did this style still exist; but it could not do so, happily, as the great facility given by the rude license which obtained among a semi-barbarous people, has been long banished from the modern stage; we fear, however, this very condition, which so permitted abuse, was necessary to the support of the dramatic art.

The old drama, of India—not the oral, but the Sanscrit written drama, of which some examples may be found in the Mahratta language, others in the beautiful translations by Professor Wilson and Sir William Jones—is ascribed to the invention of the Sage, Bharata, who, while meditating on the best means for inculcating wisdom, moral and divine, is supposed to have gathered much connected with the subject from the Vedas, or direct inspiration from Brahma. The Goddess Parvati is said also to have taught a species of pantomime to the Princess Ushá, who in her turn instructed the shepherdesses of Dwaká, (Krishna's favourite haunt,) and by them it became known to the women of the whole Surastra Peninsula.

Now the shepherdesses of Dwaká, we know, had much of the Lais and Aspasia character, and this fact of their early teaching in the dramatic art deserves remark, forasmuch as we know, that whether in the east or west, women of reputation remained absolutely ignorant, while the courtezans of Greece, the Almehs of Egypt, and the Gossis of Hindostan, were instructed in learning and the arts, taught philosophy and astronomy, and excelled in dancing, music, languages, and eloquence.

The fathers and husbands of the western portion of the world are disabused of the idea, that ignorance is the main support of female excellence, and they at length agree with Hannah More, that a woman's "being a bad companion, is not an infallible proof of her being a good economist." The opinion, however, in its spirit yet lingers in the East. And it may be, the very fact I have stated of the objectionable characters of that class of women, considered learned in the olden time, yet fosters the idea in India, that knowledge degrades, not elevates woman in her social state; and thus only permits those arts, which should cheer a domestic circle, and relieve from the pressure of more important cares a husband's mind, to be practised by Natchwomen and other reputationless people. This is a great and serious difficulty connected with the question of the education of the women of India. It immediately suggests itself as such, to those studying or acquainted with the subject; and as the only remedy appears to be, the instruction of the male part of the community to the point at which they will perceive their error, I have always held the opinion, that to educate the women of India in their present social condition is impossible, and the attempt useless, because irrational. The fathers, husbands, and brothers in Indian families must first learn, that knowledge brings with it wisdom, to the increase of virtue, and additional powers of usefulness. Thus felt, they will not fear it for their women, and once possessed of acquirements which render companionship necessary to happiness, and that happiness being in proportion to the equality of the powers of companionship, it will follow, (but I fear not till then,) that in Indian families it will be considered desirable, that gentlewomen should be skilled in other matters than the making sweetmeats and dying garments, and occupy their memory with facts more worthy its exercise than the ceremonies connected with a sprig of sweet-basil (Tulsi) or a mixture of oil and ochre. But I have digressed widely from the subject of Nana Narain's conversation, which had for its theme, the drama, ancient and modern, as found in India.

The Brahmin, as I have said, saw no harm in this mimicry of the gods, so general in Mahratta drama; he answered the doubt, as Thespis is said to have replied to Solon, who inquired of him concerning the evil of fable, "That it was no harm to say or do these things in jest, and by way of diversion;" and thus a god, or a demi-god, is usually the hero of the ten kinds of dramas described in the Dasa Rupáka, or form of Hindoo dramas. It is also worthy remark, that tender and dignified love, a passion not supposed to be known in the present day in India, formed a considerable portion of the interest of the old Hindoo drama, and women were every where connected with the business of the scene. The love, too, is of a peculiar kind, and affords an elevated idea of the state of society. For it is neither the stately chivalrous sentiment of knightly times, nor that selfish, sensual, and degrading one, so common in the East; but appears on the stage, as we suppose it to have been in life, noble, confiding, and full of personal sacrifice. The energy, purity, and devotedness of the female character, is constantly displayed, and like Sardanapalus, many a worthless man is elevated in the scale of being, and many a wicked one preserved from the just punishment of his evil deeds, by the love of woman! It is certain that the rigid seclusion also of Hindoo women followed after the Mohammedan invasion, with the introduction by the Moslems of the Hareem system; as previous to that time the women were permitted to visit the temples and baths, to form part of all bridal processions, and to take a prominent part in all general affairs of life. Married women appeared free from all restraint, and all who were yet single, received addresses from their suitors, although prevented by the manners of the times from replying to them. All these facts prove a very different state of society among the Hindoos, to what is observable in our times, but intelligent Brahmins know these things were so; and if the objects of the Brahma Subbha be, to restore old customs to the destruction of more modern abuses, it is earnestly to be hoped that the condition of women may form part of the plan, and the Hareem system be in due time abolished.

There was something singularly quaint in the arrangement of the old Hindoo dramatic representations; they had first a prefatory address, made by a sort of Gower; then a benediction on the audience; this concluded, the stage manager, the "Thespis" of his time, enters, and plainly states the name of the piece, the "Toy Cart," or the "Sácontala," for instance, with the plot, and general character of the play. And then, "the bustle having ended," as the stage directions give it, (for the Hindoo dramas had abundance of instruction in stage business, with exits, entrances, and so on, clearly laid down,) the play commenced.

The Hindoos appear never to have had Theatres, but to have acted as they do now, in the open court-yards and gardens of great men; playing by daylight, and early in the morning. We find in Greece and Rome the same practice, and in Spain, and it is said in England also, although the climate must have been little suited to it. There seems to have been no attempt at scenery, neither is there now, by the Mahratta strollers; but furniture is used, with weapons in character, costume is attended to, and cattle often introduced to give an air of truthfulness to the whole.

The jester, whom I have already remarked, is, singularly enough, always represented as a Brahmin; one, moreover, full of humour, as his character requires,—a gourmand, a wine-bibber, a lover of ease, and generally devoted to all epicurean enjoyments.

Inquiry into the condition and character of the dramatic art in the early history of a people, must ever be rich with interest; it gives us the lucid mirror in which society is most distinctly seen in its true state; there is no illusion in the matter, but the "minds of men and women" are rendered as familiar as the faces that we look on, day by day, in the present time. The ancient drama of India affords us as convincing proof as the annotators on the Vedas can do, that a variety of causes have conspired materially to change the manners and customs of the Hindoo people. And while we find authors daring, like the writer of the Decameron, to hold up to ridicule and contempt the follies, indulgences, and vices of the priestly class, we observe—and it is a fact worthy of all attention—that at the same period in Hindoo history, women were free in thought and action, were the companions and sharers of counsel with men, and were treated with the tender respect which such a condition would engender. It is always more satisfactory to restore the knowledge of good to a people than to introduce it; as superior results seem thus easier to attain. Timid or prejudiced minds are apt to cling somewhat tenaciously to old, tried things, however unfit they may be any longer to support them on a path where they have certainly advanced; and therefore, when security is given that the better thing is really that of the highest antiquity among them,—the rock, as it were, on which corruption has gathered, like fungi, that may yet easily be removed, and the strong thing remain,—the ease with which the corruptions are removed is, comparatively speaking, matter of great encouragement to the reformer. To this truth we look hopefully for the rapid progression of social and religious good among the people of India. The question has now anxiously arisen among themselves, "Who can show us any good? What were we of old? was our belief in all particulars, when the Munis (or sages) received inspiration from Brahma, (or the elementary spirit of the universe,) such as it is now? or in what has it changed?" We here observe a shaking of the dry bones; doubt leads to inquiry, inquiry to controversy, controversy to thought, and thought so exercised, we believe, will enforce the acceptance of truth.

We then spoke of an article that had appeared a few days before this in a local paper, on the condition of the women of India, and which I had sent Nana Narain to peruse, with a view of receiving his opinion on it. He said it was written with great prejudice, and very ignorantly; and many such things were so, purporting to afford information connected with the people of India. The writer had spoken of the women of India, as of a class tyrannized over by cruel taskmasters—as a class purposely kept in a state of intellectual darkness, born to suffering and endurance, and denied all kindness and sympathy from those who thus held them in a state of abject slavery and hopeless degradation. "Now, Mrs. Postans," said Nana, "I will show you how false all this is. If the family is very poor, the wife must work as well as the husband, to gain food for the children,—for instance, while the Cooli is labouring in the fields, his wife must drive forth the village cattle, or carry the banians grain-baskets on her head; and she must grind the corn, and make cakes, and fetch water for the house. A woman of the middling rank of life—my wife, for instance—does not go to market, but has a servant to assist her; she cooks, and nurses the children, and visits her neighbours, and chats to me on my return to my house, and has the management of everything. I give her all the money I receive as my salary, and never interfere in domestic concerns: if the children marry, my wife arranges this matter, according to her will, and only consults with me about it."

A rich man's wife, such as Sunkersett's,¹ walks about the bazaars, with male and female attendants, (in consideration of her rank,) as she pleases, and visits her friends, and amuses herself, wearing jewels and rich apparel; "she considers a field and buyeth it,"² neither does her husband interfere with her property or speculations. All native women cook for their husbands, which, at first sight, seems an office of degradation; but this is not the case. A Hindoo can only eat that which is prepared for him by one of his own caste. If he is a high caste man, though other offices of a menial kind may be performed for him by his inferiors in this respect, they cannot prepare his food, and consequently his wife must—as Rebekah “made savoury meat”⁽¹⁾ for Isaac—knead and bake the bread, that her lord may eat. In the East, the preparation of food by the wives of rich men was never deemed an office of degradation, but one of confidence and necessary aid. When the prophet strangers rested, in the heat of the day, on the plain of Mamre, we find, that “Abraham hastened into the tent to Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it and make cakes upon the hearth;”⁽²⁾ and we know that “Abraham was very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold,” and that he loved and honoured his fair wife Sarai, and entreated her kindly.

If we compare the condition of the women of England and India, we shall find in many cases that the lot of the gentler sex is often happier in the last. The Cooli woman, in a climate that to her is genial, perhaps suffers less than the basket-woman, or the poor strawberry carrier of civilized England; the wife in the middle classes is less oppressed by care, and the dreadful doubts attending the means of rearing and providing for her growing family, so heart-racking with many among us. And, perhaps, the lady of a rich Hindoo, amusing her leisure among her children, handmaidens, and friends, with gossip, dress, religious observances, the preparation of cosmetics and confections, and the production of brilliant dyes, may not suffer more in the society of the merry group about her, than the European lady of fashion, weary in mind and body, with that perpetual round of meaningless dissipation forced on her by the exigent character of refined society.

The truth, I believe, is this:—the women of India have few subjects for complaint in their social condition. Their husbands are, for the most part, attached and kind, their children singularly affectionate, their servants obedient and faithful, their friends cheerful and good-hearted. The evil to be deplored is in their intellectual condition—in their lack of education; and this, not only as affects these women as individuals, but as those responsible members of society who must ever exert the strongest influence on it, either for evil or for good. The women of India generally are totally uninformed. The Mohammedan girl learns to read a few verses of the Koran from an old Moollah in the family, as my friend the Meer’s little daughters do, and there education ends with them. The Hindoo women gain a fair acquaintance with their festivals, and certain ceremonies to be observed for good luck’s sake, in their families, but seek no farther to pluck fruit from the tree of knowledge. Still, as the Brahmin observed, the men are generally quite on an equality with their wives in matters of ignorance; and much as we grieve over this condition now, if we look back to the social history of “merrie Englande” in the olden time, we shall find the squire thinking less of his library than of his stables, while the dame, his wife, is busy in the still-room among her maidens; and judging by the general female correspondence even of the Augustan age of England, we shall find, that, from the ignorance of both sexes, conversation could scarcely have taken a tone in domestic intercourse, beyond the most trivial circumstances of every-day life, or the interests of the ménage. As men became intelligent and liberal, so did society take a higher tone, and the value of woman, not only as a housewife but as a companion, began to be understood. She was no longer considered as an encumbrance in society, but required to grace it; and it was understood that, although never intended by nature to rival or equal man in his energies, capabilities, or pursuits, woman still possessed faculties as well as virtues, by which the rugged path of life might be not only smoothed, but rendered bright with flowers of the richest hues. The fascinations and influences of woman were then really felt in all their powers of purifying and ennobling influence, and a tender reverence sprang up in men’s hearts towards her, as superior to that which agitated them during the brightest days of knightly chivalry, as the regard of a true English-hearted husband is superior to the feeling which renders the wife of a Hindoo (courteous as he may be) indulged and cared for by the father of her children.

Early marriages and betrothments are generally considered as among the evils of the condition of woman in India, but, I think, unjustly. Such unions neither produce the vice nor misery which they do in European countries,—France, for instance, where a girl is taken from the convent to the altar. In India, she is indeed conducted from her father’s harem to the chamber filled with marriage guests, and there consigned to the charge of one unknown, unloved, the future partner of her life;—a piece of sheer inconsistent, irrational cruelty, as it seems, in both cases. And yet with us, in liberal England, “love matches” are not proverbially happy ones, nor do women make better wives because, as girls, they thought and acted for themselves, while inexperienced in the world, and totally devoid of judgment. An Indian marriage has, at least, circumstances of suitability about it. The girl is united to a man of her own condition; she is still protected by her friends and family; her interest is cared for; and the Indian woman, at the worst, is never, like her unmarried English sister, compelled to toil for sustenance, often unprotected and careworn, through a long life of trial, with none to aid or comfort her—none to pity or sustain when sickness or old age add their sharper pangs to her lot of sorrow, solitude, and deprivation.

Many gay, light-hearted young mothers, may think it quite terrible to live in families where there is no “dear soul” of an old maiden aunt or sister to lighten her nursery cares, and with active kindness to regulate her household and abridge the number of her duties ;—but, if we think of those poor solitary beings without such friends, without such kindly nieces, and their merry offspring, it will be acknowledged, that woman is, perhaps, on the whole, safer under the Indian social arrangement than under the English ; and as “hard-hearted” husbands are not more common there than in other lands, a little damsel, “rising four,” decked with jewels and brocades, and paraded with her future lord, an urchin also not yet in his teens, to the sound of loud music, through a great bazaar, followed by “troops of friends,” and moving in a very grove of banners,—does not, after all, seem a very pitiable object ; the less so, as we know, that for the next seven years she will be playing with Surat toys in her father's harem, with the merry children of her friends or slaves, and not be exposed to have her poor little half-formed heart broken by any vagrant fancies for the numerous Ghoolam Alees, or very attractive Kumal Mahomeds, who, unknown to the pretty Ameena, may be smoking their kaliuns under the widely-spreading trees of the paternal dwelling.

DEBORAH'S DIARY.

April 23.

SPRING is coming on apace. Father even sits between the wood fire and the open casement, enjoying y^e mild air, but 'tis not considered healthful.

“My dear,” says mother to him this morning, after some hours' absence, “I have bought me a new mantle of the most absolute fancy. 'Tis sad-coloured, which I knew you would approve, but with a garniture of orange-tawny ; three plaits at the waist behind, and a little stuck-up collar.”

“You are a conical woman,” says father, “to spend soe much money and mind on a thing your husband will never see.”

“Oh ! but it cost noe money at all,” says she ; “that is the best of it.”

“What is the best of it ?” rejoined he. “I suppose you bartered for it, if you did not buy it—you women are always for cheap pennyworths. Come, what was the ransom ? One of my old books, or my new coat ?”

“Your last new coat may be called old too, I'm sure,” says mother ; “I believe you married me in it.”

“Nay,” says father, “and what if I did ? 'Twas new then, at any rate ; and the Cid Ruy Diaz was married in a black satin doublet, which his father had worn in three or four battles.”

“A poor compliment to the bride,” says mother.

“Well, but, dear Betty, what has gone for this copper-coloured mantle ?—Sylvester's ‘Du Bartas’ ?” . . .

“Nothing of the sort,—nothing you value or will ever miss. An old gold pocket-piece, that hath lain perdue, e'er soe long, in our dressing-table drawer.”

He smote the table with his hand. “Woman !” cried he, changing colour, “'twas a medal of honour given to my father by a Polish prince ! It should have been an heir-loom. There, say noe more about it now. 'Tis in your Jew's fining-pot ere this. ‘The furnace for silver and the fining-pot for gold, but . . . the Lord trieth the spirits.’ Ay me ! mine is tried sometimes.”

Uncle Kit most opportunelie entering at this moment, instantaneuslie changed his key-note.

“Ha, Kit !” he cries, gladly, “here you find me, as usual, maundering among my women. Welcome, welcome ! How is it with you, and what's the news ?”

“Why, the news is, that the plague's coming on amain,” says my uncle ; “they say it's been smouldering among us all y^e winter, and now it's bursting out.”

“Lord save us !” says mother, turning pale.

“You may say that,” says uncle ; “but you must alsoe try to save yourselves. For my part, I see not what shoulde keep you in town. Come down to us at Ipswich ; my brother and you shall have y^e haunted chamber ; and we can make plenty of shakedown for the girls in y^e atticks. Your maids can look after matters here. By the way, you have a Merlin's Head sett up in your neighbourhood ; I saw your black-eyed maid come forth of it as I passed.”

Mother bit her lip ; but father broke forth with, “What can we expect but that a judicial punishment shoulde befall a land where y^e corruption of the Court, more potent and subtile in its infection than anie pestilence, hath tainted everie open resort and bye-corner of the capital and country ? Our sins cry aloud ; our pulpits, counters, and closetts alike witness agaynst us. 'Tis, as with y^e people soe with the priest, as with the buyer soe with the seller, as with the maid soe with her mistress. Plays, interludes, gaming-houses, sabbath debauches, dancing-rooms, Merry-Andrews, Jack Puddings, quacks, false prophesyings—”

“Ah ! we can excuse a little bitterness in the losing party now,” says uncle ; “but do you seriously mean to say you think us more deserving of judicall punishment under the glorious Restoration than during the unnatural Rebellion ? Sure you have had time to cool upon that.”

“Certainly I mean to say so,” answers father. “During the unnatural Rebellion, as you please to call it, the Commonwealth never had a fair trial ; its duration was very short—”

“Very short, indeed,” observes uncle, coughing. “Only from Worcester fight, Fifty-one, to Noll's dissolution of the Long Parliament, Fifty-three, yet quite long enough to see what it was.”

“I deny that, as well as your dates,” says father. “We enjoyed a Commonwealth under the Protector, who, had he not assumed that high office which gave him his name, would have lacked opportunity of showing that he was capable of filling the most exalted station with vigour and ability. He secured a wise peace, obtained the respectfull concurrence of foreign powers, filled our domestick courts with upright judges, and respected the rights of conscience.”

“Why, suppose I admitted all this, which I am far from doing,” says uncle, “what was he but a king, except by just title? What had become, meantime, of your Commonwealth?"

"Softly, Kit," returns father. "The Commonwealth was progressing, meantime, like a little rivulet that rises among the hills, amid weeds and moss, and gradually works itself a widening channel, filtering over beds of gravel, and obstructed here and there by fragments of rock, that sorely chafe and trouble it, at the very time that, to the distant observer, it looks most picturesque and beautiful."

"Well, I suppose I was never distant enough to see it in this picturesque point of view," says uncle. "Legitimate monarchy was, to my mind, the rock over which the brawling river leaped awhile, and which, in the end, successfully opposed it; and as to your Oliver, he was a cunning fellow that diverted its course to turn his own mill."

"They that can see any virtue or comeliness in a Charles Stuart," says father, "can hardly be expected to acknowledge the rugged merits of a plain republican."

"Plain was the very last thing he was," says uncle, "either in speaking or dealing. He was as cunning as a fox, and as rough as a bear."

"We can overlook the roughness of a good man," says father; "and if a temper subject to hasty ebullitions is better than one which, by blows and hard usage, has been silenced into sullenness, a republic is better than an absolute sovereignty."

"Aye; and if a temper under the control of reason and principle," rejoins uncle, "is better than one unaccustomed to restrain its hasty ebullitions, a limited monarchy is better than a republic."

"But ours is not limited enough," persists father.

"Wait awhile," returns uncle, "till, as you say, we have filtered over the gravel a little longer, and then see how clear we shall run."

"I don't see much present chance of it," says father. "Such a king, and such a court!"

"The king and court will soon shift quarters, I understand," says uncle; "for fear of this coming sickness. 'Twould be a rare thing, indeed, for the king to take the plague!"

"Why not the king, as well as any of his commons?" says father. "Tush! I am tired of the account people make of him. 'Is Philip dead?' 'No; but he is sick.' Pray, what is it to us, whether Philip is sick or not?"

"Which of the Phillips', my dear?" asks mother. "Did you say Jack Phillips was sick?"

"No, dear Betty; only a King of Macedon, who lived a long time ago."

"Doctor Brice commends you much for your grounding the Phillips's so excellently in the classics," says uncle.

"He should think whether his praise is much worth having," says father, rather haughtily. "The young men were indebted to me for a competent knowledge of the learned tongues—no more."

"Nay, somewhat more," rejoined uncle; "and the praise of a worthy man is surely always worth having."

"If he be our superior in the thing wherein he praises us," returned father. "His praise is then a medal of reward; but it should never be a current coin, banded from one to another. And the inferior may never praise the superior."

Uncle was silent a moment, and then softly uttered, "My soul, praise the Lord."

"There you have me," says father, instantly softening. "Laud we the name of the Lord, but let's not laud one another."

"Ah! I can't wait to argue y^e point," says uncle. "I must back to the Temple."

"Stay a moment, Kit. Have you scene 'the Mysterie of Jesuitism'?"

"No; have you seen the proof, that London, not Rome, is the city on seven hills? Ludgate Hill, Fish-street Hill, Dowgate Hill, Garlick Hill, Saffron Hill, Holborn Hill, and Tower Hill. Clear as day!"

"Come, don't go yet. We will fight over some of our old feuds. There will be a roast pig on table at one o'clock, and, I fancy, a tansy-pudding."

"I can't fancy tansy-pudding," says uncle, shuddering; "I cannot abide tansies, even in Lent. Besides, I'm expecting a reference."

"Oh! very well; then drop in again in the evening, if you will; and very likely you will meet Cyriack Skinner. And you shall have cold pig for supper, not forgetting the currant-sauce, Wiltshire cheese, carraways, and some of your own wine."

"Well, that sounds good. I don't mind if I do," says uncle; "but don't expect me after nine."

"I'm in bed by nine," says father.

"Oh, Lor'!" says uncle; and with a comical look at us, he went off.

Uncle Kit did not come last night; I did not much expect he would; nor Mr. Skinner. Instead, we had Dr. Paget, and one or two others, who talked dolefully all y^e evening of signs of the times, till they gave me the horrors. One had seen a ghost, or at least, scene a crowd looking at a ghost or for a ghost, in Bishopgate churchyard, that comes out, and points hither and thither at future graves. Another had scene an apparition, or meteor, somewhat of human or angelic shape, in y^e air. Father laugh'd at the first, but did not so discredit in toto y^e other; observing, that Theodore Beza believed at one time in astrologick signs; and thought that y^e appearance of the notable star in Cassiopea betokened y^e universal end. And as for angels, he said they were, unquestionless, ministering spirits, not onlie sent forth to minister unto y^e heirs of salvation, but sometimes instruments of God's wrath, to execute judgments upon ungodly men, and convince them of the ill deeds which they have ungodly committed; as during the pestilence in David's time, when the king saw the destroying angel standing between heaven and earth, having a drawn sword in his hand, stretched over Jerusalem. Such delegates we might, without fanaticism, suppose to be the generall though unseen instruments of public chastisements; and, for our particular comfort, we had equal reason to repose on the assurance, that even amid the pestilence that walked in darkness, and the destruction that wasted by noon-day, the angels had charge over each particular believer, to keep them in all their ways. Adding, that, though he forbore, with Calvin, to pronounce that each man had his own guardian spirit, — a subject whereon Scripture was silent, — we had the Lord's own word for it, that little children were the particular care of holy angels.

And this, and othermuch to same purport, had soe soothing and sedative an effect, that we might have gone to bed in peacefull trust; onlie that Dr. Paget must needs bring up, after supper, the correlative theme of the great Florentine plague, and y^e poisoned wells, which sett father off upon the acts of mercy of Cardinal Borromeo, — not him called St. Charles, but the Cardinal-archbishop, — and soe, to the pestilence at Geneva, when even the bars and locks of doors were poisoned by a gang of wretches, who thought to pillage the dwellings of the dead; till we all went to bed, moped to death.

Howbeit, I had been warmly asleep some hours, (more by token I had read the ninety-first Psalm before getting into bed,) when Anne, clinging to me, woke me up with a shrill cry. I whispered, fearfullie, "What is 't? — a thief under the bed?"

"No, no," she replies. "Listen!"

Soe I did for a while; and was just going to say — "You were dreaming," when a hollow voice in the street, beneath our window, distinctlie proclaimed, —

"Yet forty days, and London shall be destroyed! I will overturn, overturn, overturn it! Oh! woe, woe, woe!"

I sprang out of bed, fell over Anne's shoes, got up agayn, and ran to the window. There was nothing to be seen but long, black shadows in the streets. The moon was behind the house. After looking forthe awhile, with teeth chattering, I was about to drop y^e curtain, when, afar off, whether in or over some distant quarter of y^e town, I heard the same voice, clearlie enow to recognise y^e rhythm, though not the words. I crept to bed, chilled and awe-stricken; yet, after cowering awhile, and saying our prayers, we both fell asleep.

The first sounde this morning was of weeping and wayling. Mother had beene scared by y^e night-warning, and wearied father to have us alle into y^e countrie. He thought the danger not yet imminent, the expense considerable, and the outcry that of some crazy fanaticke; ne'erthelesse, consented to employ Elwood to look us out some country lodgings; having noo mind to live upon my uncle at Ipswich.

Mary, strange to say, had heard noe noise; nor had the maids; but servants always sleep heavily.

Some of the pig having beene sett aside for my uncle, and mother fancying it for her breakfast, was much putt out, on going into the larder, to find it gone. Betty, of course, sayd it was the cat. Mother made answer, she never knew a cat partiall to cold pig; and the door having been latched, was suspicious of a Puss in Boots.

Betty cries — "Plague take the cat!"

Mother rejoyns — "If the plague does take him, I shall certainly have him hanged."

"Then we shall be overrun with rats," says Betty.

"I shall buy ratsbane for them," says mother; and soe into the parlour, where father, having hearde y^e whole dialogue, had been greatlie amused.

At twilight, she went to look at y^e pantry fastenings herselfe, but, suddenlie hearing a dolorous voyce either within or immediately without, cry, "Oh! woe, woe!" she naturallie drew back. However, being a woman of much spirit, she instantlie recovered herselfe, and went forward; but no one was in the pantry. The occurrence, therefore, made the more impression; and she came up somewhat scared, and asked if we had heard it.

"My dear," says father, "you awoke me in y^e midst of a most interesting colloquy between Sir Thomas More and Erasmus. However, I think a dog barked, or rather, howled, just now. Are you sure the words were not 'Bow, wow, wow?'"

Another night-larum; but onlie from father, who wanted me to write for him, — a task he has much intromitted of late. Mother was hugelie annoyed at it, and sayd, — "My dear, I am persuaded, that if you would not persist in going to bed soe earlie, you would not awake at these untimelie hours."

"That is very well for you to say," returned he, "who can sew and spin the whole evening through; but I, whose long entire day is night, grow soe tired of it by nine o'clock, that I am fit for nothing but bed."

"Well," says she, "I often find that brushing my hair wakes me up when I am drowzy. I will brush yours to-morrow evening, and see if we cannot keep you up a little later, and provide sounder rest for you when you do turn in."

Soe, this evening, she casts her apron over his shoulders, and commences combing his hair, chatting of this and that, to keep him in good humour.

"What beautiful hair this is of yours, my dear!" says she, — "soe fine, long, and soft! scarcelie a silver thread in it. I warrant there's manie a young gallant at court would be proud of such."

"Girls, put your scissars out of your mother's way," says father; "she's a perfect Dalilah, and will whip off half my curls before I can count three, unless you look after her. And I," he adds, with a sigh, "am, in one sort, a Samson."

"I'm sure Dalilah never treated Samson's old coat with such respect," says mother, finishing her task, resuming her apron, and kissing him. "Soe now, keep your eyes open — I mean, keep awake, till I bring you a gossip's bowl."

When she was gone, father continued sitting bolt upright, his eyes, as she sayd, (his beautiful eyes!) open and wakefull, and his countenance composed, yet grave, as if his thoughts were at least as far off as Tangrolipix, the Turk. All at once, he says,—

"Deb, are my sleeves white at the elbow?"

"No, father."

"Or, am I shiny about the shoulders?"

"No, father."

"Why, then," cries he, gaily, "this coat can't be very old, however long I may have worn it. I'll rub on in it still; and your mother and you will have the more money for copper-coloured clokes. But don't, at any time, let your father get shabby, children. I would never be threadbare nor unclean. Let my habitt be neat and spotless, my hands well washed and uncrumpled, as becometh a gentleman. As for my sword in y^e corner, your mother may send that after my medal as soon as she will. The Cid parted with his Tizona in his life-time; see a peaceable man, whose eyes, like the prophet Abijah's, are set, may well doe y^e same."

BOTANICAL GLEANINGS.

BY W. W. FYFE.

IN entering a Botanic Garden it is all very well to see the fine plants, whether trees, shrubs, or flowers, assembled from every clime, and labelled with scientific nomenclature, at the public expense. But were it generally known of what much-loved names and truly interesting histories many of the most strange in aspect and unpronounceable in title are possessed, we are convinced that a great and popular thirst for a more familiar acquaintance with botany would be universally excited. Even in the poet's hands this simple and elegant science, though with nature for its inspirer, has been sadly abused with a straining after classicality. Ravished with the high-sounding music of Dr. Darwin's "Botanic Garden" and "Loves of the Flowers," who has not felt wearied, disappointed, and repelled by his heathen mythology and hackneyed bathos of classic fable? Botany has fared even worse at the hands of its prose chroniclers. The Eleusinian mysteries themselves were not more sacred to the initiated, than are the simple facts connected with a simple flower to those who monopolise the knowledge of this kingdom of nature, by means of abstruse and technical study.

It is not for the purpose of denying the advantages of scientific nomenclature, well settled and of universal acceptance, (which is far, however, from being the case amongst botanists,) that we hazard these remarks. But it is because the scientific botanists have manifestly conspired to shut the avenues which admit the diffusion of a vast amount of useful knowledge, out of the arena of their science, that we complain of their studious care to prevent its taking a popular form. There is only one way, indeed, in which this could be done with safety; and it is by combining the scientific with the popular explanation in so intimate a degree, that the ill-natured adage of Pope may as little hold good as his relative injunction:—

"A little learning is a dangerous thing—Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

We are glad to see one book put forth in which an endeavour of this kind has been made. We allude to the new Manual of Botany, by Professor Balfour of Edinburgh, in which both features have been so effectually blended, as to show the learned Professor not to be afraid of popularity. It has struck us that a "creaming" of the popular portion of this book might not only be acceptable to the readers of this Journal, but might serve to show intelligibly the advantages which the general reader might derive from the throwing open of botanical science to popular study and appreciation.

The plea for a definite nomenclature and classification in botany is founded upon the existence of upwards of 100,000 known species of plants; for species are held to include all the individuals separately formed at the creation of the world, and perpetuated ever since. Varieties, exhibiting only minor differences, not incompatible with a common origin, and arising from soil, exposure, and other causes, evince a constant tendency to return to the specific type. But cultivation has produced permanent varieties, or races, varying much from the original type; as in the cases of the Cereal grains, wheat, barley, oats, &c. and culinary vegetables—say cabbages, cauliflower, broccoli, turnips, radishes, peas. These permanent varieties were not established all at once; but only after a series of years, and by the art and skill of the gardener or cultivator: and even yet, on a poor soil, and in a neglected condition, there is still a tendency in their seeds to produce the original wild form. Many species, however, vary in a manner so remarkable, that external influences fail to account for it. This is the case with that beautiful and favourite plant, the fuchsia. It has produced in successive years flowers differing so much in form and shape, that, if they had not been known to be produced by the same plant, they would have been considered as belonging to distinct species. Some indeed have, of late years, advanced the doctrine of transmutation of species, or, the conversion of one species into another; they have said, (we believe it was the Rev. Lord Alfred Harvey, son of the Marquis of Bristol, that first announced it as the result of an experiment at Brighton,) that oats may be changed into rye by being constantly cut down for a series of years before flowering. But there is no foundation for such an opinion. All the species more nearly allied than others are grouped together, as a distinct kind, or genus. Roses, for instance, compose a genus distinguished by marked characters. And it was amongst the highest titles Linnaeus earned to fame, that he invented the device of giving, in the name of a plant, the genus as well as species. Rosa spinosissima is a particular species of rose; Rosa being the generic, spinosissima the specific, or, as Linnaeus called it, the "trivial" name of the plant.

But, after all, it is in the multitude of minute and individual facts, rather than in the classification of names and the conflict of systems, that the value of knowledge in general, and of the knowledge of plants in particular, consists; and often, when the cacophonous jargon of modern science has grated on our ear, have we longed to live back in the history of human intelligence, that we might, with Shakspeare, be "culling of simples" under the moon—instead of botanizing with a microscope!

Let us descend then to particulars, and begin with the Crow-foot family—name familiar to the lover of field flowers. These plants are found in cold, damp climates, and in the elevated regions of warm countries. Europe contains one-fifth of them, and North America about a seventh. The clematis, anemone, ranunculus, hellebore, &c., belong to them. They have narcotic and acrid properties and are usually more or less poisonous. The acridity, which varies in different parts of the plants, and at different seasons, is usually volatile—it flies off when the plants are dried or heated. One of them, monkshood, contains a narcotic, used as an anodyne—a (medicine which, by its soothing qualities, assuages pain)—and is chiefly employed where the nerves are affected. The root of another, (aconitum,) furnishes that powerful East Indian poison called Bikh or Nabee. The irritant and narcotic seeds of Stavesacre are used for destroying vermin. The Hellebores, however, have been the most noted for their irritant effects. Some of them act as drastic purgatives, and were used in ancient times in cases of mania. Thus we read in Plutarch that Carneades, the disciple of Zeno the stoic, when about to encounter his master in disputation, purged his head with white hellebore, that the corrupt humours of his stomach might not affect the clearness of his brain. May-apple is employed in America as a purgative. And many of the crow-flowers are marked by bitter tonic properties.

The Magnolia family, though found chiefly in North America, (certain species also occurring in South America, China, Japan, New Holland, and New Zealand,) may, perhaps, be familiar in name, if not in appearance. The properties of the order are bitter, tonic, and often aromatic. The star-anise, having the taste and odour of anise, is used as a carminative, or medicine bearing the name of a "song" or "charm," from its soothing operation, and employed to assuage pain, and drive off flatulency. Captain Winter brought from the Straits of Magellan, in 1579, the magnolia, which yields Winter's-bark; employed medicinally, as an aromatic stimulant. The bark of swamp sassafras, or beaver-tree, is, in fact, used as a substitute for Peruvian bark; and the tulip-tree has similar properties. Magnolias are remarkable for their large odoriferous flowers, and tonic qualities.

The Custard apple family possess, generally, aromatic and fragrant properties; though some of the plants are bitter and tonic, while others yield edible fruits. Amongst these last, we have the custard-apples, sweet-sops and sour-sops of the East and West Indies—fruits of which even the steam navigation to the latter region has scarcely provided us the enjoyment as yet. But the cherimoyer is a well-known Peruvian fruit; so is the Ethiopian pepper, a fruit which enters into the important consumption of pepper in Africa. One species belonging to this order is called bitter-wood, in the West Indies; and lance-wood, so much employed by coachmakers, appears to be furnished by a plant belonging to the order.

The bitter and narcotic Moon-seed family is common in the tropical parts of Asia and America; some of them are employed as tonics, but others are poisonous, and little distinction seems, in one notable instance, at least, to have been made in the matter, since Cocculus indicus, the fruit of one of the moon-seed tribe, it is well known, was at one time employed most prejudicially to give bitterness to London porter! as if the Thames water were not deleterious enough without a slight taste of Indian poison.

The Berberry family of shrubs, or perennial herbaceous plants, are found chiefly in the mountainous parts of the temperate regions of the northern hemisphere. They have both bitter and acid properties. The astringent bark and stem of the common berberry yield a yellow dye; whilst its fruit, containing oxalic acid, is used as a preserve.

The Water-lily family, to which botanists, with rare felicity, have given the lovely name of Nymphaea, have very showy flowers; and although found throughout the northern hemisphere, whilst generally rare in the southern, yet it is in the waters of South America, ranging over thirty-five degrees of longitude, that Victoria regina, one of the largest known aquatics, expands its large flowers, a foot in diameter, with its still larger leaves, which are in diameter from four to six and a half feet, and dispenses its delicious odour.

Of this plant there is a delightful reminiscence wafted from the poetry of L. E. L.

"There floats the water-lily, like a sovereign Whose lovely empire is a fairy world;
The purple dragon-fly above it hovering,
As when its fragile ivory uncurl'd,
A long time ago."

The lotus figured on Egyptian and Indian monuments is said to belong to the Water-bean family of aquatic plants, with showy flowers and floating leaves, found in the temperate as well as the tropical regions of the old and new world; and the fruit of the plant whose flower is supposed to be the lotus, is said to be the Pythagorean bean. This plant has disappeared from the Nile, where it used to abound.

"Shadowy and cool, some pilgrims, on their way
To Sais or Bubastis, among beds
Of lotus-flowers, that close above their heads
Push their light barks, and there, as in a bower,
Sing, talk, or sleep away the sultry hour;
Oft dipping in the Nile, when faint with heat,
That leaf from which its waters drink most sweet.

Some of the spiral vessels of its petioles and peduncles have been used for the sufficiently common-place purpose of wicks of candles,—the candle, surely, to whose faint rays Alciphron was attracted, when he

"———seem'd
To be transported far away
To a bleak desert plain, where gleam'd
One single melancholy ray,

Throughout that darkness, dimly shed
 From a small taper in the hand
 Of one, who, pale as are the dead,
 Before him took a spectral stand,
 And said, while awfully a smile
 Came o'er the wanness of his cheek—
 'Go, and beside the sacred Nile
 You'll find th' Eternal Life you seek.'

The Sidesaddle-flower family (there is such a group, although their properties are not yet known) appear in North America and Guiana.

With the Poppy family we are, however, more familiar; though few will be prepared to learn that they are chiefly European. This, notwithstanding their extension over Tropical America, Asia, China, New Holland, the Cape of Good Hope, &c., is, however, the case. They are distinguished by their milky or coloured juice, and the well marked narcotic properties of their order. The concrete milky juice from the unripe capsules of the somniferous poppy is, in fact, opium—the particular plant from which it is procured being a native of Western Asia, and not improbably of Southern Europe also; but now distributed over various other countries besides. In fact, there are five known kinds of opium—Turkey, Egyptian, East Indian, European, and Persian. The Turkey opium is chiefly used in Britain. Its most important principle is an alkaloid called morphia. It is not a little remarkable, that, besides acting, according to circumstances, as a stimulant for rousing and a narcotic for lulling the faculties, opium acts also as an anodyne for assuaging pain, and a diaphoretic, promoting perspiration. But its strange, varied and startling effects have been too broadly given to the public in the works of De Quincey, Macnish, Abercromby, and Christison, to admit of being recapitulated here. The beautiful eschscholtzia of the garden, whose calyx resembles very much an extinguisher, belongs to the poppy family.

The Cruciferus, or Cresswort family, are a very extensive order, chiefly European. Everything connected with them goes by fours—generally in the form of a cross. None of them are poisonous, but most of them antiscorbutic and stimulant. In fact, they are cabbages, cauliflowers, turnips, radishes, cresses, horse-radishes, and other garden stuffs most familiar to our readers. Sulphur and nitrogen are contained in them to such an extent, that their decaying odours are anything but agreeable. Not only the garden vegetables, but the more ordinary garden flowers, such as wall-flowers, stocks, rockets, honesty, &c., belong to the order. Cabbage, cauliflower, brocoli, and savoy, are the varied products derived from one original (Brassica oleracea) by the art of the gardener; the edible part of cauliflower being just a mass of deformed flower stalks. In like manner the common turnip is the true parent of the Swedish. The black mustard plant, furnishing table mustard, is called Sinapis nigra. Its seeds contain a bland fixed oil, myronic acid, a peculiar bitter principle, and also myrosine, another principle, akin to albumen or the white of an egg. When water is added, the myronic acid and myrosine form a pungent volatile oil by their combination. This oil contains the sulphur and nitrogen which give to mustard its peculiar physiological agency. White mustard (Sinapis alba) contains more fixed oil than black mustard does, but none of the myronic acid or myrosine, instead of which it has sinapisin, which by combination with another principle forms a bitter compound—not a fixed oil. The mustard of Scripture belongs to another natural order altogether. Many others of these cruciferous plants yield volatile oils containing sulphur, and from the seeds of numbers of them, such as rape-seed, may be expressed a bland fixed oil. The common scurvy-grass is used as a stimulant, and the common horse-radish has irritant and even blistering qualities. One of the tribe, the Rose of Jericho, is remarkable as a hygrometer—literally, a measurer of the moisture in the surrounding atmosphere; its old withered annual stems, which are rolled up like a ball in dry weather, and drifted about by the winds in the deserts of Syria and Egypt, resuming, when rain falls, their original form and direction, and continuing for many years thus to curl up and expand, according to the state of the atmosphere. Woad, the plant yielding the well known woad-blue colour when treated like Indigo, belongs to this order.

The Caper family is probably familiar to those who affect a boiled leg of mutton. Capers are the flower-buds of a plant of this order. Their properties are stimulant. The plant is a native of the south of Europe, and is considered by Royle to be the hyassop of Scripture. Some species are so pungent, as to be used as substitutes for mustard; the pungency of others is so great, that they act as blisters. The root of one kind is used to expel worms.

Our sweet and pretty favourites the Mignonette family, inhabit Europe and the adjoining parts of Asia. "The uses of the order," says the hard-hearted man of science, "are unimportant;" and yet one kind, weld, yields a yellow dye; another (Reseda odorata) is the fragrant mignonette. Ah! how many hearts has not that gentle fragrance solaced. In the lone garret it has blended with the inmates' sighs, and mingled with the quick warm breathings of emotion on the lordly parterre. The mignonette is in France an object of such favourite culture, that by preventing the development of its blossoms, it is common to render it shrubby or woody, when it is known as the tree-mignonette.

The Arnotto family are natives of the warmest parts of the East and West Indies, and Africa. These plants are shrubs, or small trees; and many of them yield edible fruits, whose pulp is often sweet and wholesome, though some are astringent and others purgative. A reddish pulp surrounding the seeds of one description supplies the arnotto used for colouring red, and staining cheese.

The Rock roses are from the south of Europe, and north of Africa. The resinous matter of these cistuses is pretty well known.

The Violet family are natives of Europe, Asia, and America. Their roots have emetic properties, of which the active principle, akin to emetic, is called violine.

The roots of the viola odorata have been employed emetically in medicine. Other species are used in South America as substitutes for ipocacuanha. "The petals of the sweet or March violet, the lov of the Greeks," says Balfour, "are laxative, and are used in the form of infusion, mixed with sugar; and a violet or purple colouring matter is procured from them, which is employed as a test for acids and alkalies, being changed into red by the former and green by the latter. Viola tricolor, (heart's-ease,) and other species, have been used as demulcent expectorants"—the last learned phrase meaning a medicine of a gummy or oily consistence, which protects against the action of acrid matters, and is employed in promoting the rejection of mucus and other fluids from the lungs and windpipe. The Viola tricolor is the origin of all the cultivated varieties of pansy.

BELLAGIO, LAKE OF COMO.

Is there's a spot to bid the heart forsake
The memories of the past, and there to make
The spirit bask in beauty, till she bless
So sweet a Lethe of forgetfulness,
'Tis Como's sunlit wave! whose ripples dance
As if rejoicing in their radiance.
It is bright summer, at the close of day,
Ere from the lake one beam has pass'd away;
While mount, and grass, and dell, and trellis fair,
Gleam in the glory of the sunny air.
Each feathery tree seems dipt in golden light;
The marble vase shines yet more purely white;
And lofty towers, that point to yon bright sky,
Flash forth beneath their azure canopy;
While the still air, as if each breath were spent,
Makes the soft silence yet more eloquent.
Oh! scenes remember'd!—fairest still ye seem!
Like the regretted vision of a dream
Ye cross my memory! My heart forsakes
The weary world's dull paths; again it takes
Its flight o'er years long gone, and on thy shore,
Fair, peerless Como, rests awhile; once more
I hear the murmur of the lake's calm flow,
Beneath the walls of dear Bellagio!

ANNA SAVAGE.

A DAY AT BASING.

THERE is a peculiar gratification in an exchange of the claims and cares of business for the quietude and repose of the country; but when the rural charm is heightened by the memory of some noted event, how greatly is the pleasure enhanced! The sight of a place on which mighty deeds have been enacted, has an influence over the feelings more or less powerful according to individual character. An ivy-covered ruin, a battle-field, a poet's residence, a martyr's grave, the place where a book was written, a great truth uttered, or oppression resisted,—all, in process of time, became so many shrines, visited by devout pilgrims from afar—all find a response in the manifold sympathies of the human heart.

Such were a few of the thoughts that passed through my mind, as one day, in the course of the past summer, I seized an opportunity to renew my acquaintance with an interesting locality, one whose natural beauties and historical associations give it an eminent claim to notice. Leaving London by the South-western railway, a ride of two hours brought me to the quiet and pleasantly situated town of Basingstoke, near to which the object of my journey, the ruins of Basing House, are situated. There is nothing to detain the traveller in the town itself excepting the remains of an ancient chapel, not far from the station, and some monuments to the Warton family in the church. The father of the poets, Thomas and Joseph Warton, was once vicar here, and in this place his two sons received part of their education. After following the London road for a short distance, a choice of routes offers to the ruins; a narrow hazel-bordered lane on the left leading down to the canal; a footpath sloping in the same direction through corn-fields, or the road itself. I chose the lane, and was soon at the bottom of the valley, through which the canal winds in serpentine curves, its bed literally choked with weeds; evidence of scanty traffic. The walk, however, is secluded and agreeable, the view on both sides shut in by fine well-wooded undulating heights, grassy slopes and broad corn-fields, while about a mile beyond, a long range of garden wall, terminated at either extremity by a conical-roofed, turret-like building of red brick, marks the site—

"Of the fallen fabric of the other day."

On reaching the bridge by which the road crosses the canal close to the village of Basing, a short lane on the right leads to a rising ground of wild, park-like aspect. The summit is crowned by what at a little distance appears to be a thick wood, with single trees and groups scattered in various directions. A path runs up the slope past the keeper's house, half hidden among the foliage, and a little higher you come to a broad deep trench, with fragments of a wall peeping, here and there, through the high steep bank on the opposite side. What seemed a thick wood, is now found to be a belt of trees rising above the tangled underwood, from every part of the trench, stretching round a large irregular circle. The path here turns into a level lawn-like space, about which are sprinkled some magnificent white-thorns; on one side the ground falls away as a glacis, and on the other a broad gap, between the shattered extremities of the embanked wall, admits you into a spacious enclosure, the sloping sides of which give it somewhat the appearance of an amphitheatre. I walked round close to the foot of the bank, knee deep at times in nettles or tall weeds, or crushing the odorous ground-ivy which grows here in profusion, minutely inspecting the humbled remains of what was once a defence for the chivalry of the land. In one place the earth has sunk and left the brick-work bare, exposing some small circular arches, with a single arch inside like a small sewer crossing them at right angles, and running apparently to a considerable distance in the solid masonry. The bricks, it may be observed, are as hard and firm as when first laid, such as the artificers of the 15th and 16th centuries knew how to make, and will outlast by a thousand years those now made for building purposes in London. After making the circuit of the interior, I mounted to the top of the wall, which is of such thickness, so thickly overhung with trees, as to form a convenient and beautiful walk. Outside, you look down into the bed of the ditch, so far beneath that the tops of many of the trees are below your eye, and occasional breaks in the leafy barrier afford pleasant glimpses of the surrounding scenery. Westwards the view is shut in by a distant range of blue hills, and northwards, on the opposite side of the valley, is the railway—the rush and roar of the rapid trains suggestive of a striking contrast. Here, a wasting relic of the physical energy of the 17th century, a period when might was yet held for right: yonder, the masculine thought of the 19th century in full career, pregnant with the noblest humanizing influences.

From this elevation a view is gained of the interior of the spacious garden whose long wall first attracts attention on approaching the place. The two conical-roofed towers are dovecoats, one still tenanted by a numerous family of pigeons, descendants, it may be, of the birds that held possession when Cromwell's cannon thundered against the buildings. Rare old fruit-trees have been trained against those sunny walls, luscious grapes, and cherries of a kind now unknown to the cultivator. There were fantastic borders, trim alleys, and quaint alcoves, where valiant knights and fair dames laughed and lounged away the hours. Now the surface is cut up into irregular patches for the growing of vegetables; the massive wall is broken in many places, and the breaches stopped by an uncouth paling, or fence of dry thorns. Beyond this is the capacious brick barn, with high sloping roof and loop-holed sides, apparently strong enough to lodge and protect a garrison; and the fine old church of Basing, in which may be seen a monument to one of the Marquises of Winchester, who lived to the age of ninety-seven, and when he died in 1592, left behind him 103 direct descendants; the whole backed by the huge chalk-pit, still known as Oliver Cromwell's dell. There is always a temptation to moralize in contemplating such a scene; to form pictures of its past history; and here the inclination may be indulged. No obtrusive guide comes to disturb you with offers of service; there are no churlish doorkeepers whose favour is to be conciliated: by the kindness of Lord Bolton, the present proprietor, visitors may wander about the ruin at will.

I sat down in the mossy fork of a tree, overlooking the slaughter-close, (a field where a fierce struggle took place at one of the sorties of the garrison,) and ran over the leading points in the history of Basing. The curious antiquary may trace it back to the Domesday survey, when the owner, Hugh de Port, held fifty-five lordships in the county, and lived in a castle which in after times changed masters, but eventually came back to the original line. It was rebuilt, we are told, by Sir William Pawlett, who was created Marquis of Winchester by Edward VI., but in so magnificent a style that his successors, unable to bear the heavy expenses involved in keeping up the stately establishment, were compelled to pull part of it down. Edward was once entertained here for four days by the marquis, and on another occasion Philip and Mary were his guests. The "virgin queen" came twice to Basing; the first time in 1590, when the marquis was lord treasurer, and Elizabeth was so captivated with his courteous behaviour as to declare,—“Were he but a young man, I could find in my heart to have him for a husband before any man in England.” She repeated her visit in 1601, and stayed thirteen days, “to the greate charge of the sayde lorde marquisse,” great-grandson of him whom she regarded with so much favour on the former occasion. Here she received the French ambassador, Duke de Biron; and at her departure, “being very well contented with all things there done,” boasted that her entertainment of the envoy royally in a subject's house, was a feat never before accomplished. But the events from which Basing derives an enduring interest are those of the civil war; that struggle between principle and prerogative.

At this period Basing House, as appears from an old drawing, was a castellated structure of brick, with a citadel, and lofty towers at each corner, encompassed by a brick rampart and dry ditch. John, the fifth Marquis of Winchester, was a devoted royalist; he strengthened the building, and determined to keep it for the king. On one occasion when summoned to surrender, he replied that, “if the king had no more ground in England than Basing House, he would hold it out to the last extremity.” To inspire the garrison with his own spirit, the marquis wrote with a diamond on every window in the house the words aimée loyauté—“love loyalty.” From its position on the main road, the fortress was looked upon as the key to the western counties, and the parliamentary generals had set their hearts upon taking it. Sir William Waller, with 7,000 men, made three unsuccessful attempts; and some idea of the importance attached to the capture may be inferred from the title of a pamphlet published at the time—“The Soldiers' Report concerning Sir William Waller's fight against Basing House, on Sunday last, Nov. 12, 1643, to give satisfaction to the whole kingdom concerning that design; wherein are these particulars, viz:—1st. How considerable a thing it would be in case it could be taken.—2d. How strong it is, both upon the house and on the walls.—3d. Sir William Waller's onset, and the manner of the fight.—4th. The reasons of the retreat,” &c. &c.

The royalists were not less anxious to keep, than the parliamentarians to gain possession. Colonel Gage relieved the garrison twice, with much hasard and great bravery, and drew off again in safety to Oxford. Subsequently, the marquis expelled his brother, Lord Edward Pawlett, who had been temporising with the enemy. Fuller, the historian, was here during part of the siege, engaged on his favourite work, "The Worthies of England," writing as diligently, and with as much self-possession, as though in a cloister; complaining, however, occasionally, that the noise of the cannon disturbed him in digesting of his notes. For four years did the resolute marquis "hold out." "There was," to quote Thomas Carlyle's spirited words, "on the parliament side, a kind of passion to have Basing House taken. The Lieut. General, gathering all the artillery he can lay hold of, firing about 200 or 500 shot at some given point till he see a hole made; and then storming like a fire-flood; he perhaps may manage it." Notwithstanding the valour of the garrison, and the strength of their resources, Cromwell did "manage it," as explained in the following extracts from his letter to the Speaker, Oct. 1645:—

"SIR,—I thank God, I can give some account of Basing. After our batteries were placed, we settled the several posts for the storme: We stormed this morning after six of the clocke; the signal for falling on was the firing four of our cannon, which, being done, our men fell on with great resolution and cheerfulness; . . . we have had little loss; many of the enemy our men put to the sword, and some officers of quality; most of the rest we have prisoners, among which, the marquis and Sir Robert Peake, with divers other officers. We have taken about ten pieces of ordnance, with much ammunition, and our soldiers a good encouragement."

The "good encouragement" here referred to was booty worth 200,000*l*. It consisted, according to a report drawn up at the time, of "ten pieces of ordnance, twenty barrels of powder, and matches proportionable, nine colours, 200 arms, 200 horse, . . . provisions of victuals for some years rather than months, 400 quarters of wheat, 300 fitches of bacon, 200 barrels of beef, 40,000 pounds of cheese; beer, divers cellars full, and that very good. A bed in one room, furnished, cost, 1,300*l*., great store of popish books, with copes, and such utensils; silver plate valued at about 5,000*l*., some cabinets of jewels, and other treasure: one soldier had six-score pieces of gold for his share, and another had got three bags of silver, who, (not able to keep his own counsel,) it grew to common pillage amongst the rest, the fellow at last having but one half-crown for himself."

At Cromwell's suggestion the place was dismantled and abandoned: a notice, perhaps painted on a board, informed the neighbourhood that "whoever will come for brick or stone shall freely have the same for his pains." It is easy to imagine the havoc that must then have taken place; country people coming with carts and pillaging in all directions. The first Duke of Bolton built a house with part of the materials; another portion was used for the George Inn at Basingstoke; and now, such as we have described is all that remains of the imposing structure, whose line of circumvallation was "above a mile in compass." Nature has—

— "soften'd down the hoar austerity
Of rugged desolation, and fill'd up,
As 'twere anew, the gaps of centuries;
Leaving that beautiful which still was so,
And making that which was not, till the place
Becomes religious, and the heart runs o'er
With silent worship of the great of old,
The dead, but sceptred sovereigns, who still rule
Our spirit from their urns!"

While walking round the bank for the last time, I saw an old man sitting where an opening in the trees gave him a view of the neighbouring plantations; he had come to mow down the nettles and weeds growing within the enclosure, and was resting after his walk. He told me that he had lived for thirty years in the keeper's house, until too aged for the duties of the situation, but he still worked for the estate. He pointed out a spot in the centre where a well had been filled up, the site of the brewhouse beyond the ditch, and some arches on the outside of the wall, similar to those I had seen on the inside; he called them "oven-places." On my inquiring whether the ruins were much resorted to by visitors, he replied, "Gipsy parties comes here terrible often."

Basing House is not the only object of interest in this part of the country; for the visitor who can spare a day or two, there are the walls and amphitheatre of Silchester, the most perfect Roman relic in England. Bramshill House, the seat of Sir John Cope, a glorious mansion of the "olden time;" and "Our Village," the environs of which have long been classic ground through the charming writings of Miss Mitford.

SONG.

BY J. M. W.

A BOAT, love-laden,
Floating on the sea,
A soft-eyed maiden,
Smiling tenderly.

The golden brightness
Of the fervid noon,
The silv'ry whiteness
Of the crescent moon.

All flowers of earth, '
All gems that strew the deep,
Ideal forms, whose birth
Gladdens a poet's sleep.

The magic eloquence
That thrills the free,
The sweeter excellence
Of harmony.

All marble glories'
Of all classic climes,
Heroic stories,
And immortal rhymes;—

Less beautiful, less dear,
These things to me
Less sweet, less bright appear
To phantasy,

Than that fair realm of love I share with thee.

STORY OF A FAMILY.¹

BY S. M.

AUTHORESS OF "THE MAIDEN AUNT," &c.

CHAPTER XIX.—THE SURGEON.

THE faint head fell back upon the pillows tenderly arranged for its reception by the same kind hands which had hitherto themselves supported it. A long low sigh bore witness to the temporary suspension of acute pain; then followed a few broken, murmuring sentences, such as are wont to fall unconsciously from the lips of a sufferer when the immediate pressure is withdrawn, but nerves are still wrought to their utmost tension, body exhausted, and will almost paralysed by the effort of its late achievement.

"It is over, thank God!—thank you all. My kind nurse—where is she? God bless you!"

The fingers of Percy Lee closed feebly, but with convulsive eagerness, upon the small soft hand which yet rested on the bed beside his cheek. It was but for a moment. Again the room was darkened, and the bandage which had been temporarily fastened around his eyes, in order that the unwonted light necessary for due performance of the operation might not injure him, withdrawn, and the courageous woman whose arms had steadily and unshrinkingly sustained him during his agony, extricated herself hurriedly from his grasp, and glided away. The door closed behind her. Yet pausing for a moment, she applied her ear to the key-hole; the voice of the surgeon, modulated to that tone of artificial soothing which, though it be necessary for the patient, is so inexpressibly wearisome and irritating to the watcher, was alone audible. "There, there," it said, "we have done wonders; but we must avoid the reaction which is sure to follow an excitement of this kind. Drink this, my dear sir, and compose yourself to sleep."

Then came the low tinkle of glass against glass; and then, quickly, ere Ida (we need not name her) had time to retreat, the surgeon and his assistant came out of the room, almost running against her in the rapidity of their exit. They halted and looked from her to each other with a blank, startled, half-guilty expression; the superior of the two then took her gently by the hand and addressed her much in the same tone which she had just heard him adopt in speaking to her father.

"My dear child, you have no business here. You must lie down and rest. Stay; this pulse is a little quicker than I like; I think I shall prescribe for you."

"Tell me!" ejaculated Ida, in a husky, wavering voice; and then stopped.

"You know as much as we do," answered he, evasively. "I have given our patient a composing draught, and he will, I hope, be asleep in a few minutes. Of course we must expect great exhaustion. He will sleep for some hours at least, and during that time the nurse will watch him. I shall wait below stairs; you cannot do better than invigorate yourself for such exertions as you may be required to make, by sleeping now when you can be of no use. You are a little excited. I shall give you something quieting, and promise to wake you as soon as there is need. Now, be a good child, and do as you are told."

Her eyes rested fixedly upon his face with that sort of dreary helpless courage which endures to look upon the truth because it is evident, and there is no escape from it. He could not meet the gaze, but looked down uneasily. She did not hesitate a moment either in thought or action, but knew, and determined directly.

"It has failed!" said she distinctly, and without shrinking or turning aside.

The answer was written in his face. Dropping his hand, before he could remonstrate or prevent, she was again at the bedside. She knew the hours of life now left were very few, and she was greedy of them. She sat shrouded in the curtains quite calm and motionless; through the parted drapery the wan face on the pillow was visible to her, and her eyes clung to it. So passed on the hours; it was a strange spectacle. The wasted countenance of the sleeper, where many a drawn muscle and printed furrow marked the passage of years of suffering, now almost childlike in the placid exhaustion of profound repose; the child's face beside it, so young and smooth, tender in all its outlines, infantine in the transparency of its colouring, yet stern, I had almost said terrible, in its expression of agony, concentrated and held captive by inward power. All her senses were awake; her imagination was preternaturally active. Not a feature of the present, not a shadow of the future, was unmarked by her; from the past only her thoughts fled in sheer terror, unable at that moment to encounter the softness of Memory. She saw, counted, treasured, every light change that flitted across his face—so trivial, so transitory, that, to any eye save hers, all seemed absorbed in the profundity of a repose that was well nigh stupor. The sound of his breathing made rhythm of her thoughts, and they moved to it and measured themselves by it, without, for that, losing one spark of their terrific vitality. They were busy, fearfully busy; gathering in and laying up a treasure.

Slow dawn crept into the room. It was bright and glorious outside; music was going up from the thickets and fragrance from the meadows, and floods of gracious sunshine were refreshing and rewarding the beneficent efforts of earth. But light came timidly and uneasily into the chamber of death, as if afraid of what it would have to see and to reveal; it took a sickly hue from blinds and close-drawn curtains, and seemed to shiver in its coverings with the chill of ague. There, through the top of the cornice, where a crevice let in a single unfettered sunbeam, it came straight and sharp as an arrow, and seemed to make a rankling wound where it entered. Ten hours had passed since Ida began her vigil, and not one tear had visited her earnest hopeless eyes. Her being was passing through a furnace heated seven times; it was to come out a weapon of sevenfold power. How should she fail to endure even that burning fiery furnace, for was there not One with her like unto the Son of God?

"God bless you!" Low, faint, tremulous words, but she heard them. The eyes were glassy and uncertain, but she met them in one brief, instantaneous look of recognition; she had her reward—the strong patient heart had not so suffered and so waited for nothing. It had waited for death, and death had come; but with it, nay in it, the presence, the assurance, the pledge of Life.

"And she is really well enough to undertake such a journey?"

"Yes, indeed, Ellen, I think so; otherwise I would have interposed to prevent her going. It is a week, you know, since she was able to come down stairs, and I am sure change of scene will be good for her."

One of the regular medical common-places, and as shallow as it is common. Change of scene is useful enough to those who are suffering from what is technically called "worry of spirits," from over-exertion, from habitual anxiety, from discouragement, from any one of the numerous degrees of that scale which begins with discomfort and mounts up to positive unhappiness. But where there is a deep, calm, strong regret—not a pain in, but a part of the soul—an anguish open-eyed, brave and steadfast; conscious of its own reality, resigned to its own necessity, patient, ceaseless, everlasting—circumstances can only avail to vex and irritate, time only to conceal it. To such an one there is neither the power nor the possibility of change; the veil which a score of years may weave around the secret thought, and which may fold so thickly, and lie so closely, as utterly to conceal the existence of what it covers, only acts as a shrine around a relic, preserving it from all pollution or defacement, and keeping it fresh in colour and sharp in outline as when first deposited within its guardianship. What the heart only remembers it may also in time forget; what it possesses belongs to it for ever.

"Did any one go with her?"

"There, sit down and take off your bonnet, Ellen, and I will tell you all about it. I have some pity upon a woman's curiosity when I know there is genuine sympathy at the bottom of it."

The young wife did as she was desired, and looked up questioningly into her husband's face. It was not a very moveable or interesting countenance; it had all the real stoicism and external sweetness which a long apprenticeship to that very trying profession of surgery seldom fails to teach a man; but it was always, to her, the noblest and most engrossing subject of contemplation, and just now there was moisture in the eyes and an unusual pliancy about the lips, and she thought it the very incarnation of benignity. He passed his hand caressingly over her smoothly-ordered hair; it gave her a world of trouble to braid and band those tresses round her shapely head in such manner as satisfied her vanity and suited his taste, yet she was never so well pleased with them as when his awkward touch had disarranged them. After a mute exchange of looks, a language perfectly intelligible to the lookers, and mere gibberish to the lookers-on, (but what did that signify?) he commenced his story.

"It is certainly the most remarkable instance of fortitude that ever came under my notice. Once or twice I could almost have fancied that she did not feel acutely; but women are such puzzles! It is sometimes impossible to surprise them into an exhibition of feeling by any means or at any moment; and then you may be sure that there is something within so deep and so strong that it has been necessary to set a guard over it who can't sleep at his post. Closed windows and iron bars are symptoms that there is madness inside. Well, you know that she went to the funeral; that heavy-featured cousin of hers was there with her, crying heartily the whole time. I suppose it was very sympathising of her, and all that, but I own I could have beaten her for it. And then, after the funeral, she, I mean Ida of course, was ill—and I was provoked with myself that I had let her go. I ought not to have done it."

"Perhaps you could not have prevented it," suggested Ellen, who did not like to hear him blame himself even for a passing moment.

"Nonsense, my love. A man can always manage a woman, and has always a right to do so, as I hope you don't mean to dispute. That is, if he is a sensible man, and her friend. Much more, of course, her husband; but that, you know, is for your private consideration."

"But what could you have done, Henry?" persisted the wife, smiling as she put her hand into his with a kind of silent understood pledge that no management could be necessary where there would never be any resistance.

"Turned the key upon her, to be sure," replied the unceremonious Henry, "and trusted to her good sense to thank me for it afterwards, or not, as the case might be. But she deceived me. I fancied her body equal to her mind, and it was the body which gave way at last. Youth and strength have enabled her to shake it off."

"And your care, and good treatment of the case," interposed Ellen resentfully.

"That of course. Say that to anybody who asks you, my dear. Oh Ellen! It was a rich treat! If I had not been so sorry for her, I could have roared with laughter."

"With laughter! What can you mean?" And her face expressed an amazement which almost bordered upon disapproval.

"To see the intense discomfiture of that cockcomb cousin, whom I utterly abominate. While she was ill, he spoke of their engagement as a matter of certainty; I am bound in charity to believe that he was self-deceived; but I think in my heart that even his enormous vanity scarcely extended so far. He thought, so I conjecture, that she was a mere child in character, wholly in the power of any one who could speak a few soft words to her, and now more especially so, as having lost her natural guardian, and belonging as a matter of right to him and to his father. He thought he had the whole game in his own hands,—that he had her in a net, that she had no escape. No other view can account for so clever a man's so entirely committing himself. She, poor child, never gave him a thought; but as she began to recover composure, and power of comprehension, it seemed to me that she ought not to be any longer ignorant of the manner in which her name was being used. You know I am a very plain spoken person—it was no use to trust so delicate a matter in the hands of the gentle Agnes, who, between ourselves, has not much more mental grace or agility than a lame cow—so, I spoke to her myself."

"You did!" exclaimed Ellen with true womanly interest kindling in her face, "I wonder you could do it! And what did she say?"

"Opened wide her childlike blue eyes, and stared at me with an expression of such blank astonishment that I could scarcely keep my countenance, and then, shaking her pretty head to and fro with a weary, passive, troubled look, begged that I would be so very kind as to explain cousin Alexander's mistake to him. She evidently shrank from the office, and I undertook it in a moment. Of course you understand clearly that it was because I wished to oblige her—I had no spite against him, of course. But as I said before, I am a plain-spoken person, and I did not decorate my errand with any superfluous tenderness."

"Oh Henry!" cried his wife, "what pleasure can you find in talking as if you were so hardhearted! and to me, who know you! I am sure you were really very sorry for his disappointment."

"Chaff, my love!" was Henry's elegant answer. "The disappointment was to his vanity—nothing higher. The man who takes it for granted that a woman who has never coquetted with him nor encouraged him, is ready to marry him, and who says so openly, is either so obtuse that he won't feel his rejection or so impudent that he deserves to feel it."

"But without meaning to coquette or encourage," remonstrated Ellen, "one may give a false impression, you know, without any fault,—that is, unconsciously."

"Remember this, Ellen!" interrupted her husband, speaking more gravely, "that a fault is not a whit the less a fault because it is committed unconsciously; rather the more, because such unconsciousness shows a want both of the habit of self-restraint, and of the periodical check of self-examination. You should be more ashamed to confess yourself unconscious of a fault half an hour after its committal, than to confess that you have committed it." He looked down upon her upturned face, into which an expression of docile reverent attention, almost that of a child receiving its lesson, had instantaneously come, and resumed his former tone of banter. "But I see how it is, you want me to believe that you have refused some dozen devoted admirers, without having given one of them due reason to accuse you of flirtation. Oh, what a thorough woman you are!"

"You say that as if you meant it for blame, but I take it as the highest possible praise," rejoined Ellen in the same tone.

"You are are right!" said Henry emphatically.

"But tell me about Miss Lee's going away. Had she no one with her except the cousin of whom you speak so disrespectfully?"

"Yes, there came a friend, a Mrs. Tyrrel, a handsome woman, nay beautiful, but with something not altogether attractive about her. Very pale and grave, the latter I suppose from sympathy, the former the result of an illness which indeed had prevented her from sooner coming to poor Ida's assistance. And this morning they went away together. The lovely Agnes remained to console her brother. Poor woman! I ought not to satirise her; I believe she is as good as a vile temper will suffer her to be, and as agreeable as any one can be, who is by nature unconquerably repulsive."

"What a consistent speech," cried Ellen, "to be commenced with the assertion that you ought not to satirise her!"

"Very consistent indeed, if you had been aware of the mental parenthesis, which was to the effect that I chose to do what I ought not."

"Is that a conscious or an unconscious fault?" asked Ellen demurely.

He smiled, but it was an absent smile. With true masculine perverseness in all matters of feeling, he had been jocose and ironical so long as she was tender, serious and sympathetic; and now that with true feminine docility she had, not without an effort, assumed his mood, and hidden her pity beneath badinage, he ceased to do violence (for he had been doing violence) to his own inward emotions, and melted naturally into seriousness. She watched his face with a sense of rebuke, wholly uncalled for, but wholly natural; wished her gentle retort unspoken; and listened to him as though he had been a prophet.

"Poor child!" said he pensively, "yet I don't know whether pity for so noble a nature is not misplaced. Were she a man, I should reverence her; but she is the child of her mother Eve, and if self-dependence and self-government be forced upon her, it must be through acute suffering. Nay more—there will ever be in them more of semblance than of reality. If she seem composed and contented, it will be because the inward nature is not annihilated but enslaved, and the slave feels what he dares not show, all the more intensely because he is compelled to hide it. Poor child! I hope she will have some one to lean upon, but so far as a stranger can judge, her position would seem very desolate. I wonder if I shall ever see her again? What shall I then think of the soft heart which has been forced into so stern a mould?"

The young wife's uplifted eyes glistened with a dew which came from a deeper fount than that of pity. She was thanking God and man for her own blessedness in that she had found a shadow from the heat and a shelter from the storm. And so—for the look was too eloquent to remain unanswered—the lonely Ida was for the moment forgotten by both.

Her biographer echoes doubtfully the last sentence—"I wonder if we shall ever see her again!"

TO ERATO, THE MUSE OF LOVE.

BY T. K. HERVEY.

Come back, come back, lost pleiad of the heart !
Fallen, with thy lyre, from out life's saddening skies !
The spirit's chorus wants its sweetest part,
That wants thy music—though its tones be sighs !—
Too like the nightingale of earth, that flies
Ere the sweet summer, with its scents, be lost,
Though both should linger when the bright rose dies,
To soothe the mourner, when he needs it most !
Come back ! come back ! thy sister muses still Sing to my soul, and cheer it through life's crowd ;
But it has wander'd from the one bright rill
Near which my sweeter song, but not so loud,
Was heard o'er all—oh ! thou, who wilt not sing,
Save in the spirit's hush'd and leafy parts,
Save only by the soul's untainted spring—
The young deep Helicon of human hearts !

Then may it be that thou art playing yet,
Far in my bosom's depths, though all unheard ;
And as the sick of cities, when his feet
Seek the deep glade, is greeted by the bird,
So could I leave, awhile, the world's wide dream,
And lose its harsh, cold voices from mine ear.
Oh ! might I hope to trace that haunted stream,
And for an hour—an hour—again to hear
Thy low sweet song ? Alas ! the springs are dry,
Beside whose gush that early music rang,
And never more the flowers shall meet mine eye
That warm'd the valley where Erato sang—
That oldest muse—but, in her fadeless youth,
Predestined to outlive her sisters all,
And through all fancies, pure as that of truth—
Once—only once—to pour her music-fall !
Then never more for me !—She taketh wings,
When years have touch'd the spirit's tunings fine,
And fieth far from harps with broken strings,
To play the lyres of happier hearts than mine !
Oh ! well for me, and such as me, that love
Is of that angel choir, who are to sing above !

CERVANTES AND LOPE DE VEGA.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

THE greatest and healthiest writers have been generally men of active, energetic, and enterprising spirit. In the majority of instances, according to their means and opportunities, they have been prominent actors in what was passing around them, and not merely passive spectators. They have commonly mingled in the bustling pursuits of their contemporaries, undistinguished by any marked peculiarities ; and, instead of standing aloof from the busy crowd, they have been noted for their restless courage, or ardent love of adventure. The life of action has preceded the life of authorship. The opening years of manhood have been occupied in the active struggles and arduous duties of the world ; and afterwards, when the mind has become disciplined, invigorated, and informed by actual experience, the wonderful creations which are destined to live for ever have been produced or thrown off almost unconsciously, and sent abroad into the world with the lavish profusion and prodigal liberality of an affluent genius.

Cervantes and Lope de Vega were among the most remarkable men in an age of astonishing intellectual fertility. It will be remembered that they were contemporaries of Shakspeare, and indeed, it has been said, that Cervantes and our great dramatist died on the same day, namely, the 23d April, 1616 ; but as the Gregorian Calendar had not at that time been adopted in England, we were behind the countries of Catholic Europe in our calculations, and Shakspeare, in fact, survived Cervantes twelve days.

Cervantes was born "on one of the early days" of October, 1547, and Lope de Vega fifteen years afterwards, on the 25th November, 1562.¹ The former was destined to a long life of varied vicissitude and adventure, a narrative of which may serve to illustrate the manners of the age in which he lived, and some of the prominent characteristics of the national genius.

An admirable summary of the life of Cervantes has been given by M. Viardot in the biography prefixed to his exquisite translation of Don Quixote.²

"Here," he says, "is all that we have been able to collect regarding the life of this illustrious man,—one of those who paid for the tardy honours of posthumous renown by the misfortunes of a whole life. Born of an honourable, though indigent family ; receiving first a liberal education, but thrown by poverty into obscure dependence ; page, valet-de-chambre, and soldier ; maimed at the battle of Lepanto ; distinguished at the siege of Tunis ; captured by a Barbary corsair ; five years a prisoner at Algiers ; ransomed by public charity, after many futile efforts to escape ; then again a soldier in Portugal and the Azores ; smitten with the charms of a noble lady as poor as himself ; reclaimed to literature by love, but soon again compelled to abandon it by distress ; rewarded for his services and talents by a subordinate appointment in the government victualling department ; accused of embezzling the public money ; thrown into prison by the king's agents ; released after proof of innocence, and again imprisoned by mutinous peasants ; then transformed into the poet and man of business, and earning his bread by commercial agencies and theatrical composition ; at the age of fifty discovering his true vocation ; not knowing where to find a patron to whom to dedicate his works ; having to encounter an indifferent public, who condescended to be amused, but who could neither understand nor appreciate him, jealous rivals who ridiculed and defamed him, and envious friends who were ready to betray him ; pursued in his old age by want ; forgotten by most people, despised by all, and dying at length in solitude and poverty : such during his life time was Michael de Cervantes Saavedra."

A life so full of incident and vicissitude has all the charms of romance. It presents as many features of interest as the most startling of modern fictions, and we will therefore, as briefly as possible, attempt to fill up the outline with which we have presented our readers.

The birth-place of Cervantes was the town of Alcalá de Henares, a small city about twenty miles from Madrid.

"Concerning his youth," says Mr. Ticknor, "all that we know is what he incidentally tells us himself,—that he took great pleasure in attending the theatrical representations of Lope de Rueda; that he wrote verses when very young; and that he always read everything within his reach, even, as it should seem, the torn scraps of paper he picked up in the public streets."

He seems to have been for two years a student in the University of Salamanca, and also to have studied under the learned Juan Lope de Hoyos, who published by authority, "on the death of the unhappy Isabella de Valois, wife of Philip II., a volume of verse, in which, among other contributions of his pupils, are six short poems by Cervantes, whom he calls 'his dear and well-beloved disciple.'"¹ This was in 1569, and the same year we find him at Rome as a sort of chamberlain in the service of Giulio Acquaviva, afterwards a cardinal, who had been sent to Spain as the pope's nuncio, and who is supposed to have taken an interest in Cervantes from his love of literature. In this menial position it did not suit his spirit to remain, and he therefore enrolled himself among the Spanish troops then occupying a portion of Italy. "There were only two professions," says M. Viardot, "then open to the poor gentleman, that of arms and the church. Cervantes preferred the former, and became a soldier." The moment was well chosen. A memorable contest between the forces of Islamism and Christendom was about to commence. Selim II. Emperor of the Turks, in violation of existing treaties, had invaded the island of Cyprus, then belonging to the Venetians. The islanders sought the assistance of the sovereign pontiff, Pope Pius V., under whose auspices was formed, after some disastrous delay, a "holy league" against the treacherous infidels, comprising the joint armaments of the pope, the King of Spain, and the Republic of Venice, and commanded by the celebrated Don John of Austria, the natural son of the emperor Charles V. In this expedition was embarked the company into which Cervantes had volunteered as a private soldier; and he soon gave proof of his own observation, "that none make better soldiers than those who are transplanted from the region of letters to the fields of war, and that never scholar became soldier that was not a good and brave one."²

On the 7th of October, 1571, he was present at the sea-fight of Lepanto, when a glorious victory was obtained over the enemies of Christendom. He was then suffering from an attack of intermittent fever, and before the engagement had commenced his captain and comrades endeavoured to persuade him to retire into the cabin, where he might remain quietly till all was over. But, far from acceding to this timid counsel, though weakened by sickness, he implored the captain to assign him the post of danger. His request was complied with, and ample opportunities were afforded for the exercise of his bravery and devotion. The galley in which he served was stationed in the thickest of the action, and in the bloody melée he received three wounds, two in the breast and another which deprived him for ever of the use of his left hand and arm.

"But justly proud," says M. Viardot, "of having taken so glorious a part in that memorable combat, Cervantes never regretted the loss of his hand. He often said that he congratulated himself in having secured at such a price the honour of numbering himself among the victors of Lepanto; and in witness of his bravery, which he valued more than his genius, he loved to exhibit his wounds, received, he would say, on the most brilliant occasion which ages past and present had beheld, or that even the future might hope to see,—wounds that, like stars, might serve to guide others to the firmament of honour."

After the engagement, Cervantes was conveyed with the rest of the wounded to the hospital of Messina, where he remained for some months. In the spring of 1572 he departed, under the standard of Mark Antonio Columna, on the expedition to the Levant, the incidents of which he has minutely described in the story of The Captive in Don Quixote. He was next engaged in the expedition against Tunis, under Don John of Austria: afterwards his regiment returned to Europe, and was stationed for about two years in various towns in Italy, thus furnishing him with an opportunity, which he did not neglect, of forming an acquaintance with the Italian language and literature.

Having been absent some years from his native country, Cervantes at length took steps to procure his discharge, and to return home. His military career had been full of peril and adventure, and his youthful enthusiasm was probably somewhat sobered down. "He was now eight-and-twenty, disabled, weakened by the fatigues of three campaigns, a plain soldier, anxious to revisit his family and country. He obtained from his commander something more than a bare farewell. Don John of Austria gave him letters to the king, his brother, in which, making honourable mention of his conduct at Lepanto, he besought Philip to present him with the command of one of the companies about to be raised in Spain for Italy or Flanders. The viceroy of Sicily, Don Carlos d'Arragon, Duke of Scsa, also recommended to the attention of the king and his ministers, a soldier, hitherto neglected, who had secured by his courage, his talents, and exemplary conduct the esteem of his comrades and commander."³

But greater trials were in store for him. He had embarked at Naples, with his elder brother, Rodrigo, and several other Spaniards, in a Spanish galley called the Sun, full of hope and spirits, and anticipating a happy issue to the voyage. But alas for human expectations! On the 26th of September, 1575, the galley was attacked by an Algerine squadron, under the command of Arnauti Mami, who was called the "captain of the seas." A fierce but unequal combat ensued, in which Cervantes displayed his usual bravery. Three corsair vessels engaged the Christian galley, one of them being commanded by a renegade Greek, named Dali Mami. Against such desperate odds the Spaniards struggled boldly, but ineffectually, for their liberties. They were at length compelled to surrender, and were carried in triumph to Algiers. In the partition of captives Cervantes fell to the lot of Dali Mami.

The cunning renegade conceived that he had gained a great prize. After reading the letters which he found on his prisoner, addressed to the king of Spain, he believed Cervantes to be a nobleman at least, and reckoned on a large sum for his ransom. It was a common practice with these barbarians, when persons of distinction fell into their hands, to treat them with cruelty, and subject them to every privation, in order that they might induce them to renounce the Christian faith, or to obtain, by urgent solicitations, from their friends and countrymen, large sums of money to purchase their release. Cervantes was accordingly loaded with chains, and confined in a filthy dungeon; but in this extremity, he showed, says Viardot, a heroism rarer and greater than that of courage,—the heroism of patience. His active mind devised means of escape, and eagerly waited for an opportunity to carry them into execution. Among his companions in misfortune he soon acquired an ascendancy by his decision and force of character; and they readily submitted to his guidance. His first plan was to travel by land to Oran, which then belonged to Spain, and a Moor, who, unknown to him, had already betrayed other captives, was engaged as a guide. Several of his fellow-prisoners joined in the enterprise. They succeeded in escaping from Algiers, but on the second day of their journey, they were abandoned by the Moor, and had no other alternative but to return to the place of their captivity, where they were subjected to still more rigorous treatment.

Some of his fellow-captives were fortunate enough to obtain their freedom in the second year of their captivity. On their return to Spain they informed the father of Cervantes of the deplorable fate of his two sons, and the old man immediately mortgaged his patrimony, to raise a sufficient sum to purchase their ransom. The money was transmitted to Cervantes, who attempted to make a bargain with his master Dali Mami, but the sordid Greek was so exorbitant in his demands that he gave up all hope of obtaining his liberty. But his brother Rodrigo was in better hands, and Cervantes, feeling that it was useless to attempt to purchase his own release, generously applied the whole of the money to the ransom of his brother. Rodrigo was accordingly emancipated in 1577, and on quitting the land of bondage, promised Cervantes that on his return to Spain he would cause a vessel to be equipped at Valencia, which might approach the African coast at an appointed spot, and effect the deliverance of his fellow-captives.

Confiding in his brother's zeal, Cervantes laid his plans accordingly. About three miles to the east of Algiers, was a garden belonging to a Greek renegade, in which one of his slaves, named Juan, a Christian and native of Navarre, had secretly constructed a subterranean cavern. Following the instructions of Cervantes, several Christian captives made their escape, and were concealed by Juan in this recess. At the time of Rodrigo's departure there were fourteen or fifteen already there. Without leaving his master's house, or doing anything that might excite suspicion, Cervantes directed this little subterranean republic, and provided for the safety and subsistence of the members. Provisions were secretly conveyed to them every night, and a careful look-out kept up by the gardener and another Christian slave. When Cervantes believed the vessel despatched by his brother was near at hand, he fled from his master, on the 20th of September, 1577, and becoming an inmate of the cavern, waited patiently for the result.

It appears that the expected vessel, promptly despatched by Rodrigo, and commanded by an experienced officer, came in sight of Algiers on the 28th of September. It was broad day when the captain caught a glimpse of that famous stronghold of the African corsair, and not caring to run a needless risk, he prudently kept out at sea till the evening. A glorious autumn sunset had flushed the waves, and the dim twilight had succeeded, ere he ventured to approach the appointed spot, and give the captives the agreed on signal. But even this enterprise was doomed to fail; for as the vessel neared the shore, protected, as the captain thought, by the deepening shadows, she was observed by some fishermen, who immediately gave the alarm, and it was deemed expedient to put back to sea. A second attempt was made, which ended most disastrously; for the vessel was attacked and taken by the Moors, and its crew carried into captivity.

Meanwhile Cervantes and his companions, who had for a time cheerfully borne the discomforts and privations of their situation, began to suffer seriously from their prolonged imprisonment in a damp and unwholesome cavern. As time wore on, they lost all hope. The hour of their deliverance appeared every day to grow more distant. At length, on the morning after the capture of the luckless vessel, the place of their concealment was betrayed to Hassan Aga, the Dey of Algiers, who received the news with delight, as all lost or runaway slaves were, by the custom of the country, considered the Dey's especial property. A guard of soldiers was accordingly despatched to the garden, who with drawn swords entered the cave, and secured the unhappy Christians. But in the general consternation, Cervantes was collected and unappalled; he cried out with a loud voice that his companions were guiltless; that he had caused them to fly from their masters; that the plot was his, and his alone, and that in justice he should alone be punished. The soldiers were astonished, and reported what had happened to the Dey, who ordered Cervantes to be loaded with chains, and brought into his presence. But the hero was undismayed. He displayed in this extremity his accustomed firmness and address, and the barbarian was touched by his magnanimity. It seems that afterwards most of the captives engaged in the plot were returned to their masters, and Cervantes again fell into the hands of Dali Mami. He was subsequently purchased by the Dey, who is described as having been one of those capricious and bloody monsters who take pleasure in beholding human suffering. This wretch was continually, and for no obvious cause, killing or torturing his unhappy slaves. Cervantes he regarded as a dangerous person, and kept him in close confinement. But nothing could subdue the spirit of the famous Spaniard. In spite of the dangers that menaced him in the event of detection, he made another attempt to escape, and though closely watched he managed to indite a letter to the Spanish governor of Oran, and to despatch it by a Moor. The Moor was caught when on the point of departure, and immediately impaled alive, and Cervantes was sentenced to receive 2,000 blows of the bastinado. Some friends, however, interposed, and the pitiless Dey for once relented. There must have been something in the demeanour of Cervantes which inspired the barbarian with respect, or very strong influence must have been used, for shortly before, three captive Spaniards who had attempted to escape from him, had been beaten to death in his presence.

But no failure or disaster seemed to affect Cervantes, or to cause him to relax his efforts to obtain his liberty. We next find him in communication with a renegade Spaniard, who had assumed the turban, but had begun to show signs of repentance and contrition for his apostacy. With this man he concerted another plan of escape. A vessel was purchased by the renegade under the secret orders of Cervantes, and about sixty Christian captives were informed of the fact, and duly advised to hold themselves in readiness to depart. But a Dominican monk, "like another Judas," stimulated, it is said, by envy of Cervantes, betrayed the conspiracy to the Dey, who chose for a time to dissemble his knowledge, in order that he might seize the culprits in the fact. It was, however, soon suspected that the plot had been discovered, and all who were engaged in it were seized with consternation. Cervantes fled; but as soon as he understood that sentence of death was proclaimed against any one who should harbour or afford him an asylum, he generously gave himself up; a renegade Spaniard, who was then high in favour with the Dey, having undertaken to intercede for him. Cervantes was this time brought before the ferocious barbarian, with his arms pinioned, and a rope round his neck, as if destined for immediate execution. But his firmness of soul did not desert him; neither threats nor promises could induce him to betray his companions, and he left his master's presence an object of awe and respect, if not of admiration. The punishment inflicted on him for this new offence was imprisonment in irons in a Moorish fortress, where he languished five months.

Beyond a rigorous imprisonment, it does not appear that Cervantes was subjected to any remarkable or revolting ill-treatment. On the contrary, he was almost the only captive treated with any degree of consideration. "There was only one," he has said himself, in the story of The Captive, "whom he (the Dey) treated well—a Spanish soldier, named Saavedra, who engaged in so many attempts, which will be long remembered by the people of the country, and by his fellow-captives, to regain his liberty. Nevertheless, Hussan Aga never lifted his hand against him himself, nor caused others to do so, nor gave him an angry word." It is clear that the ferocious Moor stood in awe of the "lame Spaniard," and that, barbarian as he was, he respected, whilst he feared, his unconquered spirit and fertile genius. He contented himself, therefore, with depriving his captive of all opportunities for mischief, by a close imprisonment. He dared not, indeed, trust Cervantes at large, for he apprehended that the next thing attempted would be a general insurrection of the Christian slaves in Algiers. At this time they numbered upwards of 25,000, who were all alike animated by a spirit of bitter hostility against their infidel masters. We can scarcely realize to our minds the wretched position of these unfortunate captives, or the feeling of intense hatred with which they regarded their inhuman oppressors. Torn from their country, families, and friends—subjected to the severest menial labour, and exposed to constant ill-treatment and privation, their condition was indeed most pitiable. Slavery with them was truly a bitter draught. A simple sketch of some of their ordinary sufferings was presented by Cervantes to his countrymen after his return, in his curious drama called El Trate (or Los Tratos de Argel, i. e. Life, or Manners, in Algiers. This play consists of a succession of simple and touching incidents, many of which were well calculated at the period of its representation to harrow the breasts of the spectators. In one scene a very ordinary occurrence—the sale of Christian captives in the Moslem market-place—is truthfully represented, with all its sad accessories. A father, a mother, and their two children, are exposed for sale in separate lots. The simplicity of the poor innocents, who cannot be brought to believe that any human power can separate them from their parents, is beautifully contrasted with the resignation of the afflicted father and the poignant grief of the mother. The latter, beholding her youngest child carried off by the Moslem merchant, and feeling persuaded she is destined to see him no more, pours out her soul in an agony of prayer. Above all, she fears that he may be seduced into apostacy, and under this terrible impression she addresses to him these parting words:—

"What I would crave of thee, my life, since I Must never more be blest with seeing thee,
Is that thou never, never wilt forget
To say, as thou wert wont, thy Ave Mary!
For that bright queen of goodness, grace, and virtue,
Can loosen all thy bonds, and give thee freedom."

The mother's fears are not unfounded. In the fifth act the boy is introduced as a renegade, sumptuously attired, and disdaining the society of the Christian captives.

This is an incident which might have occurred within the experience of Cervantes himself. At any rate, it serves to illustrate the melancholy condition of the Christian captives in Algiers, some of whom, it will be remembered, were of gentle blood, and belonged to the best families of Spain.

Cervantes had nearly completed the fifth year of his captivity, when the hour of his liberation arrived. His family had been long making strenuous efforts to raise money enough to purchase his ransom. His widowed mother sacrificed everything she possessed, including the dowry of her daughters, for this great object. But she still found it impossible to raise sufficient for the purpose. All that could be collected was placed in the hands of a benevolent friar, who had just been appointed to superintend a mission for the redemption of Christian captives, despatched to Algiers by Philip II. Upon the arrival of the mission, negotiations were opened for the release of Cervantes; but the demands of the Dey were too exorbitant to be complied with. In the meanwhile, Hussan Aga had been recalled by the sultan, and was preparing to leave Algiers. He intended to convey his slaves with him to Constantinople, and Cervantes, heavily ironed, was placed on board his galley. It was at this juncture, when the chances of freedom appeared most desperate, that the high-spirited captive was at last released through the exertions of the Christian mission, on the 19th of September, 1580.

After more than ten long years of absence—years so full of suffering and adventure—Cervantes found himself restored to his native land. But beyond the joyous sense of liberty there was little to gratify him on his return from exile. His father had died during his captivity, his mother and sisters were too poor to offer him even the shelter of a roof. He was unfriended and forgotten, and almost a stranger in the land of his birth. It is not surprising, therefore, that he returned to his former profession, and started once more as a common soldier. The kingdom of Portugal was at this time occupied by the Spanish armies, and was the next theatre of his services. Although it is not certain how long he remained there, it is known that he was present in several important engagements, and displayed his accustomed bravery.

It was love, says M. Viardot, which restored Cervantes to literature. In a happy interval of his busy life, he had made the acquaintance of a noble lady of Esquivias, a small town near Madrid; and in her honour he composed his pastoral romance of "Galatea." The romance was published in 1584, and almost immediately afterwards Cervantes, then in his thirty-seventh year, married the fair enchantress who had inspired him with literary ambition. Whether the lady was won by the "pastoral romance," (which is admitted to be rather an uninteresting performance,) or by the more moving romance of the author's own life is, we think, doubtful. Her woman's heart might have been well touched by "the round unvarnished tale" which he was able to deliver, we doubt not, with manly eloquence,—

"Of moving accidents by flood and field;
Of hair-breadth 'scapes i' th' imminent deadly breach;
Of being taken by the insolent foe,
And sold to slavery; of his redemption thence,
And portance in his travel's history."

It will be remembered that the Galatea is found in Don Quixote's library, and is thus spoken of by its author.

"'But what book is the next one?' said the curate. 'The Galatea of Miguel de Cervantes,' replied the barber. 'This Cervantes,' said the curate, 'has been a great friend of mine these many years; and I know that he is more skilled in sorrows than in verse. His book is not without happiness in the invention; it promises something, but finishes nothing.'"

In the four years following his marriage (from 1584 to 1588), Cervantes devoted himself to dramatic composition; but in this department of literature his great contemporary, Lope de Vega, reigned supreme, and it is admitted that he was by no means successful as a rival candidate for popular favour.

We find him next at Seville, where "he acted for some time as one of the agents of Antonio de Guevara, a royal commissary for the American fleets, . . . an humble condition, certainly, and full of cares, but still one that gave him the bread he had vainly sought in other pursuits."¹

It must also be stated that at this time his two sisters were entirely dependent on him for support. After holding his appointment for some time an event occurred which cast another deep shade over the life of Cervantes. In 1597 he was arrested and thrown into prison as a defaulter to the government; but he was released after a short detention, and it does not appear that anything beyond a culpable degree of negligence could be laid to his charge.

About this time there occurs a gap in the authenticated records of Cervantes' life. From 1598, when we lose all trace of him at Seville, till 1603, when we find him at Valladolid, we have nothing but vague and conflicting reports respecting him. But it was during this period that the principal portion of the First Part of Don Quixote was written. Now Cervantes himself says that his great work was begun in a prison, and—

"A uniform tradition," (we quote from Mr. Ticknor,) "declares that he was employed by the grand prior of the Order of St. John in La Mancha to collect rents due to his monastery in the village of Argamasilla; that he went there on this humble agency to make the attempt, but that the debtors refused payment, and, after persecuting him in different ways, ended by throwing him into a prison, where in a spirit of indignation he began to write the Don Quixote, making his hero a native of the village that had treated him so ill, and laying the scene of some of the knight's earlier adventures in La Mancha."

Coupling, therefore, the fact of his imprisonment at the time that he commenced his immortal work with the intimate knowledge that it displays of the people and topography of La Mancha, in the absence of any authentic particulars, we think that his biographers are fully justified in adopting this tradition.

Cervantes had repaired to Valladolid, in all probability, because the court had been removed there, and he was led to cherish some hope that his former services might receive acknowledgment. But here, as elsewhere, he was overlooked and neglected. It was in vain that his proud nature stooped to supplication; he was still unfortunate. He presented himself before the Duke of Lerma, then called the "Atlas of the monarchy," and the dispenser of all its favours; but the proud minister received him with disdain, and Cervantes, wounded to the quick, turned heart-sick from his presence-chamber, and thenceforth renouncing all hopes of court favour, sought and obtained such precarious employment as a friendless man of education could procure for his daily subsistence. In the meanwhile, and under the pressure of poverty and embarrassment, he hastened on his great work, and in 1605, the First Part of Don Quixote, having been licensed at Valladolid in 1604, was printed at Madrid. Its popularity was immediate, and in those days almost unexampled; for the same year, another edition was called for at Madrid, and, two more elsewhere.¹ In the year following, Cervantes left Valladolid for Madrid, where he passed the remainder of his eventful life. His pen was for the next ten years fully occupied in the production of novels and plays, for a critical examination of which we have not space; and in October, 1615, he published the Second Part of Don Quixote.

The surprising popularity of Don Quixote rendered Cervantes an object of envy and enmity, which he bore with unusual serenity and magnanimity of spirit. But, though his work was everywhere a topic of conversation, he still remained in obscurity. It is related of Philip III., that he beheld one day from the balcony of his palace a student walking along, with a book in his hand, gesticulating extravagantly, and then bursting out into sudden and uncontrollable fits of laughter. "That youth," said Philip to a courtier, "is either mad, or he is reading Don Quixote." The courtier, eager to confirm the royal sagacity, immediately ran out to ascertain the fact, and returned with the announcement, that the student was indeed reading the adventures of the Knight of La Mancha; and yet neither the king nor his courtier thought of asking where or how the author of this marvellous book lived! Equally characteristic is the statement of the chaplain of the Archbishop of Toledo, who had been entrusted with the censorship of the second part of Don Quixote. Some gentlemen in the French embassy had asked him, what works of imagination were at that time fashionable in Spain; and thereupon, amongst other books, he mentioned Don Quixote. The Frenchmen had read the first part of that romance, and they expressed themselves so warmly respecting its merits, that the chaplain offered to introduce them to the author—an offer which they eagerly accepted. "They questioned me," he says, "very minutely respecting his age, his profession, his rank, his fortune. I was obliged to reply, that he was an old soldier—a poor gentleman." "What!" exclaimed one with surprise, "has not Spain, then, made such a man rich? Is he not supported at the public cost?" But another added, with great address: "If it be necessity which has compelled him to write, God grant that he may never be rich, since, by continuing poor, he may enrich by his works the whole world!" Cervantes himself seems to have calculated on, and expected the immense popularity of his book, for he makes Sancho say to his master,—"I will lay a wager, that, before long, there will not be a twopenny eating-house, a hedge tavern, or a poor inn, or barber's shop, where the history of what we have done shall not be painted and stuck up."

The fame of the work was soon spread over Europe, and it is perhaps at this moment the best-known book of its class that has been ever written. No author appears to have entered upon a subject with more earnestness of purpose, or to have more completely identified himself with his own creations. "Cervantes," says Mr. Ticknor, "in truth, came at last to love these creations of his marvellous power, as if they were real, familiar personages, and to speak of them, and treat them with an earnestness and interest, that tend much to the illusion of his readers. Both Don Quixote and Sancho are thus brought before us, like such living realities, that, at this moment, the figures of the crazed, gaunt, dignified knight, and of his round, selfish and most amusing esquire, dwell bodied forth in the imaginations of more, among all conditions of men throughout Christendom, than any other of the creations of human talent." In spite of unsatisfactory translations—and it is admitted, that there is scarcely any work so difficult to render fitly in a foreign language, as Don Quixote—it has become naturalised to every European soil. The English school-boy numbers the knight of La Mancha among his earliest acquaintances, and laughs over his adventures as heartily as the Spanish student who attracted the notice of Philip III. Don Quixote is everywhere a classic. In the ungenial north, as well as in the sunny south, it is read with admiration and delight. But we must not dis sever the book from its author. Having examined the principal incidents in the life of Cervantes, we think our readers will agree with Mr. Ticknor, that if we would "fully comprehend and enjoy the whole of his Don Quixote, we should, as we read it, bear in mind, that this delightful romance was not the result of a youthful exuberance of feeling, and a happy external condition, nor composed in his best years, when the spirits of its author were light, and his hopes high; but that—with all its unquenchable and irresistible humour, with its bright views of the world, and its cheerful trust in goodness and virtue,—it was written in his old age, at the conclusion of a life, nearly every step of which had been marked with disappointed expectations, disheartening struggles, and sore calamities; that he began it in a prison, and that it was finished when he felt the hand of death pressing heavy and cold upon his heart."

In spite of all his troubles, Cervantes retained to the last his cheerfulness and serenity of mind. We have good evidence that his faculties remained unclouded, at the close of his laborious life. On the 10th of April, 1616, he penned a dedication of his "Periplus y Sigismunda," to the Count de Lemos, the best friend of his declining years, in which he says: "Yesterday they administered to me extreme unction, and to-day I write you these few lines. My time is short; my pains increase; my hopes fail; . . . yet I believe, if I could only see your highness once more in Spain, it would give me new life. But if it is ordained otherwise, the will of heaven be done. May your highness at least be aware of my wish, and know that you possessed in me an affectionate servant, who wished to show his attachment, even beyond death." Four days after writing this, on the 23d of April, Cervantes peacefully expired, at the age of sixty-eight.

Having devoted some space to the romantic adventures of Cervantes, we will now briefly advert to a few of the most interesting particulars in the life of his great contemporary Lope de Vega. With regard to the literary reputation of the two men, there is this great difference, Cervantes passed his life in penury and neglect, to reap a rich harvest of posthumous fame; Lope de Vega was the idol of his contemporaries,—eulogized as "the glory of the land, the oracle of language, the centre of fame, the phoenix of ages, the prince of poetry," &c.—but a large portion of his works has never descended to posterity at all.

"Lope Felix de Vega Carpio," says Mr. Ticknor, "was born on the 25th of November, 1562, at Madrid. . . . From his earliest youth he discovered extraordinary powers. At five years of age, we are assured by his friend Montalvan, that he could not only read Latin as well as Spanish, but that he had such a passion for poetry, as to pay his more advanced schoolfellows with a share of his breakfast, for writing down the verses he dictated to them, before he had learned to do it for himself."

His father died when he was very young, and left his children poorly provided for; but Lope was sent to the Imperial College of Madrid, where he made great progress. His vivacity of disposition, however, and early love of adventure soon led him into scrapes. At the age of fourteen, he ran away from college with a schoolfellow; possessed with the giddy idea of "seeing the world."

"At first they went on foot for two or three days. Then they bought a sorry horse, and travelled as far as Astorga, in the north-western part of Spain, not far from the old fief of the Vega family; but there, growing tired of their journey, and missing more seriously than they had anticipated the comforts to which they had been accustomed, they determined to come home. At Segovia, they attempted, in a silversmith's shop, to exchange some doubloons and a gold chain for small coin, but were suspected to be thieves, and arrested."

In the end they were sent back to Madrid, with an alguazil, who delivered them safely into the hands of their relations. At the age of fifteen, Mr. Ticknor assumes, from a curious passage in one of his poems, that he was serving as a soldier against the Portuguese in Terceira; but this is at any rate questionable. It is certain that whilst still a youth, he became an inmate in the house of the Grand Inquisitor, Don Geronimo Manrique, Bishop of Avila, who was delighted with his quickness and intelligence, and under whose patronage he was sent to the University of Alcalá, where he acquitted himself creditably, and had he not fallen blindly in love, was, according to his own account, on the point of becoming a priest. His passion was fierce and fervent; and he suffered all the torments which he afterwards depicted in romance. On his leaving the university, he was received into the service of the Duke of Alba—the grandson, according to Mr. Ticknor, of the bloody and remorseless bigot whose name has been rendered for ever infamous by the cruelties which he practised in the Netherlands. At the suggestion of his patron he wrote his pastoral romance of "Arcadia;" and whilst engaged on that composition, he married a noble lady named Donna Isabel de Urbino. But a serious accident soon interrupted his domestic felicity:—

"It happened," says his friend Montalvan, "that there was a sort of half-and-half hidalgo (for there is a twilight in the origin of nobility as well as in the break of day) of small fortune, but of great skill in contriving to dress and eat as well as the rest of the world, without other employment than frequenting society, when with little trouble to himself he lived cheaply by flattering those present, and backbiting the absent. Lope heard that on one occasion he had entertained a company at his expense. He passed over the impertinence, not from fear, but contempt; but seeing that the man persisted in his attacks, he grew tired; so without quarrelling with him by sword or word—the first being impious, the second foolish—he depicted him in a song so pleasantly that every body laughed."

This, as might be expected, led to a duel, in which Lope wounded his adversary; and for this and other freaks and follies of youth, he was arrested and cast into prison. He was soon released, on the hard condition of his leaving Madrid; and he then passed some years in exile at Valencia.

As soon as he could venture to return, he did so. But in less than a year afterwards, his home was rendered desolate by the death of his young wife. He celebrated the sad event in some indifferent verse; and then in the course of a few months, to amuse and distract his thoughts, resorted again to "the genuine Spanish resource of becoming a soldier." The period at which he took this decisive step was a remarkable one. It was in a moment of national enthusiasm, when a spirit of military adventure was abroad, stimulated and inflamed by religious ardour. Philip II., the Most Catholic king, had just completed his preparations for overthrowing the power of England's Protestant Queen, and restoring to the bosom of the Church a nation of obstinate heretics. The Invincible Armada, one of the proudest armaments ever committed to the bosom of the main, had been prepared for this purpose; and upwards of two thousand volunteers from the best families of Spain

(in addition to a vast array of soldiers, sailors, and marines) joined the expedition. Among them was Lope de Vega, then in the 26th year of his age, panting for distinction,—having torn up for cartridges the verses he had written in the praise of a new mistress. He evidently shared the enthusiasm or fanaticism of his companions, and believed himself a soldier of God—a chosen instrument of an avenging Providence. The gloomy piety of Philip had communicated itself to the national character. Throughout the whole of the vast armament the strictest religious observances were enjoined; whilst gambling, quarrels, and duels, and all blasphemy against God, our Lady and the Saints were expressly prohibited in the general orders.

We need not recount the disasters of the ill-fated expedition. As the proud Spaniards approached our shores, a higher power interfered in our behalf. The storm arose, and their hosts were scattered. But amid all the disasters of that most disastrous attempt, Lope de Vega found time for literary composition. "Upon the deck of the San Juan, beneath the banners of the Catholic king," he wrote a long poem, designed for a continuation of the "Orlando Furioso," called "The Beauty of Angelica." When we reflect on all the circumstances attendant on the dispersion of the Armada—the terrific tempests, and the panic and confusion which must have ensued; when we learn, moreover, that his brother died in his arms, mortally wounded during a skirmish with the Dutch, at the very outset of the expedition—it must certainly be regarded as a marvellous fact that he should have found "the leisure and quietness of spirit" to engage in poetical composition. As the poem was written in the ill-fated Armada, "it contains," says Mr. Ticknor, "occasional intimations of the author's national and religious feelings, such as were naturally suggested by his situation. But in the same volume he originally published a poem in which these feelings are much more fully and freely expressed; a poem, indeed, which is devoted to nothing else. It is called 'La Dragontea,' and is on the subject of Sir Francis Drake's last expedition and death." The name of Drake was sufficiently odious and terrible in Spain. He was regarded as a pirate, or successful buccaneer, an heretical freebooter, the incarnation of all that was horrible and impious to the mind of an orthodox Spaniard. Lope de Vega's poem, a grave epic of ten cantos, is piously devoted to his abuse, and was no doubt read with avidity, for such literature was then popular. In the common ballads of the time we meet with the same expression of the public feeling, and Mr. Ticknor has cited the following significant stanzas from one of them:—

"And Bartolo, my brother,
To England forth is gone,
Where the Drake he means to kill;
And the Lutherans every one,
Excommunicate from God,
Their queen among the first,
He will capture and bring back,
Like heretics accursed.

And he promises, moreover,
Among his spoils and gains,
A heretic young serving-boy
To give me, bound in chains;
And for my lady grandmamma,
Whose years such waiting crave,
A little handy Lutheran
To be her maiden slave."

The rest of Lope de Vega's life is not particularly interesting. On his return from the Armada, he entered successively into the service of two noblemen, the Marquis de Malpica and the Count de Lemon. He then again married and enjoyed some years of domestic felicity. Death, however, deprived him of a beloved son, and his wife followed his darling to the tomb. His home was again desolate, and he began to dispose his mind for the priesthood. Finally at Toledo, in 1600, in the forty-seventh year of his age, he received the tonsure, and became a priest. But such a step did not, it appears, at that time involve any greater strictness of life, or the relinquishment of worldly pleasures or advantages. "During the long series of years," says Mr. Ticknor, "in which he was a priest, and gave regular portions of his time to offices of devotion and charity, he was at the height of favour and fashion as a poet. And, what may seem to us more strange, it was during the same period he produced the greater number of his dramas, not a few of whose scenes offend against the most unquestioned precepts of Christian morality, while at the same time, in their title-pages and dedications, he carefully sets forth his clerical distinctions, giving peculiar prominence to his place as a Familiar or Servant of the holy office of the Inquisition."

It was in the latter capacity that he officiated at one of those dreadful scenes of which his country was so often the theatre. A Franciscan monk, who had been long suspected of heresy, had committed an act of frantic sacrilege by seizing the consecrated host from the hands of the officiating priest, during the celebration of mass in the open church, and violently destroying it. The poor wretch, having been given up to the Inquisition, was condemned to be burnt alive, and the sentence was carried into effect in January 1623, outside the gate of Alcalá at Madrid. It was a scene of great solemnity, for the court was present, and the theatres and public shows were suspended for a fortnight. Lope de Vega, we are expressly informed, was one of the directors of the revolting ceremonies, and actually assisted in their horrible details.

The popularity of Lope, as a poet and dramatist, continued to increase as he advanced in life. He supplied the theatres with dramas peculiarly adapted to the tastes and prejudices of the age, and ministered to its greedy love of novelty with marvellous industry and facility. With equal success, he composed poems, religious and secular, which monopolised public admiration. The name of Lope was given, as an expression of perfection, to anything particularly good of its kind; as a Lope diamond, or, a Lope dress. The intolerance of his admirers would not permit the whisper of a censure; and it was even suggested that the author of a work reflecting on the character of some of his poems, and questioning his knowledge of the Latin language, deserved death for his heretical opinions. But, whatever may be the intrinsic merits of his productions, it is quite certain that he was the most prolific writer that has ever lived. The estimated number of his plays alone will appear almost fabulous. According to his own account, in 1619 he had written upwards of 900, and in 1624, 1070. After his death, his friend and executor Montalvan, confidently declares that, without reckoning the shorter pieces, they amounted to 1800. Of this immense mass it is certain that not a fourth part was committed to the press. He dictated verses faster than they could be taken down, and it is further stated by Montalvan, that he wrote five full-length dramas in fifteen days. This marvellous facility is thus explained and accounted for by Mr. Ticknor; and the explanation is certainly a key "to much of his personal character, as well as of his poetical success."

"No poet," he says, "of any considerable reputation ever had a genius so nearly related to that of an improvisator, or ever indulged his genius so freely in the spirit of improvisation. This talent has always existed in the southern countries of Europe; and in Spain has, from the first, produced the most extraordinary results. We owe to it the invention and perfection of the old ballads, which were originally improvised, and then preserved by tradition; and we owe to it the seguidillas, the boleros, and all the other forms of popular poetry that still exist in Spain, and are daily poured forth by the fervent imaginations of the uncultivated classes of the people, and sung to the national music, that sometimes seems to fill the air by night, as the light of the sun does by day."

The life of Lope de Vega was prolonged beyond the ordinary span of human existence; but it is said that its close was clouded by a deep religious melancholy. In his last hours, he expressed his bitter regret that he had ever employed his pen on other than pious subjects; and a few days before his death he subjected himself to such a rigorous discipline, that the walls of his chamber were found sprinkled with his blood. It is supposed that this cruel flagellation hastened his death, which took place on the 25th of August, 1635. He was nearly seventy-three years old.

We do not gather that there was any cordial intercourse between Cervantes and Lope de Vega. They have indeed spoken of each other in their respective writings; but the two men occupied very different positions in the eyes of their contemporaries. The one was the idol of the hour, the spoiled favourite of a capricious public; the other was destined to fix the admiration of posterity. When the successful dramatist walked abroad, women and children ran to catch a glimpse of him; but the author of Don Quixote was regarded as nothing more than an ordinary individual. The body of Cervantes was followed to the grave by a few mourning friends alone; whilst all Madrid flocked to the funeral of Lope, and a woman who beheld the grand procession pass, without knowing whose corpse was carried to the tomb with such unaccustomed honours, exclaimed that it was a Lope funeral! Of so little value is the judgment of contemporaries as a test of enduring popularity.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

HOW RICHARD FRERE OBTAINED A SPECIMEN OF THE "PODICEPS CORNUTUS."

"Now for the Podiceps Cornutus!" exclaimed Frere, after Lewis had been made acquainted with the result of the interview with Mr. Nonpareil.

"May I ask what wonderful creature rejoices in that ineffable name?" inquired Rose.

"You may well say 'wonderful creature,'" returned Frere, enthusiastically. "It's my belief, that my precious Podiceps is the first specimen which has ever been obtained in this country; and, I should fancy, it will be the last, too; for I don't expect any one will be inclined to take the same amount of trouble that I took in order to get it. I was down in Lincolnshire last Christmas, at a place called Water End,—so named, I should imagine, on the lucus a non lucendo principle, because there was no end of water all round it. Well, Sir," (he was addressing Rose all this time,) "Fenwick, the man with whom I was staying, told me one day, that he'd seen a bird when he was duck-shooting, which he'd never met with before; and, by the description he gave me of it, I felt almost certain it must have been a specimen of the Podiceps Cornutus, which, as I dare say you know, is scarcely ever met with in this latitude."

"You must excuse my lamentable ignorance," replied Rose, smiling, "but I was not even aware of its illustrious existence five minutes ago."

"Well," returned Frere, arching his eye-brows, "they do neglect women's educations shamefully, I must say! The Podiceps Cornutus is a species of Grebe, by no means rare in Pennsylvania, where they winter; in summer they migrate to the fur countries, to rear their young; they are web-footed; the bill is—but, however, you shall see my specimen, so I need not bother you with a long description, which I dare say you would not understand after all; and I'll tell you, instead, my adventures in pursuit of the bird. The weather was unusually cold, the ground was covered with snow and the water with ice; but as soon as I heard of the Podiceps, nothing would serve me but I must go after it. Accordingly, an amphibious old animal of a game-keeper was summoned to attend me, and as soon as it was light the next morning, off we set, and we walked through ice and snow till two o'clock in the afternoon, each armed with a long duck gun, that weighed as much as a small cannon. We saw plenty of ducks, teal, and even snipes, but nothing that could by any possibility be mistaken for a Podiceps. At last we came to a salt-marsh, as they call it,—that is, a place which is all water when the tide is high, and alluvium—more commonly termed mud—when it's low, which it happened to be at that particular epoch. Well, my old companion began to show signs of knocking up, and gave one or two broad hints that he considered we were engaged in a wild-goose chase, in every sense of the term, and that the sooner we relinquished it the better; when, all of a sudden, almost from under our feet, up sprang a bird, and flew away like the wind. 'The Podiceps, by all that's glorious!' exclaimed I; and, levelling my gun, in such excitement that I could scarcely hold it steady, I blazed away, and—of course, missed it. The old game-keeper, however, took the thing more coolly, and muttering; 'most haste worst speed,' raised his fowling-piece, and, when the bird was just at a nice killing distance, pulled the trigger—but the confounded gun hung fire, and did not go off till my Podiceps was all but out of shot; luckily, however, some of the shots reached him, and, just as I fancied I was about to lose sight of him for good and all, he gave a sort of lurch, as if he were tipsy, and came toppling down headlong. I marked the spot where he fell, and, the moment he reached the ground, rushed off to secure him. As I was going along, I heard the old fellow bawling something after me, of which I only caught the words, 'take care,' but as I was not in the humour just then to take care of any thing except to gain possession of my Podiceps, I paid no attention to him. The bird had fallen on a sort of peninsular-shaped bank, and along this, sometimes over my insteps in mud, sometimes up to my knees in water, did I make my way, as fast as the difficulties of the path would permit. The spot where the Podiceps had fallen proved to be much farther off than I had imagined it, and before I reached it I was completely out of breath, and almost dragged to pieces by wading through the mud in my heavy boots. However, I cared little for that when I discovered the bird lying on his back, as dead as mutton, and, on picking it up, perceived that it really was an actual bonâ fide Podiceps Cornutus; and no mere myth, created by my imagination. Delighted at having secured my prize, I washed the mud off it, smoothed its feathers as carefully as possible, and, wrapping it in a handkerchief, placed it in my pocket, and prepared to retrace my steps. But, lo and behold! while I had been admiring the Podiceps, my peninsula had become an island! and there was I, Robinson Crusoe-like, suddenly cut off from my fellow-creatures. Not a soul, or more correctly, a body could I see,—my old man had disappeared,—indeed, so altered was the face of things by the rising of the water, that I did not very well know in what quarter to look for him, or in which direction to advance in order to gain terra firma, while, to my annoyance, I perceived that my island was rapidly growing 'small by degrees, and beautifully less!'

"What a disagreeable position to be placed in!" exclaimed Rose, much interested. "How did you contrive to escape?"

"Well, I was just going to tell you if you hadn't interrupted me," returned Frere, gruffly; "I made one or two attempts to discover the route by which I had come, but in vain; advance which way I would I only got into deeper water, and in the last trial I made, I slipped souse into a hole, and was half drowned before I could contrive to scramble out again. After this rather serious failure, I began to feel that I was in an awkward predicament. I shouted, but no one answered, for the very sufficient reason that no one was within hearing. I loaded my gun and tried to discharge it; but it had become wet when I tumbled into the hole, and obstinately refused to go off. The water continued to rise rapidly, and my island was already covered: my only hope now lay in my old man; the words he had bawled after me, must evidently have been a warning against the danger in which I had so foolishly involved myself; he must therefore be aware of my situation, and would surely take some measures for my rescue. At all events, there was nothing for it but patience; I was unable to swim; the ground on which I stood appeared to be the highest point in the immediate vicinity; so there I must remain. Perhaps, after all, my imagination had exaggerated the danger; the tide might not rise much higher, and the old man, aware of this fact, might be waiting till the waters should recede, to join me and pilot me safely home. This at all events was a consolatory hypothesis, and trying to persuade myself it was the true one, I forced the barrel of my gun as deeply into the mud as I was able, leaned my elbows on the butt, and thus supported, watched with a beating heart the advance of the water. My feet were already covered, and it continued to rise almost imperceptibly, and yet, comparing one five minutes with another, with appalling rapidity, higher and higher: it gained the calf of my leg; it approached, then covered my knees; inch by inch it stole on till it reached my hip; the first button of my waistcoat was the next point, then the second, then the third, and as that also disappeared, I felt my situation was indeed becoming perilous in the extreme, and cast my eyes around in the vain hope of discovering some means of extricating myself. I might have saved myself the trouble; nothing but the still increasing water was visible on any side. A slight breeze arose and rippled the surface, and now my precaution of thrusting my gun-barrel into the mud stood me in good stead; but for it, I should have been swept away by the advancing tide, and even in spite of this support I found some difficulty in preserving my foothold. My eyes seemed riveted by some supernatural fascination to the progress made by the deepening water. My waistcoat buttoned up to the throat with eight buttons; five of these were by this time immersed, the water stood breast high, the sixth disappeared; it was with the greatest difficulty I could preserve my balance, I swayed from side to side like a drunken man. The cold was intense, my teeth chattered and my limbs were rapidly becoming cramped and paralysed, while, to add to my catalogue of miseries, the daylight began to fade apace. I gave myself up for lost, and came to the conclusion that if ever we were fished out, the Podiceps and I should be alike candidates for a glass-case in some museum. A strange mixture of thoughts ran through my brain. I tried to realize the idea of death. I fancied the separation of soul and body, and speculated on how my mental self would feel when it saw strange fishes taking liberties with my bodily self, without having the slightest power to drive them away. My attention was diverted from these gloomy fancies by observing that the water appeared much longer in reaching my seventh button, than it had been in advancing from the fourth to the fifth, or from that to the sixth, and while I was casting about to find a reason for this variation, lo and behold! the sixth button once more became visible. How was this? had I unconsciously shifted to higher ground, or was it, could it be possible that the tide had turned, that the waters had begun to recede? The agonizing suspense of the next five minutes was one of the most severe mental trials I have ever experienced. Though I spoke lightly on the subject just now, I had in fact made up my mind to face death as a man and a Christian should do, and was prepared to meet my fate calmly and resolutely; but now the uncertainty, the renewed hopes of life struggling with the fear of a possibly approaching death, became almost unbearable, and had the conflict been prolonged, my presence of mind would have entirely deserted me. Less than five minutes, however, served to set the matter at rest; the sixth button was left high and dry, the fifth reappeared, and was succeeded by another, and another; certain land marks, whose immersion I had watched with anxious eyes, again became visible, and I was thinking of making a final effort to reach terra firma before the increasing darkness should throw new difficulties in the way, when my ears were greeted by a distant 'Halloo.' I shouted in reply, and soon had the satisfaction of perceiving a flat-bottomed boat making towards me, propelled by my host, and the old man who I had conceived barely to have deserted me. As they drew me, half crippled with cold and exhaustion, into the boat, Fenwick began haranguing me in a composite strain of upbraiding and condolence, but I cut him short by raising my head as I lay sousing in a puddle at the bottom of the punt, and murmuring in a faint voice,—"Never mind, old fellow; it's all right, for I've got the Podiceps Cornutus;—and touching that same bird, here we are at the stuffer's shop; so come along in, and I'll show him to you bodily."

A week had elapsed since the morning on which the above conversation took place, a week in which many events had occurred. The mighty Nonpareil, still considering the via media a promising investment, had condescended graciously to purchase Rose's manuscript, and when Frere, who brought her the intelligence, placed in her hands a check for £100, which, relying on her profound ignorance of business terms, he had kindly substituted for the publisher's bill at six months, she received it with a start of delight. The girl was so happy! she had at length realised her darling project; she had, by her own exertions, helped to lighten Lewis's burden; she had done something towards shortening his period of banishment, for such she considered his enforced residence at Broadhurst. Poor Rose! she had not a particle of avarice in her whole nature, and yet never did miser rejoice over his hoards as she did over that hundred pounds;—for it was by no means to be spent;—that, fortunately, was unnecessary, as Mrs. Arundel, albeit wanting mental ballast in some points, was a notable housewife, and as for Rachel, she was a very dragon in her care of that Hesperides, the larder; so that out of the liberal allowance Lewis made to them, his mother and sister were privately saving a small fund, destined, as they fondly hoped, to advance at some future time his fortunes; and to this store Rose's hundred pounds would make a magnificent addition. And the joy it was to her thus to dedicate it! Could she have purchased with it the most desirable match in England, the hand of that identical young duke who was exhibited to correct radical tendencies at the electioneering ball at Broadhurst, his Grace might have died a bachelor ere Rose would have diverted the money from its appointed purpose. But something ought to be done with it. Rose had heard of compound interest; nay, she had even had its nature explained to her; and though at the end of the explanation she was more in the dark than at the beginning, she attributed that to her own obtuseness, and contented herself with recollecting that it was something which began by doubling itself, and went on doubling itself and something else, until—she did not know exactly what; so she supplied the blank by adding, until the desired result should be attained. And now, recalling the definition thus arrived at, she decided that the advisable thing would be to place her hundred pounds in the most favourable situation for catching that desirable epidemic, compound interest. Accordingly, with much diffidence, and a just appreciation of the very hazy nature of her dissolving views in regard to the investment of capital generally, Rose communicated her ideas to Frere. That gentleman heard her out with a good-humoured smile playing around the corners of his mouth.—"Well," he said, as she concluded, "you are but a woman after all, I see!"

"Why, what have you taken me for hitherto, then?" inquired Rose.

This very pertinent inquiry appeared somewhat to puzzle the individual to whom it was addressed, for he pushed his hair back from his forehead, and rubbed his chin with an air of perplexity ere he answered,— "If I were what they call a lady's man, which means a conceited puppy, I should grin at you to show my white teeth, and reply—'An Angel;' but seeing that man was made a little lower than the angels—though, by the way, that's a mis-translation—and that women are inferior to men, to call a woman an angel is to be guilty of a logical absurdity, and is only to be excused in the case of lovers, who, as men labouring under a mental delusion—temporary monomaniacs, in fact—are scarcely to be looked upon as rational beings."

"But if you are not a puppy, and I am not an angel, both which propositions I am perfectly ready to admit, why do you consider it necessary to enunciate your apparent discovery that, after all, I am only a woman?" inquired Rose.

"Because, if you must know," growled Frere, at length fairly brought to bay, "you have hitherto talked so much sense, and so little nonsense, that I've looked upon you more as a man than a woman. You wanted the truth, and now you've got it," he continued in a tone like the rumbling of distant thunder, as Rose, clapping her hands in girl-like delight at having elicited this confession, replied, with a low silvery laugh, "I thought so! I fancied that was it! Oh, the conceit of these lords of the creation! And now that you have found out that I am not the mental Amazon your fancy painted me, do you intend quite to give me up?"

As she said this, half playfully, half in earnest, raising her calm grey eyes, which now sparkled with unwonted animation, to his face, Frere experienced a (to him) entirely new sensation. He was for the first time conscious of the effect produced by—

"The light that lies In woman's eyes," and he felt—unreasonable as he could not but consider it—that he was better pleased with Rose as she was, than if she had been Professor Faraday himself; than whom (barring Sir Isaac Newton) Frere's mind was incapable of conceiving a more exalted type of male humanity. The way in which he expressed the gentle sentiment which had stolen into his breast was as follows—

"Don't talk such rubbish, but listen to a little common sense, and try and comprehend it, if you can, for once in your life. You want this money invested for Lewis's benefit, don't you?" Receiving a reply in the affirmative, he continued, "Well, then, have you sufficient confidence in me to trust it entirely in my hands to invest as I think best?"

"I should be indeed ungrateful if I had not," returned Rose, the tears springing to her eyes, as she remembered Frere's many acts of kindness to her father.

"Psha! stuff! I didn't mean anything of that kind," rejoined Frere, provoked with himself for having recalled such distressing recollections, "only you women are so ready to trust anybody till you've been let in for it two or three times, and then you're just as unreasonable the other way, and suspect every one whether they deserve it or not; however, as I believe I'm indifferent honest, I'll take this money, if you wish it, and do the best I can with it. Lewis shall not be always a tutor if we can help it, though it's wonderful how contented he's grown lately,—so as he kicked too when he was first put in harness."

"You've observed the change, have you, Mr. Frere?" returned Rose, interrogatively, "I have been rejoicing in it exceedingly; it is just what I could have wished, but dared not hope for. I attribute it in great measure to his affection for poor Walter."

"Well, it may be so; no doubt the lad presents an interesting psychological study," returned Frere, reflectively, "though I rather conceive it may be owing to his having taken a liking to—"

"Miss Grant and Miss Livingstone," vociferated the Colossus of plush, flinging open the door with a startling vehemence, the result of an ebullition of temper consequent upon a severe rebuke he had just received from Minerva for mis-pronouncing her patronymic, which interruption prevented Frere from expressing his innocent conviction that certain geological researches in the neighbourhood of Broadhurst constituted the charm that had so suddenly reconciled Lewis to his dependent position.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

RECOUNTS "YE PLEASANTE PASTYMES AND CUNNINGE DEVYCES" OF ONE THOMAS BRACY.

ANNIE GRANT introduced herself to Rose, with that easy courtesy which adds so great a charm to the manners of a perfectly well-bred woman, and Rose, as she gazed at her, thought she had never beheld anything so lovely before. She was dressed in—Halt là! attention, young ladies! favete—no, not linguis; in the amiability of your natures you are always ready enough to do that—favete auribus, listen and learn; for I myself, the chronicler of this veritable history, am about to vindicate the good use I made of those halcyon days when—

"My only books Were woman's looks,"

and to prove that "follics" were not all they taught me—for this I assert and am prepared to maintain, that good taste in dress is not in itself a folly, and only becomes so when the mind of a fool (or fool-as as the case may be) exalts it to an undue preeminence. Annie, be it remembered, was a blonde, with just enough of the rose in her cheeks to prevent the lily from producing an appearance of ill health. The month was June, the London season was at its height, and the young lady had called upon Rose in her way to the second horticultural fête at Chiswick Gardens. Her bonnet was of white chip, from which a small white ostrich feather tipped with blue, drooped lovingly, as though enamoured of the fair face beneath it. A visite, of light blue glacé silk, had been fashioned by the skill of an ingenious Parisian modiste, so as to suggest rather than conceal the exquisite form it covered, beneath which the rich folds of a gown of pale fawn-coloured Gros de Naples, as uncreased as if, cherub like, its wearer never sat down, completed the costume; and a very becoming one it was, as we feel sure all young ladies of good taste will allow. Richard Frere, being slightly acquainted with Minerva Livingstone, good-naturedly devoted himself to that indurated specimen of the original granite formation, who from her name and nature might possibly possess a geological interest in his eyes, and by trying to macadamize her into small-talk, enabled the two girls to prosecute their acquaintance undisturbed. Rose, little used to society, was shy and reserved before strangers, though there was a quiet self-possession about her which prevented her manner from appearing gauche or unformed. Annie, on the other hand, being in the constant habit of receiving and entertaining guests, made conversation with a graceful ease which completely fascinated her companion. The only subject on which her fluency appeared to desert her was when she spoke of Lewis, his kindness to Walter, and the valuable services he had lately rendered her father; but the little she did say showed so much good taste, and evinced such genuine warmth of heart and delicacy of feeling, that his sister was more than satisfied, and settled in her own mind that if all the family were as charming in their different ways as was Miss Grant in hers, Lewis's contentment with his present situation was no longer to be wondered at.

"What a lovely fascinating creature!" exclaimed Rose, enthusiastically, as the door closed on her visitors; "she is like some bright vision of a poet's dream."

"She seems a cute hard-headed old lady, but she struck me as having rather too much vinegar in her composition to induce one to covet much of her society; olives are well enough in their way, but a man would not exactly wish to dine upon them, either," returned Frere.

"Who on earth are you talking about?" inquired Rose, in astonishment.

"Why, who should I be talking about, except Miss Livingstone?" returned Frere, gruffly; "have you 'gone stupid' all of a sudden?"

"You must have become blind," retorted Rose, "not to have observed Miss Grant's unusual grace and beauty; I wonder Lewis has never said more about her."

"Bah!" growled Frere, "do you think your brother has nothing better to do than to chatter about a woman's pretty face? Lewis is, or was, (for his opinions on the subject seem to have been modified lately,) a confirmed misogynist, and I'm very glad of it; nothing ryles me more than to hear the confounded puppies of the present day talk about this 'doosed fine woman' or that 'uncommon nice gal.' If I happened to have a sister or any other woman-kind belonging to me, and they were to make free with her name in that fashion, I should pretty soon astonish some of their exquisite delicacies. Well," he continued, buttoning up his coat all awry, "I'm off, so good bye;" and taking Rose's hand in his own, he wrung it with such force, that a flush of pain overspread her pale features. Observing this, he exclaimed, "Did I squeeze your fingers too hard? Well, I am a bear, as Lewis says, that's certain." As he spoke he laid her hand in his own broad palm, and stroking it gently, as though trying to soothe an injured child, he continued, "Poor little thing, I didn't mean to hurt it;" then looking innocently surprised as Rose, somewhat hastily, withdrew it, he added, "What! isn't that right either? well, I see I'd better be off. I'll look you up again in a day or two, and if you want me, you know where to find me." So saying, he clattered down stairs, put on his hat hind-side before, and strode off, walking at the rate of at least five miles an hour. As he passed the church in Langham Place, he overtook two gentlemen engaged in earnest conversation: regardless of this he quickened his pace and struck the younger of the two a smart blow on the back, exclaiming, "Bracy, my boy, how are you?"

The individual thus roughly saluted, immediately reeled forward as if from the effects of the blow, and encountering in his headlong career an elderly female whose dress bespoke her an upper servant or thereabouts, he seized her by the shoulders and twirled her round in the bewildering maze of an agonized and fragmentary waltz, which he continued till an opportune lamp-post interposed and checked his Terpsichorean performance. Before his astonished partner had recovered breath and presence of mind sufficient to pour forth the first words of a tide of angry remonstrance, Bracy interposed by exclaiming in a tone of the most bland civility,—

"My dear madam, excuse this apparent liberty, really I am so completely overpowered, I would sink into the ground at your feet, if it were not for the granite pavement which is—"

Here the good woman, having scarcely recovered breath, gasped vehemently, "It's very hard, so it is—"

"Which is," continued Bracy, louder and with still deeper empressment, "as you justly observe, so very hard; but, my dear madam, the facts of this case are yet harder. Let me assure you my offence, if you choose to stigmatize my late lamented indiscretion by so harsh a name, was perfectly involuntary; simply an effect produced by a too vehement demonstration of fraternal feeling on the part of my particular friend Mr. Frere. Allow me to introduce you—Outraged Elderly Lady, Mr. Frere—Mr. Frere, Outraged Elderly Lady. Ah, what a happy meeting! As the ever-appropriate Swan observes,—'Fair encounter of two most rare affections!' or again,—'Joy, gentle friends, joy and fresh days of love accompany your hearts.'"

"Yes, it's all very fine," exclaimed the outraged one (suddenly finding her tongue) "to go frightening of respectable parties out of their wits, and then think to smooth 'em over with your blarneying words; but if I could set eyes on one of them lazy pelisemen which is never to be found when wanted, blessed if I wouldn't give you in charge for your impudence, so I would."

During the delivery of this speech, Bracy had listened in an exaggerated theatrical attitude of entranced attention, and at its conclusion he exclaimed, in a voice so intensely impassioned that it would have ensured his success at any of the minor theatres,—

"Oh! speak again; let mine enraptured ear Drink the sweet accents of thy silvery voice."

Which sentiment procured for him the applause of a small male spectator of the tender age of ten years, clad in much dirt, and a pair of adult trousers on their last legs in every sense of the term, who expressed his approval by nodding complacently and remarking, "Very well done; ancore, I says."

"Come along," exclaimed Frere, seizing Bracy's arm, and almost forcing him away; "you'll have a crowd round you directly. Your companion has taken himself off long ago."

"So he has," returned Bracy, looking round; "now I call that mean, to desert a friend in difficulties; more especially," he added as they walked away together, "as the said difficulties were undertaken wholly and solely on his account."

"On his account?" returned Frere in surprise, "why, I should have thought the mighty De Grandeville was the last person likely to appreciate a street row."

"For which reason I never lose an opportunity of involving him in one," replied Bracy, rubbing his hands with mischievous glee; "he can't bear walking with me, for I always get him into some scrape or other, and injure his dignity irreparably for the time being. Why, the last severe frost we had, I met him in Pall Mall, drew him on to talk of architecture, pointed out to him a mistake which didn't exist, in the front of one of the club houses, and while he was looking up at it, beguiled him on to a slide, and upset him, quite inadvertently, into an itinerent orange basket, just as Lady B——, with whom he has a bowing acquaintance, was passing in her carriage. Look at him now, prancing along as if all Regent Street belonged to him! Walk a little faster and we shall overtake him; and, by the way, lend me that wonderful cotton umbrella of yours, I'll make him carry it right down to the Home Office. You are bound for Westminster, are you not?"

"What made you guess that?" asked Frere, handing him the umbrella.

"Because there's a meeting at the Palæontological to-day at three, and I know you're one of their great guns," was the reply.

"It's my belief you know everything about everybody," returned Frere laughing.

"And you know everything about every-thing," rejoined Bracy, "so between us we form an epitome of human knowledge. I say, De Grandeville," he continued as they overtook that gentleman, "you are a treacherous ally, to desert your comrade in the moment of danger. That dangerous old woman abused me within an inch of my life, and wanted to give me in charge to a policeman."

"Knowing you have an equal aptitude for getting into and out of scrapes of that nature," returned De Grandeville, "I—ar—considered you fully competent to the situation—and—ar—having no taste for bandying slang with vituperative plebeian females, I left you to fight your own battles. Was I not justified in doing so, Mr. Frere?"

VOL. XI.

"Well, Bracy being the aggressor, I suppose you were," was the answer, "but as I was the innocent first cause of the scrimmage, I felt bound to remain, and dragged Bracy away by main force, just in time, as I imagine, to save him from the nails of the insulted matron."

"By Jove! what a nuisance, I do believe I've broken my trouser strap," exclaimed Bracy, stopping, and elevating his boot on a door step—"hold this one moment while I try to repair damages, there's a good fellow," he continued, thrusting the umbrella into De Grandeville's unwilling hand, "I'll be with you again directly."

The damages must have been serious, judging by the length of time they took to remedy; for ere Bracy rejoined them, Frere and De Grandeville had proceeded half the length of Regent street, the latter carrying the umbrella—which he regarded from time to time with looks of the most intense disgust—so as to keep it as much out of sight as possible, even secreting it behind him whenever he perceived a fashionably-dressed man, or woman, approaching.

"I was trying to recollect that very interesting anecdote you told me of the attack on the barrack in Galway when you were staying with the 73d—Frere has never heard of it," observed Bracy, as he rejoined his companions.

Now this said anecdote related to an episode in De Grandeville's career to which he delighted to refer, and which, accordingly, most of those who boasted the honour of his acquaintance had heard more than once. Such indeed was the case with Frere, and he was just going to say so, when he caught a warning look from Bracy, which induced him to remain silent.

"Ar—really, it was a very simple thing," began De Grandeville, falling into the trap most unsuspectingly; "I happened to know several of the 73d fellows who were quartered down in Galway at a place called—ar—here's your umbrella."

"I beg your pardon! I did not quite catch the name," returned Bracy, who, having buried his fingers in the pockets of his paletot, did not seem to have such a thing as a hand about him.

"At a place called Druminabog," continued De Grandeville; "the country was in a very disturbed state; one or two attacks of a rather serious character had been made upon the police, and the military had been called out to support them; ar—here's your um—"

"Was it three or four years ago that all this took place?" inquired the still handless Bracy.

"Four years on the second of last April," returned De Grandeville.

"Are you sure it wasn't the first?" muttered Frere aside.

"I was travelling on a business tour in the sister island," continued the narrator,—"and, meeting Osborne, a 73d man, who was going down to join his regiment, he persuaded me to come on with him to Druminabog—ar—here's your—"

"Was that Tom Osborne, who sold out when the rifles were going to Ceylon?" interposed Bracy, studiously ignoring the proffered umbrella.

The victimised De Grandeville replied in the affirmative, and, resuming his tale, soon grew so deeply interested in the recital of his own heroic exploits, that the umbrella ceased any longer to afflict him; nay, so absorbed did he become, that in a moment of excitement, just as he was passing the Horse Guards, he waved that article in the air, and led on an imaginary company of the 73d therewith, after the fashion of gallant commanders in panoramas of Waterloo, and battle scenes enacted at the amphitheatre of Astley. As they approached the Home Office, and De Grandeville had arrived at the concluding sentence of his narrative, which ran as follows,—“And so, sir, the Major shook me warmly by the hand, exclaiming, ‘De Grandeville, you’re worthy to be one of us, and I only wish you were, my boy!’” the trio paused, and Bracy, extracting one hand from the pocket in which it had been reposing, remarked with the air of a man who considered himself slightly aggrieved, but meant to make the best of it—

“Now, if you please, I’ll trouble you for my umbrella; I did not like to interrupt your story by asking for it sooner, but now, if you have no objection, I shall be glad of it.”

“Certainly,” replied De Grandeville, only too glad (his attention being once more attracted to it) to get rid of his incubus.

As Frere turned aside to hide a laugh, Bracy inquired—“By the way, De Grandeville, do you dine at Lady Lombard’s next Tuesday?”

“I do,” replied Frere, “and I suppose it’s to be one of her Lord Mayor’s feasts, as I hear she’s beating up recruits in all quarters.”

“Ar—really—I’ve received an invitation—but I—ar—pon my word I don’t know whether one’s justified in going to such places; one must draw the line—ar—somewhere.”

“It will be a first-rate feed,” resumed Bracy. “Lady Lombard’s chef is a capital hand, and her wine is by no means to be despised.”

“Yes, but the woman herself,” rejoined De Grandeville, in a tone of the deepest disgust, “just retrace her degrading career—ar—not an ancestor to begin the world with.”

“Well, I should have supposed she possessed her fair share in Adam and Noah, too,” remarked Frere drily.

“Plebeian in origin,” continued De Grandeville, not heeding the interruption, “she sinks herself still lower by espousing first a pickle-merchant, secondly a pawnbroker; the first—ar—repulsive, the second sordid.”

“She did not play her cards altogether badly, though,” observed Bracy. “Old Girkin died worth a plum, and Sir Pinchbeck Lombard was a millionaire, or thereabouts.”

“Money, sir,” returned De Grandeville sententiously, “is by no means to be despised, and those who affect indifference on the subject, usually do so to screen a grasping and avaricious temperament; but money becomes really respectable only when it enables those who are connected with the old historical families of England, those in whose veins runs the ‘blue’ blood of aristocracy, to assert their rightful position as lords of the soil. Among the landed gentry of England are to be found——”

“Some thoroughly jolly fellows,” interposed Bracy, “especially to show you the way across country, or help to kick up a shindy at the Coal Hole. But we must part company here; Frere’s booked for the Palæontological, and I am going to attend a Committee at the House; you’ll be at Lady Lombards?”

“I shall give the matter full consideration,” returned De Grandeville. “It is—ar—by no means a step to decide on hastily. In these levelling days men of—ar—position, are forced to be particular as to the places to which they afford the—ar—sanction of their presence. I wish you a very good morning,” so saying, he raised his hat slightly to Frere, drew himself up with his broad chest well thrown forward, and marched off majestically like a concentrated squadron of heavy dragoons.

“Here’s your umbrella, Frere,” remarked Bracy, handing it to him as he spoke, “many thanks for the loan. I don’t wonder you are careful of it; it’s a most inestimable property, and has afforded me half an hour’s deep and tranquil enjoyment; but of all the pompons fools that ever walked this earth, Grandeville is facile princeps.”

“He’s no fool either,” returned Frere.

“Then why does he behave as sick?” demanded Bracy. “His conceit and egotism are inconceivable. He’s a regular modern Cyclops; he has one great ‘I’ in the middle of his forehead, through the medium of which he looks at everything. One really feels an obligation to poke fun at that man. Well, I can’t accuse myself of neglect of duty in that particular, that’s a consolatory reflection; but he’s enough to convert the slowest old anchorite that ever chewed peas into a practical joker.”

“He was severe on the excellent Lady Lombard,” observed his companion.

“Did you not notice his remark about riches being respectable only when in the possession of—ar—those connected with the old historical families of England?” that gave me a new idea.”

“A thing always worth having, if but from its rarity,” replied Frere. “What was it?”

“Why, it occurred to me what fun it would be to marry him to Lady Lombard—more particularly after his abuse of her to-day.”

“A project more easy to conceive than to execute,” returned Frere laughing.

“I don’t know that,” answered Bracy confidently; “if I once set my mind on a thing, I generally contrive to accomplish it; it did not at first sight appear likely that De Grandeville would carry your old cotton umbrella through some of the most fashionable streets in London at 3 o’clock in the afternoon, yet you see he did it.”

“You’re a remarkable man, my dear Bracy, and there is no use in denying of it; but if you can induce Marmaduke de Grandeville to marry the widow of the pawnbroker and the pickle-man, you must be the very—well, never mind who—here we are at the Paleontological."

So saying, Frere shook hands with Bracy, and the oddly consorted companions, between whom their very eccentricities appeared to constitute a bond of sympathy, each went his way, the practical joker to apply his acute intellect to the details of that mighty machine, the executive government of England, and the savant to investigate the recently discovered small rib (it was only eight feet long) of a peculiar species of something-osaurus, the original proprietor of the rib being popularly supposed to have "lived and loved," cut its awful teeth, and been gathered to its amphibious fossil forefathers, two thousand years and some odd months before the creation of man.

MOHAMMED AND MOHAMMEDISM.¹

THIS is one of Mr. Bohn's excellent publications; and it is a marvel for cheapness. We must needs congratulate such of our readers as have but limited means for making themselves masters of those inestimable sources of intellectual enjoyment, and indispensable requisites for intellectual cultivation, good books, on the facilities for procuring them that every day now presents, as if for their special benefit;—even though it is by a retaliation of "privateering" (as Mr. Bohn remarks in his advertisement to this volume), that so many works of this class are thus put within the reach of all. We should heartily rejoice to see our great living authors addressing themselves to all the nation, instead of speaking by their costly volumes to a select few alone; and we can but hope, that the taste for the highest kind of literature will be so cultivated by the publication of reprints and translations of foreign works, in a cheap form, that publishers will find it possible to bring out "People's Editions" of books which ought to be household and fireside friends, instead of being cloistered recluses in libraries, to be consulted only upon rare occasions, and not without abundance of idle ceremony. We consider this "Life of Mahomet" an exceedingly well-timed book; for there is a species of cant recently imported from other countries, in the way in which he and many other great and wise men are spoken of by certain writers, that is becoming worse than offensive. It is high time that our miscellaneous readers should know what manner of man this Arabian prophet actually was, and what was his doctrine; for the insidious method of merely alluding to these subjects, and of classing them in a single sentence with things from which they are most essentially different, has produced a vague impression,—all the deeper, and less easy to eradicate, because vague,—that he and his Islam would afford just as safe replies to the inquiries of the spirit respecting its position and duties here, and its hopes hereafter, as those which our fathers have told us were once esteemed in England the only guide to holiness and heaven.

Now, there can be no more complete safeguard against these errors, nor any surer remedy for such false teaching, than a candid study of the history of Mohammed; and for this purpose we can recommend this biography by Mr. Washington Irving. It is eminently a popular work; and by the transparency and gracefulness of its style—qualities which mark all the productions of this deservedly favourite author—will beguile the task of all its weariness. Mr Irving has wisely abstained from all those hard words, by which writers so frequently prejudice or disgust their readers; yet he indicates very clearly what his own opinion of Mohammed is, and has indeed plainly declared it in the "speculations on his prophetic career," with which he concludes. One feature in this work a little detracts from its biographical value, while it enhances its popularity,—the insertion of many of the legends, with which the Mussulman doctors of after ages sought to add to the renown of their great leader; and they are not always so narrated, as to make it easy to separate the mythical chaff from the historical wheat. But if this be a drawback from the worth of Mr. Irving's "Life," it is amply compensated by the insight into the earnestness of reverence with which Mohammed was regarded by the inventors of the stories, for such legends all originate in intense admiration; and the real blame of their invention, if we must impute blame, must rest on the monkish mythologists; for it is evident that these incredible and absurd tales about Mohammed were made in rivalrous imitation of the profane and lying fables which even now are related amongst ignorant Romanists respecting the Apostles and first preachers of the gospel, and even respecting our Lord himself. In addition,—and this over-compensates for the insertion of the Mohammedan legends,—Mr. Irving has not given insertion to any of the counter-legends, by which Christian writers have sought to misrepresent the character and work of Mohammed, and which so learned a man as Prideaux had not the ingenuousness to discard.

Before we turn to our subject, we may remark that students as well as general readers may take up this work with advantage. Mohammedism occupies so large a space in the history of the world, (and it has maintained its position for now twelve hundred years,) that it cannot be neglected, and ought not to be cursorily glanced at. And the interest with which the power that gave the coup de grâce to the empire of the Cæsars must needs be regarded, grows rather than declines, now that it in its turn is tottering in its throne, and is indebted for its continued existence to the exigencies of European diplomacy, instead of to any, even the faintest relics of its ancient might.

(1) Life of Mahomet. By Washington Irving. Bohn's Shilling Series.

The price of this book makes it unnecessary for us to give any sketch of Mohammed's life; we shall therefore furnish our readers with a specimen or two of Mr. Irving's way of [telling it; and then offer a few remarks of our own respecting the character and "mission" of this extraordinary man.

The battle of Beder is thus narrated.

"The scouts of Mahomet brought him notice of the approach of [the Koreishites]. The hearts of some of his followers failed them. They had come forth in the expectation of little fighting and much plunder, and were dismayed at the thought of such an overwhelming host; but Mahomet bade them be of good cheer, for Allah had promised him an easy victory.

"The Moslems posted themselves on a rising ground, with water at the foot of it. A hut, or shelter of the branches of trees, had been hastily erected on the summit for Mahomet, and a dromedary stood before it, on which he might fly to Medina in case of defeat.

"The vanguard of the enemy entered the valley, panting with thirst, and hastened to the stream to drink; but Hamza, the uncle of Mahomet, set upon them with a number of his men, and slew the leader with his own hand. Only one of the vanguard escaped, who was afterwards converted to the faith.

"The main body of the enemy now approached, with sound of trumpet. Three Koreishite warriors, advancing in front, defied the bravest of the Moslems to equal combat. Two of these challengers were Otha, the father-in-law of Abu Sofian, and Al Walid, his brother-in-law. The third challenger was Shaiba, the brother of Otha. These, it will be recollected, had been instigated to sally forth from Mecca by Henda, the wife of Abu Sofian. They were all men of rank in their tribe.

"Three warriors of Medina stepped forward and accepted their challenge; but they cried, 'No, let the renegades of our own city of Mecca advance, if they dare!' Upon this Hamza and Ali, the uncle and cousin of Mahomet, and Obaidah Ibn al Hareth, undertook the fight. After a fierce and obstinate contest, Hamza and Ali each slew his antagonist. They then went to the aid of Obaidah, who was severely wounded and nearly overcome by Otha. They slew the Koreishite, and bore away their associate, but he presently died of his wounds.

"The battle now became general. The Moslems, aware of the inferiority of their number, at first merely stood on the defensive, maintaining their position on the rising ground, and galling the enemy with flights of arrows whenever they sought to slake their intolerable thirst at the stream below. Mahomet remained in his hut on the hill, accompanied by Abu Beker, and earnestly engaged in prayer. In the course of the battle he had a paroxysm, or fell into a kind of trance. Coming to himself, he declared that God in a vision had promised him the victory. Rushing out of the hut, he caught up a handful of dust, and cast it into the air toward the Koreishites, exclaiming, 'May confusion light upon their faces!' Then ordering his followers to charge down upon the enemy; 'Fight, and fear not,' cried he, 'the gates of Paradise are under the shade of swords. He will assuredly find instant admission who falls fighting for the faith.'

"In the shock of battle which ensued, Abu Jahl, who was urging his horse into the thickest of the conflict, received a blow of a scimeter in the thigh, which brought him to the ground. Abdallah Ibn Masoud put his foot upon his breast, and while the fiery veteran was still uttering imprecations and curses on Mahomet, severed his head from his body. The Koreishites now gave way and fled. Seventy remained dead on the field, and nearly the same number were taken prisoners. Fourteen Moslems were slain, whose names remain on record as martyrs to the faith.

"This signal victory was easily to be accounted for on natural principles, the Moslems being fresh and unwearied, and having the advantage of a rising ground and a supply of water, while the Koreishites were fatigued by a hasty march, parched with thirst, and diminished in force by the loss of numbers who had turned back to Mecca. Moslem writers, however, attribute this early triumph of the faith to supernatural agency. When Mahomet scattered dust in the air, say they, three thousand angelic warriors, in white and yellow turbans and long dazzling robes, and mounted on black and white steeds, came rushing like a blast, and swept the Koreishites before them. Nor is this affirmed on Moslem testimony alone, but given on the word of an idolater,—a peasant who was attending sheep on an adjacent hill. 'I was with a companion, my cousin,' said the peasant, 'upon the fold of the mountain, watching the conflict, and waiting to join with the conquerors and share the spoil. Suddenly we beheld a great cloud sailing towards us, and within it were the neighing of steeds and braying of trumpets. As it approached, squadrons of angels sallied forth, and we heard the terrific voice of the archangel as he urged his mare Haizum, "Speed! speed! O Haizum!" At which awful sound the heart of my companion burst with terror, and he died on the spot; and I had well nigh shared his fate.'

"Such are the particulars of the famous battle of Bedir, the first victory of the Saracens under the standard of Mahomet; inconsiderable, perhaps, in itself, but stupendous in its results, being the commencement of a career of victories which changed the destinies of the world."—Pp. 99—101, 103.

And this is Mr. Irving's account of Mohammed's final pilgrimage to Mecca:—

"The announcement of his pious intention brought devotees from all parts of Arabia to follow the pilgrim-prophet." He "was accompanied by his nine wives," and "departed at the head of an immense train, some say of fifty-five,—others ninety,—and others a hundred and fourteen thousand pilgrims." "The first night's halt was a few miles from Medina, at the village of Dhu'l Holaf, where, on a former occasion, he and his followers had laid aside their weapons, and assumed the pilgrim garb. Early on the following morning, after praying in the mosque, he mounted his camel, Al Aswa, and, entering the plain of Baida, uttered the prayer or invocation called in Arabic Talbijah, in which he was joined by all his followers."

"In this way the pilgrim host pursued its course, winding in a lengthened train of miles, over mountain and valley, and making the deserts vocal at times with united prayers and ejaculations. There were no longer any hostile armies to impede or molest it, for by this time the Islam faith reigned serenely over all Arabia. Mahomet approached the sacred city over the same heights which he had traversed in capturing it, and he entered through the gate Beni Scheiba, which still bears the name of The Holy.

"A few days after his arrival, he was joined by Ali, who had hastened back from Yemen, and who brought with him a number of camels to be slain in sacrifice. As this was to be a model pilgrimage, Mahomet rigorously observed all the rites which he had continued in compliance with patriarchal usage, or introduced in compliance with revelation. Being too weak and infirm to go on foot, he mounted his camel, and thus performed the circuits round the Caaba, and the journeyings to and fro between the hills of Safa and Merwa.

"When the camels were to be offered up in sacrifice, he slew sixty-three with his own hand, one for each year of his age; and Ali, at the same time, slew thirty-seven on his own account. Mahomet then shaved his head, beginning on the right side and ending on the left. The locks thus shorn away were equally divided among his disciples, and treasured up as sacred relics. Conscious that life was waning away within him, Mahomet during this last sojourn in the sacred city of his faith, sought to engrave his doctrines deeply in the minds and hearts of his followers. For this purpose he preached frequently in the Caaba from the pulpit, or in the open air from the back of his camel. 'Listen to my words,' would he say, 'for I know not whether, after this year, we shall ever meet here again. Oh, my hearers, I am but a man like yourselves; the angel of death may at any time appear, and I must obey his summons.' He would then proceed to inculcate not merely religious doctrines and ceremonies, but rules for conduct in all the concerns of life, public and domestic; and the precepts laid down and enforced on this occasion have had a vast and durable influence on the morals, manners, and habits of the whole Moslem world.

"It was at the conclusion of one of his discourses in the open air, from the back of his camel, that the famous verse of the Koran is said to have come down from heaven in the very voice of the Deity. 'Evil to those this day who have denied your religion. Fear them not; fear me. This day I have perfected your religion, and accomplished in you my grace. It is my good pleasure that Islamism be your faith.' On hearing these words, say the Arabian historians, the camel, Al Karwa, on which the prophet was seated, fell on its knees in adoration. These words, add they, were the seal and conclusion of the law, for after them there were no further revelations.

"Having thus fulfilled all the rites and ceremonies of pilgrimage, and made a full exposition of his faith, Mahomet bade a last farewell to his native city, and, putting himself at the head of his pilgrim-army, set out on his return to Medina. As he came in sight of it, he lifted up his voice and exclaimed—'God is great! God is great! There is but one God; he has no companion. His is the kingdom; to him alone belongeth praise; he is almighty. He hath fulfilled his promise; he has stood by his servant, and alone dispersed his enemies. Let us return to our homes, and worship and praise him!'

"Thus ended what has been termed the valedictory pilgrimage, being the last made by the prophet."—Pp. 187—189.

We are extremely anxious that none of our readers should mistake our object in what we have to offer them respecting the character and work of Mohammed. We feel that it is not enough to say, "there is no danger of our becoming, any of us, Mohammedans;" that is not the form under which a mistake in this matter is at all likely to appear. And this is not the place in which it would be proper to contrast these subjects of contemplation, with the pure and spiritual faith which it is our lot to have learnt, and with its Divine founder, for the purpose of forefending any against real danger. We can, therefore, do no more than explain the intention with which we write. Here is a great historical fact—the existence of a particular faith for twelve hundred years; now, we have before us, in the life of the man with whom it originated, all the means of judging respecting the secret of his astonishing success; and as it is not even rational to sweep such a question as this contemptuously on one side, with the vague and empty verdict of "Imposture!" "Hallucination!" we will look calmly at it, and we may thus not only be so happy as to discern how it was that Mohammed achieved so astounding a victory, and how his conquests have been so durable; but also the design that was accomplished by those triumphs, the blessings of which we may even now be enjoying. And we trust by a few words respecting the Mohammedan faith, yet more satisfactorily to prevent our purpose from being misunderstood.

Mohammed was one of those rare beings, whose appearance in the world always works revolutions. The "ground-element" of his character, as it is under one form or another of all such men, and as his whole career testifies, was a quick and clear perception of fact, and a resolute trust in that as the representative of truth, rather than the thousand-fold fancies and absurdities that were current in his times. He was born in a nation whose pastoral and predatory habits had been preserved almost unmodified from a very remote antiquity; whose language was all poetry; whose religion was idolatry grafted upon star-worship, around which, and with which, warred and jargoned the adorers of fire, the slaves of the Talmud and the Tar-gums, and opposing sects of so-called Christians, maintaining unbelievable creeds, who had polluted the simple records of the life and teaching of Jesus with the most senseless legends. He was born in the most distinguished family of his people; and it was his lot to be taught early, by the loss of both parents, the hard lesson of self-reliance. Book learning, even as it existed in Arabia, he had none; his mind was informed, and his intellect cultivated, by trade and travel. And so he grew up a man of clear insight and profound meditation, not unversed in self-knowledge, with no scanty acquaintance with men and things, familiar with the wonder-works of God, his memory filled with Bible stories and eastern legends, and habituated to view all he knew and saw through the medium of his richly poetical imagination. By his marriage with Khadija he acquired both wealth and social standing, and, what was of far greater moment, a long and untroubled experience of the tranquil endearments and joys of home. Such was the man and such his training; the slightest consideration of which,—joined with the recollection that he was past the years when fulness of life and exuberance of spirits naturally prompt the desire for change, and impel to restless action to secure it, and had entered upon that stage when the regrets and satisfactions of the past and hopes respecting the future, without more activity than old habits sustain, reign—is more than sufficient to drive away the bare thought of imposture, and to give assurance that in what he undertook he must have been moved by nothing lower than a conviction of imperious duty.

The character of the revolutions which men of such a stamp work, is always determined as much by the circumstances amid which they are placed, and by the materials they have ready fitted for their use, as it is by the education and discipline they have passed through. In Mohammed's case it was of necessity a religious revolution. The only matter of public interest was religion; and every force that had acted upon his spirit impelled it in that direction. All things called for the interposition of some one who knew, not by blind hearsay, but by living and direct communion with the fountain of all such knowledge, what was the fact

(if the very truth could not be reached) of religion for men. It did not require any great spirituality to discern that the idols of the Kaaba were nothing,—that to worship the stars, and forget Him that made and sustained them, was evil,—that fire could only typify household utility, or vengeful and insatiable wrath,—that the faith of the Jews had become drivelling credulity,—and that the creeds of Nestorians and Monophysites, of Arians and Orthodox, were vain attempts to express what was incomprehensible, and utterly valueless for practical guidance in the conflict of life. And such spirituality even was not found originally, save in Mohammed. His discovery of these things and his announcement of them, with a “rough draught” of bare Natural Religion, adorned with all that could be preserved without inconsistency of the old national faith, and with all that could in the same way be borrowed from magian or guebre, from prophet or rabbi, from evangelist or apostle, from history or tradition, to replace what was ignominiously and deservedly rejected,—these made him the religious reformer of Arabia in the seventh century, and the founder of a wide and enduring empire; they were the weapons with which he fought and gained his victories, and the magic by which he transformed every tribe that received him, into some resemblance, however distant, of himself; and with these same weapons and magic, his successors have to this day maintained a place in the history of mankind.

It was inevitable for Mohammed, who thoroughly believed in his own religious discoveries, with such knowledge as he had of sacred history, that, seeing the deeply marked contrast between his belief and the superstitions prevailing around him, he should attribute his knowledge to revelation from above, and should designate himself the prophet of God; (not boasting, so much as in token of his resolution to abide through life and in death by what he had proved to be better than all else he knew,) and should exalt his mission above that of any preceding prophet whom he recognised as a true one, since what he held, and fain would make all believe, appeared to him more fully to satisfy the wants of men, from its striking contrast with what was so evidently empty both of the life and the power of truth. Personal and political ambition manifestly took no part in his first announcement of his prophetic call and message, neither is it clear that it entered into his purposes even when he appealed to the sword as the argument for his faith. His desire was to have his religious convictions the rule of men's conduct. His manner of life to its very close evinced no sympathy with imperial pomp and sway; nor any thing more than his enthusiastic regard of himself as the head and representative model of his religion. His profound belief in his own mission would of itself lead him, after he found his message scornfully rejected and his life endangered, as soon as he possessed the power of the sword, (and it was his earnestness and whatever truth there was in his teaching alone that won it for him,) eagerly to seize it, and unaparingly to employ it, for the enforcement of his claims, and for the punishment of opponents and gainsayers. The establishment of an empire by his successors has misled men's judgment respecting the wars of Mohammed. Looking simply at his life, and calling to mind the Crusades and the Inquisition; the religious wars of Germany and Switzerland, of France, and Spain, and England; the massacre of St. Bartholomew; the persecutions of dissidents by every Church and sect ever possessed of secular power; the private and domestic persecution that has been employed in defence of every doctrine and form of faith in Christendom; and, above all, that deep stream of malignant passion which flows through every human breast, and which nothing but Omnipotence has ever restrained or dried up;—looking at his life, with these recollections, we see not how it is possible to fix upon Mohammed the mark of special and singular reprobation, as if his employment of the brand alone arose from fanaticism, and his creed were the only one that had prejudiced its claims to be received as true by recourse to such a support. The Saracenic empire, although as a worldly power it was a departure from the clearly expressed purpose of Mohammed, derived its chief strength, both for increase and permanence, from the creed of the Prophet. And the proof of this is patent to all readers of Church history. The part taken by this grand and enduring (though not wholly pure) realization of Mohammed's thought, in the history of mankind, is too great a subject for discussion here; yet some hints which the thoughtful amongst our readers may be glad to avail themselves of, we must give. James Douglas, of Cavers, in his “Advancement of Society,” thus brilliantly sketches the plainest and most evident view of their achievements:—

“The Saracens had stretched over the nations like a thunder-cloud, and like an electrical arch they had lightened at once at both extremities; thus forming a conductor between the East and the West, they brought into contact and combination the discoveries of races who lived on opposite sides of the earth. The formation of gunpowder and paper, printing, and other arts, which had long remained inert in the East, became animated with European intelligence; and society has changed its face less from any new invention, than from two elements entering into a new combination,—the empirical discoveries of the East, and the ingenuity of Europe, fertile in improvement and application. But the brevity of their career was equal to its brilliancy. The Saracens were but scholars, and never held in their own hand the key of the information they had obtained,—that is, the Greek language; the learning of the Greeks was crushed beneath the yoke of their pupils. When the Greeks ceased to communicate, the Saracens ceased to advance; the Arabic translations of Greek authors became to them the boundary of the mind,—truths which it was impossible to transcend, limits impassable to the most exalted intelligence. Even this portion of Arabian science has existed chiefly without the confines of Arabia; and when its foreign empire fell to the ground, these translated records perished with it, or existed only in those fragments which had been a second time translated into the barbarous Latin of the scholastics.”—Part I. § 9.

Their last great conquest, the capture of Constantinople, broke up the slumbers into which Europe had fallen after the overthrow of Roman civilization, and stands in history as one of the most fruitful events in that century of marvels,—the dawn of modern times. And, that we may show in how many various ways Mohammed affected the world, let this fact be noted, —a hundred years after the Hegira, Leo, the Isaurian, commenced in earnest the Iconoclast controversy at Constantinople, perceiving that the worship of images in churches rendered the Christians a reproach to both Jews and Saracens.

That Mohammed's earnestness was not of the highest or purest order, a very cursory glance at his life will show. He tolerated customs and beliefs which were too deeply rooted for even his authority to extirpate. He made use of his asserted communication with heaven to justify what had shocked even his followers' ready faith. His voluptuous sensuality after Khudija's death, although in part to be accounted for by his passionate desire for male offspring, would alone disqualify him for the dignity of religious teacher to the world; whilst the rudeness of his creed, the admission of legendary fables, the sensuous forms under which much that is worthy of belief is concealed, the purely external nature of the religious duties that he enjoined, and the entire absence from the doctrinal part of it of all but the faintest traditional vestiges of any truths higher than those which are commonly known as natural religion, would render it unfit for permanent and universal religious instruction. Indeed, he could have been a prophet, and his creed could have triumphed, only amongst such superstitious idolatries as we know to have fallen before him in willing or compelled submission. Yet, whilst the so-called Christians were diligently threshing straw and chaff, and stoutly maintaining that the chaff and husks they struck off were pure wheat; and the Sabians, wandering in one direction, and the Guebres in another, were gathering but useless or poisonous herbs and berries; and the Jews were pretending to be fed on "angels' food," which they had preserved till all was mere putrefaction; it was Mohammed's honour to take living grain, and, planting it and nurturing it, to gather in a plentiful harvest; and if that grain were mere oats and rye, and largely mixed with thistles and dandelion, still, it was living. We will not turn, even in thought, from our "bread of life" to his coarse fare, but we will imitate him in sowing "beside all waters," and in engaging in no labours save such as tend to richly-stored and overflowing granaries of genuine seed, which will witness the fidelity of our labour, and abundantly reward our toil.

MEMORIALS OF WESTMINSTER.

THERE is no portion of our great metropolis so rich in association as that which Mr. Walcott has selected for historical illustration; and the reader will find that his work is crowded with interesting matter, and displays a considerable amount of antiquarian lore. He has availed himself with great tact and skill of the labours of his predecessors in the same field, and turned to good purpose the dullest details preserved by industrious, pains-taking collectors. His style, though, perhaps, occasionally too florid, is usually graceful and vigorous, and many passages display a warm-hearted earnestness of purpose, and genuine poetical feeling, which will be sure to attract and engage the attention of a large class of readers.

We have always felt that the most interesting department of antiquarian lore is that which relates to the manners, habits, and domestic life of the generations who have successively inhabited the same town, or city, in which we happen to dwell,—through whose busy streets we are continually hurrying, and with whose features we are so intimate and familiar. How pleasant it seems to be transported, in imagination, to the London of three centuries since,—and to contrast in fancy our over-grown "desert of brick" with the picturesque city of those days! Within what comparatively narrow limits was its vast population comprised! The extension of the metropolis, indeed, was in former times regarded as a serious evil; and the policy of legislation was often directed to check the rapid growth of its suburbs, and to prevent its connecting itself with the neighbouring towns and villages. In the middle of the sixteenth century, we find that the number of houses springing up between London and Westminster occasioned considerable consternation and astonishment.

"Early in the reign of Queen Elizabeth," says Mr. Walcott, "about A.D. 1560, as appears by a Map republished by Vertue in 1737, Westminster had greatly extended itself, and Charing Cross was in the midst of an unbroken line of houses reaching from Whitehall to London. But though near Westminster Hall and the Abbey, which like tutelary guardians rose gigantic above the low grey towers of the Palace close and old Whitehall, forming the nucleus of the City, new buildings had started up, and formed a close town of many streets, still for many years green lanes, winding lanes, and a breezy country, dotted with wayside inns and quiet homesteads peeping through the partings of the trees, spread round its furthest dwellings, stretching up in far distance beyond them, until they faded away beneath the blue misty heights of Highgate and Hampstead.

"In 1580 Queen Elizabeth prohibited the erection of any new buildings within three miles of the City-gates, and suffered only one family to inhabit each house. In July, A.D. 1583, no fresh building was to be suffered to proceed within three miles of the gates of London and Westminster; no single dwelling-house was to be divided into two or more parts, and the commons within three miles of London were to be left unenclosed. In June 1602 the order was repeated."—P. 16.

In order to give our readers a fair idea of the nature of Mr. Walcott's "Memorials," we will accompany him to a few of the most celebrated spots in the ancient city of Westminster. Our remarks must, of course, be brief and cursory, and we have not space for any lengthened extracts from his valuable volumes.

The palace of Whitehall has many august and pathetic memories. It was here, about midnight, on the 25th of January, 1533, that the capricious king who "spared neither man in his anger, nor woman in his lust," was clandestinely married to Anna Boleyn, by Doctor Rowland Lee, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield and Chester. The memory of that injured woman and her wrongs disturbed his death-bed.

"On December 30, A.D. 1546, he signed his will, and on the 28th of January expired. Before the last, he at times muttered the name of Anna Boleyn, then in darker intervals of agony, with fixed and horror-stricken eyes, shrieked 'Monks, monks, monks.' A few hours, and with the words 'All is lost,' his spirit passed from earth. 'Thursday,' says Aubrey, 'was a fatal day to Henry VIII. and so also to his posterity. He died on Thursday, January 28. King Edward VI. on Thursday, July 6. Queen Mary on Thursday, November 17. Queen Elizabeth on Thursday, March 24.'—Pp. 30, 31.

In Whitehall Queen Elizabeth amused herself with divers gay and grotesque pageants. Here too, in 1561, the first regular English tragedy, "Ferrex and Porrex," was acted by the gentlemen of the Inner Temple. In 1559, when the Speaker and Commons' House resorted hither, with a delicate message, "the speciall matter wherof was to moove her Grace to marriage," her majesty delivered to them "in the great gallery," the memorable answer,—“This shall be for mee sufficient, that a marble stone shall declare that a Queene, having raigned such a time, lived and died a virgine.” And at last, after the lapse of many years, on the 24th of March, 1603, (a fatal Tudor Thursday.)—

"She had her unwilling wish accomplished; for she 'then deceased, and her corps was privily conveyed to Whitehall, and there remained till the 28th of April.' Taylor, bargeman to King Charles I., called 'the water-poet,' thus celebrated the event:—

"The Queen was brought by water to Whitehall,
At every stroke the oars did tears let fall!
More clung about the barge: fish under water
Wept out their cyne of pearl, and swam blind after.
I think the bargemen might, with easier thighs,
Have rowed her hither in her people's eyes;
For, howsoe'en, thus much my thoughts have scann'd,
She had come by water had she come by land."

The tragedy of the 30th of January, 1649, we need hardly refer to. On that day Charles I. was beheaded "before the Banqueting House, which his father had built for the royal festivities of Whitehall." In the gay reign of Charles II. this palace was "the focus of political intrigue and fashionable gaiety," and here the popular monarch went through the form of "touching for the evil." "So great was the concourse of men, women, and children, upon such occasions, that in March, 1684, several persons were crushed to death at the doors."

The parish church of St. Margaret has many interesting traditions of its own. King Edward the Confessor is said to have built the first church which stood upon the present site, and not before it was required; for, "owing to the privilege of Sanctuary attached to the Abbey by that monarch, and which became the asylum of men of blood and sin, a dangerous community had sprung up round the monastic buildings, composed of the most infamous and degraded persons, living in an open defiance of justice:—

the bankrupt, the traitor, the robber, and the murderer." Many eloquent divines have preached in this church, and some curious scenes have taken place there. In the Puritan times, among others, Calamy, Baxter, and Case, ("who censured Cromwell to his face, and when discoursing before General Monk cried out,—'There are some will betray three kingdoms for filthy lucre's sake,' and threw his handkerchief into the general's pew,") occasionally occupied this pulpit. After the Restoration, the eloquent and loyal Dr. Spratt was, for some time, rector of the parish.

"Burnet and Spratt," says Dr. Johnson, 'were old rivals. On some public occasion they both preached before the House of Commons. There prevailed in those days an indecent custom. When the preacher touched any favourite topic in a manner that delighted his audiences, their approbation was expressed by a loud hum, continued in proportion to their zeal or pleasure. When Burnet preached, part of his congregation hummed so loudly, and so long, that he sat down to enjoy it, and rubbed his face with his handkerchief. When Spratt preached, he likewise was honoured with a like animating hum; but he stretched out his hand to the congregation, and cried, "Peace, peace; I pray you, peace." 'Burnet's sermon,' says Salmon, 'was remarkable for sedition, and Spratt's for loyalty. Burnet had the thanks of the House. Spratt had no thanks, but a good living from the King, which he said was of as much value as the thanks of the Commons.'—Pp. 99, 100.

Some curious extracts from the parochial registers are published by Mr. Walcott, commencing the "1st day of Januarie, in the year of our Lord God 1538." In 1556, a series of entries occur, which furnish some interesting information respecting the ordinary causes of mortality at that period, and the diseases to which the parishioners were then subject. We have selected a few of these at random:—

"Maii xxx die.	Thomas Lawne, off a fervint ague.
" xxxi die.	Robert Jones, off a pynnyng sickness.
Junij vij die.	Elizabeth Hethe, of the ague with Godd's marks.
" x die.	Wyllyam Foster, off very povertye.
" xijij die.	Johen Mydleton, off a browce [bruise?]
" xxijij die.	Joh'n Bympanye, off famyne.
Julii xx die.	Alyce [blank], a strangere, of bled- ynge.
Nov. xj die.	Agnes Knape, of the age of lxxv, of this new decease [influenza?].
" xxiv die.	Jone Comber, of the newe sycknes "
	—P. 152.

This "newe sycknes" proved in the following year a fatal scourge to Westminster, and to the metropolis:—

"In 1557 broke out the influenza, a violent catarrhal fever, so called by the Italians, who recognised the inscrutable influence which it exerted on numberless persons at the same time. The disease prevailed very generally during the dry and unfavourable summer. The causes of this and the sweating-sickness were chiefly the following:—1. The peculiarly susceptible disposition produced by the climate on the constitution of the English. 2. Unhealthy seasons, and a poisoned misty atmosphere. 3. Intemperance, then a general vice. 4. The coarse and heating nature of the diet then generally used. 5. The immoderately warm clothing then in fashion, especially about the head. 6. The excessive indulgence in hot-baths. 7. The effects of diaphoretic medicines, employed in most disorders. 8. The rare use of soap. 9. The high price of linen-clothes. 10. The extreme indigence of the poorer classes. 11. The utterly miserable state of the dwellings, seething in filth and decomposition. (Erasm. Ep., lib. xxij., ep. 12, col. 1140.) 12. The over-crowded state of London. Such a number of foreign artisans were imported in 1517 into London as to cause the 'Evill May-Day' Insurrection. 13. The extravagant dearth and scarcity of provisions. (See Hecker's 'Epidemics of the Middle Ages,' p. 212.)—P. 153.

Among the entries of births, marriages, and deaths, the following, relative to our great poet, may be read with interest.

"1656. Between John Milton of this parish, Esq., and Mrs. Katherine Woodcocke of the parish of Aldermanbury, spinster. The banns of marriage were published Oct. 22, 27, Nov. 3.

"She died about a year after her marriage, leaving a daughter, and was buried Feb. 10, 1658.

"Methought I saw my late espoused saint
Brought to me, like Alceas, from the grave. . .
Mine, such as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in heaven, without restraint,
Came vested all in white, pure as her mind.
Her face was veild; yet to my fancied sight
Love, sweetness, goodness in her person shind'."—P. 159.

The College of St. Peter, Westminster, is another point of attraction, round which many interesting associations gather. "None but a kindred 'Westminster,'" says Mr. Walcott, "warm with the full-hearted affectionateness of a son nurtured within her walls could rightly sing her praise;" and his own volume affords proof that she has had many sons becomingly jealous of her honour and reputation. We meet with a recent example of the exercise of this spirit of warm partisanship:—

"The following is an amusing instance of old rivalry between the schools of Eton and Westminster maintained on paper,—not, as now, on the Thames. The 'Westminsters' represented in a caricature three of their body outweighing three Etonians in a pair of scales. George Canning immediately retorted,—

"What mean ye by this print so rare,
Ye wits, of Eton jealous!
But that we soar aloft in air,
While ye are heavy fellows?"

"The laugh, however, was cleverly thus turned by Hook,—

"Cease, ye Etonians, and no more
With rival wits contend;
Feathers, we know, will float in air,
And bubbles will ascend."

The name of the renowned Busby—the greatest of pedagogues,—"who boasted his rod to be the sieve to prove good scholars,"—is inseparably associated with Westminster school. "Dr. Busby!" says Sir Roger de Coverley, in the Spectator, "a great man! he whipped my grandfather: a very great man! I should have gone to him myself, if I had not been a block-head: a very great man!" It was the boast of this famous schoolmaster, that out of the bench of Bishops he had taught sixteen. Westminster has had several other masters of note and name; among them, Camden, author of the "Britannia;" and Dr. Alexander

Nowell, of whom the following singular story is told:—

"He was the improver of the first Catechism published during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and for thirty years preached the first and last Lent Sermons before her Majesty. He was represented in his college 'with his hooks and other tackling, lying in a round on one hand, and his angles of several sorts on the other: but,' says Fuller, 'whilst Nowell was catching of fishes, Bonner was catching of Nowell, and understanding who he was, designed him to the shambles.' Nowell was fishing upon the banks of the Thames when he received the first intimation of his danger, which was so pressing that he dared not go back to his own house to make any preparation for his flight. 'Like an honest angler, he had taken with him provision for the day; and when in the first year of England's deliverance he returned to his own country, and his own haunts, he remembered that on the day of his flight he had left a bottle of beer in a safe place on the bank: there he looked for it, and 'found it no bottle but a gun, such the sound at the opening thereof; and this,' adds veracious Fuller, 'is believed (casualty is mother of more inventions than industry) the original of bottled ale in England.'"—P. 184.

The following anecdote is a beautiful illustration of the enduring character of the impressions which are left on the mind by the occurrences of youth and boyhood. For the honour of human nature, we hope that it is true:—

"The Upper and Lower Schools are divided by a bar of demarcation; over which, on Shrove Tuesday, at eleven o'clock, the college-cook, attended by a verger, having made his obeisance to the Masters, proceeds to toss a pancake in the Upper School, once a warning to proceed to dinner in the hall.

"An interesting tradition is attached to the bar at the time when it bore a curtain. Two boys at play, by chance, made a grievous rent in the pendent drapery; and one of the delinquents suffered his generous companion to bear the penalty of the offence—a severe flogging. Long years went by; the Civil War had parted chief friends; and the boys had grown up to manhood, unknown to each other. One of them, now a Judge and sturdy Republican, was presiding at the trial of some captive cavaliers, and was ready to upbraid and sentence them, when he recognised in the worn features of one grey-haired veteran the well remembered look of the gallant boy, who had once borne punishment for him. By certain answers, which in the examination he elicited, his suspicions were confirmed; and with an immediate resolve he posted to London, where, by his influence with Oliver Cromwell, he succeeded in preserving his early friend from the scaffold."—P. 176.

Westminster Hall is, next to the Abbey, the principal object of interest in the city of Westminster. We need not dwell on its size and symmetry, and on its grand historical associations. "Its dark old roof has rung with the shouts that hailed many a successive heir inaugurated to 'Merrie England's' throne; its walls have trembled to triumphant strains of joyous music and kingly revelry, at coronation feasts, and assemblies of the Court; its floor has been trodden by many a noble prisoner, with the brief respite of his trial,—and the barred cell of the fatal Tower awaiting him,—ere long to give up his life upon the scaffold." As the locality of our superior law courts, it is, at the present time, an interesting place of resort. Here foreigners are taken to behold the administration of English justice, and to admire the dignified demeanour of English judges. Amongst others, the great Peter of Russia was once conducted here, and a characteristic observation is said to have escaped him, which is thus reported by Mr. Walcott:—

"The Czar Peter the Great was taken into the Hall during Term-time, and was much amused by seeing what he described as 'busy people in long black gowns and wigs with tails.' He inquired what they were doing. Being told that they were lawyers,—'Lawyers!' replied the despot, half-questioning, 'why, I have but two in all my dominions, and I believe I shall hang one of them up the instant I get home again.' The Czar would not have been so much offended, could he have anticipated his visit by some years; for in Michaelmas Term, the fifth year of Queen Mary's reign, Stow says, quite pathetically, 'men might have seen at the King's Bench barre not two men of law before the Judges: there was but one, named Foster, who looked about and had nothing to do, the Judges looking about them. In the Common Place no mo sergeants but one, which was Sergeant Boulouse, who looked about him. There was elbow-room enough, which made the lawyers complain of their miseries in that Terme.' What halcyon days of white gloves and Maiden Assize!"—Pp. 265, 266.

In the Almonry of Westminster the first printing-press, worked with moveable types, was set up by William Caxton. Several of his early books purport to have been printed in "thabbey of Westmynstre;" and it is not, says Mr. Walcott, "wholly improbable that, at first, he erected his press near one of the little chapels attached to the aisles of the Abbey, or in the ancient Scriptorium." In the library of Brasenose College, Oxford, one of his hand-bills is still preserved, and runs thus,—

"If it please any man spiriuel or temporel to have any pres or commemorative (Misæ) of Salisburi use, emprinted after the form of this pre-set letter, which be wel and truly correct, late hym come to Westmonester into the Almonestrye, at the Reed Pale, and he shall have them good chepe. Supplico stet Cedula."—P. 279

We need not call over the muster-roll of the illustrious dead whose remains have found an honoured resting-place in the Abbey Church of Westminster. Monarchs and statesmen, warriors and divines, poets, painters, actors, and historians—the far-famed worthies of our father-land—"after life's fitful fever," there sleep calmly side by side. A visit to Westminster Abbey is a lesson to the schoolboy; and no one, we presume, either gentle or simple, can pace its solemn aisles, linger in its chapels, or survey its monuments, without being sensible of some hallowed emotions, or affected by a feeling of pensive awe.

SCENES OF THE CIVIL WAR IN HUNGARY.¹

If we recommend this volume to our readers as one full of interest, we are at a loss whether to recommend it as a striking and well-written narrative of real adventure, or a startling and well-wrought fiction. We say, we are very dubious on this point, and we warn those who may be induced to peruse the book, to look for strong confirmation of its testimony, before they accept it as historical evidence. It bears a deep stamp of suspicious character. It is without the writer's name, and without date. Nor is Mr. F. Shoberl's preface of any value as an assistance on this point. The individuals alluded to are most frequently expressed only by initials, and the translator's ridiculously inconsistent remarks lend us little hope of aid from him. He first informs us that the question whether the inhabitants of Hungary "had any real grievances, any oppressive acts of their government to complain of," appears to him very doubtful. Then, after several sagacious remarks on "mob-rule," which the public will take for what they are worth, he proceeds to add, by way of entertaining us with a contradiction, that the Protestant population were "deprived successively of their equal political and civil rights, robbed of their churches, and subjected to a series of the most oppressive regulations," besides being forbidden to institute Bible-societies, or to print the sacred volume in the Hungarian language. So much for the translator's wisdom, and we only think it worth while to allude to his preface, because, after being convinced of the equivocal value of the book itself, the reader might possibly turn to this introduction for information. It will be at once seen what is the calibre of Mr. F. Shoberl's sagacity.

But we are not about to criticise the volume. We can draw from it matter for the entertainment of our readers, and shall at once enter on the writer's narrative, real or fictitious, as it may be.

After the imperial razzias in Italy, he was called to serve against liberty and the Hungarians. We meet him first at Agram, in command of the advanced guard of the Austrian army, with a flying corps of eighty horsemen. Of these, thirty five were Serassans, among the most singular soldiers in Europe. A lofty cap of brown fur, a face of the same hue, well-bearded, a jacket of kindred colour, bordered with red braid, immensely wide white trousers, tied at the ankle, and sandal shoes, constitute their dress. A crimson sash, a broadsword hung in a superb sheath, a long-barrelled gun, adorned with gold and silver studs—these form their arms and decorations, while over all is thrown a long cloak, that gives these riders the name of Red Mantles. Altogether they form, when sweeping over a plain, in pursuit or flight, a brilliant and dashing spectacle. With these wild horsemen and a party of the soberly attired Croats, our military author started off on his equestrian cruise, to lead the romantic and independent life of an Imperial bandit, sometimes "revelling like princes, surrounded by abundance of every kind, dwelling in splendid mansions, quaffing generous Tokay; then again, for weeks together, without house or harbour, scarcely finding a few heads of maize for our horses; a large wooden bottle, filled with half-putrid marsh-water, instead of wine."

Our hero appears to have been quite of the fire-eating genus—a very amateur in battle, with its sweet accompaniments of outrage and pillage. He entered on the campaign with vigorous alacrity, computing the enemy at more than forty thousand of the country-people, joined by ten thousand imperialist troops, somewhat sickened of the revolting tyranny of Austria. But whether right or not in his calculations, he was off on his errand, rushing in no time upon a body of three or four hundred peasants, who fought for a whole day, and were then dispersed. This is the first taste we have of our author in his heroic capacity—hewing down the people of Hungary.

Then, riding onwards from sunset until dark, the party, wearied, lost its way, and about ten o'clock it was resolved to bivouac, when the scouts brought intelligence that not far off was a great mansion, near a village—a more comfortable place than an open heath. The commander then ordered a party to ride forth in search of prisoners. They speedily brought in a trembling and weeping damsel, who stood like a frightened fawn before the uncouth soldiers who interrogated her. She replied that not a solitary armed man was in the neighbourhood, and led the way into the vast courtyard of the mansion. The troop galloped in, and the noise of the hoofs clattering over the stones, with the jingle of swords, brought an old man to the door. He appeared to be the steward, and was followed by several servants with large lanterns, and on being ordered to lead the way to the master of the mansion, he obeyed with evident reluctance, and our author stalked into a spacious hall, where, by the dim light of a lamp, were seen enormous pictures, antique swords, old guns, armour, and obsolete weapons which hung on walls that bore the impress of time on all their features. It seemed the museum of ancestral relics, belonging to some ancient family.

"Here the castellan bade me wait while he went to announce me; and I availed myself of this moment to take off my cloak, to set my hair to rights a little, to fasten my dolman close about me, to tie my sash properly—in short, to make myself as smart as I could. The old man presently came back, conducted me along a corridor, and then opened the folding-doors of an apartment, whence issued the brilliant light of tapers.

"Somewhat dazzled, I entered the apartment, which was most elegantly fitted up, where a tall handsome lady received me with a polite, but proud obeisance. I was just about to introduce myself, and to apologise for my unbidden visit, when she extended her hand to me with the loud exclamation of joy—'Ah! Baron W——'"

This lone beauty was, we are told, the Countess St. — the wife of St. — who once saved the author's life at Bologna, and who, after his marriage with the fair Marchesa — had retired out of the service and into Hungary. Being called by his wife, he appeared—a true Magyar, who had not openly ranked with Kossuth, lest he should have to fight his old friends—a poor excuse for a patriot—but protested he should yet do so. Our hero advised silence on political subjects, and when the Comtesse Helene entered the room, was wrapt in the contemplation of her startling beauty, so that he found himself "in Paradise, between two beautiful and amiable females, opposite to a friend whom I had not seen for a long time, and before a glass of exquisite Tokay.

All weariness vanished, and we laughed and joked half the night, forgetting the war, and Kossuth, and national hatred." Quite as romantic, at any rate, as the adventure of Haroun Al Raschid in Bagdad, and still more in the sequel. While his troop was comfortably quartered near at hand, our hero spent two days in this fascinating abode, until the eyes of the lovely Helene had pierced him through, and he felt, in its full force, the syren power of her beauty. On the third morning, however, he remembered that on earth the soldier has no rest, and with a tear in his eye—an eye that seldom wept over the desolation of the poor, and the slaughter of the innocent—he pressed his friend to his heart, kissed the cheeks of the two countesses, and received from the younger beauty a rose-bud, plucked from a bush, as a token, which he seized with joy, and then dashed away with a furious flourish of trumpets, from the seductive pleasures of this new Calypso's palace.

Immediately the scene changes. Scouring over a green level heath, the troop is opposed by a body of Hungarian patriots. They rushed one at another, the Croats winding the loud blasts of war from their trumpets, as the first shock of conflict took place. There was a fierce struggle; but the imperialists were victorious for the hour.

Foremost in their ranks was a courageous young Croatian damsel, who, perhaps, was not then aware of her royal master's woman-flogging propensities. She was as fearless a rider as any hussar, and headed a desperate charge against the enemy. They made up to meet her attack, when her brother would have hastened to assist; but she cried out, riding by, "'Tis only one, brother, never fear," and dashed at a Hungarian jurat who inflicted a cut on her right cheek. She returned it with a severe blow on the arm, seized the bridle of her enemy's horse, made the man prisoner, and took the beast as a prize. She was proud of that grey steed, and refused afterwards to sell him for forty ducats!

The Hungarians, though at first repulsed, now thickened on the plain, and compelled our imperial heroes to alter their course a little. They fell back in a slow retreat, and encamped on the wide level meadow, under the star-studded roof of heaven, where, on the banks of a rivulet they laid out the bivouac. The sentinels were posted, the horses picketed, and vast fires soon blazed up, throwing their red glare through the dusky atmosphere. Then meat, wine, and maize-flour were unpacked from the great tilted wagon, drawn by six Hungarian horses, that served as an itinerant magazine, store-room for implements, smithy, and hospital.

Although they despised the patriotism, they loved the cookery of the Hungarians, and feasted royally on gigantic stews of beef cut in squares, onions, cummin, red Spanish pepper, with wine, water, or whatever else was at hand. Then the soldiers and officers regaling themselves, so that none lacked of the equal meal, made up for the laborious day.

"After supper, they mended saddles, bridles, clothes, looked to the shoes of the horses, or, seated round the watch-fire, sang, frequently for hours together, their melancholy national songs, in not disagreeable chorus. I then stretched myself upon a horse-cloth, wrapped myself in my cloak, leant my head upon my saddle, and watched the smoke of my cigar curling about before me, till darkness gradually stole over the busy scene.

"Often have I lain for hours awake, absorbed in reverie; above me the vast dark firmament, with its innumerable twinkling stars, around me the immense plain, whence, in the distance, was heard at times the call of our advanced posts and patrols; near me, the high-blazing fires, about which lay the sleeping forms of the Serassans, in the red and white cloaks; not far off, their horses fastened with the snaffle, some lying down, some, with bowed heads, resting as they stood, some neighing and pawing the ground. If the march had not been too fatiguing, or if we had had a day of repose, two or three hussars would play upon the Jews' harp, while others sang, and the rest danced their pretty national dances, at the same time clanking their broad spurs, and clashing their swords together, so as to resound far over the heath."

Thus this little troop of wild soldiers campaigned day after day over the plain, losing many of their number in skirmishes, but still hoping to annihilate Kossuth, and wipe out all disgraces, all losses, all weariness and pain, in one grand, tremendous, joyful slaughter of the Hungarian patriots!

From these lone bivouacs on the plain, they rode to Vienna, a city which our hero loved, because of some jolly men and lovely women he had met there. Now, alas! how changed. The spirit of freedom was awake there, and the population no longer felt proud of its idolatry of the Austrian Emperor—the flogger of women. One of the gentlemen who was most indignant at the insurrection was a fantastic dandy, who was pre-eminently courageous when concealed behind double ranks of the imperial flesh-hewers. This royal bravo, in primrose gloves, and with a glass at his eye, strutted to and fro, enlarging on the profusion of rebels he intended to hack to pieces; but our military author, who,—if not as ideal a personage as Presto John,—was a brave man, took an opportunity of silencing him. He was weary of listening to the vaunts of this dainty dandy's intended bravery, and seizing an old, greasy fur cap of a Red Mantle trooper, clapped it on his befrizzled head, saying, "That fits admirably. If you want to fight against the insurgents, you can enter at once among my Red Mantles; there is a vacancy at this moment;" and while he spoke, another soldier flung an ancient red cloak over the graceful shoulders of the delicate Achilles, who stood silent and confounded, while the Serassans hailed their new comrade with peals of tumultuous laughter.

Another of these aristocratic puppies made familiar advances to the valiant and beautiful maiden we have already mentioned, and receiving a slap from her pretty hand, which made his cheek blush and tingle, came to the officer in command, and lodged a complaint against this amazon. Our hero, who was witty in his way, placed his horse and sword at the command of the offended dandy, giving him full leave to revenge the insult; but the noble young Ajax shrunk from the engagement, and slunk away. These bold and fiery maidens of Croatia had no taste for the "pretty men" of Vienna, leaving them to the sad soft loyal ladies of the Austrian capital.

Darning and mending, polishing arms, assaulting barricades, playing practical jokes, and passing the time in various other military occupations, our author was at length drawn into a whirlwind of battle, in which some splendid charges of cavalry were borne by the Hungarians with invincible bravery. He dwells, with the enthusiasm of an amateur, on the numbers that were cut to pieces on that occasion. He dilates on the squadrons of horse, in long, close, glittering array, with lines of flashing swords, dashing over the plain, in the face of pike and cannon, and then rolling upon and breaking against the masses of the foe.

"Among the many incidents of this day, one scene is vividly present to my view. A very young Hungarian lad, evidently belonging to the nobility of the country, was engaged in fight with two cuirassiers. He contrived to turn his superb horse about with such dexterity, that his antagonists, on their heavy beasts, could not get at him, while he had dealt many blows, which, it is true, mostly fell harmless upon the breast-plate and helmet. At last, one of the cuirassiers, waiting for the proper moment, prepared for a thrust with the pallasch, and the broad pointed blade was driven with such force into the breast of the youth, that he sank on the spot lifeless from his horse, without uttering a word.

"What maternal heart may mourn for him? What bright eye may be filled with tears for his loss? His horse, with bloodstained saddle, ran snorting away, and could not be caught. His rider we afterwards buried. He had about him nothing but a handsome gold watch, and a ring with hair, which I bought from the cuirassiers for a couple of ducats."

We hear of thousands slaughtered on the plains of battle, of whole squadrons hewn to pieces, and vast armies overthrown; but it is only when, as in this instance, the individual is brought before us, that we realize a full idea of the melancholy horrors of war. But this young Hungarian patriot, whatever mother mourned him, whatever eye wept for him, died in a cause worthy of the sacrifice, in fighting along with free men against hateful and inhuman tyrants.

From Vienna they marched to Raab, whence the enemy had vanished, thence to the plains beyond Moor, where a tremendous battle took place between the Imperial troops and the Hungarian army under Perczel. The earth quaked as the heavy squadrons of horsemen in armour, mounted on immense steeds, thundered over the hard frozen ground to charge the enemy. Cuirass, helmet, sword and pike, flashing in the sun, red mantle and white caftan flying in the air; the mingled ranks swaying to and fro in the variations of fortune—all these formed features in a real battle picture. At length the superior force of the Imperial army bore down the valiant ranks of the enemy, and the Croat cavalry swept over the plain in pursuit of them. While in hot chase, our hero paused in a field to watch a Hungarian hussar, who, followed by two Austrian cuirassiers, dashed through a thicket, and rode to the edge of a broad deep ditch that separated him from the officer who had formerly been his commander, as he belonged to a regiment once in the Emperor's service. In courtesy the hussar saluted with his sword, and drew up to receive his two enemies. They rode upon him with savage fierceness, and a battle ensued of dramatic interest.

"The hussar, who rode a handsome stallion of the best Hungarian breed—and many of the insurgents were extremely well mounted—managed his swift steed with wonderful dexterity. He turned him so round upon his hind legs, and dodged so quickly to the right or to the left, that for a long time the cuirassiers, on their clumsier horses, could not come at him, though they had dealt many a tremendous blow. The Hungarian, too, had aimed many a one at them, with his glittering blade, but it had always glided off with a loud droning sound from the impenetrable breast armour.

"At length, the hussar's tschako was struck off, and he was covered with blood from a wound on his forehead. 'Take quarter!' repeatedly cried the cuirassiers; but raising himself upright in his saddle, he replied, 'I am an Hungarian!' and levelled fresh blows at his antagonists. His very horse seemed to participate in his master's ardour for fighting. His black hide was dotted with foam; his red nostrils were widely distended; his long mane flickered wildly in the wind; his large eye seemed to flash."

At length, as the hussar rode by his antagonists to inflict a desperate blow, one of the cuirassiers, with sudden force, thrust the long, keen, glistening blade of his pallasch into the right arm-pit of the courageous soldier, so that the point appeared on the outside. "Jesus Maria!" exclaimed the hussar, as he rose on his saddle, and then fell dead to the earth.

When describing these episodes of the war, our author is compelled to illustrate the magnanimous bravery of the Hungarian army, although he seldom misses an opportunity to pour out the full vial of his libels against Kossuth and his followers. But even he felt tenderly towards them when one day his exhausted troops came upon a detachment of baggage wagons weakly guarded, which they took possession of. Among other welcome captures, was a hamper with fifty bottles of champagne. Ah! the ardent joy that thrilled through these soldiers' hearts at the seizure of this splendid prize. None of them had ever before tasted champagne. The necks of the bottles were knocked off, and the sweet foaming wine was drunk in long delightful draughts, though some of these martial heathens swore they would rather have drunk brandy. Whatever the reader may think, and whether it be or be not orthodox, we take this opportunity to affirm that to prefer flaming cognac to German champagne, is to look longingly out of the gates of Eden on the bleak and rugged wilderness of earth.

Well pleased, however, with the wine, the heroes fell to roasting and boiling, while the literary and military Baron consoled himself with waltzing several rounds with the lovely Scroscan maiden who had bruised the Honved's arm, captured the grey horse, and slapped the dandy's face at Vienna. Distinguished by these achievements, the damsel was now honoured by a dance with a baron. He lost her shortly after, when, her father being wounded in another province, she left the camp to tend his couch of pain.

After this, all readers will desire to know a little of the personnel of our hero. Fighting, drinking, dancing, making love, reverieing, riding, kissing countesses, &c., he must have been an interesting man, and somewhat conscious of his beauty too, as most men are—when they have any to boast of:—

"But how do I look myself?"

"Frightful! hideous!"

"I could not forbear laughing, when I first saw my figure again in the glass. A long beard-covered chin, cheeks, and lip, forming not the most graceful curls, the hair of the head wretchedly cut by an hussar, the forehead bound with a black handkerchief, on account of a slight cut which I had received from an Hungarian hussar a few days before, my white cloak covered with spots, grey, black, and yellow, marked with streaks of blood; in holes from sword cuts, balls, and fire-brands from the bivouac; the tschako cut through and bent, instead of the neat tschismen, clumsy fishermen's boots over the trousers, having a broad border of leather, and the black and yellow sash stripped of all its fringe.

"My sword, from the many strokes that it has dealt and parried, is full of notches, and covered with blood-rusty stains; my excellent Ali, my noble charger, is dry as a cat, and deprived of one ear."

Very shortly after, our hero and his band of imperial banditti had to test the courage of Kossuth's army, which cost them many a life; but we allude to these battles principally to notice a confession made by our Croatian Baron, which is curious, considering its source. He admits that the Imperial throne of Austria, the paternal government of the Hapsburgh family, rests only on bayonets, "all other props are rotten." Nothing could be more true. Popular affection and all similar pillars of power have fallen away, and the Austrian crown is upheld only by columns of steel,—well washed in blood.

In one battle with the Magyars, our author, after repeated mutual charges had taken place, particularly observed the leader of one impetuous column of cavalry, that swept like the blast of the sirocco against the most formidable Imperial squares, in spite of those tremendous moving batteries that roll in the van of modern warfare. He was a man of tall and graceful form, elegantly attired, and of unflinching bravery. His figure seemed familiar, and as he led charge after charge against the enemy, wheeling his bright sword in all directions, our author's eyes followed him with an undefined feeling of interest. After a defeat, which the writer cleverly abstains from characterising, he lay by the watch-fire weary and sleepy, when he was told that one of the rebel officers, desperately wounded and taken prisoner, desired to see him.

In one corner of a long, dark, low, hurdle shed, filled with the wounded, lay the Count — whom the Baron had met in the mansion, with his lovely wife and sister. He was sinking fast into the arms of death. Thanking his friend for coming, he desired him to send his pocket-book, containing a will and other papers, to Marie, and answering an inquiry after Helena, fell back on his couch and died. The soldier, accustomed as he was to blood and death, wept over him, directed his decent burial, and was again on the march over a vast undulating snow-clad moor. A skirmish took place; some wagons were captured, and a merry encampment was made. Moody and sorrowful he walked the rounds, to keep the sentinels alert.

"The moon shining tolerably bright, we perceived a human figure lying at the foot of a tree.

"We went nearer. It was a woman, dressed as a man, in the costume of an Hungarian magnate; the long hair which fell over her shoulders, betrayed her sex. My Serassans turned her round, and by the pale moon-beams, I recognised Helena, the lovely sister of my friend, St ——. Inexpressible anguish thrilled me at that moment, and I was well-nigh throwing myself upon the corpse.

"Swiftly mustering my spirits, I ordered my men to carry the body to the fire. There we examined it more closely, and with extreme anxiety I sought to ascertain whether there was any hope of reviving her. Vain hope! It was several hours since her spirit had departed; the ball of one of our riflemen had gone through her heart. From the small red wound the blood was still oozing in single drops, which I carefully caught in my handkerchief, to be preserved as a relic.

"My only consolation was, that the deceased could not have suffered long; that she must have expired the very moment she was struck. Those pure, noble, still wondrous beautiful features—on her brow dwelt peace and composure, and the lips almost smiled."

This beautiful woman, lying a cold corpse on the snow by the bivouac fire, drew sympathy even from the Croat soldiers, many of whom remembered her in another and a happier time. The ground near a maple tree was thawed, and the whole night passed in the digging a large deep grave, with hand bills and swords. As the light dawned, the work was done, while an hussar constructed a rough rude cross of maple wood. Then the frozen remains, still lovely as in life, were lifted from the ground. In full uniform, with a helmet plumed with heron's feathers at the head, and a light Turkish sabre by the side, it was wrapped in a blanket, and laid in the grave. A salute of pistol-shots was fired, and the cross planted on the spot. Our author confesses that at that moment his heart was convulsed by feelings too tumultuous to describe. He took a ring from the finger, and a lock from the hair, as memorials of the dead.

Careering through an infinity of wild adventures in strange variety, the soldier met everywhere proofs that the Hungarians are a generous and noble people. We could, did space permit, quote many passages of singular novelty and interest, from the volume, which, certainly, whether genuine or fictitious, is full of entertainment; but must conclude by a few lines describing the horrible circumstance of this Imperial officer contributing to the support of a patriotic war! Having experienced great kindness at a house, he requested to be allowed to pay for his entertainment. The beautiful maiden whom he asked looked proudly at him, saying gravely, "How can you, a German, offer a Magyar money for entertainment? But hold! Our country needs money just now for war; give a ducat a week—I will send it to the military chest." Ashamed, he handed her the seven ducats.

What an impertinent English lawyer would have done in reply to this solid speech from the pretty maiden we shall not guess; but revenons à nos moutons.

TUPPER'S BALLADS FOR THE TIMES.¹

This is a collection of the scattered poetical productions of the author of "Proverbial Philosophy," and to our mind they display the same characteristics as that well-known and popular work. Mr. Tupper is unquestionably a man of genius; but his productions are by no means equal. When in his best vein, few can excel him, either for thought or expression; but he is sometimes too careless and trivial both in theme and style. We know not where to look for a more truly Anglo-Saxon (to use a word the significance of which he will not undervalue) heartiness and manliness of spirit than in his works. They breathe the air of England and of English country life, and will come home to a wide circle of admirers; while not a few will gratify the more fastidious taste of the select judges of poetry. The volume contains a very great variety from which we might make a selection which would be gratifying to our readers, but we confine ourselves to an extract from a descriptive poem, which is among the most beautiful in its way that we are acquainted with.

ST. MARTHA'S.

"Holy precinct, mount of God,
Where saints have bled, and pilgrims trod,
Martyr's hill—thy nobler name,
Martyr's hill—thy fairer fame
Than as call'd of her, whose heart Chose but late the better part,—
Unto thee my praise I bring,
Thee my soul delights to sing.

"Lo, the glorious landscape round!
Tread we not enchanted ground?
From this bold and breezy height
The charm'd eye sends its eagle flight
O'er the panoramic scene,
Undulating, rich, and green;
And with various pleasure roves
From hill and dale, to fields and groves,
Till the prospect mingling grey
With the horizon fades away,
Shutting in the distant view
By fainter lines of glimmering blue.

"Start we from the warm South-East;
Spread the fine pictorial feast:
There the landmark tower of Leith
Sentinels its purple heath;
Nearer, Holmbury's moated hill,
Highden-hall, and Ewhurst mill,
Dewy Hascomb's fir-fringed knoll,
Hind-head, and the Devil's-Bowl,
With peeps of far South-downs between Seaward closing up the scene.

"Like a thunder-cloud, beneath
Stretches drear the broad Blackheath:
Scatter'd coins have seal'd the sod
A classic site that Rome has trod,
Field of many a desperate strife
For conquest, liberty, or life,
When the legion's sullen tramp
Echoed oft from Farley-camp,
And some Cæsar's ruthless sword
Reap'd the rude barbarian horde,
Britons, patriots, free brave men,
But unskill'd to conquer—then."

"And, while thy spirit praises Earth
Its precious gifts, its wealth and worth,

(1) "Ballads for the Times. Geraldine, &c." By M. F. Tupper.

Forget not thou this glorious Sky,
Oh ! lift thine eyes, thy heart on high ;
Forget not Him, whose mercy gave
All the good we hope, or have ;
Him, whose Presence, far and near,
Man's best wisdom learns to fear
Where above the green glad world
Heaven's banners float unfurl'd,
Gorgeous in each mighty fold
Bathed in black, or fringed with gold ;
Or, as clouds of fleecy white
Sail in seas of azure light ;
Or, as streamers hurrying by
Tell of tempests in the Sky ;
Or, like snow-clad mountains, stand
Giant wardens of the Land.

" Earthward once again ; the North !
Draw its good, its evil forth :
Mile beyond mile of waving field,
Rare to see and rich to yield ;
The frequent village round its spire ;
The snug domain of rural squire ;
Yon dusky tract of Waste and Moss ;
That iron road-way drawn across ;
Windsor, throned o'er half the land ;
And gambling Epsom's far-famed stand ;
While the dim distance in a shroud
Is wrapp'd by London's smoky cloud.

" Near us, Guildford's ancient town
Between the hills is hiding down ;
Decent Guildford, clean and steep,
Ranged about its castle-keep,
Relic of departed power,
Grey and crumbling square old tower.
Like some warden at his post
Honest Booker's lofty boast
Fine and feudal, shames outright
Puny's telegraphic height.
While it overtops with pride
All the vassal scene beside,
And above that verdant swell,
Sainted Catherine's Gothic cell.

" Westward thence, a narrow track,
Stretches far the bare Hog's-back :
Ridging up, with hilly sides,
Lo, the bristling Boar divides
Right and left a kindred scene,
Purple moors and meadows green,
Or those seeming-vineyards wide,
Farnham's wealth, and Surrey's pride.

" Forth from Merroe's happy plain
And noble Clandon's rich domain,
Newland's heights, and Coombe beyond,
And nutty Sherbourne's crystal pond,
Eastward to the landscape's end
The sloping chalky Downs extend,
Primal still, by man untamed,
Fresh, unbounded, unclaim'd :
Now a lawn of herbage sweet,
Smooth as velvet to the feet,
Now a jungle, matted dense,
A wilderness of briar-fence ;
Here, an earthwork, fosse and mound ;
There, a race-course curving round ;
Hollow'd pits, where in old times
Bad marauders hid their crimes :
Sad sepulchral groves of yew
Solemn ranged in order due,
Seeming of primeval birth,
Solid as the ribs of earth,
Where white Druids, years of yore,
Roam'd those mystic circles o'er,
Or calm kneeling on the sod
Wisely worshipp'd Nature's God.

" Let then a lateborn son of Time
Shadow forth the Past sublime,
And while, the greensward laid along,
He weaves his meditative song,
Tell what various tribes have trod
With various hopes this ancient sod.
The painted Briton, long of yore,
Hunting down the wolf or boar ;
The Roman watcher, posted here
Leaning on his iron spear ;
The fair-hair'd Angle, piling high
Beacon-fires against the sky ;
With vulture-eyes the hungry Dane
Gloating o'er the fertile plain ;
Patriot Saxons, who withstood
The Norman, conquering for good ;
Monks, to bless with book and bell ;
Crusaders, bidding all farewell ;
Foot-ore Pilgrims, hither come
Midway from St. Becket's tomb ;
Round-heads, chaunting rebel prayers ;
Gay devoted Cavaliers ;
Rustics, on the Sabbath-day
Duly toiling up to pray ;
Mourners, weeping round the bier
Brought for humble burial here ;
And thousands, more, in denser quaint,
Than tongue can tell, or pencil paint,
Have laugh'd or wept, or fought their fill,
Or lived, or died, on Martyrs' Hill.

" Martyrs' Hill !—before my mind
Rise the triumphs of Mankind ;
Martyrs' Hill !—and to my thought
Back the crimes of men are brought :
Yea :—for on this sacred sod
Doubtless perish'd saints of God,
And Elijah's chariot came
Mingling with the martyrs' flame,
To bear them from that awe-struck crowd
In robes of light, on thrones of cloud.

" Then, the seed of holy blood
Gave its hundredfold of good ;
Barbarians heard, and thought, and felt,
Glow'd, admired, and mourn'd, and knelt ;
Their very murderers came in fear
To bless the sainted victims here,
Penitent, with zealous haste
Aloft the rustic temple placed
Keyless arches, rough and round
Spanning high the blood-stain'd ground,
Of iron sandstone rudely built,
Memorial of their grief—and guilt.

" Thereafter, Newark's princely priest
Added all this Gothic East,—
The modest choir and transepts twain,
Fitting well the Christian fane,
Windows, deck'd in colours rich,
The pointed arch and florid niche,—
Contrast to yon Saxon nave
That simply mark'd the martyr's grave.

" Ruin, I have loved thee long,
And owed for years this humble song ;
While I pay the grateful debt,
Hear me one petition yet.
When in God's good time and way
I wake upon my dying day,
Should I still beneath thee dwell,
As my spirit sighs farewell,
Let the shadows from thy wall
Be my hallow'd funeral pall ;
Let no city's close church-yard
Steal from thee thy native bard ;
But where now I careless lie
Make me welcome when I die :

On this thyme-enamell'd height
 Let me bid the world good-night;
 Sacred to my memory be
 All the scene that circles thee;
 And plant o'er me, in goodwill,
 A plain stone cross on Martyrs' Hill."

"Thoughts from the Inner Circle."—We have here a small and unpretending collection of verses which displays at any rate, considerable powers of thought and some poetic spirit. The preface informs us that the volume originated in the monthly meetings of a few congenial friends, who, in the summer of 1848, agreed to assemble "for the purpose of obtaining close and intimate intercourse upon the great questions affecting the interests of humanity." To these meetings they gave the name of "The Inner Circle," and hence the title of the volume. The poems are contributed by different authors, and are by no means of equal merit. We have not space to criticise the philosophy introduced, but shall content ourselves with transcribing a few graphic stanzas, penned in the Tennysonian style and metre, from one of the poems on "The Railway."

"Wondrous is the march of ages; wondrous is the growth of mind;
 Between the savage and the sage what an awful gulph we find.

Take a survey of the nations; see the progress of mankind,
 In whatever casts a halo round the workings of the mind.

See the heavens mapped and charted, see their mysteries descried;
 O'er the restless, boundless ocean, see the navies proudly ride.

See the earth, e'en from her centre, all her hidden treasures yield;
 O'er the death-compelling lightning, see man high dominion wield.

Not the least too of our triumphs, the triumph of this later day,
 See man over vale and mountain stretch his mighty iron way.

Like a net-work o'er the nation, iron threads are strangely woven;
 And, unconsciously, the workers for a holy end have stroven.

Never hath the world beheld, since the earth her course began,
 Such a manifest display of the skill and power of man.

See the dragon-engine foaming, with a fury fierce and wild;
 Yet, unto his master's willing, as obedient as a child.

With a speed the wind's surpassing, on and on it ever bears;
 All the work of man's achieving, works of anxious hopes and fears.

Strange the thoughts which crowd upon us, as its fleeting course we view;
 Realizing ancient legends, making ancient fables true.

See those mystic wires extending, how at time and space they laugh,
 As the peoples, in amazement, breathe, "The Electric Telegraph!"

How they smile at Ariel's vaunting! Put a girdle round the earth
 In forty long and dreary minutes! Proper subject that for mirth.

In a moment will their tendrils creep along her lovely face,
 Linking nation unto nation in a firm and fond embrace.

In a moment will they carry, from the north unto the south,
 All the lovings, hopings, yearnings, falling from a people's mouth.

Who shall say what high results, in the holiest sense sublime,
 Still are left for their achieving, in the fruitful womb of time?

Wonders never yet imagined, e'en in fancy's wildest flight,
 Shall these instruments accomplish for the triumph of the Right.

They shall be the iron levers, aiding aye the good and wise,
 To make this dædal earth of ours a type of that beyond the skies.

Humanity will ever bless them; will sing poems to the day
 When first were laid their deep foundations,—first was wrought an iron way."

"Latter Day Pamphlets." Edited by Thomas Carlyle. Two of these have already appeared, and have created a great deal of talking and wonderment, and no little of strong disapprobation among the readers of the remarkable productions of the day. Anything bearing the name of Thomas Carlyle on its title-page must be considered among these. "The Present Time" and "Model Prisons" are full of the author's deep, fiery spirit, in which none but the mentally near-sighted can see nothing but hatred and all uncharitableness. The address to the "indigent incompetent of this land" in the former pamphlet sounds severe; but is it always wrong to be severe? Do not some things demand severity, as the truest kindness? The tone of "Model Prisons" is severe too, but very sad. Indeed, it is impossible to read these outpourings of a thinker, and not be convinced that it is out of the fulness of the heart that he speaketh—that he does not sit alone in his closet, and disregard the toils and troubles and perils of the country in which he lives, of the world to which he can address himself. Carlyle is not a self-absorbed philosopher, nor hard-hearted, though he has said some hard words lately. We would recommend our readers to listen to him, and if they listen in a right spirit, they will find good matter as well as bad or doubtful. Very little that is bad, say we, in spite of the loud cries to the contrary that are being uttered around on every side.

"More Verse and Prose." By the Corn-law Rhymer. Although this verse and prose is not among the best that we have seen from Ebenezer Elliot, yet there are many very good things. We recommend these volumes to all those who took delight in the song of the late lamented Sheffield bard.

CONVERSATION.

BY J. M. W.

"Seeing we are civilized Englishmen, let us not be naked savages in our talk."—FULLER.

THE most ardent admirers of England and every thing English cannot say very much for our improvement in the art of conversation since the days of the great Church historian. We have arrived at the middle of the nineteenth century; we are a very industrious and enlightened people,—“civilized Englishmen” (as we fancy); and yet are still “savage” enough in our talk, for the most part. We exercise our great national talent for silence, to a considerable extent, when a proper exercise of the faculty of speech is the one thing demanded by circumstances; and we make a display of the “savage nakedness” of our “talk” on occasions when speech, properly arrayed and tastefully ornamented, is the one thing to be preferred to silence. In the hope that it may be permitted to one of the most insignificant of the community to whisper a little truth into its large ear, I venture to offer the following remarks. Potentates, in general, cannot well bear to have the truth about themselves, even in trifles, told out plainly; but the potentate I address is already getting accustomed to hear facts about its own nature, and has already learned that, in the end, an ounce of truth is of more value than a pound of falsehood.

There are few European nations who do not excel the British in the art of conversation, except, perhaps, the Turks, whom, being half Asiatic, and wholly un-Christian, we will exclude from the comparison. They belong to a social system altogether different from our own. It is one that has, no doubt, many advantages, but among them is not that of what we call general society, i.e. the free intercourse of the various educated classes and both sexes, in polite assemblies of all kinds, from morning calls and wedding breakfasts to literary conversaziones and æsthetic tea-parties. I do not on this account despise the Turks; I wish it to be particularly understood that I have a great respect for them on many accounts. Not the least on this, that they are a nation of bearded men who know how to be silent when they have nothing to say, which is more than I, or any much bolder person, can venture to assert of another race of bearded men nearer our own island. On some other occasion it will give me pleasure to pay due honour to our Ottoman brethren for their hearty recognition of the maxim that “silence is better than speech.” But at present my business lies in an opposite direction.

Setting the Turks aside, then, we may challenge all Europe to produce worse talkers than ourselves. We are “naked savages in our talk,” in the sense of being unable to clothe our thoughts decently. We do not cultivate the faculty of verbal expression; we are, for all ordinary intents and purposes, exactly what Carlyle declares us to be,—viz. “an inarticulate nation.” Now this is certainly not a thing to take pride in; it is not a pleasing peculiarity; it is a positive defect.

VOL. XI.

Go into an ordinary evening party, where the guests are collected for no other purpose than that of passing a few hours in social converse; what is the state of matters there?

“The circle form’d, we sit in solemn state,
Like figures carved upon a dial-plate.
‘Yes, Ma’am,’ and ‘No, Ma’am,’ utter’d softly, show,
Every five minutes, how the minutes go.”

Any one who recollects the rest of Cowper’s very clever description of an evening party will be ready to admit, at once, its applicability to similar réunions at the present day, and its perfect freedom from exaggeration. They, too, will sympathise with him in his delight when the hour of departure comes, and when, as he expresses it, he hastens

“As from a seven years’ transportation home.”

Now what is the cause of this entire failure in the object proposed in bringing people together? They are brought together for social conversation, and they do not converse. Why is this? Either they cannot, or they will not converse, or there is some powerful hindrance to the exercise of their ability and will, to do that which they have met together to do. If we look into the cause narrowly, we shall perhaps discover that it is a little of all three combined. They cannot converse, they will not converse, and certain circumstances prevent them from conversing.

Let us begin with the last preventive cause, the “certain circumstances that prevent people from conversing.” One of the chief of these I take to be the fact that they are brought together to converse; that they are set down to do that, upon compulsion, and at a given time, which can only be done properly spontaneously, and without premeditation. That which, if it were left to itself to spring up naturally out of some interest of the moment, would be one of the greatest pleasures, one of the most charming relaxations and most healthful exercises of the mind, is converted into the dulllest and most fatiguing of operations. It is much the same with the act of walking. The best physicians will tell you that a mere duty walk, imposed upon you, as is the custom in young ladies’ boarding-schools, at a stated time and within certain prescribed limits, is neither remarkably pleasurable nor healthful. You should go out for a walk, not as a business or mere cut-and-dried duty, but as a pleasure; either you should have something to walk out for, or the mere act of walking, of feeling your “life in every limb,” should be delightful to you. When that is the case, walking is healthful. But when you set out on a walk as if it were a penance, it would often be better for your health to stay at home. So it is with conversation. If people do not enter into it naturally, either because they have something important to learn or to impart, or because they take a delight in the mere exercise of the mind which it demands, they had better be silent and stay away from conversation parties. They should not go there to make talk, however small. Nothing is more tedious or offensive to persons of taste, than listening to a repetition of the stereotyped phrases of people who have nothing to say at that precise moment, yet think it necessary to go about the room saying something to everybody, which everybody is tired of hearing, and which nobody cares to listen to.

To be obliged to take one's pleasure "on compulsion," is a grievous infringement of the rights of man; and at many an English party have I been reminded of an anecdote related of Talleyrand. When present at one of the emperor Napoleon's grand soirées at the Tuilleries, at which all sorts of people of the ancien and of the nouveau régime were present, and everything was very fine, and very solemn, and very dull (just like an ordinary English party), Napoleon was much annoyed at the want of conversation, and at the comparisons which he felt sure the company was making between this and former gay and witty réunions in the same place. He could not coerce his guests into a brilliant and lively conversational vein. Parisian as the party was, his imperial majesty knew that it was what the Parisians could not forgive; it was dull, emphatically flat, Anglais. Talleyrand, who knew his master's mind, and also felt the comedy of the thing, like a thorough Frenchman, is said to have gone about among the various groups, encouraging them to converse gaily, with the following remark, "L'Empereur ne plaisante pas; il veut que l'on s'amuse." "The emperor is not joking at all. It is his will that you should amuse yourselves." And people were obliged to set themselves seriously to work to get up a conversation, and appear amused. Now, though we have no Talleyrands to go about in drawing rooms, and tell us that the host and hostess "expect every man will do his duty" in the talking way, yet do we not all feel at a heavy party that we ought to be appearing amused, and that we shall be a burden on our hosts if we do not achieve that business of the hour?

Another preventive cause to conversation on these occasions is, that the people who give parties in this country are apt to invite the guests without any regard to their fitness for each other, or, if they have some regard to that matter, they want the necessary discrimination. They generally assemble heterogeneous crowds; "a combination of disjointed things," in which there is no attraction of cohesion. In these gatherings every one feels out of his element, and looks in vain for some one whom he is glad to see, and longs to talk to. It is in vain that the various members of the host's family glide about, trying to produce something like a mixture of the company. The men get together, and the women get together. Some of the men talk politics, as it is called, i.e. they tell each other what was in the leading article in yesterday's "Times;" others go in twos and threes and are silent, or (in slang phraseology), talk shop. The women are generally distributed as follows: young ladies, who sit in corners and giggle; their mothers, who talk about babies, husbands, and servants; and other ladies, old and young, and neither the one nor the other, who wonder when the men are coming to make themselves agreeable, when the supper will be announced, and where on earth Mrs. This or Miss That bought that frightful gown she wears. A great many witty things might be said about the absurdly incongruous nature of the elements out of which many good sort of people attempt to make a social conversational party. It is in vain they mutter the charm—

"Mingle, mingle, mingle, Ye that mingle may;"

it is powerless, for there is a more potent counter-charm at work, one that lies in the nature of things; a want of kindred in the spirits, a positive inability to mingle. Where it is otherwise,—in small coteries of people interested in the same thing; in parties composed exclusively of military people and their belongings, or of persons connected with the law, or with medicine, or with the church, or with literature,—in these cases there is no want of fellowship and animated talk; there is a bond of union between the various members of the society; but the fault in these narrow and exclusive circles is, that social conversation, instead of dissipating the prejudices of individuals, tends to foster and consolidate them. That which should be used as a means of exciting and enlarging the mind upon all subjects disconnected with the special business of a man's daily life, so as to make his sympathies and views tend as far as possible to universality, becomes a powerful agent in shutting him up within the circle of his professional business and usual mode of thought and feeling. He finds his own views of men and things reflected with little variety in the minds of those with whom he converses. The esprit de corps is so strong in these coteries that they cannot tolerate what does not belong to themselves. The very language they use becomes impregnated with a certain slang, unintelligible to any stray visitor from the world beyond the exclusive circle. To such a visitor much of the talk he hears will be little more agreeable than that of what is called general society, alluded to above.

It does not appear very difficult to remove these two hindrances to social converse, when they are recognised. Let those who give parties be careful to select the guests with a view to their fitness for each other's society, and let them be brought together with some general object in view, not merely to talk. Let there be a short but good musical performance, if your guests love music. It will cost but a few guineas more, and if you cannot well afford the addition, spend a little less upon your supper table. You will find yourself amply repaid by the effect produced among your guests. They will all be pleased, for the grand secret of pleasure is to have the mind agreeably occupied. Conversation will arise naturally out of the performance, and will soon pass freely to other subjects. Even those whose dispositions are taciturn will have enjoyed the music, and will feel that the time has been well employed. The exhibition of curiosities or novelties in mechanical invention would, in like manner, interest another class of guests, and lead to animated and entertaining conversation. One or two new pictures, or a statue from the studio of a first-rate artist, shown to a private party of persons who possess knowledge and taste in art, would set the conversation going. For those who have no interest in art or science, and who do not readily talk about matters of general interest, there are various games which may be introduced with advantage into evening parties,—chess, whist, backgammon, and even round games of cards. For the younger portion of the guests, dancing and charades tastefully got up will almost always induce conversation. In proportion to the intellectual faculties and higher affections of our nature brought out in communion with our fellows, will be the positive pleasure we derive from that communion. And we may depend upon this, that if our higher faculties are not called into action in what are named amusements, we shall not be amused, for even children do not like what they call stupid play. Therefore it follows that conversation will be amusing and satisfactory to the company just in proportion to the amount of intellectual force and grace, to the happy mixture of reason and feeling, of liveliness and earnestness, and of moral truth and goodness of character brought into play by it. The author of "Friends in Council" is one who speaks with authority upon the "Art of Living" generally. In this great subject is included that of conversation and social intercourse. In his late admirable essay, he mentions, among other hindrances to social intercourse, two important things, besides one of those we have just spoken of. We cannot do better than give them in his own words:—"In all social intercourse there is an implied faithfulness of the members of the society one to another; and if this faithfulness were well maintained, not only would a great deal of pain and mischief be prevented, but men, knowing that they were surrounded by people with a nice sense of honour in this respect, would be more frank and explicit in all they said and did. As it is, a thoughtful and kind-hearted man is often obliged to make his discourse very barren, lest it should be repeated to a circle for whom it was not intended, by whom it could not be understood, and who can rarely have before them the circumstance which led to its being uttered."

From this cause social intercourse is rendered superficial and half-true, if not wholly untrue, and thus anything like free or eloquent conversation is prevented. The other hindrance is thus spoken of by Mr. Helps:—"There is a light, jesting, slippant, unkind mode of talking about things and persons very common in society, exceedingly different from wit, which stifles good conversation, and gives a sense of general hostility rather than sociability, as if men came together chiefly for the purpose of ridiculing their neighbours, and of talking slightly about matters of great concern. I am not sure that this conduct in society is not a result rather than a cause, a result of vanity, want of truth, want of faithfulness, and other hindrances which we have been considering. It certainly bespeaks a lamentable want of charity, and shows that those who indulge in it are sadly ignorant of the dignity of social intercourse, and of what a grand thing it might be."

"A grand thing," indeed! But it will never be that, and conversation will never be anything but mean and contemptible, as long as the foolish desire to be always funny, the desecrating love of the ridiculous, continues to prevail amongst us. Let us have wit, if you will, humour, if you will, spontaneous drollery and high spirits within graceful limits, if you will, neat satire, if you will, fair and well directed; but perish all unfair and ill-natured satire, and every atom of that lively stupidity which thinks itself so very clever that it may turn all things, in heaven and earth, into food for silly laughter and sillier sneers. There may be noisy talk, but there can be no good conversation in the midst of buffoonery or petty giggling.

Having thus glanced at some of those circumstances which prevail in society to the prevention of conversation,—the communion of mind with mind by means of truthful living words, let us proceed to the consideration of the remainder of our argument, viz, that people in this country can not converse and will not converse in society.

To excel in any art we must practise it, and no one will practise an art who does not attach importance to it, either through natural inclination, or because reason tells him that it is good to do so. Now, the art of speaking in one that is much neglected of us. Res non verba, is our national motto. Because things, in some respects, are of more importance than words, we underrate the value of words, and we do not care to possess a complete mastery over them. This is altogether an error. The faculty of speech is one of the highest given to man; without it there could have been no communication of thought, and society, except as among monkeys and beavers, could not have existed at all. In very few cases can a great thought become action, become a thing, without the intervention of the living word, into which the thought must be translated before it can be apprehended by another thinking being. Only by means of the fine arts (which are also manifestations of thought), and by the art of speech, can we learn what is in the minds and hearts of our fellow men. What the fair statue is to the mind of the sculptor, (the expression of his inner thought and feeling), is fair speech, "thoughts that breathe, and words that burn," to the mind of the thinker. Without "the spoken words," he would be an isolated creature, and could not impart the truth and beauty which would lie pent up within him. Words are indeed things, and things of the most enduring and most precious kind, if they be rightly considered. Indeed some philosophers have doubted whether we can think without words, and, indeed, it seems scarcely doubtful that words are necessary to the completion of thought; that that thought is but half matured which is not, or cannot, be expressed in fitting words.

By thought I mean something distinct from feeling or passion. Words are by no means mere breath, unsubstantial, shadowy, and good for nothing. They are for good and for evil; they are real entities. It would be well that we changed our national motto, and wrote in our text books Res et verba. Once let us get to a rightful understanding of the value of words, and we should learn to use them well; we should be taught early the art of expressing our thoughts and feelings, instead of never being taught anything of the kind. Instead of being "naked savages in our talk," clothing our meaning scantily in the first rag of utterance that comes to hand, we should be civilized men in our words as well as in our actions. At present we will not talk well, and we can not talk well, because we do not appreciate the art of conversation. This is one of those things (generally among the highest we have to do with on earth), which we must learn to love and to admire, before we shall be able to practise it. England is inarticulate, not because she wants the faculty of speech, but because she does not value it enough to use it.

These observations do not apply to exceptional cases. One swallow does not make a summer, nor do Sir James Mackintosh and Sidney Smith, and a dozen other brilliant conversationalists, make a generation of men who can talk well. These and such as these, of whom there are, I believe, a few specimens afloat upon society in the present day, are to be considered as rara aves. They stand proudly preeminent amidst the great national inaptitude for conversation. They are talked of and sought after as wonders. But this would not be the case in all countries. What may have befallen the art of conversation since February 1848, I cannot say, but before that time I believe any Parisian salon of reputation could produce rivals (in talking—my comparison goes no farther,) to most of our celebrated wits, except, perhaps, Sydney Smith, who was sui generis. But to converse it is not necessary to be a great wit. The art of conversation may be very gracefully practised by people who are not at all witty. It is quite sufficient that a man be well educated, well informed, with a decided taste for, and interest in, one or two pursuits beyond his profession, and that he be of a genial and truthful character, with good temper, and a readiness to impart and to receive ideas. These qualities, with a little study and practice in the art of extempore expression will enable a man to make a good figure in general conversation, and to derive from it as much pleasure as he gives. The qualities just enumerated are precisely those which are required to make a man and a gentleman, not a mere professor of this or that, who is well acquainted with one corner of the world of human knowledge and interests, but is ignorant of the rest. The present evil result of the division of labour, moral as well as physical, is the tethering down of each individual to a certain allotment of the field of knowledge, beyond which he has, at first, no time and subsequently no desire to wander. Hence a want of common interests and of enlarged views, out of which, alone, anything worthy the name of conversation can spring. A person of the kind that is best fitted for social intercourse is thus described in a conversation of the "Friends in Council." It is Milverton, the author, who speaks:—

"I do not think sufficient credit is given to people of eminence in social qualities. To take an instance; you know our old college friend ——. Well, you know what a serviceable man he is in society, how sure he is in any company to promote the happiness and amusement of all around. His wit is of the lambent and not of the forked kind; it lights up every topic with grace and variety, and it hurts nobody. I suppose no one ever left his company aggrieved by any saying of his. Very often you can carry away nothing that he has said, for his humour has been continuous, and a pailful of water from any river will no more give a notion of its beauty, than a quotation from his conversation of its richness, grace, and drollery. I do not know whether — is, or will be, successful in his profession; that greatly depends upon other people; but to my mind he is a successful man. If he does not, however, obtain professional success, he may have all the graces and merits in the world; most people will pronounce his life a failure."

That is because most people are too apt to consider that merit lies in what a man does, and not in what he is. This error in judgment is one that is excusable enough in a complicated system of society like our own, in which it is not easy to know what men are, except by their actions, and in which that man who takes no share in the divided labour of the age, who does not employ part of his time in some one thing for the general good, is likely to stand still on the bank while the rapid stream of human interests runs by him. A life of contemplation, of indefinite work and general interest, without a special employment, is not a safe or wholesome life for ordinary people, although here and there individuals may be found who are exactly fitted for such a mode of existence. These people, if of a genial communicative nature, are among the very best conversationalists, because they are among the best men; their talk is sunny, and full of warmth, of light and shadow, like a summer day, when you have no thought of turning the powers of nature to a money account; when you do not think how much corn the sun will ripen, or the wind will grind.

If any one were to ask me to define good conversation, I should be very much puzzled to do it, and probably should not succeed in satisfying either my readers or myself with a definition. But of two things I am almost certain. One is, that conversation, to be good, must be characteristic, that is, it should reflect the character of the speaker; any want of truthfulness in that respect is a want of vitality, a want of the projectile force, by which the thing said strikes against the brain and heart of the hearer. For this reason no prepared or made up talk ever reaches its object, unless that object be to affect the inferior orders of mind, and no person who talks beneath himself can talk well; it would be better to talk over the heads of the company. The other thing about conversation, of which I feel tolerably certain, is, that if my readers will refer to Bacon's essay on Discourse, they will find there the very best rules laid down for general and particular conversation. If any one will take the trouble to study that wise and brilliant composition, he will not fail to perceive in what good conversation consists. If every person capable of understanding it were obliged to read that essay before he went out to a dinner or an evening party, I cannot help thinking there would be a marked improvement in the talking. It will perhaps be allowed me to quote a few sentences by way of finishing well, i.e. leaving the best thing to the last. "It is good in discourse and speech of conversation to vary and intermingle speech of the present occasion with arguments, tales with reasons, asking of questions with telling of opinions, and jest with earnest; for it is a dull thing to tire, and, as we say now, to jade anything too far. As for jest, there be certain things which ought to be privileged from it; namely, religion, matters of state, great persons, any man's present business of importance, and any case that deserveth pity; yet there be some that think their wits have been asleep, except they dart out somewhat that is piquant, and to the quick. And generally men ought to find the difference between saltiness and bitterness. Speech of a man's self ought to be seldom and well chosen. Speech of touch towards others should be sparingly used: for discourse ought to be as a field without coming home to any man. Discretion of speech is more than eloquence; and to speak agreeably to him with whom we deal, is more than to speak in good words or in good order."

FRED SHIRLEY'S MAY DAY, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY W. M.

"There's many a cloudy morning turns out a very fine day."—Old Saw.

At thirteen Fred Shirley was an orphan with a grandmother, thirty-four cousins, from the first degree downwards, and two thousand pounds in the three-and-a-half per cents. His guardian was a lawyer, with a family of his own, and a tolerably extensive practice; and although he had been a great friend of Fred's father, (indeed, they were almost brothers at school,) the affection did not descend to the son, and he cared little enough about his young charge. Perhaps it was better for Fred that it was so; for though with powers enough to act for himself if obliged to do so, yet his fault through life was a disinclination for voluntary and unforced exertion.

And so after the funeral, when Fred was staying at his guardian's house, they had a business interview; and the boy got through it pretty well, too.

"Well, Frederic," said the man of law, "you know, I suppose, your poor father's wish about your education—some good public school for you before you enter at Oxford—don't you?"

"Yes, Sir," said Fred.

"Now, the interest of your money will never be sufficient to cover these expenses. You will have, therefore, to draw upon your principal."

"Yes, Sir," said Fred.

"Suppose, then, we put by 1,000*l.* for your college expenses, and devote the remainder to the payment of your school bills. I think, with the running interest, we shall find the sum ample."

"Yes, Sir," said Fred.

"Then I'll write to Winchester to-night; and you had better spend the remainder of your time before school begins with your grandmother in Worcestershire. I'll take your place as I go along."

"Yes, Sir," said Fred, and walked home to the private house; for this conversation had taken place in Gray's Inn. Mr. Rawlinson never talked business except in chambers.

At nineteen Fred Shirley still had a grandmother, more cousins than six years before, and one thousand pounds in the three-and-a-quarter per cents. Fred withdrew his support from the government, he said, immediately they reduced the three-and-a-half. It was unconstitutional, and he could not, and would not, countenance it.

At twenty-three Fred Shirley was in the same condition, with the exception that he had nothing in the three-and-a-quarter per cents, and ten pounds in his pocket, and had been duly allowed by the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford to write, and have his name written, Frederic Shirley, B.A.

Fred Shirley gave a parting dinner to some twenty of his most intimate friends, all of whom were very happy to come, for the dinner was good, and Shirley was a pleasant host; but eighteen out of these twenty voted him a fool for the expense, and some few of them cut him dead in London three months after. Indeed, the only lasting effect of the dinner was the diminution of our friend's exchequer, as we have said, to the sum of ten pounds. But for this Fred cared little; he had not the slightest doubt that there were innumerable situations merely waiting for him to accept them, and he even looked forward with pleasure to have really something to do. So with a light heart Fred Shirley entered London, put up at his usual hotel, and answered every eligible advertisement in the Times for the next succeeding three days, and received no reply. This won't do, thought Fred, I must insert a few lines myself, and then I shall have the choice of all the answers; and he paid seven shillings for a neatly worded notice that a graduate of Oxford, having a few hours disengaged, would be happy, &c. &c.

As a general rule I should say, when you read of these few hours disengaged you may rest satisfied that the advertiser's whole time is totally and entirely unoccupied. It is one of the ruses of life, like "Vacancies for one," "Early application for the few copies left," "Property of a gentleman leaving the country," and so on. This, however, by way of digression. No one seemed to want the few disengaged hours of an Oxford graduate, and Master Shirley became just a trifle uneasy.

He returned oftener to the coffee-room to look for letters; he read the advertising sides of the papers first; he did not like going to bed early lest he should brood over unpleasant thoughts, and he slept on perforce as long as he could in the morning to avoid thought at all.

He was a very different man from the Shirley who used to come in and out so gaily in days gone by; the very waiters saw it and guessed the reason. They are sharp fellows these waiters.

One cannot live for life at an hotel upon ten pounds; so like a wise man our friend spent a whole day wandering about the northern and western parts of London looking for lodgings. It was the pleasantest day he had spent for some time, for he had an object in view, and when this was the case Fred generally succeeded; so that by ten o'clock that evening he had paid his bill, moved his property, and taken possession of two rooms on the third floor of a house in Judd Street, New Road. And a gleam of satisfaction shot through his heart, and he looked round again on a spot he could call his own. His rooms at Oxford had been much better, certainly, still here was private and sole possession, and this is a wonderful comfort.

And Fred drew the old sofa before the fire, (for it was January, and a cold January, too,) pulled off his boots, threw up his legs, and pondered on his ways and means. He thought of the cousins, but there was little comfort there; he thought of Mr. Rawlinson, but only for a moment; he was not the man for a difficulty, (unless for a rich client in difficulties, then he was admirable,) and then he thought of his grandmother, and jumped up with something of his old vigour about him, and, as he termed it, "polished off a letter to her." And, really, to do Fred justice, it was a very good letter—open, straightforward—not presumptuous, but tolerably confident, and with some touches positively affecting. Just the letter to interest an old lady like Mrs. Shirley, who was very eccentric, very prejudiced, very much behind the day, but with a very good heart at bottom. And, for my own part, I care very little about eccentricities and prejudices if I can but find the good heart at the bottom.

Fred Shirley liked the letter, too; sealed it, hoped much from it, and went to bed.

Three months have passed. It is May-day morning, very early, for the clocks have but just chimed the passing-bell of April, but it is May-day all the same, and Fred Shirley is slowly walking through Russell-Square.

And what has he been doing all this time since we left him on his sofa in January? His grandmother had sent him a five-pound note—she was too much behind the day to know anything of post-office orders, and the transmission of the one half, the acknowledgment of the same, and the forwarding the other, had occupied some eight days, to her grandson's great disgust—and had promised the same on the first of every month; and it was very liberal of the old lady, for she was by no means rich, and was particularly scandalized at the disappearance of Fred's two thousand pounds. Now, there are a vast number of persons who live in London, some single, some married and with large families, on five and twenty shillings a-week. Some, too, no doubt, put by money and invest it in profitable ways; and many of these people dress well, too, and have their enjoyments on certain days. Shirley knew this, and made some very excellent plans for doing likewise, but, alas! they failed.

He did not put by money. I am afraid his landlady's bills were somewhat in arrear, and his laundress had sent a message or two to him. What was the consequence? Why, Shirley became one of those wretched beings, a "mooner" about London. He would walk to the Bank in the morning, and take two hours and a half to stroll up to Piccadilly, then stroll back again to the city for his dinner, and waste and loiter away the evening as he could. He became learned in different chop-houses, and knew where the best ordinaries were held at low prices.

Poor Fred! directly he got into difficulties he lost all system, and would have an expensive dinner at the beginning of the month, and then go without one for two or three days. Depend on it, reader, there is nothing much more detrimental to self-respect than to go without dinner from compulsion.

Poor Fred! I say again. What! uncharitable one, do you demur? Do you say he ought to have been more careful? So he ought, no doubt; but, O Draco! stern lawgiver and judge, did you ever try to live in London upon five pounds a-month? If you were to do so, and had led anything like Fred Shirley's life before, you would do just as he did, I feel morally certain.

And Fred is in Russell Square all this time. No; he has passed through it and is in one of the private streets near the Foundling, and he has backed off the pavement, and is looking up at a bright drawing-room window, from which float pleasantly the sounds of music and the soft murmur of female tones. One man's voice he thought he recognised, but it must have been imagination. There were shadows on the blinds, too, and there was one head,—magnified enormously, 'tis true,—but Fred took quite a fancy for it, and as he watched the dancing curls he wondered what the face was like.

"I suppose it would be no good ringing the bell and sending up my card," thought Fred; "I could make myself tolerably agreeable once; but I dare say I have forgotten the way. No; I'll go home."

Home! Poor Fred, the home looked very dull and very ghastly as he drew a lucifer-match and lit a candle. "Any letters, I wonder. No. Well, I might have heard, I hoped, from that Anti-Ramoneur Association to-night." And very low, very hopeless, and with a very sinking heart, Fred Shirley sought his pillow on May-day morning.

THE TOWER

THE TOWER

Fred Shirley was a mighty dreamer; he said his dreams were his greatest comfort. No sooner were his eyes closed than he was transported far away from that bed in Judd Street; and so on this May morning, in ten minutes he was one of the presiding genii of the hilarity of the evening in that well-lit drawing-room he had so enviously gazed at; and his chosen and most pleasant companion was a bright face with waving curls.

It was a very bright sun that shone into Fred Shirley's bed-room when he woke, and this same sun blazed so warmly into his eyes that he could not shut them again, and so thoroughly roused him that he was out and dressed much more expeditiously than usual. The usual anxious, hurried glance on his table for letters—yes, there was one! Frederic Shirley, Esq. (he always answered advertisements in his own name,) very large, too, very business-like, and a great oblong official seal, with "Anti-Ramoneur Association," in deeply cut letters round a brick-broom and scraper salient-wise.

Drowning men catch at straws; Fred Shirley caught at the letter, and was immediately, in imagination, Secretary of this said Association, with a salary of 300 guineas a year, rooms, coals, and candles free.

Live on, Fred Shirley, in the imaginary purport of that letter; the reality will be scarcely so pleasant to thee. And what were the contents of this large business-like epistle? Why, a long prospectus of this Society, which was in course of formation, and for the proper carrying on of which, if formed according to the plans of the originators, one hundred clerks would be required at salaries varying from 500*l.* to 100*l.* a-year; and Mr. Shirley was informed that his name was placed seventeenth on the list, and he was respectfully requested to use his influence in behalf of a Society which would so materially conduce to the happiness and well-being of mankind as the Anti-Ramoneur Association.

And this was all Fred Shirley ever saw of his secretaryship and its appurtenances. And so it had been with all the attempts he had made during the last three months.

His appetite was not very good after this, and as he loitered over his breakfast, he took, as was his custom, the first book which lay near his hand. It was an old volume of a Guide to the Almanac, and he opened on the article on May-day, and read:—"The young people of both sexes go out early in the morning of the first of May, to gather the flowering thorns and the dew on the grass, which they bring home with music and acclamations, and having dressed a pole on the town green with garlands, dance round it. The dew is considered a grand cosmetic, and preserves the face from wrinkles."

"By Jove! why, it's the first of May to-day. I wonder whether 'the young people of both sexes' in London keep up this custom; tolerably improbable, I should say, but I'll stick to it, and I'll go and gather 'the flowering thorns and the dew on the grass' by myself. The latter, at any rate, will be useful, for, if this life lasts much longer, my visage will be as wrinkled and furrowed as a ploughed field."

Ever energetic in his movements, in a very short space of time Fred Shirley had his hat and boots on, had taken his stick and was wending his way up the New Road. King's Cross, that noble structure, called forth no smile on his gloomy visage; he had seen it too often to appreciate now its great practical facetiousness. Rival omnibuses having a spurt up the rise by Claremont Square, had no interest for him; the continual bustle and confusion of the Angel Inn, Islington, brought not one trace of pleasurable excitement to him. No; although all was so bright around, there was little sunshine in poor Shirley's heart—his case was an unfortunate one. When he was in his rooms he was uneasy and fidgety to be out, and when he was out he was equally dissatisfied with himself, and wondered that he could have ever left the house. The streets were a perpetual source of annoyance to him; everything brought his lamentable case before his mind. There were the shops—he was always wishing to buy, but, alas! never able; there was the general look of employment about the faces of all he met, the air of 'something to do,' which is so enviable to the man idle from necessity; and then,—for though it is doubtless a weakness, it is yet a common and natural one,—most of the passers by, who had any pretensions to dress at all, were better dressed than he.

He found London different from Oxford, and without the same facilities for adorning his person which that seat of wisdom afforded; for London tailors are shy of poorly dressed men, who come to them without introductions; and so he had lived on upon his original wardrobe, and to his grief he discovered that the originality of each article was rapidly failing, and sinking into sere and yellow seediness. All this was gall and wormwood to Fred Shirley; his mind had got into that morbid state that he looked on everything with aversion; it was not in his idea that others were deserving, but that he was unfortunate.

"Look at that contemptible wretch riding down to the city," soliloquized he, as the mud from the horses' feet slightly spattered his sleeve; "now that man, I dare say, has not more brains than I have, if so much; has had not one quarter the education, and nothing like the gentlemanlike tastes and habits; and yet he rides gaily along,—by the bye, if that seat can be called riding,—while I — pshaw!"

Now, you were wrong there, Frederic Shirley; that young man was at Eton; he was at a better college than yourself at Oxford; he has twenty times your talent, and bids fair to be one of the most rising barristers of the day. So learn a lesson, Shirley, and do not let your jaundiced eye give such an ungenerous hue to all things.

And this was simply and entirely from the poor fellow's comparative poverty. It requires a very strong mind to bear, without injury to its moral sense, a reverse of fortune. How many a man there is who once was held up as a pattern of delicacy and strict honour, reduced by straitened circumstances to allow and to perform actions which once he would have scouted in others and deemed impossible in himself!

Mind, reader, there are, and ever will be, noble exceptions, where the waters of reverse and disappointments, instead of quenching or dimming the flame of noble spirit and high purpose, have been rather as oil to make that flame burn more brightly and clearly; but, depend on it, these are the exceptions, and Fred Shirley's is no uncommon case.

On with thee, Fred; there may yet be something in store for thee on May-day. He half seemed to think so himself; he had reached Highgate Hill, and he sat himself down on the mile-stone, and, with a smile on his face, (the first for the day,) turned his ear towards dusky London, to discover if there were any Whittingtonian bells ringing forth for him to "turn again."

There were bells ringing, but these words were not in their tones, and yet the idea seemed to have done him good; the smile had done him good; and the idea expanded, and he believed that some turn must soon take place, and that brighter days would come; and the smile expanded, and Fred Shirley laughed. Yes, he laughed at all his bad temper and ill-feeling, and the bad temper and the ill feeling fled away, as such things always do when treated in this manner.

"He that has no time to mourn has no time to mend:" I have read that somewhere," thought Shirley. "Well, I have mourned for three months or more, but I'll begin to mend now. And, first, for some bold stroke to turn the tables, to give me something to do. I'll write a book, or a comedy, or a farce, or a paper for a magazine, or a leading article for some weekly paper. Let me think," and he sat himself on a gate by the lane into which he had wandered, somewhere near Hornsey. He had formed a general outline of the character of the comedy, a strong idea of the plot of the book, two or three excellent situations for the farce, a glowing notion of the magazine paper, and a glimmering of the leading article, and was just going back to work up the comedy a little when he sprang from the gate as if the top had suddenly become red-hot.

"Fred Shirley, by all that's glorious!"

"Williams, my dear fellow, how glad I am to see you!"

It was the first effervescence of his heart startled from its cynical frigidity; for one moment he was very glad to see his friend, the next he hated the chance which had led to this meeting. His pride was touched; he did not choose that one of his former gayest friends should know or guess his present condition and prospects. He had reversed the order of nature, had enjoyed his butterfly state first, and was now merged in the chrysalis, and he repudiated the chrysalis, and would rather be remembered or forgotten, as the case might be, as the butterfly.

And up dashed two ladies on horseback, (Williams was mounted,) and not seeing, or not noticing Fred, called out:—

"Oh, Harry! what a chase you have given us; we are blown to the winds."

This completed Fred's annoyance; and, with a "Good day, now; we shall meet again; I have a particular engagement," he was turning away.

"Why, in the name of fortune, are you going, man? I've a hundred things to talk to you about. Ellen—Fanny—my most intimate and light-hearted friend, Fred Shirley. Fred, my sisters."

The intimate and light-hearted friend would have been delighted if some mysterious power had removed him in bodily shape to the centre of the largest haystack in the adjoining fields; but no such power came to his relief, and he had nothing left but to bow and mutter a few words in a low and unsatisfactory manner.

There was no possible reason, though, why Shirley should have been discontented with his lot; the young ladies were very pretty and very agreeable; one with hair in black and massive bands, the other with light waving curls leaping and frolicking round her hat in the wildest way imaginable.

"And now, old fellow, tell me all about yourself—what are you doing? where are you staying? how long have you been in London? why have you not found me out before? how are all the old set? how did you all get on the year after I left Oxford? have you met Spiller in town?—he would have told me, though, if you had."

"My dear Harry," said Fanny, "how can Mr. Shirley answer all these questions at once? Begin in order, for very pity's sake."

"I will. Well, Fred, what are you doing?"

"Reading for the bar, but not very hard, I'm afraid," was the reply.

Oh, Fred Shirley! why so weak?—why not confess that you are doing nothing? And this thought shot across his conscience, and he was ashamed of himself for the subterfuge. So he satisfied his scruples by the reflection that a deep knowledge of nature was one of the most important requirements at the bar; "and do I not study nature in the streets, hedges, and by-ways daily?" reasoned Fred. By the way, this reading for the bar was no invention of Shirley's; it is a cloak which covers and screens the idleness of many a man; there is something so beautifully undefined in the expression, and the really correct way of acting up to the profession is so little generally known that the chances of detection are small. I don't myself believe much in men when they tell me they are reading for the bar; but then I am partly behind the scenes, for I knew Fred Shirley and one or two others of the same class.

And then Fred told them he had rooms in Judd Street; and Fanny Williams remarked that they must have been very near him on the evening before, for that they were at a party close to that street. And, like a flash of lightning, it burst upon Fred Shirley; he had never seen the curls before, but he had seen their shadow on the blind, and the voice he fancied he recognised was his friend Williams's; there was not a doubt about it in his mind; but he did not confess now he had stood in the road and looked at the windows, and had gone away saddened in heart from envy of so much happiness he could not share. At least he did not tell them then: long afterwards, perhaps, it may have been mentioned with other confessions.

But the effect of the discovery was mighty upon him. "Oh, there's decidedly fate in this; kismet, as the Turks say. I'll resign myself to the stream of circumstance." And Fred floated down the stream as gaily as the gilded galley of a Cleopatra, with its silken sails and pennons floating in the sunbeams. And when they reached Springfield Lodge, he walked into the house as coolly and naturally as if he had received a regular invitation three weeks before, and had come dressed and prepared for the very purpose of dining there.

Any friend of Harry's was certain of a warm reception, particularly if he came just at dinner-time; for there was always a good dinner at the Williams's, and the old man was proud of it, and felt his heart glow with an innocent pride as he made his customary remark, "Now, Sir, here you find us just as we always are—no preparation—a family leg of mutton in a quiet way." But, oh! reader, if you had dined at that table as often as I have, your ideas would be materially expanded as to the comprehensive signification of a "family leg of mutton."

Shirley rose with the occasion. Circumstances make the man; at any rate he had found the reverse true, for the circumstances of the last few months had nearly unmade him, and the revulsion was all the more powerful. The old gentleman was a first-rate man of business; his opinion was good sterling currency on 'Change; but he never talked business in his own house. He was a wretched attempt at a farmer, and he talked of farming incessantly. Perhaps at times he might have been considered slightly a bore on that point; but it is strange what a vast deal of boring one can stand at such a table as his, when your host is the inflieter.

A short account of the habits of the Hampshire hog, which Fred had read years back in White's "Selbourne," went directly to the heart of the worthy merchant, and when, in the course of conversation, he mentioned a successful plan he had seen adopted in Worcestershire of rearing guinea-fowls, Mr. Williams decided him to be a very superior and well-informed young man, and gave secret intimation that the claret was to be taken from bin No. 9. Mrs. Williams, like some other ladies of her age and position, had a deep and absorbing interest in the royal family. Now, Fred was not on visiting terms at the palace, but he had once entered those revered precincts on occasion of an address being presented from the University, and a vivid description of this, in which I confess he drew rather largely from his imagination in his account of the fittings and ornaments of the rooms, won the old lady's regard for life. As to the young ladies, it seems utterly impossible not to be agreeable in their company; so cheerful, unaffected, and ready to be pleased, that as Fred closed the door, as the last of the waving ringlets floated out, he even heaved a sigh, and would have preferred following to the drawing-room at once. But there was the claret from bin No. 9 to be discussed first.

If Frederic Shirley, when he left Judd Street that morning, had been told by some weird person that he would meet a gentleman and two ladies riding; that he would go home with them, dine, and before half-past eight that evening (although all the parties were strangers to him except one) have fully disclosed his plans, hopes, disappointments, and prospects, Fred Shirley would have spurned the weird person from his path, as a melancholy satire on a profession to the knowledge of future events.

Yet so it was. And he told all, too, in such an honest, unaffected manner, that Mr. Williams was at one moment laughing heartily at the droll way in which Fred would describe some of his failures, and at the next sympathising so deeply with his ill fortune that he was on the point of drawing a check for some handsome sum, only he knew well enough that such a mode of assistance was utterly impracticable.

But when the claret was finished, the evening was by no means over too; there were bright eyes waiting for you, Fred Shirley, and a remark had been made, how odd it was papa would take so long after dinner. And they had talked you over, and imagined all sorts of things about your present, past, and future life; and Fanny had openly avowed that, for her part, she was quite convinced you were not reading much, and never intended going to the bar. "Not a bit of it," said Fanny; "I know a lawyer, or a future one, at first sight; there's something about their brow and eyes; and young barristers always speak to you as if you were in a witness box; they think it good practice, I fancy, to be suspicious, and ask your reasons for what you say. Oh dear, no; Mr. Shirley will never wear a wig."

"And a great pity he should, my dear, with such a nice head of hair of his own," murmured old Mrs. Williams, who was half asleep.

But when the gentlemen joined them, there was not the slightest appearance of their being expected. Mary sprang from her chair to ring for coffee, and Fanny was at the piano deeply buried in a mass of music, apparently intent on searching for some particular song. And Fred Shirley certainly made the best use of his time; he chatted with Mrs. Williams, turned over music for the young ladies, tried a bass to three or four songs, had a long confidential talk to his old friend Harry, and played three or four rubbers with papa or mamma. It was the worst thing he did that evening, for he revoked twice, and nearly invariably trumped his partner's trick; but that partner was Fanny, and that rather added to the old people's pleasure than the contrary. A nice little supper—for, though they dined at four, the Williams's were old-fashioned people, and always had supper—and the day was gone; it was over, and Fred Shirley felt that he must go. And a hearty good-bye he received from each of the family, with a warm invitation to come and see them very often, which he assured them most sincerely he fully intended to do, and left the house with a lighter step than he had for many a day. The last omnibus was gone; but he did not care for that; he rather enjoyed the idea of quietly walking home in the cool pleasant starlight, and thinking over again and again the unexpected events of the day.

May-day was numbered with its predecessors when Fred jumped into bed, and it was rather a singular coincidence that on this night, as on the preceding, he should have dreamt of those same waving ringlets.

Night and morning! 'Tis the epitome of life! Fred Shirley woke with that feeling of something on the mind which rests for some moments in an undefined shape till it resolves itself into pleasure or pain. What was it which made the difference between this morning's first consciousness and that of many preceding ones? In one flood it burst upon him, and he was broad awake.

Broad awake to a sensation of intense dissatisfaction. The impulses of the night had passed away, and the sober reflections of morning had arrived. The gloom around him was deeper from the gleam of light which had shone. "And I was simpleton enough to confess everything about myself to that unimaginative strict business-man of money who would, of course, think me first a fool for not being able to earn my daily bread, and next a greater fool for telling him, a stranger, of it. I thought I knew the world better; but Harry was most affectionate. Pooh! how could he help it in his own house? His sisters—pshaw! they had not heard my confession. And now I shall have the whole family driving through the street, to look at the place where the man lives who, living like a beggar as he is, with nothing in the wide world to do, was reading for the bar, forsooth! Inconceivable ninny that I am!"

And yet his conscience would smite him for this doubt of his friends; and so the struggle went on the whole day as he wandered about far away from Hornsey; and, wearied and worn out, he returned to his lodgings earlier than usual that evening. He ran up stairs with a beating heart, though saying to himself, "How absurd of me to suppose that he would call!" and yet eager was his glance to the table, and bitter his disappointment as no card or letter lay there.

"No one called to-day on me, of course?" asked he in a careless tone of the servant who came to light his lamp.

The girl stared at the unusual question as she answered in the negative.

"And better that no one should," muttered he; "better leave me alone and unheeded in my misery than come to look at me in it, and perhaps despise me for it. And yet, Harry Williams," he apostrophized aloud, as he paced the room rapidly, "I would have called the man a liar who had said you would cut an old friend because he was poor!"

Poor Fred Shirley! your temper and your patience were sorely tried, and your confidence in human nature must have been firm indeed not to have tottered on its base, when day after day passed by and nothing occurred otherwise than if May-day had been a dies non, and the year had leaped from April 30 to May 2.

Yes, something did occur. He was sauntering up Judd Street in the middle of the day, about the tenth of the month, when, turning round at the sound of a carriage, he caught sight of a face in it. With one bound Fred was in the nearest shop, (it was a linen-draper's,) and there he stood behind a pile of flannel, while it rolled by. It cost him a couple of yards of shoe ribbon, and the miserable reflection that the Williamses had cut him dead, without forgetting his existence, as he had seen them looking at the windows of the houses on each side. He would have changed his lodgings, but there were difficulties in the way, hinted at in the commencement of our acquaintance with him.

Thirteen days have passed, and the rays of the fourteenth of May seem struggling in vain to pierce the low clouds and drizzling mist which give warning in London of a wet day; and a letter lay waiting for Fred Shirley on his breakfast table, while Fred Shirley himself lay lingering in bed. He had no object to rise, that he knew of, and when he could sleep no longer, he took a novel from the chair by his side and began to read. To be reduced to such a proceeding as this betokens a low ebb of a man's mental resources; and he felt it at last, for he cast off his torpor and wandered to his sitting-room.

"A letter! and I have been lying like a log in bed. Post-mark, Hornsey;" and he tore open the envelope, and this was the letter:—

"MY DEAR OLD FRIEND,—You must indeed have thought us a most extraordinary race of people, and have imagined no end of strange things, from not having seen or heard of us since the day on which I fell upon you—by-the-bye, I shall never forget your jump from the gate. The fact is, I was called away suddenly on business (I'm a business man now, really, you know, Fred) the morning after we met, and only returned last evening. And here have I, while away, been soothing my filial feelings by the idea of how excellently you were taking my place, and filling the part of le bon fils in my absence; and when I come back I find you have been neither seen nor heard of. It appears you did not tell us your whereabouts in Judd Street, and my good family, not having the same confidence as myself in the wonderful-discovery powers of the Post-Office, never thought of directing to you without the number.

"Nevertheless, to do my good mother justice, she has taken the carriage through your street daily (to the astonishment of John), in the hope that she by some happy fortune might light on you." ("Confound that pile of flannel!" thought Shirley.)

"And now, my dear fellow, for a bit of seriousness. My good father, wise man that he is, has been bitten by this speculating mania, though, mind you, he is not the man to aid in any dishonourable or truckling scheme; and the consequence is that he has some considerable influence in many railway companies. Hence has come to him the offer for me of the secretaryship to a new line, which promises very well, they say—the South-West Anglian, or some such name. He won't hear of my leaving his own concern, and assures me of his immediate intention of changing the firm from 'Williams & Co.' (that Co. always puzzles me—I'll be hanged if I know who our Co. are) to Williams, Son & Co. with some material increase to my allowance. 'But,' said the dear old gentleman, 'will it do for your friend, Shirley, for a time, you know, till he is called to the bar, if he positively intends entering that profession?' By-the-bye, my sister Fanny says she has very little belief in your hard reading for the bar, and says you'll never make a lawyer. (She has just looked over me, seen this, boxed my ears, and ordered me to tear this up; but I have not time for rough copies of letters, so you must forgive her.) Therefore, my dear Fred, think it over; the salary is 250*l.* and, if the thing rises, will of course rise too. Dine with us to-morrow, and we will discuss the affair over some of bin No. 9. Till then, with kind regards from all our circle,

"Believe me,

"Ever your affectionate friend,

"HARRY WILLIAMS.

"P.S. If we don't see you at dinner I shall conclude that this never reached you, and shall commence at 6 A.M. the next morning by knocking at No. 1, Judd Street, and may hope, with fair luck, to drop on you at breakfast time, about 9. Rather Irish, my postscript, I'm afraid.—H. W."

Reader, you must have been in Fred Shirley's condition previously to have appreciated this letter as he did. He did dine at Springfield Lodge, and the result of the discussion was, he commenced his duties on the following day, and during the next week wrote innumerable letters, all signed "Frederic Shirley, S. S. W. A. R. C." Secretary of the South-West-Anglian Railway Company.

The company prospered, and Fred prospered with it; it was just the work which suited him. He made an admirable secretary, and had the satisfaction not long after of placing Mrs. Williams within four yards of royalty, when, in company with the Chairman and Vice Chairman he conducted Her Most Gracious Majesty to the "magnificent carriage constructed for her special use," and of which the curious may no doubt find an exact representation in one of the back numbers of the "Illustrated News."

Five years have winged their flight away, and it is again May-day, just such a bright joyous one as the first we told of. In one of the streets near the Foundling, a very neat little phaeton, with a pair of ponies, is standing at the door of a house where there was a certain evening party five years back; but the house has apparently changed tenants, for there is a brass plate on the door, with "Mr. Shirley" on it. A gentleman was standing in the drawing-room—the drawing-room where the light shone so brightly on that May early morning. A lady, a very pretty one, enters, with long waving ringlets, and behind her follows a nurse with something mysteriously enveloped and hidden in shawls in her arms, which we may presume to be a baby.

"Why, Fanny dear," said the gentleman, "are you going to take baby?"

"Going to take baby, Fred? Why, what are you thinking of, silly man? What would darling do without mamma all day, and what would grandpapa say if we left his boy behind? But, of course, Freddy, love, if you have any particular objection to Springfield Lodge on May-day, and would not wish your son to —"

There was a wicked little meaning smile on the pretty mouth, so the husband lovingly chased it away with a kiss.

* * * * *

And this, reader, is what came of Fred Shirley's May-day.

LINES.

BY L. A. H.

"Give true hearts but hearth and sky,
And some flowers to bloom and die."

"In thee and in this quiet mead
The lesson of sweet peace I read,
Rather in all to be resign'd than blest."

KEBLE.

THERE is a calm November day,
When Heaven is veild in softest grey,
That to a thoughtful spirit seems
More soothing than June's brightest beams.

Still mingle on the wood's dark screen
Autumn's bright tints with faded green,
But not a wintry breath is there,
To chill the mild and balmy air.

'Tis peace on such a day to stand,
And gaze upon the quiet land,
Or listen in the stillness round,
To catch each low and distant sound:

Some note from village, farm, or fold,
A winding horn, a church-bell toll'd;
Or clear and sweet from some near brake
A lonely bird its music make.

And then to wander far and free,
O'er the wide heath and grassy len,
To find, or give, a magic power,
To simplest form of tree and flower.

Soft lights, sweet sounds unmark'd before
When Summer spread her dazzling store,
Have now a power to charm and bless
That fills the heart with thankfulness.

'Tis like old age in peace declining,
Content its summer joys resigning;
'Tis like the smile that "sickness wears,"
That gleams through sorrow's patient tears.

Oh, had we God's good works alone
That we could love and call our own,
Though friends forsake us, foes oppress,
He has not left us comfortless.

His hand around, beneath, above,
Has traced its characters of love,
Alike in storm, in sun, in shower,
We see His mercy and His power.

For every mood of every mind
Some sympathetic chord we find,
Some whisper of the "still, small voice,"
That bids us worship and rejoice!

A WINTER'S DRIVE TO BEAULIEU ABBEY.

BY E. O.

THE winter's morning was bright and inspiring, and as we stood round a blazing wood fire after breakfast, to decide on which of the plans proposed during that cheerful meal was most worthy of being carried into immediate execution, our hostess suggested that I had yet to visit Beaulieu Abbey before I left Hampshire.

"Oh! but summer is the time to see it!" was the general exclamation.

"Yes; a picnic when the trees are all in leaf, and you can stroll about the ruins, and sit upon the grass, is delightful!" cried one.

"And then the sail down the river would be so beautiful, with Clara's guitar to cheer us, if we happened to be becalmed, as is usually the case on such occasions."

"But then," sensibly observed Clara herself, breaking in upon this pleasant dream of green shades and summer trees, "there is no chance that Miss Damer will be with us."

"No, indeed," I added, "long before the orthodox time for a visit to Beaulieu Abbey arrives, I shall be far away in the north; so pray let me enjoy a drive there while I may."

And finally it was settled that Clara should drive me there that very afternoon in the pony carriage, and that we should boldly defy cold blasts upon the heath, bad roads through the forest, and damp grass round the ruins, so that we might fully satisfy our wish to investigate together all that now remains of this famous monastic structure, the account of which forms an epitome of some of the most interesting parts of English history. This point was no sooner arranged, than Clara, with her bright young face beaming with pleasure, brought down from its place in the library a large, old-fashioned looking book, entitled, "Warner's Collections for a History of Hampshire:" it was the first volume of a work now become somewhat rare, as well as expensive; and we turned with great interest to the accounts of the Monastery which it contained; they were selected from a great variety of writers, Matthew Paris, Browne Willis's Mitred Abbies, The Monasticon, Lord Verulam's History, &c., and occupied us very pleasantly for some time; but when we actually set off, we were more intent on the peculiar characteristics of the scenery through which we passed, than on the records we had read.

Our way lay through the pretty village of Eling, with its grey church-tower crowning the steep hill, and its shaded churchyard sloping down to the edge of the Southampton Water; past the beautiful church lately built at Marchwood, in the revived Gothic taste of the present day; then round the park of its munificent founder, out upon the heath, a wide tract of forest land, with here and there one stunted tree left, bent by the sea wind, against which its gnarled branches had made so valiant a stand, but still serving as a landmark through the waste. The clouds hung over us, not like a leaden canopy, but broken by patches of blue sky, and softened into every shade of grey; the light fell through them in broad beams, as from a hidden glory, and touched the distant undulating lines of the New Forest, bringing out each feature of the landscape in rapid succession. We stopped at the end of the first four or five miles to look at the town of Southampton, on the opposite shore, with its pier, and quays, and shipping, and the long line of the High Street, marked chiefly by smoke: before us were the blue hills of the Isle of Wight;—to the right was the forest; and where was Beaulieu? Sheltered by hill and wood, far out of sight, nestled down by its own quiet river, and surrounded by its own secluded beauties. We ought, by rights, to have been thinking of the days of King John, who founded the abbey in 1204, and brought thirty monks from Cisteria to inhabit it; but we actually were thinking and talking of the heather of Scotland, and of the wild heaths of Denmark, with their wandering tribes of gipsies, and of the green lanes of Bedfordshire, which seem expressly intended for gipsy encampments. We were the more strongly reminded of this picturesque people, by the broad margins of the lane down which we descended towards Beaulieu; the trees threw their wide-spreading branches over them, affording still the beauties of chequered shade upon the grass; for all the varied hues of summer, there were the glossy leaves and berries of the holly, the spotted bark of the young birch, and here and there the living gold of the furze, which was just coming into bloom; and everywhere the hoary lichens, and the fresh green moss, and the tall fern, supplied in their degree the place of flower and leaf, and suggested visions of warm sunny days that had been, and should be again: and so the scene we had come nine miles to visit stole gradually upon us, in its natural loveliness, before we well knew where we were. The Beaulieu river is an arm of the sea, and therefore much depends on the tide, which fortunately for us was quite high, and washing up almost to the foot of the old walls, leaving only the road between itself and them. Giving the pony in charge to the servant, who was to take it across the bridge, to the little town that stands at the head of the river, we eagerly turned our steps towards the church, sending only for the key. We were informed that the clerk was out, but that a neighbour "kept he," and we were not sorry to dispense with the services of the rustic cicerone. Never was a fairer spot chosen for a monastic retreat! In front is a lake-like reach of the river, surrounded by hanging woods, through which are glimpses, every now and then, of smiling meadows; on either hand rise gentle slopes, and the New Forest forms the back-ground. To the right is the Abbot's house, looking much as it did in the time of Thomas Stephens, the last abbot, who surrendered the abbey and its rich possessions to Henry VIII., in the 29th year of his reign; it then became the family residence of the grantee, Thomas Wriothsley, unto whom "the king granted all that manor of Beaulieu, with its rights, members, and appurtenances (the rectory of the parish church, and the right of patronage, alone excepted), in as full and ample a manner as any abbot thereof, before it came into the hands of the king, held and enjoyed the same." There it stands, with its broad green moat, its terraced garden, and avenue of beech trees: even the canopied niche over the doorway is left entire, though the image of the Blessed Virgin, to whom the abbey was dedicated, has long been withdrawn from it. As we entered the inclosure, the clock over the fine old gateway struck four, and the tremulous sound was in itself a token of age, and harmonized well with the surrounding scene of past magnificence, and of "calm decay." Three hundred years have gone by, since "the great arched chamber" accommodated the abbot's guests, or re-echoed to the song of the minstrel, and to the merriment of jests and mummeries; but the house is kept in habitable order, as it is still from time to time the residence of the Duke of Buccleugh, to whom it now belongs. The estate itself is twenty-eight miles in circumference, and enclosed within a ring fence; it is finely wooded, with large and valuable timber, and yields a considerable income: it is no marvel that its possessors should now and then exchange their splendid abodes for this sylvan solitude. The abbey walls, which may be traced throughout the greatest part of their extent, though thickly mantled with ivy, are still in many places almost entire; they enclose an area of sixteen or seventeen acres, finely wooded and watered, which is full of the foundations of ruined buildings. About three miles to the south-west are the ruins of a chapel, and those also of an immense barn, built chiefly of stone. These we had no time to visit, nor yet the more interesting spot from which the monks brought their supply of spring water; well provided, as one might have supposed them to be, with that element, nearer home. At the distance of half a mile, in an almost inaccessible nook of a deep wood, is "a cove" formed of smooth stones, which shelters a copious and transparent spring: the little building measures seven feet by ten, and is five in height, and the water rushes from the entrance into a small dell, where it was formerly received by a chain of stone pipes, and thus conveyed to the abbey. Long, however, we lingered in the church, and round the cloisters. The sun shone out while we were there in fuller brightness, and a thrush sang as merrily from the leafless boughs as if spring were come in good earnest.

The site of the ancient church can now only be traced by the remains of the graves that were made in and around it: the present one was formerly the refectory, or "the abbot's dining hall;" and if the reveries in which we might, perhaps, have indulged, had it not been for our morning studies, were dispelled by remembering its original destination, there was still enough of interest connected with it, to enable us to conjure up a vivid picture of the scene which it once presented.

A note I had copied from the above-mentioned work by Warner ran thus:—"The ancient and sayre parish Church of Bello Loco Regis, alias Bewley in the county of Southampton, being destroyed with the Abbey wherein it stood; at the south side of the said old church's foundations stands the new parish church, southe and northe, having been the Abbot's dyning-hall. On the west side of the same is an ancient Pulpette which stands in the hall, leading up to it; which was the place wherein the Abbott's Bible-clarke did exercise his function, and is situate over against the new pulpette and reading-place but higher upp. This Church is a spacious room, the walls of stone, the roof of timber and covered with slates, but ruinous; it hath no steeple, and but one small bell hunge in a small wooden frame at the north end of the Church, in a square part thereof." This note, taken from a MS. in the Harleian collection, bore the date of 1648; and, but for the ruinous condition it describes, is still a correct account of the building; happily, however, it was restored in excellent taste about eight years ago, so that while every trace of antiquity has been carefully preserved, it is now in admirable order. The roof is flat, and of carved oak, and the windows are remarkable for the delicacy of their mouldings, and afford a fine specimen of the early English style. We ascended by steps, worn by many a foot, and many a century, to the large stone pulpit, (or, as it is commonly called, "The Martin's Nest,") through a narrow gallery opening with five graceful arches on the church; they are curiously arched and ribbed overhead; and the ancient rostrum itself is of a demi-octagonal form, with a vaulted roof, and a good window, filled with modern stained glass. Here, then, while the monks sat at their meal, keeping (according to the rule) "their hands upon the table, their ears with the Reader, and their hearts with God," did the abbot's clerk entertain their mental faculties, with "history, read in a sonorous voice, or homilies and sermons, in a more gentle and engaging one." He was enjoined to stand before his book, with his face turned towards the east. When the brethren bowed at the Gloria Patri and the Lord's Prayer, he also was to incline himself, turning his face towards the assembly; and by no means to seat himself till the head of the Convent was seated.

The most beautiful remains of this once splendid abbey are found round the space occupied by the cloisters; the mouldings of the great western gateway, its clustered pillars, rich capitals, and highly finished arch, attest the ancient magnificence of a pile remarkable not only for its extent, but also for having been finished in the highest style of the architecture of the 13th century. The ground behind these ruins rises in park-like slopes, adorned by trees of stately growth, towards the edge of the forest; at some distance from them is a lovely little lake, with a floating island; and nearer to the church, stand upon the smooth turf the two high gabled ends of a building, which was once imagined to have been the Abbey-church. It appears probable that they formed part of the apartment in which the monks manufactured their wine; there is a bank running from them in a northerly direction for about seventy yards, which has been found to be a ruinous aqueduct, communicating with a spring at a small distance from the building: and that wine was made in England from the time of the Saxon kings, there is abundant evidence; but the clearest proof of its having been enjoyed in tolerable perfection by the recluses of Beaulieu, lies in the fact of some warm and sheltered fields near the abbey still retaining the name of "The Vineyards." Brandy was made from the vines growing there, a hundred years ago.

The fish-ponds, which were of yet more importance to the comfort of the establishment, remain in good preservation, and abound with excellent fish. In short, a more desirable residence for men severed from the world and its ties, could scarcely have been found throughout the whole realm of Old England. The reasons which induced so tyrannical and godless a monarch as John to found this noble abbey must remain wholly unknown to us, unless we choose to adopt the following version of this part of his history, in the Monasticon:—

"In the sixth year of the reign of King John, that king built a certain monastery of the Cistercian order in England, and named it Beaulieu; and this was the cause of his building it:—The king being beyond measure, though without cause, enraged at the Abbots and Monks of the Cistercian order, after various oppressive measures, summoned the heads of the order to a parliament which he held at Lincoln. They obeyed the summons, flattering themselves that he now at last relented, and would confer on them some marks of his grace; but instead of this, as soon as he beheld them, the savage monarch ordered the Abbots to be trodden to death by horses. None of his attendants, however, being found sufficiently cruel to obey the bloody command, the ecclesiastics, dreadfully alarmed, and despairing of any favour from John, retired to their inn. In the course of the ensuing night, when the monarch slumbered on his bed, he dreamed that he was led before a judge, around whom the Cistercian Abbots were standing; which judge commanded the Monks to stripe the back of the King with rods and thongs; a beating of which he declared he felt the effects when he awoke the next morning. This dream he related to a certain ecclesiastic of his court; the priest assured him that the Almighty had been above measure kind and merciful to him, who had thought fit to afford this paternal correction in the present life, and to reveal to him the mysteries of His dispensation. He therefore advised John to send immediately for the Abbots, whom he had hitherto cruelly treated; and humbly to crave pardon of them for his barbarous conduct. The King, adopting this counsel, ordered the Abbots instantly to attend him; a message which they received with fear and trembling, thinking they should now certainly be banished from the kingdom. God, however, who will never forsake His servants, had ordered things otherwise. And the king, instead of venting his indignation upon them, as they feared, received them with kindness and complacency." Shortly after this event, John granted a charter for the foundation of Beaulieu Abbey; endowing it with a large tract of country in the neighbourhood; together with the manors of Great and Little Farendon, Great and Little Cokeswell, the villages of Schulton and Inglesham, the churches of the same places, and the chapel of Cokeswell, and part of the village of Langeford, all in Berkshire. No less than forty years elapsed, however, from the time of foundation, to the completion and dedication of Beaulieu Abbey. This ceremony took place in the year 1246 on the Festival of St. John the Baptist; King Henry III. and his Queen, Richard, Earl of Cornwall, his brother, several prelates, and a long retinue of nobility, being present on the occasion.

Among the privileges which papal power had conferred on this monastery, was that questionable one of the Sanctuary; or of affording, within the hallowed precincts of its church, protection to such persons as fled from the arm of justice, or the avenger of blood.

Hither came the lion-hearted Margaret of Anjou, with her princely boy, when, on landing at Weymouth, she found the Earl of Warwick dead, her husband a captive, and Edward IV. upon the throne of England. It was within the sanctuary of Beaulieu that she first gave way to womanly tears and despondency, and remained for a time unnerved by her many sorrows; until, roused by the presence of the Earl of Devon, she resumed her wonted equanimity and prepared for fresh exertions.

Perkin Warbeck also, the reputed son of her mortal foe, sought shelter here. After a check received by his little army before the gates of Exeter, he was seized by a sudden panic, which was increased by the report of the preparations made against him by Henry VII.; and he fled during the night, accompanied only by a few friends, and never relaxed his speed till he reached Beaulieu sanctuary. Within its walls he was safe from violence; but Lord Daubeney, investing the place with three hundred men, precluded all hope of escape from them, and he was at length induced by the promises of the king to surrender himself into his hands. He was lodged in the Tower after making a full confession of his imposture, from whence he was only removed to the place of execution, in 1499.

These, and many other recollections connected with the abbey in the days of its splendour, and in those also when its last monks went forth from its cloisters, poor pensioners on the bounty of their spoiler—came into our minds, as we wandered about the ruins, and drove home over the long tract of heath and forest by which they are surrounded. The moon shone bright on Eling church, with the old-fashioned avenue of cleft elm-trees, and on the high-peaked gables of the neighbouring farm-house, as we again passed by; the broad expanse of the river lay in her light like an antique silver mirror set in a dark filigree of leafless wood; brightly too she shone through the fir-trees, and on shrubbery and lawn, as we approached the hospitable house to which we were bound; but none the less welcome for all her cold radiance, was the sight that presented itself as the hall doors flew open, and disclosed the blazing fires and glowing lamps within, and a party of merry children assembled to act charades. And so ended our drive to Beaulieu Abbey on the 12th of February, 1848.

BIOGRAPHY OF THOMAS CHALMERS.

BY JOHN LEAF.

THE lives of eminent and distinguished men are commonly admitted to be interesting. There is a natural disposition in mankind which inclines them to seek to become acquainted with the doings, endeavourings, and circumstances of all persons who have in any way become objects of popular renown. As a rational satisfaction for such a curiosity, the practice of publishing written memoirs or biographies of noted individuals appears to have been originally and principally intended; and it must be admitted that the world is rarely disposed to be unthankful for any contributions of the kind, from whomsoever they may happen to proceed. It may accordingly be presumed, that the present memorials of Dr. Chalmers, furnished by his son-in-law, will be at least acceptable to a considerable class of readers. Though a clumsy and most unelaborate performance, the volume here before us, which is apparently designed to be the first of three similar fabrications, contains certain passages of interest; and though utterly inartistic, and in nearly all respects imperfect, the work may be nevertheless considered to have an unquestionable value as a collection of biographical materials. The author or editor is indeed no architect or ingenious literary builder, but he is competent enough to carry bricks, and may have a share of praise awarded him as what the Germans are apt to call a literary "hodman." The particulars which he has amassed, or may hereafter bring together, may serve, perhaps, eventually for the construction of a sufficient and appropriate biography. It is obvious that nothing of this sort ought to be attempted or could possibly be accomplished within the limits open to us in the present magazine, even did we pretend to be qualified for such an enterprise. Inasmuch, however, as it is conceived that certain readers will probably be glad to learn a few particulars respecting the outward and inward history of so notable a man as Chalmers, it is proposed to present here such an outline and general picture of his life, as we, with our limited ability and too contracted space, may be able to shape out of the matter now before us. Whosoever, therefore, may be disposed to read, let him patiently proceed with us as follows.

Thomas Chalmers was the son of Mr. John Chalmers, who on the 17th of March, 1780, (the day of the boy's birth,) had been for some years settled as a dyer, ship-owner, and general merchant, in the town of Anstruther, one of a number of small boroughs clustered together on the south-eastern coast of the county of Fife. Mr. Chalmers and Elizabeth his wife were ultimately the parents of a "crowded household" of fourteen children, of whom Thomas was the sixth. He is said to have gone to school "of his own accord, when only three years of age; not drawn by his love of learning, but driven by the fear of domestic persecution;" for a certain abominable old nurse (worthy of initiation into the mysteries of witchcraft), to whose care he had been committed, treated him with a most severe and inhuman cruelty. His schoolmaster was the parish dominie, a certain Mr. Bryce, who "had a fair enough reputation as a Latin scholar," and an excessive celebrity for "flogging." In Chalmers's time his days as an effective teacher had gone by, he being at that time nearly blind, though his "thirst for flogging" was nowise in decline. Eager in the pursuit of all delinquents, "the sightless tyrant used to creep stealthily along behind a row of his little victims, listening for each indication given by word or motion of punishable offence, and ready, soon as ever the centre of emanation was settled, to inflict the avenging blow." But the quicker witted urchins were frequently too cunning for him, and concerted such a plan as was calculated signally to disconcert the enemy. "In the row opposite to that behind which the master took his furtive walk, one of the boys was set to watch, and whenever, by sudden stop or uplifted arm, any token of the intention to strike appeared, a preconcerted sign given quickly to the intended victim enabled him to step at once, but noiselessly, out of his place, so that, to Mr. Bryce's enraged discomfiture, and to the no small amusement of his scholars, his best aimed blows fell not unfrequently upon the hard unflinching desk," where of course they inflicted no particular harm. Ultimately, the worthy dominie "furnished himself with an assistant," a Mr. Daniel Ramsay, who in his treatment to the pupils "was as easy as his superior was harsh." As teachers they are reported to have been equally inefficient; so that of course young Chalmers profited little under their united discipline.

By those of his school-fellows who survived him, Chalmers is remembered as "one of the idlest, strongest, merriest, and most generous-hearted boys in Anstruther school." Careless about lessons, which he could learn well enough when he set himself to do so, he was often in disgrace for shameful negligence in that department; but though frequently consigned to ignominious durance in the "coal-hole," he was rarely long in gaining his liberation, by a rapid and successful discharge of his neglected duties. In the playground, and in the streets of old Anstruther, he was a very prince of frolic. Wheresoever any kind of fun was going forward there was Tom Chalmers sure to be found. He is said, however, to have been altogether unmischievous in his mirth, and always displayed a fixed repugnancy to falsehood or the use of "naughty words." He employed his superior strength in defence of the weak or injured, who accordingly looked to him as their natural protector; and whenever in its heated overflow play passed into passion, he hastened from the ungenial region, to avoid unpleasant consequences. Once when he was assailed by a hostile party with "a whole storm of mussel-shell," he fled into a neighbouring house, declaring as he sheltered himself, "I'm no' for powder and ball," a saying which the good old woman who gave him refuge was wont, in later years, to quote in his behalf, when less friendly neighbours were charging him with being "a man of strife."

Father and mother Chalmers were devout and worthy people. Regularly every Sunday they went at the head of a family procession to the kirk, and at home were daily mindful of pious and christian exercises. Sitting in the congregation of Anstruther, Tom, at a very early period, thought how fine a thing it would be could he some day become a "minister." Not to be wanting in timely preparation, he set up a private pulpit, and preached to all that would please to listen. The sister of one of his school-fellows still remembers breaking into a room, to which her brother and the future orator had retired, and finding Tom (then a very little boy) standing grandly upon a chair, and holding forth most vigorously to his single auditor. The considerate parents, taking thought of it, resolved to give encouragement to the boy's apparent tendency.

Accordingly, in November 1791, while not yet twelve years of age, he was enrolled with an elder brother as a student in the United College of St. Andrews. A letter written during the summer which succeeded his first session is still preserved—the earliest extant specimen of his writing—and "abounds in errors both in orthography and grammar," proving abundantly that "the work of learning to write his own tongue with ordinary correctness had still to be begun." His knowledge of Latin was equally imperfect—"unsuited him during his first two sessions to profit as he might otherwise have done from the prelections of that distinguished philosophical grammarian, Dr. Hunter, who was then the chief ornament of St. Andrew's University." His third session at college, however, which commenced in 1793, has been described as Thomas's "intellectual birth-time." "That intelligence which never afterwards knew a season of slumbering inactivity then awoke. That extreme ardour of impulse, and that strong force of will, which had shown themselves from infancy, took now a new direction, urging on and upholding him in his mathematical studies." Chalmers became excited and absorbed in the study of geometry. He was ably assisted by a very excellent teacher, who was some time after known as Dr. James Brown, Professor of Natural Philosophy in Glasgow. Of all his living instructors, Chalmers said as lately as 1833, that he ever reckoned Dr. Brown as first, then Professor Robison of Edinburgh, and lastly Dr. Hunter of St. Andrews, "as far the most influential, both in the formation of his taste and intellectual habits."

In November 1795, he was entered as a student of divinity. "Theology, however, occupied but little of his thoughts." Having during the preceding autumn learned enough of the French language to be able to read it "fluently and intelligently," he preferred to spend his time in perusing works on the higher branches of mathematics in that tongue. The present "venerable minister of Kilsyth," who entered the Divinity Hall along with him, says that Chalmers had got the notion strongly into his mind that the orthodoxy of the divinity lecturer was "formed in conformity to the standards, rather than as the truth most surely believed." It seems the professor had sometime expressed an opinion that "Calvinism should not be too broadly brought forward in the pulpit addresses, lest it should be repulsive." Tom could not see the sense of this. "If it be truth," said he, "why not be above-board with it?" On it being remarked that the professor had one day delivered "a really masterly defence of one of the deepest points of Calvinistic doctrine, upon the scheme of Jonathan Edwards," the party speaking of the matter was much surprised when Chalmers said, "I was not paying attention to it, but thinking of something else," probably, as the venerable minister of Kilsyth inclines to think, "following out some mathematical problem." "But why, Thomas, did you not attend to so able a disquisition?" "Because," was the abrupt reply, "I question the sincerity of the lecturer."

Here is a lad evidently who designs to think a little for himself, and in some sort can see what is really worth respecting. What's the good of all these fine-spun logic-webs in defence of the "scheme of Jonathan Edwards," if the poor logician be uninspired by any principle of lively virtue? One would "rather be a kitten and cry mew," than spend one's time in heeding such empty declamations. So, apparently, thinks Thomas Chalmers, with the healthy natural instinct of a stripling of fifteen. He seems to have given an early attention to the writings of William Godwin, and to have embraced several of his peculiar and ardent views. Subsequently, "he studied Edwards on Free Will with such ardour that he could scarcely talk of anything else;" and some of his acquaintances were indeed "afraid of his mind losing its balance." Edwards's Theory of Necessity fell in with the reasonings of his earlier favourite Godwin, and he entirely embraced it as the system of his metaphysical faith. He spent nearly a twelvemonth in what he afterwards called a sort of intellectual elysium; and "the one idea," says he, "which ministered to my soul all its rapture was the magnificence of the Godhead, and the universal subordination of all things to the one great purpose for which He evolved and was supporting the creation."

This mental fever, however, gradually gave way to a less elevated state of feeling. In three years' time he has nearly done with college, and is standing at the threshold of the world, looking out for fortune. During his preceding winters of attendance at St. Andrews, the family at Anstruther had been rapidly increasing; and therefore, not to be more of a burden to his father than was necessary, Thomas resolved to seek some kind of temporary employment, whereby to sustain himself until such time as he should be old enough for ordination. Seven sessions at college had been passed; and during the eighth, a three months' instead of a six months' residence was held to be sufficient. Having got provided with a situation as a family tutor, he left home in May 1798, to enter upon the duties of his engagement.

The day of his departure was naturally one of some emotion in the parental household. The whole family turned out in tears to see him start. His luggage being already despatched before him, he was to travel after it on horseback to the ferry at Dundee. Taking a tender farewell look at all before him, he turned to mount his horse, which was waiting at the door. He turned and mounted—when lo! the whole tearful tendency of the assembled family was suddenly dispersed, and first there ran a universal titter, and at last, a downright general roar of laughter, at the horseman's particular expense; for Tom, in his deep emotion, had mounted with his face to the horse's tail! Blessed be the powers of laughter! Instead of going away under a heavy shower of tears, he rode off under peals of merriment, in which he himself joined gladly; and thus he journeys forth from old Anstruther, not to be seen again for many days.

The tutorship afforded him an intelligible taste of purgatory. "The people of the house don't seem to know the place in which a tutor ought to stand; hence," says Tom, "a cold, distant, contemptuous reserve, to which I never was accustomed, and which exposes me to feelings extremely disagreeable." He strives to possess his soul in patience, but finds he cannot do it. It is beyond the power of mortal self-respect to brook the marked indignity whereof he is constantly the object. The proud, conceited laird (or whatever he might be), with his fussy vanities and pompousness—the pampered quality-puppyism of all the lairdlings, (nine of them in number)—the haughty, intolerant indifference of the laird's guid wife—the insolent superciliousness of the flunkies, who never fail to show their consciousness of a tutor's inferiority—all together make up a complication of detestable annoyances, such as the flesh and blood unsanctified of an honest, intelligent youth of eighteen years of age cannot find in him to put up with. It being impossible to be upon a good understanding with people who did not properly respect his position, or appreciate his services, he resolved to act towards them, on his own part, with something of decided "dignity and effect." He tried remonstrances, but remonstrances were utterly in vain. A very palpable indignity, and one which irritated him exceedingly, was the circumstance that, on all occasions when there was any company in the house, he was excluded from the supper-table, and had a cheerless repast served to him in his own room. Against this he at length determined to have a remedy. Having picked up some few acquaintances in the neighbourhood, he made a point of inviting some of them to supper at an inn, at his own expense, whenever he knew there was going to be a supper in the house, to which he would not be admitted. To make his purpose the more manifest, he always waited till the servant entered with his solitary meal, and then ordered it away with something of an emphasis, saying, "I shall sup elsewhere to-night." These "curiously-timed tutorship suppers" were not long in coming to the knowledge of the governor, who, with magnificent disapprobation, charged the tutor with unseemly and unreasonable pride. "Sir," said he, "the very servants are complaining of your haughtiness. You have too much pride by far." "There are two kinds of pride, sir," retorted Chalmers. "There's a pride which lords it over dependants and inferiors; and there's another pride, which rejoices in repressing the insolence of superiors: the first I have none of—the second I am inclined to glory in." After this, there was not likely to follow any reconciliation that could be safely considered lasting. At the end of the year, Chalmers shook the dust from off his feet, and joyfully turned him homewards.

Pleasant, as we imagine, were the greetings which awaited him, under the old familiar roof-tree. Sweet, inexpressibly consoling, during that old Christmas season of 1798, were the words and looks of kindness from friends and kindred, to the harassed and exasperated spirit which could say, that throughout the foregone year, it had not known the meaning of enjoyment. After a brief respite of precious rest, however, he has to get ready for examination before St. Andrew's Presbytery, preparatory to the obtaining of a "licence to preach the gospel." As he had not yet completed his nineteenth year of age, some difficulties were raised against his immediate admission to the ministry. Presbyteries were not wont to admit students into probation till they had attained the age of twenty-one. Under the circumstances, one of his friends luckily brought forward an old statute of the church, which ordains, "That none be admitted to the ministry before they be twenty-five years of age, except such as for rare and singular qualities shall be judged by the General and Provincial Assembly to be meet and thereof worthy;"—and under cover of the terminating clause, it was pleaded for Mr. Chalmers that his reception would be justified on the ground that he was "a lad o' pregnant parts." Accordingly, after the customary formalities, he was licensed on the 31st July, 1799.

"No strong desire," says Dr. Hanna, "was shown to exercise the privilege thus conferred." The newly appointed preacher set out to visit a brother then residing at Liverpool. On the 21st August he writes to inform his father, that he and his brother design going on the following Saturday to Wigan, "where," said he, "I intend to make my first public exhibition in Mr. Dinwiddie's pulpit." The place of exhibition was "Chapel Lane Chapel, or the Scotch Church,"—a place of worship still standing in Wigan. Here, on the Sabbath day, 25th August, 1799, did the since so celebrated Thomas Chalmers preach his first public sermon, with what acceptance the present writer knoweth not.

In the course of the next winter, we find him hunting about Edinburgh, in quest of a situation, and meanwhile prosecuting his mathematical studies under Professor Playfair, at the University. He had a notion of employing himself in the capacity of a private teacher, but informs a friend that he had "been much disappointed in the article of pupils." He remained in Edinburgh, however, for that and the succeeding session, studying, amongst other things, Natural and Moral Philosophy, under Professors Robison and Dugald Stewart. With respect to the latter, Chalmers gave proof of his natural independence of mind, and also of a considerable scientific penetration. At a time when Stewart's fame was at its height, and when he was considered universally in Scotland as the "very prince of metaphysicians," the young country student of twenty-one had the boldness to write of him as follows: "I attend his lectures regularly, and I must confess I have been rather disappointed. I never heard a single discussion of Mr. Stewart's which made up one masterly and comprehensive whole. His lectures seem to be made up of detached hints and incomplete outlines, and he almost uniformly avoids every subject which involves any difficult discussion. I have acquired from him, however, a much clearer idea than I ever had of the distinctive character of Reid's philosophy. I think it tends to a useless multiplication of principles, and shrinks even from an appearance of simplicity."

Visits to Liverpool and Teviotdale, and a brief engagement as an assistant preacher in a parish in Roxburghshire, take up the time till November, 1802; when Chalmers got appointed to the living of Kilmany, a village lying in a sequestered valley behind a low range of hills, which, in looking from Dundee, across the Frith of Tay, "is seen to run from east to west along the Fifeshire coast." He had a short time previously been engaged as an assistant mathematical teacher in the college of St. Andrews, and throughout the session, devoted himself steadily to the conduct of his classes. His method of teaching, however, which diversified mathematical instructions with frequent vehement appeals to the moral sense and imagination of the students, was rather jealously regarded by the authorities, and eventually led to his dismissal from the assistantship, as well as to other consequences, which will presently be mentioned.

On the 12th May, 1803, Chalmers was ordained as minister of his parish, by the Presbytery of Cupar, and was mainly engaged throughout the summer in getting his manse in order, and in extending his acquaintance with his new parishioners. He had calculated on retaining the mathematical assistantship in conjunction with his living, and might perhaps have not been hindered, had his college prelections of the previous session been properly appreciated. As it was, he received an intimation that his services would not be required further, and to justify this summary dismissal, his inefficiency as a teacher was made the pretext—an allegation obviously calculated to damage his fair fame, and to blast all the prospects he might entertain of academical distinction.

But now, shall a man who believes himself to have ably and effectually fulfilled his duty, sit quietly down under so gross an imputation? Not, certainly, a man of mettle, like our Thomas Chalmers. Let the prosy heads of old St. Andrew's see to it, lest their soft customary repose be somewhat singularly interrupted. To clear his impeached reputation from the reproach which had been cast upon it, Chalmers resolved to open in St. Andrew's, mathematical classes of his own, rivals to those of the University! "The professors met in hurried consultation,—the students were agitated and divided—the hearts of many siding with the youthful devotee, who came to redeem his scientific honour. The general public, dependent either for actual subsistence, or for all social fellowship, upon the colleges, looked with wonder at the sight of an open and declared rivalry establishing itself within the very shadow of the University."

On the first of November, Chalmers delivered his introductory lecture to a tolerable concourse of such of the students as were sufficiently independent of their colleges to brave the displeasure of Professors. All winter long he lectures with ability and zeal, gathering, as he proceeds, more and more encouragement. In addition to mathematics, he announces his intention of also teaching chemistry; and on the 19th of December, delivers the first of a course of lectures "to a full and respectable audience." Considerable is the noise and conversation thereupon, throughout the town; many declare that this Quixotical professor—elevated to professorship by mere personal election—must certainly be utterly inefficient to teach chemistry, since perfection in that science is work for a man's lifetime, and the present lecturer is but a newly-ordained parson, of the age of twenty-three. Nevertheless, success attends his efforts: he can, at least, make the science eminently interesting; and by the 6th of February is able to record it in his journal, that, "Dr. Brown tells me that all over the town the impression is most decidedly in favour of me, and of my chemistry."

So far, therefore, matters are not amiss. He seems to have succeeded pretty satisfactorily in demonstrating to an enlightened public that he is not so incompetent a fellow as those envious old professors had represented him to be. The tide of opposition began gradually to subside, and another tide of popular applause arose and flowed up to the shores of his position. At last the very professors themselves gave in, and acknowledged, in corroboration of his friend's former testimony, that beyond all questioning, this Chalmers was a bold chiel, and also, to all appearance, "a lad o' pregnant pairs."

But while the day is thus brightening in the direction of St. Andrew's, there is a dark cloud gathering up behind him at Kilmany. Some of the ministers of his Presbytery, thinking his recent turbulent way of life not sufficiently in keeping with the calling of a priest, resolved to bring his conduct before the provincial synod, and get, if possible, an ecclesiastical extinguisher put upon his eccentricities. When the discussion was introduced, however, in May 1804, it met with the fate which it deserved, being, as Chalmers said, "quashed and reprobated." Still, the business was not allowed to rest. As the chemical lectures had been highly relished, Chalmers had been requested to repeat them during the next winter session, at St. Andrew's, and had readily consented to do so. But, meanwhile, at a meeting of the Presbytery of Cupar, on the 4th of September, one Dr. Martin, apparently a very strait-laced Presbyter, "begged the Presbytery to insert in their minutes that, in his opinion, Mr. Chalmers' giving lectures in chemistry is improper and ought to be discontinued:"—a request to which the presbytery acceded; whereupon Mr. Chalmers also "begged it to be inserted in the minutes, that after the punctual discharge of his professional duties, his time was his own; and he conceived that no man or court had a right to control him in the distribution of it." Chalmers, moreover, made a speech, in which he quite indignantly protested against all such stupid interferences, and defied the objector to find a single person who could substantiate the charge of negligence in regard to any of his proper duties. "I will defy him," said he, "to find a single individual who will say that I have been outstripped by any of my predecessors in the regularity of my ministerial attentions, or who will say that he has discovered anything in my conduct which betokened a contempt for religion or indifference to its sacred interests. What more will the gentleman require of me? Has he any right to control me in the distribution of my spare time? I maintain he has none. I spurn at the attempt as I would at the petty insolence of a tyrant; I reject it as the interference of an officious intermeddler. To the last sigh of my heart I will struggle for independence, and eye with proud disdain the man who presumes to invade it." Evidently the Presbytery is not constituted which will be able to manage such a man. With a magnificent unconcern for consequences, Chalmers resumed the chemical lectures at St. Andrew's in November.

About this time, Dr. Rotheram, the Professor of Natural Philosophy in St. Andrew's University, fell into his last sleep, and left his vacant chair to the occupation of anybody who might chance to be elected to it. Chalmers offered himself with other candidates, but had not the fortune to succeed. "I confess," said he, on writing to his father, "I am not much affected by the disappointment, as my university prospects have upon the whole brightened up within the last fortnight,—as my election would have involved me in the embarrassment of a law process,—and above all, as my contempt for the low shuffling artifices of college politics supports and elevates my mind against the vexation of regret."

In February, 1805, we find him coming forward as a candidate for the professorship of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh, then vacant by the appointment of Professor Playfair to the chair of Natural Philosophy, after the death of Dr. Robison. Here again there is no success. The canvassing and the election, however, afford one an opportunity for displaying one's growing powers of authorship. Professor Playfair had taken occasion to allege that there were "very few Scottish clergymen eminent in mathematics or natural philosophy," and that "the vigorous and successful pursuit of those sciences was incompatible with clerical duties and habits." So crushing and illiberal an insinuation against "the whole order of churchmen" was not to be endured. Accordingly, Thomas Chalmers writes his first pamphlet, which is entitled, "Observations on a Passage in Mr. Playfair's Letter to the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, relative to the mathematical pretensions of the Scottish Clergy." Touching this production his father writes: "As to Thomas's publication, it is acknowledged on all hands to be clever enough; but as to serving his own ends, whatever these may be, I scarcely think he has taken the mode that now leads to preferment, for he flatters no man." Not he, indeed; if success depends on flattery, it is likely Thomas never will succeed. The truth, however, was, that "the writer had no ends of his own to serve," beyond the simple one of "unburdening himself of the indignation which Mr. Playfair's allegations had excited."

The pamphlet had the luck to sell, to an extent beyond the author's expectation. The aspiration dawned upon him that he may possibly live to achieve distinction in the ranks of literature. Meanwhile, however, he is bent to become a little more famous nearer home. The chemical lectures have been successful in St. Andrews; why shouldn't they be repeated and reap a measure of success elsewhere? Let us try the capacities of our parishioners at Kilmany, and see whether or not some scientific elements may be instilled into some of the heads there. A course of chemical lectures is accordingly delivered to all such as please to come to listen and see experiments. Among other experiments, the powers of the bleaching liquids were exhibited,—not without the admiration of two old women. "Our minister," said the one, "is naething short o' a warlock; he was teachin' the folk to clean claes but (anglicè, without) soap!" "Aye, woman," returned the other, "I wish he wad teach me to make parritch but meal." That would be a beautiful discovery. Equal, or superior, as Dr. Hanna thinks, to any of the wondrous exploits of Count Rumford, whom Peter Pindar thus apostrophised:—

"Say, canst thou make, whose brains have not their fellows,

Fire blow itself without a pair of bellows?
Soon shall we see a haunch, with equal wit,
Turn round and roast itself without a spit;
Fish without frying-pans come hot and hot,
And dumplings boil themselves without a pot."

After lecturing at Kilmany, you might (had you been living then and there) have heard and seen him doing the like in the county-town of Cupar, to an audience a trifle more intelligent. Once, on going thither, with his chemical apparatus packed before him on his horse, one of those unlucky accidents which will occur in spite of all precautions gave a disagreeable diversity to the journey. A bottle, containing a burning liquid, somehow sustained a fracture, and the contents, pouring over the horse's shoulder, left upon his hide "a discoloured belt to tell of the strange catastrophe."

Thus, by a diligent activity, do we contrive to bring about the time, and to enliven the "dulness" of our ministerial existence. For doubt it not, good people, that here in our lonely, almost uninhabitable manse, with little or no society except two sisters, not particularly learned, we have many a dull day. Nay, there is now coming over our sequestered household a cloud of actual sorrow, which it will need numberless bright hours to make us utterly forget. News has come that "brother George" has lately returned from sea with the seeds of consumption in him growing rapidly towards death. He has come, as a last resource, to try his native air. He lingered through the spring and summer months, spending part of the time in our secluded parsonage; but in the following December he closed his eyes and died. Joyfully, in that last sickness, had he experienced the consolations of the christian faith; uttering with his pale and trembling lips in his last hours, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that in hiding these things from the wise and prudent, thou hast revealed them unto babes." Farewell to thee, thou pleasant brother George! Never again, while this terrestrial existence is prolonged, shall we see thy buried and remembered face. Yet thou wast beautiful in thy life, with thy manliness and shaggy honesty, thy rough unpolished sailor courtesies, and rich amenities of heart and soul: and in thy death thou wast most beautiful; for with thy foot upon the tomb thou didst spurn from thee all thy earthly trammels, and art now, as we believe, a spirit glorified, in that better land,—

"Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow Nor ever wind blows loudly."

Lie on, in thy cold but quiet slumber; and if, as our faith teaches, at the resurrection of the just, the bodies of men are restored to the spirits which did inhabit them, then, perchance, through patience and well-doing, we may at last behold thee, where the sighings of our distress shall be hushed in boundless and immortal gladness!

Turning from this new-made grave, let us now, in the spring of 1807, accept brother James's invitation, and visit the "Babylon of Fog"—that wondrous immeasurable London, of whose glories we have had repeated intimations in reveries and dreams. James is living there, and doing a reasonable spell of business as a merchant. The traveller goes by Liverpool and Birmingham: and from thence to Woodstock; and afterwards walks to Oxford—where he hears that the Fellows there "are sometimes very noisy, and keep it up till two in the morning." On Saturday the 2d of May, he "left Oxford at seven in the morning, and landed in Ludgate Hill about seven in the evening." That was the rate of travelling in 1807.

Having arrived, he spends his time mainly in visiting all the public institutions, and in seeing the general great sights, and, for one thing, ascends the Monument and has a "most gratifying view of London." From what he saw at a lecture room and exhibition of gas-lights in Pall Mall—where, though the lecturer was "a mere empiric without a particle of science, the Londoners listened with delight"—he pronounces the metropolis to be the "best mart" in the world for impudence and ignorant pretension. We find from his journal that on May the 23d he "repaired to the Albany, and dined with Mr. Sheridan and 150 of his admirers." "The dinner," says he, "was wretched, too little of it, and the worst conducted I ever saw. Great tumult and confusion among the company. I was disappointed in all the speeches, and much shocked with the extreme incorrectness of feeling discovered by several of the company. When the venerable name of Fox was announced by Mr. Sheridan the toastmaster, it was received with the most ridiculous shouts and huzzas, which were at last drowned by the hisses of the majority. A most offensive degree of vulgarity prevailed among my immediate neighbours. It seemed to be their great entertainment to throw the waiters into trouble and confusion. It was strongly suspected that there were people stationed at one part of the room for the purpose of disturbing the harmony of the electors. I left them at nine, and bent my steps homewards." As far as one can see, London was then, in regard to matters of this sort, pretty much as it is now.

Coming home, towards the end of May, by way of Cambridge, he is better pleased with it than with Oxford, inasmuch as everything about the place "wears a simplicity and chasteness allied to the character of philosophy." He says, "it smells of learning all over, and I breathe a fragrance most congenial to me. The very women have an air of academic mildness and simplicity." Going from Stamford on the great north road, he distinctly sees "Sir Isaac Newton's house" at Woolsthorpe, and says he "felt a glow and an enthusiasm" at the prospect, from the veneration which he entertained for the character and talents of the great philosopher. Early in June he has reached Berwick; "and walking along the banks of the Tweed and the Teviot, found himself, about a week afterwards, in the hospitable manse of Roberton"—the residence of Mr. Shaw, a college and clerical friend of long standing, and with whom he had formerly lived while engaged as an assistant preacher in the neighbourhood.

And here we get a glimpse of some of the whimsical features of a Scottish parson's way of life. Chalmers was in the hey-day blood of twenty-seven; his friend was also young; and the two together were a merry pair. As the visitor was about to leave, "I proposed," says Mr. Shaw, "to accompany him to Dr. Hardie's, (about six miles distant,) whence he intended to get to Pennycuik next day. We set out accordingly on a Monday after breakfast. The next morning I expressed a wish that we should go as far as Galashiels, and call on Dr. Douglas; to which he consented, on condition that it must be only a short call. There, however, we were induced to spend the day. Next morning we took our departure on the way to Peebles; but in passing the hospitable residence of a family with whom I was intimately connected, I prevailed on him to call; and being much delighted with our kind reception, we remained till next morning, when we took our leave after breakfast. On our way up the Tweed, I suggested the propriety of our calling on my friend Nicol of Traquair, whose manse was situated only about half a mile off the road. 'Well, sir,' was the reply, 'but it must be only for a minute or two, as I must get to Pennycuik this night.' There, however, we spent the day most comfortably; and in the evening, were so delighted with the music of the piano, that we could not refrain dancing a few merry reels [with some interesting young ladies, as we guess]. At last, Chalmers took hold of my arm, and exclaimed, 'It's out of the question my getting home this week. You have a good horse, so you must just proceed to-morrow morning to Kilmany, and I will go back to Roberton.' To his proposal I readily agreed. Nicol was amazed, and seemed to think we were both getting deranged. On awakening next morning, and perceiving that it rained, I began to groan a little, when my friend pulled me out of bed, and ordered me to set off with all convenient speed. Off I accordingly rode, and reached Kilmany about eight o'clock at night. Chalmers went from Nicol's to Hardie's on the Friday, and on Saturday to Roberton parish, where he wrote a poetical farewell to Teviotdale, and preached a brilliant sermon on 'Look not on the wine when it is red.' Afterwards, on his way home, he called at Abbotshall, and gave me a minute and amusing account of all his proceedings, concluding with high glee and emphasis, 'This famous exploit will immortalize us.'"

Chalmers returned to Kilmany in July, and immediately began to write a book. His mind does not appear to have been laid hold of very impressively by any particular subject; only his brother had suggested to him "the propriety of making some effort in the way of publication"; and he himself had long been smitten with a touch of authormania. Having some inclination towards Political Economy, he resolved to write an "Inquiry into the Strength and Stability of National Resources,"—which, though intended chiefly to "elucidate some questions in the science of political economy," was designed likewise to contain "a number of allusions to the present aspect of affairs." The writer thought he could make it appear that Great Britain might be utterly independent of foreign trade; and that thus Napoleon, who had shut the continent against us, might be successfully defied. By the end of January of the next year the labour of composition was completed, and in February Chalmers went to Edinburgh to revise the work while passing through the press. On the 28th of March, 1808, the volume was published, and shortly experienced a tolerably brisk sale. He had some intentions of bringing out a second edition in London, and was on the eve of going thither in the month of August to negotiate preliminaries, when his purpose was changed suddenly by the death of one of his sisters. It is a memorable circumstance that for this book the Farmer's Magazine "belaboured him with twenty pages of abuse,"—"a coarse and ignorant invective," said Chalmers, naming it contemptuously.

In the autumn of 1808, Chalmers removed out of his dilapidated manse, for better comfort, to a place called Woodmuir, a house "lying close upon the Fifeshire coast of the Frith of Tay," and commanding a prospect "of Dundee and the shipping of the river." From thence, in February, 1809, he writes that the people in that neighbourhood were experiencing a hard winter—"another desperate attack of frost and snow within the last few days—the very beer freezing in the bottles": whereat doubtless hard drinkers were much discomfited. Among the recent occurrences of the world at large had been the famous battle of Corunna, in which a distinguished British general had fallen—Sir John Moore, namely, whose burial has been so well commemorated in Wolfe's rude but stirring lines:

"We buried him darkly at dead of night,
The sods with our bayonets turning,
By the struggling moonbeam's misty light,
And the lantern dimly burning.

* * *

Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
From the field of his fame fresh and gory;
We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone—
But left him alone in his glory!"

As a suitable accompaniment to the consequences of this battle, it was thought advisable by the powers in high places that there should be a national fast proclaimed, to give the general population of the kingdom an opportunity of humiliating themselves, and of profitably lamenting their recent loss. "Like every other minister in Scotland, Mr. Chalmers had to open his church for public worship, and to preach a sermon suitable to the occasion. To discharge this duty, he had the cold and snow of a five miles' walk to brave." "I made my way," says he, "through the drift from Woodsmuir to Kilmany;" but having none but the villagers to preach to he convened them in his dining room. "And it was," says Dr. Hanna, "to that shivering group, convened in the dining room of the old and uninhabited manse, that he preached as eloquent a sermon as was delivered that day from the best of British pulpits, or was listened to by the most brilliant audience in the land."

From the scene of so much wasted eloquence—for evidently Dr. Hanna thinks it was a waste of eloquence to deliver a good sermon to a few shivering people in a dining room—let us now behold our orator in the attitude of making his "maiden speech in the General Assembly." Chalmers appeared there to expose the defect of a recent act of legislature affecting the augmentation of church livings; he having an eye meanwhile to some little augmentation of his own stipend. "The topic," says Hanna, "was a sufficiently dry and barren one, fit enough for a good legal pleading, but ill calculated, we should have thought, for eloquence or illustration. Nevertheless, a few sentences only had been uttered when the singular ingenuity and eloquence of the pleader arrested the whole house. Vigorous reasoning, genial humour, practical sagacity, large and generous sentiment, all broke out in the fervid and rapidly spoken utterance." All which occasions some impression, so that high dignitaries are inquiring of each other,—“Do you know this man? Who is he? He is surely a most extraordinary person.” Methinks, brethren, you will come to know him tolerably by-and-by. Meanwhile, however, listen to what he says,—Chalmers, like Sydney Smith, contended that virtue in a parson was not sufficient of itself to render him respectable. "It is quite ridiculous," said he, on winding up his speech, "to say that the worth of the clergy will suffice to keep them up in the estimation of society. This worth must be combined with importance. Now, it is our part to supply the element of worth, and it is the part of the Court of Session to supply the element of importance. Give both worth and importance to the same individual, and what are the terms employed in describing him? 'A distinguished member of society, the ornament of a most respectable profession, the virtuous companion of the great, and a generous consolation to all the sickness and poverty around him.' These, Moderator, appear to me to be the terms peculiarly descriptive of the appropriate character of a clergyman, and they serve to mark the place which he ought to occupy; but take away the importance, and leave only the worth, and what do you make of him? What is the descriptive term applied to him now? Precisely the term which I often find applied to many of my brethren, and which galls me to the very bone every moment I hear it—'a fine body;' a being whom you may like, but whom I defy you to esteem; a mere object of endearment; a being whom the great may at times honour with a dinner, but whom they will never admit as a respectable addition to their society. Now, all that I demand of the Court of Teinds, is to be raised, and that as speedily as possible, above the imputation of being 'a fine body;'—that they would add importance to my worth, and give splendour and efficacy to those exertions which have for their object the most exalted interests of the species." The motion which this address was intended to support fell, notwithstanding, to the ground, owing to the speaker's "ignorance of the forms of the house." When some one complimented him the next day on his "well-reasoned and brilliant speech," he observed, "Yes, but what did it signify?—it had no effect—nothing followed upon it." This man evidently understands what is the end of all speaking; discerns plainly that unless it can effect something, silence is far better.

The loss of his motion was not the worst thing that happened to Chalmers on this occasion; for on coming home from the assembly he caught cold, and fell afterwards into a severe and lingering illness. "For four months he never left his room; for upwards of half a year he never entered his pulpit; it was more than a twelvemonth before all the duties of his parish were again regularly discharged by him." An apparently sad prostration, and distressing interruption to his contemplated literary pursuits, as well as to all other interests in which he desired to be engaged. And yet, who does not see, that to such a man as Chalmers this long and painful illness might prove a salutary and most edifying season? Hitherto he had been occupied almost exclusively with outward things. His fervour and impetuosity of character made a continued succession of employments needful to him; and these were prosecuted with an ardour and intentness which left little time to look intimately into the inner depths of his own soul. But now he is called upon to pause. He, in his sick chamber, has to find a strength which shall be competent to fortify him against pain, weariness, and the gloom of sick imaginings. A strong man, hurled suddenly from the heights of health to the very brink of dissolution—with what thoughts, what feelings is he likely to contemplate his new and not unperilous position? His first impression is a mortifying sense of his personal impotence—of the paltriness and frivolity of many of the concerns which have till now principally filled up the measure of his occupation. What is time, with all its plans and vanities, its deep-laid ambitions, its pleasures of hope or memory; of what significance is all this towered world of projects, wherein we seek to build our little sanctuaries of contentment, and to possess a place in the affections or admiration of our fellows? A fleeting, inconstant, most empty, and inexplicable phenomenon,—a dim speck in that large invisible economy whereon time and all its interests rest—a bubble on the billow: of immensity! How trivial and insignificant, compared with the vastness of that grand eternity, towards which time, like a river to the ocean, is hourly and incessantly hastening to be merged and swallowed up. What are these dread solemnities of life and death? What this huge unfathomable mystery wherein we dwell?—dwell only for an instant and then are gone? Is there anywhere within the bounds of the wide creation, within all this dark and inextricable coil of things, amid which we spin like fire-sparks on the wheel of some everlasting engine of necessity,—is there any place or covert of stability, where the wearied soul may rest, and breathe some breath of peace? So does the sick and distracted spirit, in that sick chamber of the body, ponder and inquire. And from the abyssal, unsounded depths of consciousness, from the throne as it seems of the eternal God, there comes a voice of wonder and of ecstasy, as though the spherical harmonies were audible, proclaiming a sweet, most consolatory evangel. O man, God is above thee: on His love and on His mercy thou shalt rely, and it shall be well with thee. Let self within thee be annihilated; thou shalt renounce the world; and with thy eyes upon the lodestars of immortal truth, thou shalt travel forward to thy fate in cheerfulness, through all the mazes of this checkered scene, through all the intricacies of the ulterior worlds; for it is the strength and inspiration of the Almighty which enlightens and sustains thee. By cultivating a faith in the invisible, the incongruities of the visible shall be rendered clear to thy apprehension.

This is what, in theological phraseology, is called Chalmers's conversion. It is a change which every true and sufficient man cannot fail, under one or another form, to undergo; a change by which a man is instructed and informed concerning the profound significance of life; and how, for its appropriate unfolding, his aims and aspirations must lay hold on something which is beyond it. By such evangelical methods as were open to him did Chalmers learn to apprehend the mysterious Redemption of the Cross, the saving power of that religious and consecrated sorrow, which has been the beacon-light and guiding star of earnest souls these eighteen hundred years. The meaning of the Infinite was revealed to him, and by the light of that revelation the Finite was no longer unintelligible. "Strip human life," said he, "of its connexion with a higher scene of existence, and it is the illusion of an instant, an unmeaning farce, a series of visions and projects, and convulsive effort, which terminate in nothing." Time, then, is the fore-court of eternity—the preliminary scene of preparation and probation for an ultimate and grander scene wherein time shall be no more. In the face of this great conviction, he can say with all humility, "My prayer to heaven is, that my temper, and my passions, and my conversation may be brought under the habitual regulation of principle; that the labours of my mind may be subservient to the interests of the gospel; that from this moment I may shake off caprice and indolence, and the mischief of ill-regulated passions; and that with the blessing of the divine assistance, I may be enabled to soar above the littleness of time, and give all for eternity." So stands it written, on "March 17th, 1810," the day on which the writer had completed his thirtieth year of age.

With a clearer purpose, profounder aims, and loftier aspirations, he can now pursue his calling. As a preacher, as an author, he comes to entertain a higher end than that of personal celebrity or ambition. The cause of truth is seen to be a pre-eminent and sacred one; an immeasurable, and altogether infinite concern. With restored health comes a time of greater effort and more resolute activity. He seeks to realize his new ideal; to live in a lively conformity to the principles which he has embraced with the whole strength of his understanding, with the deep intentness of exalted feeling. He is sensible, doubtless, of manifold short-comings—some of which are recorded in his journal with an almost morbid susceptibility; but his effort after a completer worthiness is henceforth earnest, strenuous, and sincere.

In 1811, we find him re-established in his manse, (which had lately been rebuilt,) exercising a liberal and genial hospitality, and occupying his leisure hours in writing articles for the Edinburgh Encyclopædia. One of the pleasantest things about Chalmers, is, that he never lost a relish for a joke. In the course of this autumn, when his sister Jane, his "favourite housekeeper," had left him for a month or two, (on the eve of her expected marriage,) to manage the hospitality of the manse by his single ingenuity, he was visited by two gentlemen from Dundee, who were prepared with excellent appetites for dinner. On inquiry, and examination of his larder, Chalmers found, not without dismay, that he had "nothing whatever in the house but two separate parcels of salt fish." To make the best of these, however, he ordered each to be cooked separately; and the same were afterwards served up in "two large and most promising cover-dishes, flourishing at the head and foot of the table." "And now, gentlemen," said the host, as the covers were removed, "you have variety to choose among: that is hard fish from St. Andrews, and this is hard fish from Dundee."

It would have been agreeable had this volume of Dr. Hanna's introduced us a little more distinctly into the households of Kilmany, so that we might have seen the minister's ingoings and outgoings among at least a few of his parishioners. The journal itself is in this respect extremely unsatisfactory and imperfect; there being scarcely any entries from which we can gather the slightest notion of the sort of life which was then and there going forward. By dint of keen inspection, however, we perceive that in the summer months of 1812, the worthy pastor is frequently in the habit of calling at a house in the place or hamlet named Starbank, the residence of one Mr. Simson—to all appearance a highly respectable and worthy kind of man. But it does not appear to us, looking at the matter retrospectively, that Chalmers can be particularly anxious about enjoying this gentleman's conversation, nor even the wine or whisky which at stated seasons every day are probably brought on the table. There is, as we conceive, a far more spiritual and interesting attraction. Mr. Simson has, in fact, a rather pleasant niece residing with him, and, to all appearance, nowise indisposed to marry; provided she can find a man who takes her fancy, not disinclined to put the question. The Reverend Thomas Chalmers—a "personable man" of two-and-thirty, with undoubted talents and unblemished reputation, seems likely to be the man, and is evidently intending something of the sort. Though he had declared he would die a bachelor, he is beginning to think with Benedick, that when he made that foolish resolution he had no conception of ever living to be married. Miss Grace Pratt (second daughter of Captain Pratt of the First Royal Veteran Battalion) is the lady's name—a name which it were apparently highly pleasant and expedient to transform into "Mrs. Chalmers." Accordingly, after some preliminary dalliances, the parties come to speech about the matter; and Chalmers thus announces the result, in a somewhat mystifying letter to his sister Jane:—

"You know that, when you left Edinburgh, I was engaged with a process before the court of teinds, and that the issue of that process was not just so favourable as I could have wished; since which period I have been carrying on another process before another court, and after the delay of some vexatious forms, and some tedious unlooked-for evasions, I have the joy to announce to you that the issue has been in the highest degree triumphant. I had really no time for answering your letter. My whole time was occupied with the business of the law-suit, and with a most constant and fatiguing attendance upon the forms of court. I had to draw out the summonses; I had to plead repeatedly in person. When I met with any discouraging appearance on the part of the judge, I had to renew my appeal, and betake myself to another line of argument. I had to frame replies and dupes, and thought at one time that I would be cast upon the necessity of resting the whole merits of the cause upon a reclaiming petition. The memorials I had to write out and give into court were innumerable. At length appearances began to dawn more favourably upon me. Anxiety brightened into hope, and hope now reposes in all the certainty of the long-wished and well-fought-for decision. Nothing now remains but to carry forward the decision into accomplishment as speedily as possible."

There being thus no reasonable "cause or just impediment why these two persons should not be joined together in holy matrimony," the marriage accordingly came off, on the morning of the 4th of August, 1812, at Starbank aforesaid—the parson and his bride going home with their party to Kilmany in the evening; and eight days afterwards we find him writing,—“Peace, harmony, and affection reign in my abode.”

Thus far only can we at present follow Chalmers. When another volume of materials has been published, perhaps, if readers be not wearied, we may again take up the theme.

DEBORAH'S DIARY.

May 12.

YESTERDAY, being the Lord's day, mother was hugely scared during morning service, by seeing an old lady put her kerchief to her nose, look hither and thither, and, finally, walk out of church. One whispered another,—“A plague-smell, perchance.” “No doubt on't;”—and soe, one after another left, as, at length, did mother, who declared she beganne to feel herself ill. On the cloth being drawn after dinner, she made a serious attack on my father, upon the subject of country lodgings, which he stoutly resisted at first, saying,—“If, wife and daughters, either the danger were so immediate, or the escape from it soe facile as to justify these womanish clamours, reason would that I should listen to you. But, since that the Lord is about our bed, and about our path, in the capital noe less than in the country, and knoweth them that are his, and hideth them under the shadowe of his wings,—and since that, if the fiat be indeede issued agaynst us, no stronghold, though guarded with triple walls of circumvallation, like Echatana, nor pastoral valley, that might inspire Theocritus with a new Idyl, can hide us, either by its strength or its obscurity, from the arrow of the destroying angel; ye, therefore, seeing these things cannot be spoken agaynst, ought to be quiet, and do nothing rashly. Wherefore, I pray you, wife and daughters, get you to your knees, before Him who alone can deliver you from these terrors; and, having cast your burthen upon Him, eat your bread in peacefulness and cheerfulness of heart.”

However, we really are preparing for country quarters, for young Elwood hath this morning brought us note of a rustick abode at Chalfont, in Bucks, the charges of which suit my father's limited means; and we hope to enter on it by the end of the week. We part with one maid, and take the other. Betty was very forward to be left in charge; and profest herself willing to abide any risk for the sake of the family; more by token she thoughte there was noe risk at alle, having boughte a sovereign charm of Mother Shipton. Howbeit, on inducing her, much agaynst her will, to open it, nought was founde within but a wretched little print of a ship, with the words, scrawled beneath it,—“By virtue of the above sign.” Father called her a silly baggage, and sayd, he was glad, at anie rate, there was no profanitic in it; but, in spite of Betty, and Polly, and mother too, he is resolved to leave y^e house under the sole charge of Nurse Jellycott. Indeed, there will probably be more rather than less work to do at Chalfont; but mother means to get a little boy, such as will be glad to come for threepence a-week, to fetch the milk, post the letters, get flour from the mill and barm from the brew-house, carry pies to the oven, clean boots and shoes, bring in wood, sweep up the garden, roll the grass, turn the spit, draw the water, lift boxes and heavy weights, chase away beggars and infectious persons, and any little odd matter of the kind.

Mother has drowned the cats, and poisoned the rats. The latter have revenged 'emselves by dying behind the wainscot, which makes y^e lower part of the house soe unbearable, 'speciallic to father, that we are impatient to be off. Mother, intending to turn Chalfont into a besieged garrison, is laying in stock of sope, candles, cheesc, butter, salt, sugar, raisins, pease, and bacon, besides resin, sulphur, and Benjamin, agaynst y^e infection; and pill, ruff, and Venice treacle, in case it comes.

As to father, his thoughts naturallic run more on food for y^e mind; soe he hath layd in goodlie store of pens, paper, and ink, and sett me to pack his books. At first, he sayd he s^d onlic require a few, and good ones. These were alle of y^e biggest; and three or four folios broke out the bottom of the box. Soe then mother sayd y^e onlic way was to cord 'em up in sacking; which greatlie relaxed y^e bounds of his self-denial, and ended in his having a load packed that w^d break a horse's back. Alsoe, hath had his organ taken to peeces, but as it must goe in two severall loads, and we cannot get a bigger wagon, everie cart and carriage, large or little, being on such hard duty in these times, I'm to be left behind till the wagon returns, and till I've finished cataloguing y^e books; after which, Ned Phillips hath promised to take me down on a pillion.

Nurse Jellycott, being sent for from Wapping, looked in this forenoon, for father's commands. Such years have passed since we lost sight of her, that I remembered not her face in y^e least, but had an instant recollection of her chearfull, gentle voyce. Spite of her steeple hat, and short scarlet cloke, which gave her an antiquated ayr, her cleare hazel eyes and smooth-parted silver locks gave her an engaging appearance. The world having gone ill with her, she thankfullie takes charge of y^e premises; and though her eyes filled with tears, 'twas with looking at father. He, for his part, spake most kindlie, and gave her his hand, which she kissed.

They are all off. Never was house in such a pickle! The carpets rolled up, but y^e boards beneath 'em unswept, and black with dirt; as Nurse gladlie undertook everie office of that kind, and sayd 'twould help to amuse her when we were away. But she has tidied up the little chamber, over the house-door, she means to occupy, and sett a beau-pot on the mantell of fresh flowers she brought with her. The whole house smells of aromattick herbs, we have burnt soe many of late for fumigation; and, though we fear to open y^e window, yet, being on y^e shady side, we doe not feel the heat much.

Yesterday, while in y^e thick of packing, and nobody being with father but me, a messenger arrived, with a few lines, writ privily by a friend of poor Ellwood, saying he was in Aylesbury Gaol, not for debt, but for his opinions, and praying father to send him twenty or thirty shillings for immediate necessaries. Mother having gone to my Lord Mayor for passports, and father having long given up to her his purse, . . . (for us girls, we rarelie have a crown,) he was in a strait, and at length sayd,—“This poor young fellow must not be denied. . . . A friend in need is a friend indeed. . . . Tye on thy hood, child, and step out with the volume thou hadst in thy hand but now, to the stall at y^e corner. See Isaac himself; shew him Tasso's autograph on y^e fly-leaf, and ask him for thirty or forty shillings on it till I come back; but bid him on noe pretence to part with it.”

I did soe, not much liking y^e job,—there are often such queer people there; for old Isaac deals not onlie in old books, but old silver spoons. Howbeit, I took the volume to his shop, and, as I went in, Betty came out! What had been her businesse I know not; but she lookt at me and my book as though she s^d like to know mine; but, with her usuall demure curtsey, made way for me, and walked off. I got the money with much waiting, but not much other difficultie, and took it to father, who sent twenty shillings to Ellwood, and gave me five for my payns.

Mother was soe worried by y^e odour of y^e rats, that they alle started off a day sooner than was first intended, leaving me merelic a little extra packing. Consequence was, that, this morning, before dawn, being earlic at my task, there taps me at the window an old harridan that mother can't abide, who is always a crying, “Anie kitchen-stuff have you, maids?”

Quoth I, “We've nothing for you.”

“Sure, my deary,” answers she, in a cajoling voyce, “there's the dripping and candles you promised me this morning, along with the pot-liquor.”

“Dear heart, Mrs. Deb!” says Nurse, laughing, “there is, indeed, a lot of kitchen-stuff hid up near the sink, which I dare say your maid told her she was to have; and, as it will onlic make y^e house smell worse, I don't see why she s^d not have it, and pay for it, too.”

Soe I laught, and gave it her forthwith, and she put into my hand two shillings; but then says,—“Why, where's the cheesc?”

“We've no cheesc for you,” sayd I.

“Well,” says she, “it's a dear bargain; but . . .” peering towards me, “is t'other mayd gone, then?”

“Oh, yes! both of 'em,” says I; “and I'm the mistress,” soe burst out a laughing, and shut the window, while she stumped off, with something between a grunt and a grone. Of course, I gave the money to Nurse.

We had much talk overnight of my poor dear mother. Nurse came to her when Anne was born, and remained in y^e family till after the death of father's second wife. She was a fayr and delicate gentlewoman, by Nurse's account, soft in speech, fond of father, and kind to us and the servants; but alle Nurse's suffrages were in favour of mine owne mother.

I askt Nurse how there came to have beene a separation between father and mother, soon after their marriage. She made answer, she never c^d understand the rights of it, having been before her time; but they were both soe good, and tenderly affectioned, she never c^d believe there had been anie reall wrong on either side. She always thought my grandmother must have promoted a misunderstanding. Men were seldom fond of their mothers-in-law. He was very kind to the whole family the winter before Anne was born, when, but for him, they would not have had a roof over their heads. Old Mr. Powell died in his house, the very day before Christmase, which cast a gloom over alle, insomuch that my mother would never after keep Christmas Eve; and, as none of the Puritans did, they were alle of a mind. My other grandfather dropt off a few months after; he was very fond of mother. At this time, grandmother was going to law for her widow's thirds, which were little worth y^e striving for, except to one soe extreme poor; yet, spite of gratitude and interest, she must quarrel with father, and remove herself from his house; which even her own daughter thought very wrong. Howbeit, mother w^d have her first child baptized after her; and sent her alle y^e little helps she could from her owne purse, from time to time, with father's privitie and concurrence. He would have his next girl called Mary, after mother; though the name she ever went by with him was "sweet Moll;"—'tis now always "poor Moll," or "your mother." Her health fayled about that time, and they summered at Forest Hill,—a place she was always hankering after; but when she came back she told Nurse she never wished to see it agayn, 'twas soe altered. Father's sight was, meantime, getting worse and worse. She read to him, and wrote for him often. He had become Cromwell's secretary, and had received the public thanks of the Commonwealth. . . Great as his reputation was at home, 'twas greater abroad; and foreigners came to see him, as they still occasionally doe, from all parts. My mother not onlie loved him, but was proud of him. All her pleasures were in home. From my birth to that of y^e little boy who died, her health and spiritts were good; after that, they failed; but she always tried to be chearfulle with father. She read her Bible much, and was good to the poor. Nurse says 'twas almost miraculous how much good she did at how little cost, except of forethought and trouble; and alle soe secretlie. She began to have an impression she was for an early grave, but did not seem to lament it. One night, Nurse, being beside her, awoke her from what she supposed an uneasie dream, as she was crying in her sleep; but as soone as she oped her eyes, she looked surprised, and said 'twas a vision of peace. She thought the Redeemer of alle men had been talking with her, face to face, as a man talketh with his friend, and that she had fallen at his feet in grateful joy, and was saying, "Oh! I can't express. . . I can't express—" About a week after, she dyed, without any particular warning, except a short prick or two at the heart. My father was by. 'Twas much talked of at y^e time, she being soe young.

Discoursing of this and that, 'twas midnight ere we went to bed.

AN ADVENTURE IN THE TEXAS.

DURING the recent war between the United States and the Indians of Texas, a great number of volunteers joined the expedition. One of these, Captain Ferguson of Kentucky, became celebrated for his hardihood and success in the terrible hunting of the Indians. The following incident will convey some idea of the character of the man, and also of the war still waging in the New World, between civilization and barbarism.

A small band of volunteers, among whom was Captain Ferguson, spent several days exploring Texas, and had wandered far into the interior without meeting a solitary Indian track. Tired of this pacific journey, they resolved to separate, and seek adventures singly, before returning to the camp.

Accordingly, the following morning, Captain Ferguson, mounted on an excellent horse, left his companions, and directed his course across a vast prairie, towards a cluster of hills, hemmed in by thick woods which bounded the horizon. Arrived at the foot of one of the hills, the Captain perceived a troop of wild horses slowly advancing towards him. Suddenly they broke into a gallop: a manœuvre which appeared suspicious, and induced our hero to watch them closely.

They soon gained the level ground, and the dull sound of their hoofs striking the soil, became distinctly audible. The Captain looked, and saw clinging to the flanks of each horse, an Indian suspended horizontally by an arm and a leg. This is a common stratagem among the Indians, but luckily for Ferguson, he was still at a considerable distance from these unpleasant-looking cavaliers.

Perceiving, by the sudden rapidity of his flight, that they were discovered, the Indians climbed nimbly on their horses, and pursued our hero at full speed, shouting their terrible war-cry.

Looking back, Ferguson observed that his enemies spread themselves across the prairie, with the evident intention of cutting off his retreat to the hills. He saw that his only chance of safety consisted in gaining the woods; whither his pursuers durst not follow him, lest they might encounter the out-posts of the American troops.

He did not again look behind, but with his eyes eagerly fixed on the yet distant goal, he spurred on his horse to its utmost speed. The animal stumbled, and the cry of the Indians became more distinct; but the noble animal rose again, and with a loud neigh, as though conscious of the peril that menaced his master, he made a prodigious forward bound, and cleared the space which divided him from the wood, with the speed of an arrow.

As Ferguson had foreseen, the Indians, fearing to enter the woods, came to a sudden halt. Although now comparatively out of danger, he did not esteem the neighbourhood perfectly safe, and therefore pursued his course for five or six miles without drawing bridle. Evening was closing in when he judged it proper to pause. He tried in vain to discover where he was; but he was not a man to vex himself for trifles, so he quietly resolved to pass the night in the open air, and defer till the morrow the task of finding his way. A clear stream bordered with shrubs ran near, and Ferguson, having unbridled his horse, wrapped himself in his cloak and lay down on the grass.

At daybreak he resumed his journey, following the course of the stream. When he had gone about four miles, he found the corpse of one of his companions. The poor fellow had been scalped, and Ferguson's first thought was that all his friends had probably been surprised, and massacred singly. Indeed, the numerous hoof-prints of horses, some shod and some unshod, indicated plainly the recent passage of both white-men and Indians. Slowly and cautiously he followed these traces without making any discoveries; until towards the middle of the day, having climbed up a slight eminence, he saw on the plain, at about a mile's distance, a large Indian encampment.

At the same moment the Indians perceived the Captain, and leaped on their horses. Cursing his own imprudence, Ferguson turned bridle, and began as quickly as possible to retrace his steps. Arrived at the outer border of the wood, he saw on the plain which he was about to cross, a dense cloud of lurid smoke extending on either side as far as the eye could reach. It was a prairie on fire. What was he to do? To return was death: to go forward, destruction no less inevitable.

In this terrible emergency, Ferguson did not lose his presence of mind, but continued to advance rapidly in the direction of the fire. When he met the black advanced guard of smoke, behind which the flame wound and darted like some monstrous hydra-headed serpent, Ferguson checked his horse and dismounted. He tore his mantle into pieces, fastened one as a bandage round his horse's eyes, and another so as to envelop the animal's mouth and nostrils; then he covered his own face in a similar manner. This was the work of a few moments—precious moments, for the yells of the advancing Indians became fearfully distinct. His preparation made, Ferguson remounted, and facing his horse towards the fire, spurred him on with the energy of despair. The noble beast bounded onwards, the fierce flames enveloping him and his rider; but the arm of the latter was of iron strength; he held up his horse, and impelled him through the fire. A few desperate bounds, and the torture was over.

The fresh cool air, how delicious it was! Ferguson tore off the bandages which covered his own head and his horse's, and threw himself on the ground. He is saved! he has accomplished an unparalleled exploit!

But above the roaring and crackling of the flames, he hears the triumphant cries of his pursuers, who think they have precipitated him into the ocean of fire. He made an effort to give back a defying shout, but his voice died on his lips.

Half suffocated, both horse and man had scarcely strength to move across the blackened plain; yet Ferguson knew that without water they must inevitably perish. He therefore summoned his remaining energies, and crept on, leading his horse by the bridle. All the poor creature's hair was singed off, and large pieces of his hide came away at the slightest touch.

Tormented by a raging thirst, Ferguson dragged himself towards the farthest extremity of the plain; and when there, he perceived a band of wolves advancing with savage howls. This new peril roused both the horse and his rider. A clear fresh stream was flowing by: into it plunged the animal, and Ferguson also dipped his head into the delicious bath. Its restorative effect was magical. He recollected that the wolves in these vast deserts are accustomed to flock towards a prairie on fire, in order to prey on the animals escaping from the flames. The Captain examined his horse, and found with pleasure that the poor creature was much recovered, and even neighed in reply to the wolves' howling. More moved by this plaintive neigh than he had ever been by a human cry, Ferguson gently caressed the head of his steed, and then mounting, urged him towards the forest. The wolves meanwhile were crossing the stream in hot pursuit, their hoarse yells sounding a thousand times more terrible than the whistling of bullets on a battle-field.

A cold shuddering seized Ferguson. "If my horse should fall!" he thought. But thanks to his vigilance, and the feverish energy of the animal, they gradually gained on their pursuers; for the speed of a prairie wolf is much less than that of a fleet horse.

But the powers of the noble creature were nearly spent, his breathing became rapid, and his head drooped. Yet he still made a wondrous effort to gain the forest, for, with the instinct of his kind, he seemed to know that safety would be found among the trees.

At length the wood was gained. Ferguson gave a joyous shout, for now he could take refuge in a tree. Tying his horse to a lower branch, our hero climbed one quickly, and loaded his carabine and pistols, with a faint hope of defending the poor animal from the wolves' attack.

From the lofty branch on which he had taken up his position, Ferguson watched the monsters' approach—they were of the fiercest species, white with glowing red eyes; and he saw that all was over with his faithful horse. They rushed on their victim—Ferguson fired among them; but in a moment the animal was devoured, and the empty bridle left hanging on the branch.

The wolves, with gaping throats, and their white tusks grinning horribly, remained round the tree; for the horse had scarcely furnished each with a single mouthful. On the Captain's slightest movement they jumped up, as if to seize him before he could touch the ground. Ferguson enjoyed a sort of feverish pleasure in killing a number of them with his carabine. But night was closing in, and quite exhausted, unable even to reload his arms, he was seized with a sudden giddiness. He was forced to close his eyes, lest he should fall from his green fortress.

Then a deep roaring was heard in the neighbouring prairie. At the sound, the wolves pricked up their ears, and darted off simultaneously in pursuit of a new prey. In a short time Ferguson opened his eyes, and descried in the plain on the border of the wood, an enormous buffalo, surrounded by the ravenous wolves, who were tearing him to pieces, despite his furious efforts to escape.

The Captain, profiting by this fortunate diversion, descended from his tree, and hastened to kindle the dried branches scattered on the ground. He shortly succeeded in surrounding himself with a rampart of fire.

Feeling then in comparative safety, he roasted one of the dead wolves, and ate a small portion of the flesh, notwithstanding the natural repugnance inspired by such unclean food. Being somewhat strengthened by his strange repast, he collected a supply of wood for the night.

In about an hour afterwards, the wolves returned to the charge, but Ferguson, thanks to his flaming fortification, was in such perfect safety, that despite the continued howling, he slept profoundly until morning.

On awaking, he found that the wolves were gone, in pursuit, doubtless, of some easier prey; and the Captain was able to resume his journey on foot, carrying with him his pistols, his cutlass, and his carabine.

After a week of incredible fatigue and privation, he arrived in safety at the American camp; but no tidings were ever heard of his unfortunate companions. They probably had either been massacred by the Indians, or devoured by the wolves. As to Captain Ferguson, he was seized with a fever which confined him to bed during many weeks. When convalescent, he happened one day to look in a mirror, and started back affrighted. His beard remained black, but the hair of his head had become white as snow.

A FEW WORDS ON CORALS.

BY M. B.

It is the object of the following papers to illustrate the natural history of the ocean, and to introduce to the reader a few of the forms of life which the naturalist meets with in the deep sea. The sea that bathes the globe contains as countless multitudes of living beings as does the land we tread, and each possesses an organization as interesting and as peculiar to itself, as any of the higher forms of the animal creation. But the interest does not cease here, for these marine invertebrata play an important part in the vast economy of nature, some living but to afford food for the larger kinds, others devouring all matter devoid of vitality, and so removing all putrescent materials, with which the sea would otherwise be surcharged; while others, again, living in large communities, surely and slowly, by their gradual growth, so alter the physical construction of the globe as to render seas and harbours unnavigable, and in many cases even to give rise in course of ages to those islands, apparently of spontaneous growth, which are so common in the Southern Seas.

Corals and Madrepores first claim our attention, because they occupy the lowest place, with the exception of sponges, in the animal scale. Indeed, so low is their organization, that former naturalists denied their animal character, and from superficial examination of their external appearance, placed them among the wonders of the vegetable world. And from the arborescent and plant-like form assumed by many kinds, in the Flustra and others, in which the resemblance to sea-weeds is so strong as generally to cause them to be confounded together under the same group, and being fixed to submarine rocks, or marine shells, observers might easily have been led to the mistake, had not modern research rectified the error. Corals and Madrepores, as they are known to us, consist but of the stony skeletons of the animals themselves, for in the living state, while dwelling in the ocean, each portion of the stony framework was covered with an animal coating of gelatinous matter, which, closely investing it, was the living portion of the animal. But the structure of the animal is not simply this, for attached to different portions of it in the living state are to be found a countless number of little cells, which, armed with tentacles of great prehensile and tactile powers, are the apertures through which the particles of food are conveyed for the sustenance of the animal. These bodies, as they may be called, are the analogues of that simple polyp, the common hydra, which, abounding in almost every pond, has been long known to naturalists. It consists of a single dilated gelatinous vesicle, which is terminated at one extremity by a sucker, and at the other by a number of contractile filaments, which serve as the tentaculae, by which it seizes its prey. This is all that represents the animal, the dilated portion of the tube being the part in which the process of digestion is carried on, and where the food is assimilated to the wants of the little creature. These hydræ live singly, each animal being independent of another, and each possesses the power of self-reparation; so that should it happen that a tentacle is lost, another sprouts to supply its place, or should the naturalist by way of experiment divide it in half, each portion immediately reproduces the wanting section. Such then is briefly the structure of the simple fresh-water hydra, a polyp of common occurrence, and from this description the reader will gain some idea of the polyps of the Coral family before us; but he must remember that in the case now under discussion, the polyps are aggregated together, a number on one common stem, each possessing independent life, but all ministering to the support of the compound animal.

The hydra, then, of the Coral and Madrepor, thus explained, would appear to be the parts through which food is absorbed for the general nourishment of the body, which, as before observed, consists simply of a gelatinous film of animal matter, possessing but little evidence of vitality. Here then is a community of nourishment, and with it also a community of sensation, for if one portion be irritated, contiguous portions of the animal are apt to sympathise. When the Coral polyps are not in an active state, or in other words, when they are not in want of food, these hydra-form polyps may not be visible, but being retracted into cells found as depressions in the skeletons of the Madrepor, they are lost to observation, and it is only when in quest of food and nourishment that their contractile tentacles are expanded, and distinctly prominent.

The physiology of the growth of the skeleton, both in the Madrepor, and the Coral, is the same. The entire skeleton, however ramified it may be, or whatever form it may assume, is secreted by the living matter with which it is invested, the materials for its formation being derived from the element in which it lives; and as its deposition takes place at different times, the central stem of some corals is apt to assume a beautiful concentric arrangement of laminae. But the material deposited or secreted need not necessarily be hard or calcareous, but even may partake of the character of horn or other flexible materials, as is the case with some of the coral family. In other cases there is an alternation of each material; and the necessity of this change in the character of the skeleton will now demand our attention.

The common coral of the Mediterranean, possessing a stony skeleton, is found in situations where its stunted form and its extreme hardness sufficiently preserve it from the violence of the waves; but place a coral under other circumstances, and expose it to the storms of the Indian Ocean, where the waves rage with fury, dashing on and uprooting all things within their power, and the structure of the simple corallum would fail to withstand their violence. Here then, under such circumstances, in the case of the Gorgonia, nature has provided a horny and flexible skeleton, which, spreading majestically in the sea, shall be capable of bending beneath the weight of the superincumbent waves, and so yielding to the storms. Nature has thus adapted herself to each contingent circumstance.

The next point to which we shall advert will be coral formations, which form so interesting a study to the naturalist and geologist. When we consider that we have at hand only a soft gelatinous covering, stretched on a hard stony frame-work,—that the material on which this animal substance exists, is furnished by the sea in which it lives,—we cannot but be surprised at the smallness of the means which nature uses for the execution of her great designs. But time compensates for the insignificance of the means employed, and the continued activity of nature's architects, during continuous ages, accomplishes these stupendous results, which have at various times excited the wonder of the navigator, and aroused the attention of the naturalist. Many examples of these are to be found in the Pacific Archipelago. Seas and shallows, once navigable, become in the process of time so filled by these living animals, as to become impassable, their stony skeletons forming hard massy rocks and impenetrable barriers, which, rising from the bottom of the sea and shallows, constitute solid masonry of living stones.

But besides thus aggregating in the neighbourhood of land and continents, formations similarly produced are constantly met with during the circumnavigation of the globe. Not only barriers and reefs owe their origin to these humble means, but large lands, stretching for miles in the centre of the ocean, rise gradually from beneath the surface of the sea, and, becoming clothed with verdure and vegetation, at last offer a resting-place for the daring seafarer. But now occurs the interesting question, How happens it that these islands are found in situations where the sea is too deep to allow of any animal life to exist? And yet these corals must have grown upwards from some resting-place. The researches of Darwin have shown that the greatest depth in which corals live, is between thirty and forty fathoms beneath the surface of the sea; hence it is absolutely certain that for every island some foundation must exist in the sea for these reef-building animals to attach themselves to. Such foundation, from the observation of Darwin, would appear to be provided by submarine mountains which have gradually subsided into the sea, having originally existed above its surface. Upon these foundations the reef-building saxigenous corals have become attached, and slowly accumulating in large numbers, and gradually depositing their carbonate of lime, during the lapse of ages, by degrees construct these large piles, which, at last emerging from the ocean's bosom, appear as newly-formed continents and islands. Once above the surface, the work of the corals is at an end; no longer exposed to the salt water, the emerged portion dies, and then new agencies are called into play, before its surface can be clothed with vegetable life. The storms of the ocean and the rising waves gradually deposit on its surface the sand and mud torn up from the bottom of the sea, and the sea-weed too that is cast upon its tenantless shores soon crumbles into mould, and unites with the debris of the former polyps. At last, some seeds from neighbouring lands are driven to its strand, and there finding a soil suited for their growth, soon sprout, under the influence of a tropical sun, into fresh life, and clothe the ocean isle with verdure and vegetation.

Then last, man comes, and taking possession of the land, erects him a house to dwell in, and cultivating the soil he finds, soon converts the ocean-rescued land into cultivated plains. Islands thus formed are constantly increased in circumference by the same means as those that gave them birth; the same agency is ever at work, adding particle on particle to the rising land. But is it not strange that such simple means can resist the ever-flowing and roaring ocean—that such simple animals can uprear a masonry which shall resist the violence of the waves and defy the power of the breakers? Is it not strange that a simple polyp can form a structure in the bosom of the ocean, which shall stand, a victorious antagonist to the storm when works of man and other “inanimate works of nature” would have crumbled into nothing before the relentless fury of a disturbed ocean? “Let the hurricane tear up its thousand huge fragments, yet what will that tell against the accumulated labour of myriads of architects at work day and night, month after month?” for here organic force is opposed to the raging elements, and opposing, is victorious.

UNEXPECTED DISCLOSURES.

A VERY entertaining volume might be written on unexpected disclosures. There are few who could not contribute from their own experience, or from that of their friends, some amusing exemplification. It has not unfrequently happened, that a secret believed to be locked in the bosom of one only confidant has escaped, and gone through the length and breadth of the land by some strange chance, and not from any breach of faith in the one whose duty it was to guard it. Thus it was with an unfortunate secret which Peter the Great confided to the empress and to Menchikoff, under the promise of inviolable fidelity. “We are going to march against the Persians,” said his Majesty, who had resolved on the measure, “but it is absolutely necessary that we should keep this entirely to ourselves, till the plans can be considered.” A few days after this confidential communication, the emperor inquired of an attendant if there were any news. “The news that every one has, your Majesty,” replied he, “is, that we are going to march against the Persians.” The Czar, naturally concluding that one or other of the only two persons in whom he had confided had betrayed him, desired their attendance in the same apartment where he had before received them in private. He upbraided them with their breach of confidence; they protested their innocence;—“Not one syllable of what he had told them had ever passed their lips; how could he suppose them guilty of such perfidy?” Their protestations were vain, and he was about to leave the room in displeasure, when the parrot who was in the cage began to flutter and to call out, “We’ll march against the Persians—we’ll march against the Persians—” words which he had picked up by hearing them from the Czar at his interview with the empress and Menchikoff, and which he had repeated so often that all the domestics in the royal palace had heard them again and again. The mystery was now solved, and the Czar determined that Poll should never be taken into his confidence again, for it was plain that he had no talent for keeping a secret. How often by an inadvertent word, which would have been gladly recalled at the cost of the whole world, has some disclosure been made, which turned the tide of justice against a culprit! how often has such a one been committed on some unexpected disclosure made unguardedly by himself! But this would be a sad chapter, and we pass to less gloomy instances.

From sheer carelessness disclosures have been made to the last persons in the world who should have known anything of the matter. Frederic once picked up a letter which had been dropped by the Hussar who attended on him. He sent for the man, and asked him whether he could write, “A little,” replied the Hussar. “No matter,” replied the king, “take this pen, and write, as well as you can, what I shall dictate.” Frederic then dictated from the fatal letter, which was addressed to the Hussar’s mistress, “My dear Charlotte, it will not be in my power to call upon you either to-day or so soon as I could wish, having to stay at home to take care of the old Brummen Bar (growing bear). I hope, however, towards the end of the week to make good this loss.” The man fell on his knees, and attempted to excuse himself. “Write on,” resumed the king, “and add, ‘My dear Charlotte, it is probable several weeks may pass over before I can have the pleasure of seeing you, being obliged at this very moment to set off for Spandau.’” The king signed the letter, and sent him with it to prison. However, he left him there no longer than it was necessary to give him a fright.

King Charles, who enjoyed anything clever, said one day, “Come, Rochester, let me see one of your last lampoons.” Eager to gratify his Majesty, and to show his own ability, he flew in haste to his desk, and laying his hands on one, he presented it to the king. He had taken the wrong one; it was a lampoon on his Majesty! Papers falling into hands for which they were never intended, have indeed caused the greatest embarrassment.

Mr. Hawkshaw, a friend of ours, who was on a visit with a neighbouring nobleman, picked up a piece of paper as he was going down stairs one morning. As he was rather inquisitive, he looked into the contents, with which he was highly amused. It was an account of house expenses kept by one of the servants. Among various items he found the following:—

To fresh eggs for my master and mistress. 1s. 6d.
To stale ditto for Mr. Hawkshaw 0s. 4d.

Mr. Hawkshaw entered the room where his host and hostess were sitting, and pretending to think they were privy to the servants’ mode of entertaining him, made great amusement for himself.

Among unexpected disclosures, that which took place at the house of a family where we were intimate caused much laughing at the time of its occurrence. Here there were large evening parties occasionally, to which Mr. J., the master of the house, had a particular dislike. From these entertainments he always sought the privacy of his own chamber, leaving his wife to apologise for his absence in the best manner she could. She generally accounted for it by saying he had been suddenly called from home on professional business. One evening a very large company had assembled, and Mrs. J. apologised for her husband as usual;—"Most urgent business some miles off in the country had required his most special attendance, which had been a very great disappointment to him—he would have been so glad to have had his friends about him," &c. The guests, as politeness demanded, chimed in with his regrets. Supper was laid for a great number on two tables which extended the length of the room; the space between the two was sufficient for the servants to pass up and down to the sideboard, which was at the top of the room. It was during the few moments' silence which has been sometimes observed to prevail even in the largest companies, and it was now near the conclusion of supper, when the door flew open with a great swing, a strange gaunt figure deliberately bent his way between the tables, and as the room was brilliantly lit up, he was visible to all the company, and every eye was fixed on him. He wore no garment but a shirt, which did not reach to his knees, and a white cotton cap, surrounded by an imposing tassel. When he reached the sideboard, he poured out a glass of water, and drank it off, then retracing his footsteps, he passed out of the room. If the guests at first mistook him for a ghost, they had ample time to be undeceived as he passed in review before them, and to recognise the master of the house. He was a somnambulist, and when his wife flattered herself that he was asleep in bed, he appeared among his guests, giving the lie direct to all that she had asserted about his unwilling absence.

It has sometimes happened to those who have wished to make an appearance above their means, that unexpected disclosures have marred their attempts. Mrs. S. was in straitened circumstances, and was obliged to do many things for herself, which she would have left to a servant, had she not been so situated. Still she delighted in fashionable society, and in such it was her great object to keep up an appearance. A large coarse rubber was still in her hand, with which she had been dusting some of the furniture, when she heard Lady Mary on the stairs. To be seen on such intimate terms with the horror in her hand was dreadful; but there was neither time nor place to hide it, so she thrust it at once into her pocket, and met her visitor with tolerable ease, but could not but perceive that she wore a suppressed smile all the time of her stay. This was accounted for after she took leave, for there was the coarse soiled rubber dangling at considerable length from her pocket hole. On another occasion she was at a loss to find a proper conveyance for an answer to an invitation she had received from the wife of a nobleman. She had written it on the nicest paper, and in her very best style. Her maid undertook to despatch it by a smart footman of her acquaintance, who wore a handsome livery. The lady was quite satisfied on the subject, but some hours after was told, a person waited to see her. A woman with dirty face and hands, a tattered gown, and a cap so soiled and smoked that it might have been guessed any colour but white, appeared to demand payment for the errand on which she had been sent from the huckster's shop by the faithless footman. She had carried the answer to the lady, and as she had been told to take care that it was delivered, she absolutely refused to give it into any hands but hers, saying that "her mistress" had bid her "for her life, give it to nobody else." It may be supposed with what cheerfulness the lady answered the demand.

Poor Astley the artist, when in very low circumstances, took the greatest pains to conceal his situation from his intimates, and to keep up a respectable appearance. He was reduced to many shifts to accomplish this object. One day he joined a party of artists in an excursion into the country; Sir Joshua Reynolds was among them. The day being oppressively warm, there was a general call to "cast off coats." Astley for some time refused to comply; at length, overcome by the bantering of his companions, he very reluctantly suffered them to pull off his coat. The waistcoat whose repairs he had hoped would never have met mortal eyes, was now exhibited to view. The back, made out of one of his landscapes, represented a foaming cascade, and elicited shouts of laughter.

"James," said a friend of ours to his servant, as he was going out one day, "take those birds to my uncle, and say that I hope he will eat them for his dinner." As he spoke he pointed to some game which had been just sent to him from the country, and which lay on a table near the window. In the evening, when he returned home, the first thing he did, according to his custom, was to go over to the window to look at his pet canary birds; but cage and birds were gone. "Where are my canaries?" he called to the servant. "Sir," said James, "you bid me for to take them to your uncle, and to say that you sent them for his dinner." The uncle was a precise old gentleman, that would be treated with deference, more particularly by his nephew. Moreover, he was an invalid, and as his appetite had to be coaxed, and his dinner was a matter of interest, "How kind and thoughtful!" said he, as the servant laid the basket down, with his nephew's compliments, that he hoped he would eat the birds which he sent, for his dinner. The basket was opened; there was the cage, and the two little canary birds, fluttering and chirping about in it. The old gentleman glared and stamped; at first he concluded that his nephew was gone mad, but soon looked on the affair as a stupid bad joke—a notion that his nephew could never get thoroughly out of his head.

A bird-catcher in Plymouth used to conceal the birds, as he caught them, in his hat, but one day meeting Northcote on the road, he wished to make a respectful bow, and doffing his hat, out flew a whole bevy of birds, chirping and flapping their wings, to the no slight confusion of the man, and the amusement of the artist.

Children sometimes make unexpected disclosures, which produce great awkwardness. A gentleman dining with a friend one day, was struck by the earnestness with which one of the little girls regarded him, and taking her on his lap, he caressed her. "Please, sir," said she, "tell me what is in the house next to you; I'd like very much to know, and to see it?" "And tell me, my little dear, why you wish to know?" "Because I heard mamma say, Sir, that you were next door to a brute." We may suppose how mamma felt when she heard herself thus quoted.

"What are you about, my dear?" said his grandmother to a little boy who was sidling along the room, and casting furtive glances at a gentleman who was paying a visit. "I am trying, grandmamma, to steal papa's hat out of the room, without letting that one see it," said he, pointing to the gentleman, "for papa wants him to think that he is out."

When George IV. was in Ireland, he was one morning entertained by a nobleman at his beautiful seat. There was great anxiety that the déjeuner should go off with the greatest éclat. Along the splendid hall, tables were spread, at which every delicacy that wealth could procure, and every ornament that taste could devise, might be seen. A table specially set for the royal guest was so placed that he could be seen by all the company. A gallery was erected at the extremity of the hall, where numbers who were not of a sufficiently high grade to make part of the assembly, had still the advantage of hearing and seeing all that passed. The hostess had placed her lovely children where they could be seen by his Majesty, and she felt a thrill of pleasure when she heard him call one of her young beauties to his side. Taking her on his knee, he spoke to her in the gracious manner for which he was distinguished. He asked her for a kiss, but the honour was most bluntly declined by a decided No. He pressed on the subject. The same repulsive No was repeated, "And why, my dear," said the king, who had set her down in his mind as a premature prude, "and why, my dear, won't you give me a kiss?" "Because," said the child, staring full in his face, and speaking in an energetic tone, "because you are the ugliest man I ever saw in my life." This was probably the first time in the course of his existence, that he had been treated with so little ceremony. The company felt confused, and the mother horrified. Had she been like some that we have known, we might have wound up the story by saying, that after the banquet was over, the child was well whipped, and sent supperless to bed; but the fair lady was too gentle and loving to adopt harsh measures.

In the country part of Ireland where we resided for some years, we remember a wedding which was much talked of at the time. A young man, who visited at the house of a farmer, became deeply smitten with the personal charms of his younger daughter, and proposed to him for her. As he was well to do in the world, he was accepted. It was in the good times before famine and pestilence had spread such a universal gloom over that unfortunate country, and, as was the custom, great preparations were made for the marriage feast, and cousins to the fortieth generation and all the neighbours were invited to join in the festivities. On such occasions it was no unusual thing to see tables laid out in the barn for the accommodation of 150 persons, and if ever tables were excusable for being so rude as to groan in the face of their guests, these were, when the ponderous weight of provisions which they sustained is taken into consideration. The preparations for the wedding feast, to which we have alluded, were at least equal to anything of the kind which had taken place in that part of the country for a long time. The ceremony was performed in presence of all the company. The priest had bestowed his benediction, and the bridegroom, impatient to be the first to salute his bride, threw aside the thick veil which concealed her face. When oh! horror of horrors, he beheld, not the fair girl whom he had chosen, but her elder sister, who was blind of an eye and dreadfully pitted with the small-pox. He looked indignantly at the father, who could only say, "it was all fair that the elder should go first." He looked imploringly at the priest, who could only say, "there was no help, and that the rite just performed was in his church a holy sacrament." He looked furiously at his bride, who could only murmur out that "she would do her best to be a good wife." The neighbours observed that if he didn't eat heartily of the feast set before him, it wasn't the fault of those who provided it, for the best of everything was there, and if he didn't dance with all his heart, it wasn't the fault of the pipers, who played up their merriest lilt.

CHAPTERS ON CHURCHES.

MY DEAR READER,

If thou art indeed willing confidently to consign thyself to my capricious hobby-horse, and to launch forth with me into pure ether, we will wend our way together from this our land of clouds, to where brighter suns shine out from more intensely azure skies; there to mark what the art of favoured man hath accomplished, as an offering of gratitude toward the Giver of all good. We take our flight over strait and strand, over champaign and mountain barrier, over fertile plain and sluggish lagoon, and alight in an immense piazza surrounded with palaces. Pillar rests upon pillar, arch ranges by arch, in endless succession. Truly the beauty of uniformity is here, and that grandeur produced by interminable repetition. Grim figures, too, here and there reposing on the sides of the arches, look down with an air of calm dignity on the busy, bustling crowds, passing and repassing in the arcades around them; thus have they gazed for centuries, and thus will they gaze until their stony couches crumble beneath the attacks of time, or shiver under them, through some grand catastrophe of nature.

But what is this strange building before us, whose leaden cupolas mingle in colour with the sky? this mixture of mosque and cathedral, contrasting so violently with the neighbouring edifices, its harlequin hues of unrivalled brilliancy, with their shades of sober grey; its clusters of thin banded shafts, with their columns of classical proportion; its picturesque forms with their stately regularity. It appears to be a magnificent medley of all things "rare and strange." There are arches round, and others pointed; here are pictures apparently enlarged from the slim grotesque illuminations of the 13th century; and there rampant bronze horses, from the top of some Roman arch of triumph; here the "contemplative dome" of the East, and there the "aspiring pinnacle" of the northern nations. The materials of the structure are mosaic work, gold, and the richest and most variegated marbles. Is it mosque, church, palace or glittering bazaar? Let us enter by one of these doorways, and ascertain. We find ourselves in a narrow vestibule, running the whole width of the building, and divided by columns and arches into three square compartments, each covered by a domed ceiling, enriched with mosaics on a gold ground. The pillars, walls, and pavement, are of polished marbles.

This is no mosque, or we should not see the human figure depicted above us. It may be a palace. Let us advance circumspectly, lest we suddenly intrude into some princely presence. No, we are still mistaken; the tread and aspect of yon squalid beggar, who, brushing past us, penetrates with firm yet humble confidence into the inmost recesses, undecieve us, and assure us that we are in the habitation of no earthly potentate, but in the house of Him in whose sight all men are equal,—of his Father, and our Father, of his God and our God. Can we prevent a transient film of envy at the man whose privilege it is to worship day by day in so glorious a temple, from dimming the clearness of our mental vision, or can we restrain "the vermillion of shamefacedness" from tinging our cheek, when we call to mind the coldness and nakedness of the whitewashed walls, and the inhospitality of the closed doors, of our churches at home? This is in truth a church, and you will most probably have guessed ere now, that it is the St. Mark's of Venice,—of the Christian world, whose pavements have been trodden by the feet of pilgrim popes, and whose walls have witnessed, for a longer succession of years than those of any other edifice in the world, the gorgeous displays of religious ceremonial. For to and from this building, the heart of the queen of cities, of the "sea-born Venus," have streamed and returned for centuries, through those vast veins and arteries, the branching and intersecting canals, multitudinous processions of prince and priest, of patriarch and doge, nun and noble lady, inspired by religious zeal or warlike enthusiasm, and glittering with all the wealth of this once richest of republics. At one time, no expedition could be undertaken, nor public act of importance performed, without the sanction and sanctification of the Church, so that on every great occasion, the magnates of Venice repaired to their cathedral, to obtain the blessing of their patriarch, and to solicit the approval and intercession of their evangelistic patron, whose mortal remains therein reposed, in a jewelled shrine. Hence St. Mark's became the fount of vitality, whence this great body received all its energy and animation. The Venetians owed much of their boldness and consequent success to the belief, that their possession of the corrupt and earthly saint entitled them to the favour and protection of the heavenly and glorified saint; this belief nerved their arm in conflict, and gave them courage for their hazardous commercial enterprises. No wonder, then, that their gratitude rendered their saint's mausoleum one of the richest on the face of the earth. It was made "the heir of dead doges," and its treasury was filled, and its walls adorned, with the gold of pious merchants, the trophies of despoiled enemies, and the offerings of zealous pilgrims.

The building itself is as unique and isolated in its character as the city it graces; it is the only perfect specimen existing of a style of Christian architecture, which, having had its origin in the East, became the parent of a numerous offspring, indeed of all the grades of the Moorish style, even down to the modern Turkish; it afterwards was wedded to the Romanesque of the Western Empire, and its features are to be traced in many of the descendants of these two parents of Christian architecture. We will not pause to deduce the pedigree of this style,—called the Byzantine, from Byzantium the city of its birth; still, we may stop to consider in what manner it arose. In old Rome there were many deserted temples, ruined courts of justice, (basilicæ,) and other places of public assembly, into which the tender young congregations of Christians, as soon as they ventured to forsake their burrows in the sand—the catacombs, were permitted to creep, until they grew sufficiently strong and healthy to possess shells of their own, to erect independent places of worship.

In Constantine's new city, there were no halls, no available buildings; so the converted were compelled to erect churches for themselves, and, from their necessity, a new style arose, adapted to the requirements of their worship, though containing in its details some vestiges of the architecture of the old seat of the empire. The dome, however, was a new feature, and it therefore became the distinguishing characteristic of the Byzantine style. The religion of Christ was triumphant, consequently, these first temples were magnificent; Constantine built many churches, that of the Divine Wisdom (Sancta Sophia) was the chief. It, however, was entirely rebuilt by Justinian, in the year 537. Inasmuch as St. Sophia was the counterpart of St. Mark's, which was erected by architects from Constantinople, in the year that Justinian commenced his work, and, as the present mosque consists of that emperor's building, with but few additions, (though shorn of its ornaments, by the infidel Turk,) I shall take the liberty of drawing a comparison between it and St. Mark's, during our progress,—trusting to the description of the former by other observers; for

U

I am not one of those who have beheld either the interior, or exterior, of that renowned pile.

To return to our description: we were in the narthex, or porch of the cathedral. Here it was, in the earliest periods of the Church, that the penitent, catechumen, or uninitiated person, and new convert congregated, during the more solemn services to a participation in which they were not admitted. They were not, however, left here without instruction, for they had but to raise their eyes to the roof, to behold a pictorial history of the creation of the patriarchal world, a chronicle of the earliest times, written in no obscure characters, but in an universal language, with the alphabet of form, equally legible to the rude savage and to the man of civilization. The pictures form a consecutive series, commencing on the south dome,—that is, that to the right on entering by one of the western doors; for old churches were universally so erected, that the worshippers might face at the same time the altar, and the rising-place of the Sun of righteousness. This dome has three rows of pictures, the two uppermost representing the Acts of Creation, the lowest the Temptation and Expulsion. The soffit, or lower part of the arch separating this from the central ceiling, together with the pictures on that ceiling, exhibit scenes from the life of Noah. In that compartment representing the building of the Ark, we see that the implements employed are very similar to those of the present day; (the mosaics are of the 12th century.) A common long saw, with top and bottom sawyers, appear very conspicuously. In the Dispersion, the Saviour is represented as descending attended by angels, dividing the people into four companies. In this and throughout the whole series, the Saviour is the Agent, the presence of the Father being indicated only by the appearance of a hand from heaven. The reason of this is, because the work was executed by Greek artists, who always, with the proper delicacy of their Church, abstained from any direct representation of the First Person of the Holy Trinity. I am indebted to Lord Lindsay's "History of Christian Art" for this observation. The pictures are continued on the north dome and on two or three others, which cover a passage or continuation of the narthex on the north side of the nave, extending as far as the transept, and they end rather abruptly with the History of the Rock in Horeb. The whole of the mosaics in this portion of the building are of one period of art. The figures are soft and conventional in outline; the heads having that peculiar twist we notice in illuminations of the Norman times, and which it would be impossible for any human being correctly to imitate. Still they answer and always have answered the purpose of instruction as well, if not better than the more laboured productions of later times. The backgrounds for the figures are of gold, formed by placing laminæ of the metal on the small stones which form the basis, and covering them with a vitreous coating: the figures are executed with very small squares of coloured stone, and (to use a simile which will at once explain the matter to my lady readers) have exactly the same effect that patterns for Berlin wool-work on very large "point paper" would have, when seen from a moderate distance.

But let us proceed, and instead of returning to enter the nave by the "royal or beautiful gate" at the west end, let us pass, by this door at the east end of this passage, from the twilight of the porch to the night of the interior. A deep mysterious gloom indeed prevails around, and it is rendered more perceptible by the lights from many gold and silver lamps, scattered up and down in the space, which shine and twinkle beneath the over-arching dome, like stars and planets beneath the vaster hemisphere of heaven. Beam on, pure lights of the sanctuary, ever casting a little halo of glory round you; fit emblems of the calm and holy lives of those who, devoted to religion, consume the oil of existence in the service of their Maker, and by the brightness of their individual example create a sphere of mild radiance around them, visible through all the thick obscurity of a vicious world. In a few moments our eyes become accustomed to the darkness, and column and capital, arch and cupola, loom upon them in large and massive proportions. The materials are even richer than those we have previously seen. The immense slabs forming the walls, and the monolithic pillars are of porphyry and verd antique, the undulating pavement has lapis lazuli, agate and jasper in its interlacing circles; the pillars near the altar are of alabaster, and the roofs are of gold mosaic with richly coloured figures. Yet with this great variety of hue, there is no glare, no gaudiness,—all is subdued and harmonized. Few direct rays of light can struggle through the narrow apertures of windows, and these, before they travel very far, are overpowered by the richness of colour, and compelled to partake in the warm auriferous hue that pervades every part of the building; even the pure whiteness of alabaster is changed to a delicate rose, by the combined reflection of the multifarious tints around it.

How often, when children, have our young imaginations been dazzled and confused by descriptions of genii palaces, (or, as Mr. Lane would have them, gin palaces,) built of gold and silver, and precious stones, which we from time to time encountered in tales of Eastern romance! Being beyond our conception, they ever tended to give a gorgeous improbability to the story, and even to render what appeared to us within the limits of credibility most evidently fabulous. The little self-deception that we had been nursing up, of the possibility of the history being a veritable one, was not proof against the extravagant idea, of houses built with the rarities of our mineralogical cabinets, and set with the jewels which our mammas and sisters seemed to consider invaluable; so fancy and reason generally quarrelled, and the story-book was cast to the ground between them. Now had we but seen St. Mark's before-hand, we should have had a model for our dreams, our imagination and reasoning powers would have been reconciled, and its splendid scenes of costly brilliancy would again and again have been "hailed up" from the scene-store of memory, to form the back-grounds to many a marvellous tale of romantic fiction. Were there such an edifice in England, it would be guarded day and night, to preserve it from the depredations of the godless wretches whom frequently the prize of a little church-plate will tempt to commit the awful sin of sacrilege. Richly do these men deserve the punishment with which this crime was visited in the Middle Ages, that of having their hides "tanned," not in the figurative school-boy sense, but after a literal interpretation; not by the process of "thrashing," but by that of flaying, and nailing "the hides" to the church doors, to be tanned by wind and weather! This has been lately proved, by the diligent researches of an eminent amiable archæologist, to have been the fate of the sacrilegious in the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries. Were there such an edifice in England, it would swarm with a set of licensed showmen, to exhibit its wonders "for a consideration," to tyrannize over unfortunate antiquaries, and to— But I feel I am waxing warm when writing of these gentlemen, and being an irascible old man, I may digress so far as to trespass even upon your patience, my dear Reader; so I will bottle up my wrath for the time being, and will take the opportunity of pouring it upon their devoted heads in some future chapter, returning for the present full of grumbling and growling, to the point where I left you ready to drop on your knees from the awe-compelling grandeur of all around you.

You were in the north transept or arm of a Greek cross,—that is to say, of one in which the arms are of equal length. The centre or intersection of the cross is crowned by an immense cupola, and each branch by one of smaller dimensions. There are aisles to the nave, and transepts, separated from them by a sort of screen of pillars, arches and wall above, not reaching to the main vaulting. The east end has an apsidal, or semicircular termination. There is little sculptured ornament, the arches being almost destitute of mouldings; the columns are of elegant proportions, but the rest of the work is remarkable only for its massiveness and appearance of great solidity; without the embellishment of mosaics and marbles its general effect would be heavy. Of St. Sophia, Gibbon remarks, it was "a Greek cross inscribed in a quadrangle." This form is precisely that of St. Mark's, the corners being filled up by the continuation of the porch through which we passed on the north side, by the baptistery and the oratory of St. Zeno on the south-west side, and by chapels and vestries on the north-east and south-east sides. The roof of St. Sophia also, says Gyllius, the Byzantine historian, like this, was "a surprising piece of mosaic work," and encrusted with "delectable marbles."

Many of the pictures remained in the year 1683, when a Frenchman, a M. Grelot, paid a visit to the mosque. He enumerates amongst others a figure of the Virgin and Child, with adoring angels, on the roof of the chancel, and four cherubim on the largest dome. I should think the hearts of the few modern travellers who have had the courage to enter the forbidden precincts would have palpitated too violently to allow them to notice these minutiae of the building, and to ascertain if these figures still existed. Our Frenchman took the matter coolly enough, according to his own account; for, disguised in his Mussulman robe, he sought out some retired corner; and while the faithful were performing their ablutions, he was sketching—while they were drinking in the words of the imaan, he was imbibing the forbidden juice of the grape—while they were mumbling their prayers, he was munching pork sausages; for he had had the foresight to smuggle in the wherewithal to assuage the attacks of the enemy hunger. When thus employed, he beheld a man approach. For a Christian to be caught in the holy place was instant death. What then would be the terrible end of the "infidel dog" who was discovered committing there the three chief abominations of figure-making, wine-sipping, and swine-flesh-eating, and that after so nonchalant a fashion? With admirable presence of mind, Monsieur Grelot pocketed his dainties, pulled out his beads and "his Peter Gyllius," and pretended to "patter" his prayers—ah hypocrite that he was! But hypocrisy, alas! was of no avail; the savage Turk in solemn tones exclaimed, "Infidel dog, what makest thou here?" The intruder was almost nonplussed. Still he contrived to stammer out a lame excuse about his being attracted by the beauty of the building. But what was his delight to behold the grim features of the questioner relax into a smile! In his terror, Grelot had not recognised the man whom he had bribed to introduce him, and who had played off this little hoax upon him for his own peculiar satisfaction and entertainment.

Trusting to the accuracy of the descriptions of Gyllius, Grelot, and Gibbon, we perceive that the present St. Mark's is very similar in plan and decoration to what St. Sophia was, in the most prosperous times of Byzantium.

But, to continue our catalogue of the subjects of the mosaics. On the top of the central dome is a figure of Christ in the act of benediction; lower down, are the figures of the Apostles standing between "the Palms of Paradise;" in that to the west is a representation of the Pentecost,—the Holy Spirit descending on seated figures of the Twelve; beneath are groups of every nation under heaven. Some of the pictures in the transepts are in a later style, said to be by Titian and Paolo Veronese; but, however excellent as exhibiting the talents of these masters applied to an unusual material, they do not appear so fit and appropriate in the eye of an antiquarian to the character of the building, as those containing the personages in damp garments whom we remarked so particularly in the porch. There is a gigantic figure of our Saviour on the ceiling of the apse. A rood-screen of marble surmounted by figures separates the nave from the choir.

Crossing the nave, we enter the baptistery, which is walled out from it, and approachable only through a doorway in the south aisle. This, like the porch, is in the form of a parallelogram, with three divisions formed by arches. In the centre is a huge circular brass font on a base of steps. It is so large and so high that it passes our comprehension how it can be made use of. The cover is of bronze, shield-shaped, supporting a beautifully executed figure of St. John the Baptist. The greater part of the mosaics around illustrate the life of this saint. Those on the dome above the central division exhibit the Apostles baptizing diminutive figures in tub-shaped fonts. In the crown is the Redeemer holding the banner of the resurrection; and in the spandrels, or curved surfaces between the arches which sustain the dome, are placed figures of the four doctors of the Church, seated at their desks. We behold in the easternmost ceiling the nine orders of the heavenly hierarchy, depicted as engaged in the several offices attributed to them. In the westernmost, which is what is technically and expressively termed "waggon-head," is a representation of the Deity with rays proceeding from Him towards half-length figures of Apostles. In the soffits of the arches and lunettes, or those spaces on the wall circumscribed by the lines of the arches, in addition to the passages from the life of St. John, we find the Adoration, Flight into Egypt, Wise Men before Herod, and Massacre of the Innocents. Wherever there are not figures, there are arabesques of the brightest colours and most graceful patterns; those in the adjoining chantry of St. Zeno are remarkable for their beauty.

Having now completed our hasty survey of this most interesting of cathedrals, we may make our exit by a side-door which opens on the piazza close to the doge's palace. We have been tedious, possibly, in our detailed notices of the subjects of the mosaics. We have looked upon them, and described them, perhaps, as though they were the chief attractions, and the shell of the building a mere gilded frame for their reception; but such, indeed, was our impression when viewing them, and such, there is little doubt, would be the prevalent idea of most travellers who have beheld them. Durable as the walls in which they are inserted, they stand as perpetual memorials of the period antecedent to adoption of the readier process of painting for the purposes of decoration; accomplished with great labour and no little skill, they remain as everlasting monuments of the piety of those who sacrificed their talents and possessions for the greater glory of the place where God's "honour dwelleth." We specified the subjects in order that those who study such things might gather from the catalogue some inkling of the general arrangement, composition, and grouping adopted by the designers of the Middle Ages. In the porch we saw initiatory histories from the Old Testament,—in the nave, passages from the New Testament,—in the baptistery, the operations of the Holy Spirit and the life of the Baptist. There seems to have been a regular system pursued throughout, well worthy a more complete investigation.

Should you wish, dear reader, to obtain a more accurate idea of either St. Mark's or St. Sophia, for the former I refer you to Howell's "Survey of the Signorie of Venice," and Lord Lindsay's excellent "History of Christian Art"—for the latter to Symeon Gyllius, Du Cange, and Grelot. A few years, however, will render Venice as accessible as any one could reasonably desire, and a trip to it will be as little thought of as a journey from Newcastle to London was in my young days. If you are not so sanguine as to believe that ere five revolutions of the globe be accomplished St. Paul's and St. Mark's will be neighbours, and that you will be able to travel to Venice on a steam-Pegasus almost as rapidly as my own hobby-horse; and if you are anxious to have a peep at this glorious duomo, more lasting than that which I hope to have afforded you, hie to the enchanter's cell in ———, Regent's Park—say what you would like to behold—seat yourself in darkness in the revolving magic circle, regardless of the subterraneous, unearthly groanings which assault your ears, and, in a few minutes, you will be transported into the dusky nave of St. Mark's, and will be listening to the notes of the many-mouthed organ rolling through its vaulted ceilings. When your rapture has, in some measure, subsided, and while you are watching the dark shadows of night chased away by the less obscure shadows of day, let fancy wave her fairy wand and people the vast space before you with innumerable figures. Look carefully,—there are old men, women, and children, prostrate in prayer. But where are the healthy and strong? where active youth and robust manhood? where the mailed warriors of Venice, and her robed nobles? and why is the doge himself absent when a pope honours St. Mark's by his presence? In that dim adytum of the choir a pope is performing mass, and you see indistinctly the forms of white-robed priests, flitting to and fro around him, revealed by the mournful light of a few fitful lamps, which also cast now and then their sickly glare on the pallid faces of the prostrate crowd. A low monotonous chanting is carried on in the choir, lost occasionally amid the sighs and murmurings of prayer that proceed from those before you. Many anxious eyes are turned towards the door. Why these wistful, hopeful glances? why these sighs of sorrow? why these mutterings of prayer? The sighs are for the danger, the hopes and prayers for the success, of the fathers, sons, or husbands of these prostrate ones; for the hosts of Venice, who are gone out to battle. Even at this moment their galleys grapple with those of their enemies outside the mole, like huge sea-serpents entwined in grasp of deadly hatred on the peaceful bosom of the deep. They fight for yon fugitive pontiff, against the son of the Emperor Frederick, who, at his father's behest, does battle for the false against the lawful pope.

The service proceeds. Suddenly, a noise like the roll of distant thunder reaches the ears of those kneeling. It is the murmur of a multitude; louder and louder it swells, nearer and nearer it approaches, causing many hearts to leap between fear and hope. Louder and louder it swells; yet above all its roar the low, quiet chanting of the mass continues to be heard. Now it is finished, and "with solemn step and "slow," the stolid ecclesiastics, with the venerable father at their head, file towards the door, from which the helpless multitude instinctively shrink. With hands clasped in prayer, with eyes uplifted, and with resigned mien, that majestic man awaits patiently the advent to him either of grateful joy or of extreme sorrow. Now the roar is deafening. The clear voice of the silver clarion is to be distinguished from the hoarse acclamation of the crowd. Now the clank of armed heels rings upon the pavement; the doors burst open, and unfold to the gaze of all, cause, indeed, for rejoicing; for the trumpeters of Venice are sounding in triumph, and the lion standard of St. Mark waves victoriously. The notes of victory are hushed, and the standard is lowered as the procession enters. The ranks of warriors unfold, and two noble figures advance, side by side, up the lane of people; the one, half-senator half-warrior, by his dress, the other, a prince by his carriage. The bold step and flushed brow of the one proclaim the victor; the downcast eye, compressed lip, and pale cheek of the other, signify the vanquished. Approaching the pontiff, the doge kneels to present his captive's sword, and to ask a blessing of the Church. The prince stands erect, with head averted, unwilling to kneel to him whom he has been taught to consider an usurper of the highest dignity in Christendom. Raising his right hand to heaven with marked majesty, the holy man begins, "Receive the blessing of the Church, my sons;" and, after pronouncing it, adds these memorable words, "Take, Ciani, this ring, and by my advice give it to the sea, obliging it thereby unto thee; which both thou and thy successors, for ever hereafter, likewise shall do yearly on the same day, to the end that posterity may know that thou hast in time past by right of war purchased the entire dominion over the sea, making it subject unto thee as a woman unto her husband."

But, lo! kindness hath conquered that spirit which the fate of arms could not vanquish. To find himself placed side by side with his generous conqueror, had softened his spirit; but to find himself addressed as a son by the man whom he had persecuted, subdues it, and he kneels down, to rise no longer a foe, but a friend; no longer an enemy, but an ally,—a faithful son of his spiritual mother, the Church, and yet of his temporal father, the Emperor. Filial obedience, the religion of nature, ever prepares the way for the religion of grace.

Now, resuming their places in the choir, the priests raise the loud song of triumph, and the increased concourse respond with hearts gushing with gratitude and mouths filled with praise. The penitential glimmer of lamps is exchanged for the blaze of a thousand candles, and the organ's peal reverberates so loudly and so prolongedly through the arched aisles, that many eyes are turned upwards as though to see if the saints on the ceiling were not taking up and perpetuating the song of praise. And it would not be wonderful if to some, these saints may appear to smile with responsive joy, when seen through the refracting medium of salt tears of gratitude. The captive prince is afterwards sent to conciliate his father, taking with him a rich peace-offering from the well-stocked treasury, an angel of peace with a pax of gold.

ITALIAN PEASANT GIRLS AT A FOUNTAIN.

THE dwellers in a northern clime and humid sky can scarce form an idea of the value of a fountain in the sunny south. To the Italian peasantry it is not merely a luxury and an ornament—it is a permanent and enduring good, an essential to their every-day existence. In those districts where fountains are not common, the toil of the poor is materially increased, and their comforts at the same time proportionably abridged. Water, in many instances, can only be procured with severe labour from deep wells or distant streams, and, when obtained, is frequently so much impregnated with earthy salts as to act injuriously upon the health of those who are compelled to use it as a daily beverage. In the event of a failure of the wells, which the thirsty soil in some seasons of the year occasionally refuses to supply, recourse must be had to stagnant pools and ditches, often swarming with the products of animal life to an extent sufficient to disgust the most accommodating appetite. What a treasure then, in such circumstances, must be a spring like that depicted by our artist! one which unceasingly pours forth a stream of the liquid element sufficient for the wants of all comers, and available with the least possible exertion.

The painter has taken care that the fountain should not want its attendant nymphs—not the fabled immortals of a worn-out mythology, but real living and loving maidens and mothers, who rejoice in its bounties and turn them to the best account—the advantage of their fellow-creatures. One has filled her vessel, and, poising it carefully on her head, (which is protected from undue pressure by a small circlet of straw or other softer material,) is departing for her cottage home, attended by a chubby faced bare-footed urchin, whose whole attention is absorbed by a large bunch of grapes which the mother has just plucked from the overhanging vine. We have also an illustration of another of the benefits of a fountain, in the bright-eyed girl who, seated on the steps, has taken the opportunity of making her toilet where she can so readily obtain not only water for her ablutions but the aid of a natural mirror. The clustering grapes around give unmistakeable evidence that it is the season of the vintage,—a time of rustic festivity; and the little coquette is doubtless anxious to render her charms as captivating as possible in the eyes of her bachelor friends when they meet for a dance or other recreation after the labours of the day. Another damsel is kindly engaged in lifting the heavy picher on the head of a companion, who stoops to receive the burthen. The graceful walk and apparent ease with which many of the young females of Italy carry their vessels on their heads for considerable distances, excites the astonishment of strangers, who have been accustomed only to see water carried in a couple of pails, swinging from the yoke across the sturdy shoulders of a porter.

The back-ground of the picture is occupied by a calm sun-lit bay, bounded by the distant outline of a mass of buildings. The tranquil appearance of the water, and the absence of figures, contrast well with the bustle and activity which pervade the foreground, and combine to render the whole a charming picture of southern landscape. The merits of the engraver are sufficiently known to render anything more than the mention of the name of Englehart unnecessary; and those who are familiar with the original painting will at once acknowledge that he has successfully transferred to the steel the beauties with which Mr. Williams has adorned his canvass.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER XXXV.

WHEREIN IS FAITHFULLY DEPICTED THE CONSTANCY OF THE TURTLE DOVE.

It was the important Thursday on which Lady Lombard's chief dinner-party of the season was to take place, and the mighty coming event cast a proportionate shadow before—for a day or two previous, a gloom, as of an approaching tempest, hung over the devoted mansion; visitors were scarce, the invited would not call because they were invited, and the non-invited avoided the place as though it were haunted, lest it should be supposed they wished to be invited, which for the most part they did. As the event drew nearer, signs appeared heralding its approach; shoals of fishmongers, laden with the treasures of the deep, poured down the area steps; the number of oysters which entered that house would have surprised Neptune himself; squadrons of poulterer's men brought flocks of feathered fowls, and of fowls unfeathered; there was not a single species of edible ornithology of which Lady Lombard did not possess one or more specimens—she would have ordered a Podiceps Cornutus had she ever heard of such a creature. The eighty-guinea advertisement-horse, with the plated harness, in Messrs. Fortnum & Mason's spring cart, began to think his masters must have established a dépôt in the far west, and that he was engaged in transporting thither the major portion of their seductive stock. In the interior of that dwelling house, confusion reigned supreme. Up-stairs, Mrs. Perquisite, the housekeeper, rendered life a burden to the female servants, and tyrannized over her hapless mistress till free-will became a mockery mentioned in connexion with that much-thwarted widow. It was enough for Lady Lombard to express a wish; Mrs. Perquisite, a living embodiment of the antagonistic principle, was instantly in arms to oppose it.

"What, your Ladyship!" would she exclaim, (and be it observed, her voice was at least an octave higher than any good-tempered woman's ever was, and pitched in a most aggravating key;) "What! not uncover the marble table! I never heard of such a thing! Her Ladyship will have it taken off, Jane—not uncover that bootiful Paria marble! inlaid with Lappuss Lazily. Why, your Ladyship must be a-dreaming!"

"I thought that the satin cover matching the chairs, and having poor dear Sir Pinchbeck's arms embroidered on it, perhaps it might have been better to leave in on, Mrs. Perquisite," pleaded Lady Lombard, meekly.

"Of course your Ladyship can do as you! Ladyship pleases; if your Ladyship likes to let yourself down by looking after such things, which was never the case when I lived with the Dowager Marchioness of Doubledutch, now no more, having remembered all her faithful servants handsomely on her death-bed, without a dry eye about her in the 76th year of her age. Perhaps I had better go down stairs, which am only in the way, and your Ladyship can direct Jane to set out the rooms according to your Ladyship's fancy."

Poor Lady Lombard, when once that defunct Dowager Marchioness was let loose upon her, felt that her fate was sealed. It was not for her, the widow of a man who had been knighted, to fly in the face of the peerage; so she humbly authorized the removal of the Lombard arms, implored Perquisite to arrange the rooms as she had been accustomed to set out those of the poor dear Marchioness, and betook herself to the sanctity of her own boudoir, leaving the field to the virago, to whom she paid 60*l.* per annum for keeping her in a continual state of moral bondage.

But while such scenes as the foregoing were enacting in the upper portions of the establishment, the French chef de cuisine, Monsieur Hector Achille Abelard d'Haricots, was making a perfect Pandemonium of the lower regions. The physical energy displayed by that ardent foreigner was truly admirable; his ubiquity was marvellous; the tassel at the top of his white night-cap appeared to have been multiplied infinitesimally, and to pervade space—the sound of his polyglot exhortations and reflections re-echoed through the lofty servants' offices. Wonderful were the strange oaths he poured forth, when Antoine, a long, limp, shambling French lad, "son élève, zic son of —hélas! baigne des larmes, he even till at present scarcely could pronounce her name—his angelic sister, since some time entombed, having espoused un brave Anglais, his long-lost Rose Amélie Marie-Antoinette de Brownsmit, née d'Haricots,"—when this unworthy offspring of international alliance committed some unpardonable artistic error, and, unlike "Polly" of lyrical celebrity, did not "put the kettle on," or "take it off again," exactly at the critical moment. Deep and nasal were his ejaculations when some obtuse butcher's boy would not understand his "Anglishe," which that somewhat apocryphal personage "ce brave garçon Brownsmit" (who was Hector Achille's Mrs. Harris, and was consequently brought forward on all occasions) had declared he spoke like a native.

"Mais, que diable ! vot is zies ?" he would exclaim, raising his eye-glass to examine with a face of deep disgust a shin of beef; "vot is zies ? Did I not ordinaire ~~un~~ gigot, vot you call a leg of ship, and 'ere you 'ave transported to me,—ah, que c'est dégoûtant !—zic stump of a cow: qu'ils sont bêtes, ces Anglais—takes 'im away."

But if there were earthquakes and tornados in the culinary and decorative departments, difficulties hydra-headed had arisen in the boudoir of Lady Lombard, where sat a council of three, Rose merely acting as secretary, and writing just what she was bidden. The third privy councillor (besides the giver of the feast and Mrs. Arundel) was a certain Mrs. Colonel Brahmin, relict of the late Colonel Brahmin, which gallant officer had been cut off in the prime of life, together with 200 tawny privates of the —th native infantry, by falling into an ambush of armed Sikhs, headed by Meer Ikan Chopimatoo at Choakum-surree. After this afflicting event, Mrs. Colonel Brahmin returned to England, in the thirty-third year of her age, with a small pension, a very becoming widow's cap, and an earnest desire to replace the victim of Ikan Chopimatoo's scimitar without loss of time.

Now, in bygone hours, the lamented Sir Pinchbeck Lombard, in his capacity of East India director, had known and patronized the lamented Brahmin; what, therefore, could be more natural than that their disconsolate widows should desire to mingle their tears? And, indeed, Mrs. Colonel Brahmin was so anxious to insure the effectual working of this Mutual-misery-mingling Association, that, on her return to England, she was good enough to stay six months with Lady Lombard; and although, during the whole of that period, she told every one she was anxiously looking out for a house, so few edifices are there in London and its vicinity, that she was unable to find one till the very week before her hostess was about to start on a self-defensive tour to the lakes. Since then, she had been vizier-in-chief to her wealthy sister in affliction,—riding in her carriage, eating her dinners, and entertaining her guests, especially such eligible males as appeared likely to succeed to the (nominal) command left vacant by the cut-off colonel; but, up to the present time, these young eligibles had remained unattached, and the appointment was still to be filled up. Mrs. Brahmin was not really pretty, though, by dint of a pair of fine eyes, glossy hair, a telling smile, and little white hands, she contrived to pass as such. In her manner, she affected the youthful and innocent; and very well she did it, considering her natural astuteness, and the amount of experience and savoir vivre she had acquired when following the world-wide fortunes of the cut-off one. Lady Lombard believed in her to a great extent, and liked her better than she deserved. Perquisite saw at a glance, not only through, but considerably beyond her, and hated her with all the rancour of a vulgar mind. But Mrs. Brahmin was too strong for Perquisite, and with her soft voice and imperturbable simplicity put her down more thoroughly than the veriest virago could have done;—the house-keeper's most bitter speeches and cutting innuendoes producing much the same effect on the mild Susanna, that a blow might have done upon an air-cushion—viz. exhausting the aggressor's strength, without making the slightest impression on her opponent.

Mrs. Brahmin had been prepared to find in Mrs. Arundel a dangerous rival, and was ready to defend her position to the death, and do battle à l'outrance for her portion of the Lombard leaves and fishes. But her courage was not destined to be put to the proof, the present being an occasion on which an appeal to arms was unnecessary,—diplomacy would suit her purpose better, and on diplomacy, therefore, she fell back. She had not been ten minutes in Mrs. Arundel's company ere she discovered her weak point,—she was unmistakably vain. Accordingly, with artless simplicity, Mrs. Brahmin indirectly praised every thing Mrs. Arundel said or did, and Mrs. Arundel straightway suffered her discrimination to be tickled to sleep, took Mrs. Brahmin at her own price, and doated on her from that time forth, until—but we will leave events to develop themselves in their due course.

Rose and Mrs. Brahmin were mutual enigmas—neither could comprehend the other. Rose had heard the details of the "Chopimatoo" affair, and all her sympathies were ready to be enlisted in behalf of the interesting widow; but the "sweet simplicity," cleverly as it was done, did not deceive her. With the instinct of a true nature, she felt that it was assumed, and that beneath it lay the real character. What that might be, remained to be discovered,—and she suspended her judgment till opportunity might afford her a glimpse of that which was so studiously concealed. On the other hand, the character of Rose was one which Mrs. Brahmin could by no means comprehend, perhaps because, in its entireness, it was beyond and above her comprehension; but parts of it she discerned clearly enough, and most particularly did they puzzle her. For instance, she perceived that Rose had a mind, properly so called,—that her ideas and opinions were bonâ fide the product of her own intellect, and not like those of too many girls, a dim reflex of somebody else's; but the straightforward, earnest truthfulness of her nature she could by no means fathom, such a quality being essentially foreign to her own disposition; accordingly, she deemed it put on for a purpose, which purpose it behoved her to find out. But her investigations did not prosper well, from the simple fact that ex nihilo nil fit;—Rose, having nothing to conceal, concealed it most effectually.

Many and important were the consultations held in the boudoir by this council of three, as to who should, and who should not, be invited. Lady Lombard's smooth brow grew furrowed with the unwonted demand upon her powers (?) of mind.

"Sir Benjamin and Lady Boucher regret exceedingly that a previous engagement prevents their accepting Lady Lombard's kind invitation for Thursday, the —th."

"Dear me, how dreadfully provoking!" sighed the perplexed "invitress." "My dear Susanna," (the Brahmin's Christian name,) "the Bouchers are engaged, and there'll be nobody fit to meet the General Gudgeons. What are we to do?"

"Would you ask the Dackerels? They're such very nice people, and live in such very good style, dear Lady Lombard," cooed Mrs. Brahmin, (for, be it observed, that bereaved one's method of speaking, together with the low, gentle, sleepy, caressing tones of her soft voice, involuntarily reminded her hearers of the cooing of a dove, or the purring of a cat.)

"They're only lieutenant-colonels, are they, my love?" inquired Lady Lombard, doubtingly.

"Oh! my dear Lady Lombard, surely you must recollect, he has been a full colonel, by purchase, these five years, vice Rawbone Featherbed, who sold out, and married an heiress,—at least," murmured Innocence, remembering herself, or rather her part, "she was said to be very rich; but, of course, it must have been a love match. I cannot believe people are so—so horrid as to marry from any other motive."

"Well, then, we'd better ask the Dackerels. Miss Arundel, my love, will you request the pleasure of Colonel and Mrs. Dackerel's company,—(with one I only),—at seven o'clock. That shy son with the long legs. I suppose we need not ask him, my dear."

"He's late'y come into a large Yorkshire property from an uncle on the mother's side, and has taken the surname of Dace, and, perhaps, as he's so shy, he might feel hurt at not being asked. I feel such sympathy with shyness, you know; besides somebody said he was an author," rejoined Susanna, dropping her eyelids, and looking as unconscious and disinterested as if John Dace Dackerel Dace, Esq., Barrister at Law, still depended upon that ghost of nothing, his professional income, instead of the rent-roll of the manor of Roachpool, in the West Riding.

"If they come, they'll make—let me see," mused Lady Lombard, "what did I say the Fitzsimmons's were? yes, twelve; well, then, they'll make fifteen, and the table only holds three more, and that tiresome Mr. De Grandeville hasn't sent an answer yet, and I shall be so disappointed if he does not come, for he knows everybody, and moves in such high society, and is such a tall, noble, military-looking creature."

This eulogium, recalling, probably by contrast, (seeing that the lamented Brahmin had been remarkably small of his age all through his boyhood, and never outgrown it afterwards,) sad recollections of the fair Susanna's killed and wounded, produced a little embroidered handkerchief which just held the two tears its owner felt called upon to shed on such occasions. The memory of the victim had been so often before embalmed by pearly drops in her presence, that Lady Lombard had grown rather callous on the subject, and she abruptly invaded the sanctity of grief, by exclaiming,

"It lies between the Lombard Browns and the Horace Hiccorys, my dear. The Hiccorys live in better style, I know; Mrs. Hiccory was to have been presented at court last year, only little Curatius was born instead,—the most lovely child! but the Lombard Browns are godsons, at least he is, of poor dear Sir Pinchbeck's, and they've not dined here this season."

"I think, dear Lady Lombard, if I might venture to advise, the Horace Hiccorys would do best. Mrs. General Gudgeon would get on so well with Mrs. Hiccory, I'm sure; and I'm afraid Mrs. Dackerel,—you know, she's very clever,—writes poetry, those sweet things in the Bijou—all clever people are sarcastic, you know—I'm afraid Mrs. Dackerel might laugh at poor dear Mr. Lombard Brown's little eccentricity about his H's."

"Ah yes, that's true," returned Lady Lombard, "yes, I forgot his H's."

"As he probably does himself," whispered Mrs. Arundel, aside to Rose.

"Then, my dear Miss Arundel, may I trouble you to write a note to the Horace Hiccorys,—with one I, my love,—15, Bellairs Terrace, Park Village West. What a pretty hand you write, and so quick! Then, if Mr. De Grandeville will only come, the table will be filled properly."

"And a dear charming party it will be," cooed the bereaved one, who had manœuvred herself into an invitation at an early stage of the proceedings.

"Yes, my love, I hope it will," replied the giver of the feast anxiously, "and if I was quite sure that Perquisite and Harriot would not quarrel, and that General Gudgeon would not take too much port wine after dinner, and tell his gentleman's stories to the ladies up in the drawing-room, more particularly since I hear Miss Mac Salvo has taken an extra-serious turn lately, I should feel quite happy about it all."

"You'd better add a postscript to the great Gudgeon's note, mentioning the port wine, and its alarming consequences, Rose," whispered the incorrigible Mrs. Arundel. Her daughter smiled reprovingly, and the sitting concluded.

Exactly at the time when Lady Lombard had completely given him up, and was revolving in her anxious mind how she might best supply his loss, De Grandeville condescended graciously to vouchsafe a favourable answer.

On the afternoon of the eventful day, as Frere was returning from his place of business, he met—of course, accidentally—Tom Bracy, who immediately took possession of his vacant arm, and engaged him in a disquisition on the use of formic acid as an anæsthetic agent, which discussion proved so deeply interesting to his companion, that in less than five minutes he was completely lost to all outward objects, and reduced (for all practical purposes) to the intellectual level of a docile child of three years old.

"Well," continued Frere, eagerly, as Bracy paused before a hairdresser's shop, "well, supposing, for the sake of argument, I consent to waive my objection; supposing I allow that by the process you describe, you've produced your acid—"

"Excuse my interrupting you one moment, but I was going in here to have my hair cut: if you're not in a particular hurry, perhaps you'll come in with me, and I think I can show you where you are wrong."

"Yes—no, I'm not in a hurry; come along, I'm convinced there's a mistake in your theory which upsets your whole argument,—merely subject to the common analyzing process—"

"By the way," observed Bracy, carelessly, "you'd be all the better for a little judicious trimming yourself; besides, it's more sociable. This gentleman and I both want our hair cut—Sit down, Frere."

"Eh? nonsense; I never have my hair cut except when the hot weather sets in," remonstrated that individual; but he was fairly in the toils. Bracy set a garrulous hairdresser's man at him, who deprived him of his hat, popped him down in the appointed chair, and enveloped him in a blue-striped wrapper, before he very well knew where he was, or had arrived at any kind of decision whatsoever on the subject. No sooner was he seated than Bracy administered a fresh dose of his anæsthetic agent; Frere resumed his argument, and long ere he had exhausted the catalogue of chemical tests to which his opponent's theory (invented for the occasion) might be subjected, the hair-cutter (previously instructed) had reduced his hair and whiskers to the latitude and longitude usually assigned to such capillary attractions by the "manners and customs of ye English in ye nineteenth century." And thus Frere became, for the time being, a reasonable looking mortal, and Bracy won a new hat, which he had betted that morning with a mutual acquaintance, on the apparently rash speculation, that he would, before the day was over, administer an anæsthetic agent to Richard Frere, under the influence of which he should have his hair cut.

Dear Rose Arundel, (excuse us the adjective, kind reader, but we own to being very fond of her,) having been a perfect godsend to everybody all day long, having thought of everything, and done everything, and looked on the bright side of everything, and sacrificed herself so pleasantly that an uninitiated beholder might have believed she was intensely selfish, and doing it all for her own personal gratification,—Rose having, amongst other gymnastics of self-devotion, run up and down stairs forty-three times in pursuit of waifs and strays from Lady Lombard's memory, committed the first bit of selfishness she had been guilty of all day, by sitting down to rest for five minutes before she began her toilet; and leaning her forehead on her hand, she thought over her own chances of pleasure or amusement during the evening. She had had one disappointment; Lewis had been invited, and Lewis would not come. He did not say he could not come, but he put on what Mrs. Arundel called his "iron face," and said shortly "the thing was impossible;" and no one could have looked on his compressed lips, and doubted the truth of the assertion. It grieved Rose, for she read his soul as it were an open book before her, and she saw there pride, that curse of noble minds, still unsubdued. Lady Lombard patronized them, and Lewis could not submit to witness it. Rose had hoped better things than this; she had not failed to observe the change that had taken place in her brother, during his residence at Broadhurst; she saw that from an ardent impetuous boy, he had become an earnest-minded, high-souled man, and in the calm dignity of his look and bearing, she recognised the evidence of conscious power, chastened by the discipline of a mind great enough to rule itself. Nor was she wrong in her conjectures; only she mistook a part for the whole, and arguing with the gentle sophistry of a woman's loving heart, concluded that to be finished, which was but in fact begun. Lewis had learned to control (except in rare instances) his haughty nature, but he relied too much on his own strength, and so he had failed as yet to subdue it. Rose was too honest to disguise the truth from herself, when it was fairly placed before her, and she acknowledged with an aching heart, that the great fault of her brother's character yet remained unconquered. Poor Rose! as this conviction forced itself upon her, how she sorrowed over it. He was so good, so noble, and she loved him so entirely—oh! why was he not perfect? If Lewis could have read her thoughts at that moment, he would have assuredly made one of the guests at Lady Lombard's hospitable board.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

DESCRIBES THE HUMOURS OF A LONDON DINNER PARTY IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

As the clock struck the half-hour, forming the juste milieu between seven and eight, post meridiem, the goodly company assembled in Lady Lombard's drawing-room, being warned by the portly butler that dinner was served, paired off and betook themselves two by two (like the animals 'coming out of Noah's Ark, as represented on the dissecting puzzles of childhood) to the lofty dining-room, where much English good cheer, disguised under absurd French names, awaited them. During the short time that Bracy had been in the house, he had not been altogether idle. He first took an opportunity of informing Lady Lombard that De Grandeville was directly descended from Charlemagne, and that he was only waiting till the death of an opulent relative should render him independent of his profession, to revive a dormant peerage, when it was generally supposed his colossal intellect, and unparalleled legal acumen, would render him political leader of the house of Lords; he then congratulated her on her good fortune in having secured the presence of this illustrious individual, who, he assured her, was in such request amongst the aristocracy of the kingdom, that he was scarcely ever to be found disengaged; and wound up by running glibly through a long list of noble names, with whom he declared the mighty Marmaduke to be hand and glove. Accordingly, good Lady Lombard, believing it all faithfully, mentally elected De Grandeville to the post of honour at her right hand, deposing for the purpose no less a personage than General Gudgeon. When we say, no less a personage, we speak advisedly, for that gallant officer, weighing sixteen stone without his snuffbox, and being fully six feet high, was, if not exactly "a Triton amongst minnows," at all events a Goliath amongst gudgeons, which we conceive to be much the same thing.

Having achieved his object of placing De Grandeville in exactly the position he wished him to occupy, Bracy next proceeded to frustrate a scheme which he perceived the fair Susanna (who was his pet detestation) to have originated for the amatory subjugation and matrimonial acquisition of John Dace Dackerel Dace, Esq., of Roachpool, in the West Riding. John D. D. had a weakness, bordering indeed on a mental hallucination; he fancied he was born to be a popular author,—"to go down to posterity upon the tongues of men," as he himself was wont to express it,—and the way in which he attempted to fulfil his exalted destiny, and effect the wished-for transit, via these unruly members of his fellow-mortals, was by writing mild dull articles, signed J. D. D., and sending them to the editors of various magazines, by whom they were always unhesitatingly rejected. The frequent repetition of these most unkind rebuffs, and the consequent delay in the fulfilment of his mission, had tended to depress the spirit (at no time an intensely ardent one) of John Dace Dackerel, and had induced a morbid habit of mind, through which, as through a yellow veil, he took a jaundiced view of society at large; and even the acquisition of the surname of Dace, and his accession to the glories of Roachpool, had scarcely restored cheerfulness to this victim of a postponed destiny. Bracy, from his connexion with Blunt's Magazine, knew him well, and had rejected, only a fortnight since, a forlorn little paper, entitled "The Curse of Genius, or the trammelled Soul's Remonstrance;" in which his own cruel position was touchingly shadowed forth in the weakest possible English. Accosting this son of sorrow in a confidential tone of voice, Bracy began:—

"As soon as you can spare a minute to listen to me, I've something rather particular to tell you!"

"To tell me?" returned the blighted barrister in a hollow voice, suggestive of any amount of black crape handkerchiefs; "what ill news have I now to arm, or I may say, to steel my soul against?" and here he observed, that it was a habit with this pseudo-author to talk, as it were, a rough copy of conversation, which he from time to time corrected by the substitution of some word or phrase which he conceived to be an improvement upon the original text.

"Perhaps it may be good news instead of bad!" remarked Bracy, encouragingly. The blighted one shook his head.

"Not for me," he murmured; then turning to Susanna he continued,—"Excuse my interrupting our conversation, but this gentleman has some intelligence to impart—or I may say, to break to me."

Mrs. Brahmin smiled sweetly such a sympathetic smile, that it went straight through a black satin waistcoat, with a cypress wreath embroidered on it in sad-coloured silk, and reached the "crushed and withered" heart of J. D. D.

"You know," continued Bracy, "I was obliged, most unwillingly, to decline that touching little thing of yours. The—what was it? the Cough of Genius?"

"The Curse," suggested its author gloomily.

"Ah! yes. I read it cough—you don't write very clearly—yes, 'the Cursing Genius.' You know, my dear Dace, we editors are placed in a very trying position. A great responsibility devolves upon us; we are scarcely free agents. Now, your article affected me deeply," (this was strictly true, for he had laughed over the most tragic touches, till the tears ran down his cheeks;) "but I was forced to decline it. I could not have put it in if my own brother had written it. You will naturally ask, Why?—Because it did not suit the tone of Blunt's Magazine!"—and as Bracy pronounced these awful and mysterious words, he shook his head and looked unutterable things; while the "child of a postponed destiny," seeing the shadow of a still farther postponement clouding his dark horizon, shook his head likewise, and relieved his clabberately-worked shirt-front of a sigh.

"But," resumed Bracy, "thinking the paper much too original to be lost, I took the liberty of handing it over to Bullbait, the Editor of the Olla Podrida. Well, sir, I saw him this morning, and he said—"

"What?" exclaimed the fated one eagerly, a hectic tinge colouring his sallow cheek.

"Don't excite yourself, my dear Dace," rejoined Bracy anxiously; "you're looking pale; too much brain work, I'm afraid. You must take care of yourself; so many of our greatest geniuses have died young. But I see you're impatient. Bullbait said,—he's a very close, cautious character, never likes to commit himself, but he actually said, he'd think about it!"

"Was that all?" groaned the disappointed Dace, relapsing into despondency.

"All! my dear sir? all! Why, what would you have? When a man like Bullbait says he'll think about a thing, I consider it a case of opus operatum—reckon the deed done. If he meant to refuse your paper, what need has he to think about it? No, Mr. Dace, if you're not correcting a proof of the 'Cough'—psia, 'Curse,' I mean—(when one once takes a wrong idea into one's head, how difficult it is to get it out again!) before the week is over, I'm no prophet. By the way," he continued, as Rose, looking better than pretty in the whitest of muslin frocks, resigned a comfortable seat to a cross old lady in a gaudy turban, which gave her the appearance, from the neck upwards, of a plain male Turk, liberally endowed with the attributes commonly assigned to his nation by writers of fairy tales and other light literature for the nursery, amongst which man-stealing and cannibalism are two of the least atrocious,—“by the way, I must introduce you to this young lady; a kindred soul, sir, one of the most rising authoresses of the day.”

"No, I really—" began the Dace, flapping about in the extremity of his shyness like one of his fishy namesakes abstracted from its native element.

"Nonsense," resumed Bracy, enjoying his embarrassment. "Miss Arundel, let me have the pleasure of making you acquainted with one of our youths of genius, a man to whom a liberal posterity will no doubt do justice, however the trammelled sycophants of a clique may combine to delay his intellectual triumphs." Then in an aside to J. D. D. he added, "Make play with her, Bullbait wants her particularly to write for the Olla, and she hangs back at present: she would merely have to say a word to him, and you might obtain the run of the magazine."

Thus urged, John Dace Dackercel Dace, Esq. called up all the energies of his nature, and by their assistance overcoming his habitual sheepishness, he caused to descend upon Rose a torrent of pathetic small-talk, which overwhelmed that young lady till dinner was announced, when he claimed her arm and floated with her down the stream of descending humanity until he found himself safely moored by her side at the dinner-table. Having thus, as he would himself have expressed it, taken the change out of that odd fish Dace, and frustrated, for the time being, the matrimonial tactics of the Brahmin's widow, Bracy was making his way through the various groups of people in search of Miss Mac Salvo, which ardent Protestant might, he considered, afford him some sport if judiciously handled, when he was suddenly intercepted by the innocent Susanna, who inquired, "Pray, Mr. Bracy, can you explain this wonderful metamorphosis in your friend Mr. Frere? he's grown quite handsome."

Thus appealed to, Bracy regarded attentively the individual in question, who was good-naturedly turning over a book of prints for Lady Gudgeon, a little shrivelled old lady, so deaf as to render conversation with her a pursuit of politeness under difficulties. Having apparently satisfied himself by this investigation, Bracy replied, "To the best of my belief, I should say he had only had his hair cut, and was for once dressed like a gentleman."

"He is wonderfully clever, is he not?" inquired the lady.

"Clever!" repeated Bracy, "that's a mild word to apply to such acquirements as Frere possesses. He knows all the languages living or dead, has gained an intimate acquaintance with the arts and sciences, has all the 'ologies' at his fingers' ends, and is not only well up in the history of man since the creation, but will tell you to a fraction, how many feeds a-day kept a Mastodon in good condition, two or three thousand years before we tailless monkeys came into possession of our landed property."

"I suppose, as he dresses so strangely in general, that he's very poor; all clever people are, I believe," returned Susanna with an air of the most artless naïveté, the idea having for the first time occurred to her that, faute de mieux, the philosopher might do to replace the man of war.

Bracy read her thoughts, and kindly invented a few facts and figures, by which he increased Frere's income about sevenfold, and gave him a magnificent stock of expectations, of the realization whereof not the most forlorn hope ever existed.

Having done this small piece of mischief also, he continued his search after Miss Mac Salvo. The result of these machinations was, that Lady Lombard signified to De Grandeville that he was to hand her down to dinner; John Dace Dackercel Dace, Esquire, performed the same office by Rose, much to the disgust of Richard Frere, who had intended to secure that pleasure for himself, and who being, at the moment in which he first became aware of his misfortune, captured by the Brahminical widow, whose silky manner he could not endure, went down stairs in a frame of mind anything but seraphic. Mrs. Arundel contrived to gain possession of General Gudgeon, with a view, as she observed to Bracy, to discover, firstly, his system of feeding, which, from its results, she felt sure must be an excellent one; and, secondly, to insure his obtaining a liberal supply of port wine, to the end that she might satisfy a reprehensible curiosity as to the precise nature of the "gentlemen's stories." Lady Lombard was so anxious to suppress; which act of un-English-woman-like espégle must be set down to the score of a foreign education, than which we know not a better receipt for unsexing the minds of the daughters of Albion. When we add that Bracy, with a face of prim decorum, escorted Miss Mac Salvo, a gaunt female, whose strict principles appeared to have warred with her flesh so effectually, that there was little more than skin and bone left, we believe we have accounted for every member of the party for whom our readers are likely to feel the slightest interest.

During the era of the fish and soup, by which our modern dinners are invariably commenced, little is discussed except the viands; but after the first glass of sherry, mute lips begin to unclose, and conversation flows more freely. Thus it came about that John Dace Dackercel Dace, Esquire, of the Inner Temple, (we admire his name so much, that we lose no opportunity of repeating it,) having revolved in his anxious mind some fitting speech wherewith to accost the talented young authoress, of whom he felt no inconsiderable degree of dread, fortified himself with an additional sip of sherry ere he propounded the very original inquiry, "Whether Miss Arundel was fond of poetry?" Before Rose could answer this query, her neighbour on the other side, one Mr. James Kasper, a very strong young man, with a broad, good-natured, dullish face, demanded, abruptly, in a jovial tone of voice, "Whether she was fond of riding?"

As soon as she could collect her senses, scattered by the raking fire of this cross-examination, Rose replied, "that she was particularly fond of some kinds of poetry," which admission she qualified by the apparently inapposite restriction,—"When she was on a very quiet horse."

J. D. D. was about to follow up his attack by a leading question about the gushing pathos of the bard of Rydal, when Rasper prevented him, by exclaiming, "No!—Do you really?" (which he called "rally.") "Then I know just the animal that would suit you." And, having thus mounted his hobby-horse, he dashed at every thing, as was his wont when once fairly off, and rattled away, without stopping, till dinner was finished, and he had talked Rose completely stupid; while the unfortunate Dace, foiled in his weak attempt to captivate the influential authoress, plunged again into the deep waters of affliction, where, pondering over this farther postponement of his destiny, he sank, and was heard no more.

Exactly opposite to Rose and her companions, sat Frere and the simple Susanna, who, labouring zealously at her vocation—viz. husband-hunting—threw away much flattery, and wasted an incalculable amount of "sweetness on the desert air." To all her pretty speeches Frere returned monosyllabic replies, in a tone of voice suggestive of whole forests-full of bears with sore heads, while a cloud hung heavy on his brow, and his bright eyes flashed envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness, at the unconscious James Rasper. At last Susanna chanced to inquire whether he were fond of music; and as, without falsifying facts, he could not answer this negatively, he was forced to reply, "Yes; I like some sort of music well enough."

"Some sort only," returned Susanna, in a tone of infantine artlessness. "Oh! you should like every kind, Mr. Frere. I never hear a merry tune without longing to dance to it; and pathetic music affects me even to tears. But, what class of music is it that you particularly prefer?—though I need scarcely ask,—operatic, of course."

"Not I," growled Frere; "I hate your operas."

"Oh, Mr. Frere!" exclaimed Simplicity, fixing its large eyes reproachfully upon him, "you can't mean what you say. Not like operas! Why, they are perfectly delicious. Look at a well-filled house,—what a magnificent coup d'œil!"

"A set of pigeon-holes full of fools, and a long row of fiddlers," rejoined Frere; "I can't say I see much to admire in that. I went to one of your operas last year, and a rare waste of time I thought it. It was one of Walter Scott's Scotch stories bewitched into Italian. There was poor Lucy of Lammermoor dressed out like a fashionable drawing-room belle, singing duets all about love and murder, with a pale-faced moustachioed puppy, about as much like Edgar Ravenswood as I am like the Belvidero Apollo; a brute engaged on the strength of a tenor voice, to make love to all and sundry for the space of four calendar months, for which "labour of love" he is paid to the tune of 500*l.* a-month, a salary on which better men than himself contrive to live for a whole year. Then Lucy's cruel mamma, who is the great feature in the novel, is metamorphosed into a rascally brother, who growls baritone atrocities into the ears of a sympathising chorus of indigent needle-women and assistant carpenters, who act the nobility and gentry of Scotland, at half-a-crown a head and their beer. The first act is all love—the second all cursing and confusion, and the third all murder and suicide; and that's what people call a pleasant evening's amusement. The only thing that amused me, was in the last scene, when the stipendiary lover kills himself first, and sings a long scena afterwards. I thought that very praiseworthy and persevering of him, and if I'd been Lucy, such a little attention as that would have touched me particularly, and I daresay it would have done her; only—seeing that she had died raving mad some five minutes before, and was then drinking bottled porter for the good of her voice,—she was perhaps scarcely in a situation to appreciate it."

"But if you don't like the singing, I dare say you prefer the ballet?" suggested Susanna.

"No, I don't," was the short, sharp, and decisive reply.

"Not like the ballet? Oh! Mr. Frere, what can be your reason?" inquired the surprised turtle-dove.

"Well, I have a reason good and sufficient, but I sha'n't tell it to you," growled Frere; then muttered as an aside, which was, however, sufficiently audible—"A set of jumping Jezebels, skipping about in white muslin kilts, for they're nothing more; respectable people ought to be ashamed of looking at 'em." Having enunciated this opinion, Frere cast a doubly ferocious glance at Mr. Rasper, then eloquently describing to Rose the points of his favourite hunter, and relapsed into surly monosyllables, beyond which no amount of cooing could again tempt him.

Marmaduke de Grandeville, enthroned in state on the right hand of the lady of the house, gazed regally around him, and, in the plenitude of his magnificence, was wonderful to behold. But, after all, he was human, and the evident depth and reality of Lady Lombard's admiration and respect softened even him, and, ere long, he graciously condescended to eat, drink, and talk,—not like an ordinary mortal, for that he never did; but like himself. For instance, the topic under discussion being the new Houses of Parliament, then in even a more unfinished state than they are at present, De Grandeville elaborately explained the whole design, every detail of which he appeared to have at his fingers' ends—a fact for which he accounted when he allowed it to be understood, that—"Ar—he had—ar—given Barry a hint or two,—ar—that Barry was a very sensible fellow, and not above—ar—acting upon an idea when he saw it to be a good one;" and it must be owned that as De Grandeville had only once been in Mr. Barry's company, on which occasion he had sat opposite to him at a public dinner, he had made the best use of his time, and not suffered his powers of penetration to rust for want of use. Having in imagination put the finishing-stroke to the Victoria Tower, (one of the farthest stretches of fancy on record, we should conceive,) he contrived to work the conversation round to military matters, set General Gudgeon right on several points referring to battles in the Peninsula at which the General had himself been present, and gave so graphic an account of Waterloo, that to this day

Lady Lombard declares he acted as Amateur Aid-du-Camp and Privy Counsellor-in-Chief to the Duke of Wellington on that memorable occasion. He then talked about the De Grandeville estates till every one present believed him to be an immense landed proprietor, and wound up by the anecdote of William of Normandy and the original De Grandeville, which, with a slight biographical sketch of certain later worthies of the family, (one of whom, Sir Solomon de Grandeville, he declared to have suggested to King Charles the advisability of hiding in the oak,) lasted till the ladies quitted the room, when, by Lady Lombard's request, he assumed her vacant chair, and did the honours with dignified courtesy.

Bracy, who during dinner had appeared most devoted to Miss Mac Salvo, now endeavoured to render himself universally agreeable. He applauded General Gudgeon's stories, and plied him vigorously with port wine, which, as Mrs. Arundel had taken care the servants did not neglect to replenish his wine-glass at dinner, began to tell upon him visibly. He elicited the names, pedigrees, and performances of all Mr. James Rasper's horses, and received from that fast young man a confidential statement of his last year's betting account, together with a minute detail of how he had executed that singular horticultural operation yecept "hedging on the Oaks," during which dry recital his throat required constantly moistening with wine, in spite of which precaution his voice grew exceedingly thick and husky before the sitting concluded. On two individuals of the party, however, all Bracy's efforts were thrown away;—Frere continued silent and moody, only opening his lips occasionally, shortly and sternly to contradict some assertion, and relapsing into his former taciturnity; while J. D. D. sat silently bewailing his postponed destiny over a glass of water and two ratifia cakes, which seemed to possess the singular property of never diminishing.

At length the gentlemen rose to go up stairs, a matter easily accomplished by every one but General Gudgeon, who made three unsuccessful attempts to get under weigh, and then looked helplessly round for assistance. Bracy, the ever-ready, was at hand in an instant.

"My dear General, let me lend you an arm. You're cramped from sitting so long."

"Tha-a-ank you, my dear bo-o-o-y," returned the gallant officer, who appeared to have been seized with a sudden wild determination to alter the English language by dividing monosyllables into three parts, and otherwise fancifully to embellish his mother-tongue. "Tha-a-ank you! It's that confou-wow-wow-nded gun-shot wound in my knee-ee. I got it at Bu-Bu-Bu—no! not Bucellas. What is it, eh?"

"Busaco," suggested Bracy, fearing he had over-dosed his patient.

However, when once the General got upon his legs, he used them to better advantage than might have been expected, and proceeded up-stairs, "rolling grand," as that prince of clever-simple biographers, (to use one of Mrs. Browning's adjectives,) Boswell, said of his ponderous idol. Encountering Frere at the foot of the staircase, he stumbled against that gentleman with so much force as nearly to knock him down. As he recovered his footing, Frere turned angrily towards his assailant; but his irritation changed to an expression of contemptuous pity as his eye fell upon the white hair of General Gudgeon, and stepping on one side, he allowed him to pass. He was quietly following, when Mr. James Rasper, who had witnessed his discomfiture with an ill-bred laugh, attempted, by way of a stupid practical joke, to repeat General Gudgeon's involuntary assault, and reckoning Frere a good-natured quiet sort of person, not likely to resent such a jest, pretended to stumble against him, and pushed past him when about half-way up the first flight of stairs. Never did a man (to use a common but forcible expression) "mistake his customer" more completely. In an instant Frere had collared him, dragged him down a step or two, then, retaining his grasp of the coat-collar, seized him by the waist-band of his trousers, and by a great exertion of strength, swung him clear over the banisters, lowered him till his feet were about a yard from the floor, and then let him drop. After which performance, having glanced round to see that his victim was not injured by the fall, he coolly pursued his way up-stairs.

(To be continued.)

"WILL IS POWER."

BY E. J. B.

SUCH is said to have been the maxim of one of the most persevering and fortunate women who ever existed.¹ Upon it she acted from childhood to old age, and was rewarded by a success in life seldom attained even by the most resolute. All things bent to the magic of her determined and unscrupulous will. Even homeliness of person, that great barrier to advancement, was no effectual obstacle to her. She had fixed her powerful and ambitious heart upon the goal of greatness, and she reached it. All great successes, and all great minds, have so resolved, so come to pass. A feeble will, like a feeble hand, achieves nothing. And why? The great ingredient of success is firmness of purpose, self-concentration; two things utterly unknown to the irresolute and feeble. Besides these, there must be that rarer quality than either—self-knowledge. Honesty with ourselves, is to the full as needful as honesty with our neighbours, and without this too we cannot succeed. We must read ourselves faithfully, thoroughly, honestly. We must measure our capabilities against the end we wish for. We must as it were lay the pattern of our powers and weaknesses upon the cloth of the success we wish to cover, and with unblinded and unloving eyes see if it does so. If it does, no matter what the obstacles, success is ours ultimately if we choose.

A man may bend circumstances, but if he would

triumph, he must not bend to them. But to make this unflinching perseverance rational, he must have been honest with himself, honest in his self-appreciation from the first. He must not have undertaken an impossibility. He must have borne in mind that what is perfectly possible, almost easy to one man, is not so to another. Will is only power when directed against a battery, for the subjugation of which our capabilities will avail. For instance; a man with the quiet un-speculative eye and cool head of an engineer, might toil on for ever and for ever, wear out life and hope, energy and existence, in the wild wish to become a Chantry. Something must ever come of resolution, and he might at last achieve some tolerable copy; but more he would never do. Life would be fretted out in a vain battle against SELF. Not against circumstances, not against fortune, not against ill-usage, but against SELF. The man has been his own enemy, the one sole cause of his own failure, and all for want of honesty—the courage to take himself as it were to pieces, and faithfully judge the fragments. “What has been done may be done again,” is an old maxim, and true as it is old; but it must be effected by having the right thing done by the right people. The celebrated John Hunter, in his lectures, took continued pains to impress this upon his pupils, and was accustomed to instance himself as a proof of its truth and practicability. “When I want to do a thing,” he said, “I first consider if it can be done; then, if I can do it: I think well what there is for and against me; what powers I have that other men have not, and what they have that I have not. Upon this I make up my mind. If the thing can be done, and I can do it, I do it; if not, I dismiss the idea at once, and never give the matter another thought.” This was the advice and experience of a man, whose indomitable energy, and bold self-searching, raised him from a poor cabinet-maker’s apprentice in a wretched Scottish town, to the position of Surgeon-extraordinary to the British Army, and to be one of the first authorities of his profession. Without the brave self-scrutiny which told him when he had power and when none, and without the earnest purpose, that never swerved from the calm rational determination to which knowledge so earned led him, John Hunter would have been a cabinet-maker at his death.

Every where, spread over all creation, are the means of progress for all sorts of people. Into all corners the grappling irons by which we may pull ourselves up can be cast. But the same hooks are not for all men, nor the same irons for all purposes. It is reported of Buonaparte, that he was wont to exclaim; “‘Impossible’ is the adjective of fools.” And Armand Richelieu, that man of mighty will and indomitable self-reliance, has been made to say by his biographers, “There is no such word as ‘fail’.” Daring as these bold aphorisms are, and smoothly and fate-defying as they sound, they are only true in a certain sense, and with certain reservations. If John Hunter’s hand had trembled at the cold hard touch of a scalpel, or his heart fainted at the tortured groans of the operating-table, “impossible” would have been his adjective, and he would have been so fool to apply it to his surgical ambition. Again: what but “fail” would be the right term to employ to any man’s scheme, even were it Brunel’s, who should propose throwing a tunnel from Dover to Calais, or constructing a viaduct over the Bay of Biscay. Yet both these great men have achieved wonders, things impossible to other minds, and to them, if they had read themselves less truly. It was by self-knowledge, no less than by WILL, that they accomplished their determination. “Can this thing be done, and can I do it?”—was the question honestly put, and faithfully answered of each to his own mind, and so it must ever be with those who would bear down to all opposition.

A blind man, with all the will of all the Cæsars, might determine to be a Claude Lorraine, but could he? He might spend life and thought, care and resolution, in his vain scheme, and people would laugh at his folly as they gazed upon the blurred and blotted canvass; but he would be no more ridiculous than the man, who with the feeble ideas and wavering decision of a harmless, helpless nonentity, took into his head to be a statesman or a warrior.—No; if a man would succeed in life, he may for a while let his fancy roam whither it listeth, but when it settles, and would make its home and his, in any trade, profession, or employment, let him weigh his capabilities, against his wish. Let him judge himself as he would judge another; taking into account first the reasons for his fancy, and then his power and resolution. No need to weigh opportunities and means, impediments and fears. The first of these last two, unless they are in the nature of physical defects, must be as nothing; the last, if they obtain one moment’s hearing, are of themselves enough to prove his unfitness for the position he covets; the first he must make, the second he must struggle for. He must count up against the difficulties, his ability of endurance, love of the end, firmness of purpose, mental and bodily qualifications. If these agree with his will, it depends solely upon himself to play the game of life successfully. For him there is but the old device and motto on the ancient seal—a pick-axe, with the words, “Either I will find a way, or I will make one,”—and if he fail, it is of himself, his own feebleness in executing what he rashly planned.

There is no such thing as “luck;” what seems so, is traceable to causes as easily discovered as their effect. God rules the world. And while Omnipotent hands hold the reins of government, there can be no chance. Let it not be thought, that in advocating the bold principle of our motto, we are urging or inviting recklessness of means, so the end be gained; or unscrupulousness of end, so fame and fortune be achieved. No; by success we mean full and complete success. Not prosperity here, ruin hereafter; but success before God, by using to their utmost the talents he has lent, and doing for His glory the most service with the smallest means. Nothing that chose here, can rightly be called success; we sow on earth to reap in heaven. But to the honest brave purpose, the unbending perseverance, the unwavering steadiness of a true heart, will be power, for God our Maker, our Father and our Guide ordained it so.

PRIVATE LIFE AND PERSONAL CHARACTER OF DEAN SWIFT.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
And thin partitions do their bounds divide.

DRYDEN.

WE have always regarded Dean Swift as a decidedly unamiable man. From all that we can learn he appears to have been cold-hearted, selfish, tyrannical, morose, and parsimonious, coarse and brutal in his manners, and singularly deficient in elevation of taste, thought, and sentiment. The closing scene of his life has warranted the supposition that there was a taint of insanity in his constitution, and attempts have been made to account for his eccentricities upon this hypothesis. This view is, however, warmly combated, upon medical grounds, in a recent production now before us,¹ in which the character of Swift is strenuously vindicated, and the true nature of his malady detailed. Without wishing to enter into any controversy, we think the subject is sufficiently interesting to be brought before the attention of our readers; and though we have met with few new facts, we feel sure that every attempt to illustrate the idiosyncrasies of genius will be received with indulgence.

We will not trouble our readers with many biographical details. At the age of fourteen, we may remind them, Swift entered Trinity College, Dublin, where he was an irregular and undistinguished student; that at the usual time he applied for his Bachelor's degree, and obtained it only by special grace, "a term," says Johnson, "used in that university to denote want of merit;" and that his academical career, like that of many men of genius, was in other respects undignified and unfortunate. On leaving college, he secured the patronage of Sir William Temple, who had married one of his mother's relations. King William III. occasionally visited Temple; and "it is recorded," says Scott, "by all the poet's biographers, that William offered him a troop of horse, and showed him how to cut asparagus the Dutch way." At this time Swift devoted himself earnestly to study, working eight hours a day. At length, he was overtaken by a serious illness, (brought on by his own imprudence,) which is said to have occasioned the severe maladies from which he suffered through life.

"Writing to Mrs. Howard, in 1727," says Mr. Wilde, "he thus describes the commencement of his complaint. 'About two years before you were born,'—consequently in 1690—'I got my giddiness by eating a hundred golden pippins at a time, at Richmond.'"

Dr. Johnson comments on this incident in a characteristic manner:—

[1] "The Closing Years of Dean Swift's Life: with an Appendix, containing several of his Poems hitherto unpublished, and some remarks on Stella." Dublin, 1849.

"Before he left Ireland (?) he contracted a disorder, as he thought, by eating too much fruit. The original of diseases is commonly obscure. Almost everybody eats as much fruit as he can get, without any great inconvenience. The disease of Swift was giddiness with deafness, which attacked him from time to time, began very early, pursued him through life, and at last sent him to the grave, deprived of reason."

It seems probable that his frequently recurring attacks of giddiness and loss of memory may be ascribed to this accident, and the medical testimony is to the same effect.

"Overloading the stomach," says Mr. Wilde, "in the manner described, and catching cold by sitting on a damp, exposed seat, were very apt to produce both these complaints," (i. e. giddiness and deafness,) "neither of which, when once established, was likely to be easily removed from a system so nervous, and with a temper so irritable, and a mind so excessively active, as that of Swift. From this period, a disease which, in all its symptoms and by its fatal termination, plainly appears to have been (in its commencement at least) cerebral congestion, set in, and exhibited itself in well-marked periodic attacks, which, year after year, increased in intensity and duration."

Whatever forms his disorder or disorders may have at times assumed, Mr. Wilde expresses his conviction, that "Swift was not, at any period of his life, not even in his last illness, what is usually termed and understood as mad."

We are not among those who regard every trifling eccentricity of conduct as an indication of insanity. On the contrary, we believe that men of strong mind and good sense have occasionally shown a sound discretion in breaking through social usages and conventional notions which were not obviously founded on principles of utility and practical convenience. But Swift was distinguished through life for a contemptuous disregard of the received opinions of the world, which had more the air of bravado than anything else. From his youth upwards he would seem to have affected singularity, and to have studied how he could best show his contempt for the ordinary rules of life. Numerous anecdotes are told by his biographers of his wayward disposition, eccentric habits, and parsimonious spirit. "While he lived with Temple," says Johnson, "he used to pay his mother, at Leicester, a yearly visit. He travelled on foot, unless some violence of weather drove him into a wagon; and at night he would go to a penny lodging, where he purchased clean sheets for sixpence. This practice Lord Orrery imputes to his innate love of grossness and vulgarity: some may ascribe it to his desire of surveying human life through all its varieties; and others, perhaps with equal probability, to a passion which seems to have been deeply fixed in his heart, the love of a shilling." The "love of a shilling"—of strict economy in small matters—was observable, indeed, in all his conduct, and frequently subjected him to the imputation of meanness.

In after years, when he had secured the friendship of the greatest wits of his age, and lived with them on terms of friendly intercourse, a curious instance of his oddity has been preserved by Spence, as related by Pope, which may serve to illustrate his manners and character :—

"Dr. Swift has an odd, blunt way, that is mistaken by strangers for ill-nature. 'Tis so odd that there's no describing it but by facts. I'll tell you one that comes into my head. One evening Gay and I went to see him: you know how intimately we were all acquainted. On our coming in, 'Hey-day, gentlemen,' (says the Doctor,) 'what's the meaning of this visit? How came you to leave the great Lords that you are so fond of, to come hither to see a poor Dean!'—'Because we would rather see you than any of them!'—'Ay, any one that did not know so well as I do, might believe you. But since you are come, I must get some supper for you, I suppose.'—'No, Doctor, we have supped already.'—'Supped already? that's impossible! why, 'tis not 8 o'clock yet. That's very strange; but if you had not supped, I must have got something for you. Let me see, what should I have had? A couple of lobsters; ay, that would have done very well; two shillings—tarts, a shilling: but you will drink a glass of wine with me, though you supped so much before your usual time only to spare my pocket?'—'No, we had rather talk with you than drink with you.'—'But if you had supped with me, as in all reason you ought to have done, you must then have drank with me. A bottle of wine, two shillings—two and two is four, and one is five; just two and sixpence a piece. There, Pope, there's half-a-crown for you, and there's another for you, sir; for I won't save anything by you, I am determined.' This was all said and done with his usual seriousness on such occasions; and, in spite of everything we could say to the contrary, he actually obliged us to take the money."

He evidently prided himself upon originality, and independence of thought and action; and he took every opportunity of setting at nought the observances of society, and the restraints of his profession. As a clergyman, it was his passion to be as unclerical as possible. He has truly described himself as "A clergyman of special note

For shunning those of his own coat;
Which made his brethren of the gown
Take care at times to run him down;
No libertine, nor over nice;
Addicted to no sort of vice;
Went where he pleased, said what he thought;
Not rich, but owed no man a groat."

He would transgress the rules of decorum to avoid the suspicion of over-strictness or hypocrisy. In Ireland, he assembled his household to morning prayers, so secretly, that his most intimate friend was six months in his house without discovering it. He was always pleased when his peculiarities provoked hostilities; and he seems never to have felt that in discarding the received notions of propriety, he was running some risk of being misled by his passions or convictions. He had no mental misgivings,—no appreciation of the solid truth sententially expressed by Dr. Johnson, that he "who indulges peculiar habits is worse than others, if he be better."

Of his over-bearing disposition and insolent bluntness a story has been told, which gives us some notion of his offensive demeanour in society :—

"The last time he was in London," says Sir W. Scott, "he went to dine with the Earl of Burlington, who was then but newly married. The earl being willing, it is supposed, to have some diversion, did not introduce him to his lady, nor mention his name. After dinner, said the Dean, 'Lady Burlington, I hear you can sing; sing me a song.'" The lady looked on this unceremonious manner of asking a favour with distaste, and positively refused. He said—"She should sing, or he would make her.—Why, madam, I suppose you take me for one of your poor English hedge-parsons; sing when I bid you." As the earl did nothing but laugh at this freedom, the lady was so vexed that she burst into tears, and retired. His first compliment to her when he saw her again, was 'Pray, madam, are you as proud and as ill-natured now as when I saw you last?' To which she answered, with great good-humour, 'No, Mr. Dean, I'll sing for you, if you please.' From which time he conceived great esteem for her."

We have selected at random these anecdotes of Swift's eccentricity, as displaying by a few graphic touches the most prominent features in his character. But it may be curious to consider how far his peculiarities of temper and disposition were aggravated by his constitutional infirmities, and whether the infelicitous circumstances of his private life did not largely contribute towards the same result. In the first place, it must be borne in mind that he was a man of exquisitely nervous and excitable temperament. His perceptive faculties were clear and keen: and a habit of minute inquiry and narrow scrutiny into human motives, had familiarized him with the vices and follies of his species, and inspired him with a sullen contempt for humanity which he took no pains to disguise. We can also imagine that his temper was soured and embittered by the occurrences of his youth; by his unprosperous career at college; by his early position of dependence. And when in early manhood a serious illness prostrated his strength, and left him through life exposed to a distressing malady, we cannot wonder that his mind was clouded with a deeper gloom.

After the death of Temple, in 1699, Swift accompanied the Earl of Berkeley to Ireland, as his chaplain and private secretary. Having quarrelled with his patron, his anger was pacified by a presentation to the rectory of Agher, and the vicarages of Laracor and Rathbeggin, the income of which amounted to about 230*l.* per annum. It is said, that on leaving the Earl of Berkeley, he walked down to his new living, incognito, and astonished the poor curate by roughly announcing himself as his "master." He performed his clerical duties with punctuality and decorum, and busied himself in the restoration of the parish church, which had become dilapidated through the neglect of former incumbents. But his residence at Laracor was soon distinguished by circumstances of more romantic interest. Beneath the roof of Sir William Temple he had become acquainted with Esther Johnson—the unfortunate Stella—who, when he first beheld her, was a little bright-eyed, laughing child, the delight of all the inmates of his patron's residence. "Little Hetty," as they called her, was often thrown in his way, and gradually won upon his heart; he set her her daily tasks, and as she grew towards womanhood, his cold nature was warmed and subdued by a passion which even the prospects of worldly advancement were unable to stifle. When he found himself settled at Laracor, he sighed for the society of Stella; (for so he designated her in poetical phraseology;) and as she was her own mistress it was not long before he had persuaded her to visit Ireland, in the company of a discreet, middle-aged lady, named Mrs. Dingley. A suitable residence was procured for his visitors; and when Swift was absent from the vicarage, and then only, they became its inmates. In these arrangements Stella acquiesced, under the belief, and it is to be supposed with the tacit understanding, that her admirer would offer her his hand as soon as his worldly circumstances would justify their union. At first, perhaps, an excess of prudence deterred him from marriage: he was proud and ambitious; he could not bear the idea of sinking down into a poor Irish clergyman; he was avacious and covetous, and in his scheme of worldly advancement, he probably thought that a wife might be in his way. "In the pride of talent and wisdom," says Scott, "he endeavoured to frame a new path to happiness; and the consequences have rendered him a warning, where the various virtues with which he was endowed ought to have made him a pattern."

In the meanwhile, Stella had her admirers. A neighbouring clergyman became her suitor, and applied to Swift, as the lady's guardian, to sanction his addresses. The lover was placed in a curious predicament; but, in the end, the clergyman was rejected by Stella, who, it is reasonable to suppose, considered herself engaged to the friend of her early youth. Every year that glided by, she had established a fresh claim on his sympathy and regard. The sacrifices she had made for him were of no ordinary kind; and he was by no means insensible to her devotion. More than once he acknowledged it in verse.

"Then Stella ran to my relief,
With cheerful face and inward grief;
And though, by Heaven's severe decree,
She suffers hourly more than me,
No cruel master could require,
From slaves employed for daily hire,
What Stella, by her friendship warm'd,
With vigour and delight perform'd."

Poor Stella! Her disposition was lively and engaging; and it is said that she had a face and form of surpassing loveliness. But like many another gentle and confiding woman, she was sacrificed to cold prudential notions, and to the overweening worldly pride that does more than anything else to corrupt and degrade the heart.

In 1835 the skeletons of Swift and Stella were exhumed from the vaults of St. Patrick's Cathedral. The ghastly relics were clearly identified from several circumstances which are fully entered into by Mr. Wilde; and he observes that Stella's skull, thus irreverently rescued from the tomb, is "a perfect model of symmetry and beauty. Its outline" (he continues, in a rapturous vein,) "is one of the most graceful we have ever seen; the teeth, which, for their whiteness and regularity, were, in life, the theme of general admiration, were, perhaps, the most perfect ever witnessed in a skull. On the whole, it is no great stretch of the imagination to clothe and decorate this skull again with its alabaster skin, on which the rose had slightly bloomed; to adorn it with its original dark hair, its white expanded forehead, level, pencilled eye-brows, and deep, dark, lustrous eyes, its high prominent nose, its delicately chiselled mouth, and pouting upper lip, its full, rounded chin, and long but gracefully swelling neck,—when we shall find it realize all that description has handed down to us of an intellectual beauty of the style of those painted by Kneller, and with an outline and form of head accurately corresponding to the pictures of Stella which still exist."

In the early years of his residence at Laracor,—the happiest term of his life,—the health of Swift was comparatively good, and he made but few complaints. But in 1710 he went to London, and plunged into politics and public business, for the space of three eventful years. Stella still occupied his thoughts; and he regularly transmitted to her his journal, in which he noted down the minutest incidents of his busy life. His energies and ambition had now full scope; but late hours and excitement made sad havoc with his constitution. He was alarmed with continual attacks of giddiness and deafness, and was forced to practise the strictest temperance. Soon also he found that something more than talent and strong conviction was necessary to secure success in the game of politics. His hopes of preferment were disappointed. "He enjoyed the shadow," says Lord Orrery, "the substance was detained from him. He was employed, not trusted; and at the same time he imagined himself a subtle diver, who dexterously shot down into the profoundest region of politics." At length, in 1713, he was promoted to the Deanery of St. Patrick's, a preferment which fell far short of what he conceived he had a right to expect, and he returned to Ireland, with a bitter and disappointed spirit.

He stayed a fortnight in Dublin to take possession of his Deanery, and we have a pitiable picture of the state of his mind at this period. "I hate the thoughts of Dublin," he writes, "and prefer a field-bed and an earthen floor before the great house there, which they say is mine."—"At my first coming, I thought I should have died with discontent, and was horribly melancholy; but it begins to wear off and change to dulness." And in a poem, written in sickness, in October 1714, we have a vivid picture of the pettishness and jealousy of the confirmed and inconsiderate invalid.

"My state of health none care to learn;
My life is here no soul's concern:
And those with whom I now converse
Without a tear will tend my hearse.

* * * * *

Some formal visits, looks, and words,—
What mere humanity affords,—
I meet perhaps from three or four,
From whom I once expected more;

Which those who tend the sick for pay
Can act as decently as they :
But no obliging, tender friend
To help at my approaching end.
My life is now a burden grown
To others, ere it be my own."

Though separated from the turmoils of party, it was not likely that Swift's active spirit would rest satisfied with a life of monotonous tranquillity. But his means were now ample, and every apparent obstacle being removed, it might have been expected that he would no longer defer his union with Stella. Alas! during his residence in England he had made a fresh conquest; and poor Stella had found a powerful rival in Esther Vanhomrigh, the eldest daughter of a wealthy widow lady. For a time the sacrifices, wrongs, and deep, deep affection of Stella were forgotten or disregarded, and Vanessa (for this was Miss Vanhomrigh's poetical name), usurped her place in Swift's unfeeling heart. Vanessa came to Dublin, and Stella's jealousy being excited, she demanded an explanation. In this dilemma Swift was compelled to yield something to the claims of long-tried affection; but he still made use of the same heartless cant—that his fortune was insufficient, that marriage would be imprudent, &c. &c. At length he consented to a secret union, on condition that it should never be disclosed by either of them, and that they should still "continue to live separately, and in the same guarded manner as formerly."¹ Accordingly, in 1716, the ceremony was performed by his early friend and tutor the Bishop of Clogher, in the garden of the deanery.

It is said that after the performance of this ceremony, Swift's state of mind was wretched in the extreme. As for Stella, like many another woman who has "loved not wisely but too well," her fortitude supported her under every trial, and whatever may have been her mental sufferings, they were hidden beneath the outward mask of tranquillity and contentment. She is described about this time as looking "pale and pensive, but not melancholy;" she patiently attended the Dean in his frequent attacks of sickness, and regulated his table,—at which, however, she appeared only as a guest. In the meanwhile he continued to correspond with Vanessa, and to interchange verses with her. He frequently visited her at her residence at Celbridge, where she had retired, says Scott, "to nurse her hopeless passion in seclusion from the world." Strange that this haughty, sullen, and unamiable man should have inspired with such deep affection two amiable and accomplished women, who, once enslaved, seem to have lost all self-dependence, and to have readily obeyed the harshest dictates of his cruel caprice!

As Swift advanced in life, his mind became more gloomy, his temper more irritable, and his health more uncertain. He began to feel strange forebodings of the mysterious malady which was ultimately to reduce him to a state of hopeless imbecility. "So early as 1717," says Scott, "we are informed by Dr. Young,

(1) Scott's Life of Swift.

that while walking with Swift, about a mile out of Dublin, the Dean stopped short. 'We passed on,' says the author of the Night Thoughts, 'but perceiving he did not follow us, I went back and found him fixed as a statue, and earnestly gazing upwards at a noble elm, which in its uppermost branches was much withered and decayed. Pointing at it he said:—I shall be like that tree, I shall die at the top!'" He had a severe illness in the beginning of 1719, and in May he wrote to Lord Bolingbroke these melancholy words: "My health is somewhat mended, but at best I have an ill head and an aching heart." When in the following year he plunged into politics, and as an Irish patriot gave vent, in a memorable pamphlet,² to his indignant sense of English injustice, his bodily health appears to have improved, and his melancholy to have been for a time dispelled. Soon afterwards, the publication of the Drapier's Letters raised him to the highest pitch of popularity. These remarkable productions were directed against an unpopular scheme for supplying the deficiency of copper coinage in Ireland. For this purpose a patent, which was said to have been obtained in a surreptitious manner, had been granted to an English contractor named Wood, empowering him to coin halfpence and farthings to the extent of £108,000. The popular feeling was aroused; Wood's worthless halfpence were denounced by the spirited Drapier; the printer of the letters prosecuted; and a large reward offered for the discovery of the author.

"But not a traitor could be found
To sell him for three hundred pound."

It was during the excitement of the public mind on this subject that a Quaker is said to have circulated the apt quotation from Scripture,—"And the people said unto Saul, Shall JONATHAN die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not."³ Flattered, excited, and stunned by popular applause, he had at this period less leisure to think of his ailments, and though we have no particular account, it is reasonable to suppose his temper was more cheerful. But, as if to counterbalance these advantages, domestic afflictions at the same time deeply affected, and perhaps temporarily softened his spirit. In 1723, the hapless Vanessa bade farewell to a world of disappointment and sorrow. The loss of one beloved object was the prelude to another greater bereavement. Stella's health began to decline in the very year of the Drapier's triumph; and though she rallied from time to time, it was soon apparent that her unhappy life was drawing to a close.

In June, 1727, we find Swift in England, and giving a deplorable account of his own state of health. "I walk like a drunken man, and am deafer than ever you knew me . . . The last act of life is always a tragedy, at best, for it is a bitter aggravation to have one's best friends go before them." He visited Pope for a short time at Twickenham; but left his house abruptly, saying, "that two sick friends cannot live together." Every post brought him alarming accounts of Stella's declining health, and in October, he left England, never to return.

"He turned," says Johnson, "to a home of sorrow." Stella was on her death-bed, anxiously expecting his presence, ere the hour of dissolution arrived. In her last moments she conjured him, it is said, to acknowledge their union to the world; but the accounts of their parting interview are somewhat contradictory." One witness (his niece, Mrs. Whiteway,) reports that she heard Swift say, in reply to some urgent request, "Well, my dear, if you wish it, it shall be owned;" to which Stella rejoined, "It is too late." Another, (Mr. Sheridan,) relates that after she had earnestly implored him to acknowledge their marriage, he turned on his heel, and left the room. At length, on the 28th of January, 1728, in the forty-first year of her age, this injured woman "closed her weary pilgrimage, and passed," says Scott, "to that land, where they neither marry, nor are given in marriage."

When the grave had closed over Stella, the Dean's melancholy assumed a more sombre hue, and every hour of his life grew darker and darker. On the most ordinary occasions, he would bid his friends adieu with the gloomy words, "God bless you, I hope we shall never meet again." His natural moroseness of disposition was increased by deafness; he became irritable and impatient beyond endurance. His memory also grievously failed him.

"For poetry he's past his prime,
He takes an hour to find a rhyme."

He often described himself in words too true, "Vertiginosus, inops surdus, male gratus amicis." His fits of ill-humour, even in the society of his friends, began to wear the appearance of something approaching to insanity. In 1730, he was for about six months the guest of Sir Arthur Acheson, at the town of Market Hill, and whilst staying there, it is related that "he sometimes retired from table, and had his victuals carried into his own apartment, from which he would not stir till his good-humour returned." In the following year he wrote the melancholy and prophetic verses on his own death, in which the well-known lines descriptive of his mental and bodily condition occur:—

"See how the Dean begins to break—
Poor gentleman, he droops apace,
You plainly find it in his face;
That old vertigo in his head
Will never leave him till he's dead;
Besides, his memory decays—
He recollects not what he says.
He cannot call his friends to mind;
Forgets the place where last he dined;
Plies you with stories o'er and o'er;
He told them fifty times before."

We turn to Mr. Wilde's volume for a summary of the state of Swift's health three years afterwards.

"The tottering which first attacked him in the year 1711, returned again in 1734; and to increase his misfortunes, his eyesight at this period began to fall, and from some whim, Swift had a great dislike to the use of spectacles. Two of the avenues both of knowledge and amusement being thus shut out, need we wonder that the poor Dean's temper increased in fretfulness, and occasionally induced him to give way to those outbursts of passion which have been related of him? His Medicina Gymnastica, as it was termed by his friends, no longer alleviated his malady, or afforded him amusement. He well knew from experience the beneficial effects of active exercise upon his distressing complaint, and when he was not able to go abroad, he sometimes enjoyed it by chasing his friends up and down stairs, and through the large apartments in the deanery, 'till he had accomplished his usual quantity of exercise.'"

Writing to Alderman Barber, in March, 1735, he says:—

"I ride a dozen miles as often as I can, and always walk the streets, except in the night, which my head will not suffer me to do My chief support is French wine, which, although not equal to yours, I drink a bottle to myself every day. I keep three horses, two men, and an old woman, in a large empty house, and dine half the week like a king, by myself You see by my many blottings and interlinings, what a condition my head is in."

Again, in a letter to Pope, December 2d, 1736,—

"I have not been in a condition to write; years and infirmities have quite broke me; I mean that odious continual disorder in my head. I neither read nor write, nor remember, nor converse. All I have left is to walk and ride; the first I can do tolerably; but the latter, for want of good weather at this season, is seldom in my power; and having not an ounce of flesh about me, my skin comes off in ten miles riding, because my skin and bone cannot agree together."

In his peculiar state of mind he also felt severely the loss of several friends with whom he had lived on terms of affectionate intimacy; and as they dropped off one by one, and "tie after tie was loosened from his heart," he became more fretful and desponding. In one of his letters to Pope, he has characteristically described the feeling of regret with which it is natural to regard the death of early and distant friends, from whom we may have been long separated, and had even little hope of seeing again.

"The death of Mr. Gay and the Doctor [Arbuthnot] have been terrible wounds near my heart. Their living would have been a great comfort to me, although I should never have seen them; like a sum of money in a bank, from which I should receive at least annual interest, as I do from you, and have done from my Lord Bolingbroke."

Although Swift had been in early life, both from choice and necessity, remarkably abstemious, it is probable, that in his advanced years the unfavourable symptoms of his complicated disorders were aggravated by a free recourse to intoxicating beverages.

"Notwithstanding," says Mr. Wilde, "that none of his biographers have alluded to the subject, nor have his greatest enemies ever been able to say that the Dean was once seen intoxicated, or in anywise affected with liquor, it is quite evident that he took more wine and spirituous liquors in his latter life than his medical men would now have recommended him; but whether from liking, habit, the advice of his physicians and friends, or as a stimulant and resource in those hours of gloom or despondency to which he was then subject, it is now difficult to say."

His parsimony, however, prevented him from encouraging conviviality at his own residence.

"When his friends of either sex," says Johnson, "came to him, in expectation of a dinner, his custom was to give every one a shilling, that they might please themselves with their provision. At last his avarice grew too powerful for his kindness; he would refuse a bottle of wine, and in Ireland, no man visits where he cannot drink!"

The last remark is somewhat sweeping; and notorious as the boundless profusion and habitual love of conviviality of the Irish gentry of the last century may have been, savours somewhat of the Doctor's thoroughly English prejudices.

A note to Mrs. Whiteway, penned in July, 1740, is almost the last memorial which we possess of the celebrated Dean. Whilst it describes in piteous terms his bodily anguish, it exhibits the decay of his mental faculties, and foreshadows the night which was about to close over him for ever. "I hardly understand," he says, "one word I write. I am sure my days will be very few; few and miserable they must be. If I do not blunder, it is Saturday, July 26th, 1740. If I live till Monday, I shall hope to see you, perhaps for the last time." After this, his understanding totally failed, and he sank into that state of "second childishness and mere oblivion," which he had so long apprehended. Scott says, that "his first state was that of violent and furious lunacy;" but Mr. Wilde labours to show that the alleged fits of insanity were nothing more than the fretful ebullitions of temper, which might have been expected under the painful circumstances which marked the last scene of his "strange, eventful history." In the beginning of 1741, it was, however, thought proper to place his estate under the management of trustees, and to appoint guardians, to whose care he was for the remainder of his life confided. Mrs. Whiteway was the last person that he knew; "and when," she says, (in a letter, dated November, 1742,) "that part of his memory failed, he was so outrageous at seeing anybody, that I was forced to leave him . . . He walked ten hours a-day; would not eat or drink if his servant stayed in the room. His meat was served up ready cut, and sometimes it would lie an hour on the table before he would touch it, and then eat it walking." Mr. Wilde has copied the same lady's account of a fearful ophthalmic affection with which the poor Dean was attacked in the month of October, 1742.

"About six weeks ago," she says, "in one night's time, his left eye swelled as large as an egg, and the lid, Mr. Nichols (his surgeon) thought, would mortify, and many large boils appeared upon his arms and body. The torture he was in is not to be described. Five persons could scarcely hold him, for a week, from tearing out his own eyes; and for near a month he did not sleep two hours in twenty-four. Yet a moderate appetite continued, and, what is more to be wondered at, the last day of his illness he knew me perfectly well, took me by the hand, called me by my name, and showed the same pleasure as usual in seeing me. I asked him if he would give me a dinner? He said, 'To be sure, my old friend.' Thus he continued that day, and knew the doctor, the surgeon, and all his family so well, that Mr. Nichols thought it possible he might return to a share of understanding, so as to be able to call for what he wanted, and to bear some of his old friends to amuse him. But alas! this pleasure to me was of short duration; for the next day or two it was all over, and proved to be only pain that had roused him."

A sad blank followed this incident, illumined by occasional glimpses of reason. One of these occurred at the close of the year 1743. "After the Dean had continued silent a whole year," says one of his biographers, "in this helpless state of idiocy, his housekeeper went into his room on the 30th November, in the morning, telling him that it was his birthday, and that bonfires and illuminations were preparing, to celebrate it as usual. To this he immediately replied. 'It is all folly! they had better let it alone.'" Mr. Wilde maintains that this forced silence differed materially from "the sullenness of insanity;" for, according to Dr. Delany, "he would often attempt to speak his mind, but could not recollect words to express his meaning; upon which he would shrug up his shoulders, shake his head, and sigh heartily."

It is said that in these days of his mental alienation, he was literally made a show of by his unfeeling domestics, who privately took money from strangers who were anxious to see him. His relative Mr. Deane Swift has furnished some of the last anecdotes respecting him, and they are melancholy enough.

"He endeavoured several times to speak to his servant, [this was in 1744,]—(now and then he calls him by his name); at last, not finding words to express what he would be at, after some uneasiness, he said, 'I am a fool.' Not long ago the servant took up his watch that lay upon the table to see what o'clock it was; he said, 'Bring it here,' and when it was brought, he looked very attentively at it. Some time ago the servant was breaking a large stubborn coal: he said, 'That's a stone, you blockhead.'"

Bitter retribution! The man who in his pride of heart and undisguised selfishness, scornfully put aside the proffered cup of social happiness, disregarded all that interfered with his stubborn will, and repaid with studied cruelty the most sincere affection, was doomed to expire "a driveller and a show," the sport of domestics and unfeeling strangers,—a piteous and humiliating spectacle, of which the world affords occasional examples, as if to remind us that intellectual superiority, like everything else we admire and value here, proceeds from Him who gives and takes away at His good pleasure!

At length, on the afternoon of Saturday, the 10th of October, 1745, after several months of total silence and vacuity, the once renowned Dean of St. Patrick's ceased to breathe. According to some accounts, his dissolution was so easy that the attendants who watched by his bedside were hardly aware of it, and only heard the death-rattle in his throat a few moments before he expired. His body was interred with strict privacy, according to the directions contained in his will, in St. Patrick's cathedral. By his will, dated 3d May, 1740, he bequeathed his whole property, amounting to about 12,000*l.* to his executors, to purchase land in Ireland, with the profits of which to erect and endow "an hospital large enough for the reception of as many idiots and lunatics as the annual income of the said lands should be sufficient to maintain." This appropriate destination of his property he had long resolved on; for in the verses on his own death, written in November, 1731, the often-quoted lines occur:—

"He gave the little wealth he had
To build a house for fools and mad;
And showed by one satiric touch
No nation wanted it so much."

We have already spoken of the exhumation of the bones of Swift and Stella in 1835. According to the medical testimony in Mr. Wilde's volume, the theories of the phrenologists are not confirmed by the examinations to which the Dean's cranium has been subjected.

"On looking at Swift's skull," says one gentleman (Mr. Hamilton), "the first thing that struck me was the extreme lowness of the forehead, those parts which the phrenologists have marked out as the organs of wit, causality, and comparison being scarcely developed at all; but the head rose gradually, and was high from benevolence backwards."

The animal propensities, again, were all large and even disproportionably so. But it is admitted that "although the skull, phrenologically considered, might be thought deficient, yet its capacity was in reality very great, capable of containing such a brain as we might expect in so remarkable a genius." In the Museum of Trinity College, Dublin, a bust, long believed, and now satisfactorily, to be that of Swift, identified from a cast taken from his face after death, has been preserved, and is commented on at some length by Mr. Wilde. Scott describes the expression of countenance as "most unequivocally maniacal, and one side of the mouth (the left) horribly contorted downwards, as if convulsed by pain." But this description is, according to Mr. Wilde, a great exaggeration; "on the contrary," he says, "the expression is remarkably placid, but there is an evident drag on the left side of the mouth, exhibiting a paralysis of the facial muscles of the right side." In summing up—and he does so most carefully—all the symptoms of the Dean's disorder, the conclusions drawn by Mr. Wilde seem to be, that he suffered from a cerebral affection, proceeding in the first instance from deranged digestion and other causes, aggravated by mental excitement and unhappiness, but never amounting to actual insanity, or utter loss of reason. His not speaking during the last years of his life, he accounts for as arising "either from paralysis of the muscles by which the mechanism of speech is produced, or from loss of memory of the things which he wished to express, as frequently occurs in the case of cerebral disease."

The "unpublished poems of Swift," at the end of Mr. Wilde's volume, are said to be copied from a pocket-book of the Dean's, in the possession of a family named Christie, and lent to the author for the purpose of his essay. "They are nearly all political, and the greater number of them refer to the reign of James II., particularly about the period of the expected birth of the Prince of Wales. Swift was at this time a student of Trinity College; and these were probably written shortly before he went to England, in the beginning of 1689. Others are as late as the reign of Anne." We give the following as samples; both referring to James II.:—

A PAPER PUT IN THE KING'S SHOE.

The hearts of all thy friends are lost and gone,
Gazing they stand, and grieve about thy throne,
Scarcely believing thee the Martyr's son.

Those whom thou favourest merit not thy praise;
To their own gain they sacrifice thy cause,
And will in sorrow make thee end thy days.

Then, trust thou not too far, doo not relye
On force or fraud;—why shouldst thou, Monarch, why

Live unbeliev'd, and unlamented die?

A PAPER FOUND IN THE KING'S TWALLITE (TOILET).

The King, to keep the laws, did plight his troth;
His will's his law, and thus he keeps his oath.

The following epigram ("probably by Swift") "On seeing a worthy prelate go out of church in the time of Divine service, to wait on his Grace the Duke of Dorset, on his coming to town," though frequently printed, is characteristic enough to bear quotation:—

"Lord Pain in the church (could you think it?)
kneel'd down,
When told that the Duke was just come to town,—
His station despising, unawed by the place,
He flies from his God to attend on His Grace.
To the Court it was fitter to pay his devotion,
Since God had no hand in his Lordship's promotion."

We have in the present paper principally dwelt on the personal character of this distinguished man. As a writer, he has been admirably criticised by Scott and Jeffrey; and as a politician he has had many illustrious eulogists. Little therefore remains to be said by humbler critics. As a political writer, by a happy union of pure idiomatic English with plain good sense, he effected triumphs which can only be compared with those subsequently achieved by the rhetorical Junius. His prose fictions are unequalled for wit, humour, and accurate knowledge of mankind. The "Tale of a Tub" is the most perfect satire in the language; and well might he exclaim, as he is reported to have done, when looking over it at an advanced period of his life, "Good God! what a genius I had when I wrote that book!" The Travels of Captain Lemuel Gulliver have continued to be popular, though their hidden satire is altogether forgotten or disregarded, and are as eagerly fastened on as the Pilgrim's Progress, Robinson Crusoe, Don Quixote, and other world-books. Whence this wide popularity? It is perhaps to be traced principally to this. Like Defoe, Swift possessed that admirable talent for circumstantial and minute narration which gives to the most improbable incidents the air of reality. We feel Captain Gulliver to be a real personage, and we are almost imposed on by his gravity and consistency; for "if," says Sir Walter Scott, "the reader is disposed to grant the traveller his postulates as to the existence of the strange people whom he visits, it would be difficult to detect any inconsistency in his narrative." And it is upon record that an Irish bishop gravely censured the book, as containing some things which he could not prevail on himself to believe! In his most trivial productions Swift had the happy art of appearing to be in earnest, and his grave irony was frequently mistaken for truth. A singular illustration of this is afforded by the effect of a placard which he had written, in one of his jesting moods, on the execution of one Elliston, a noted street-robber. The placard was addressed, in the thief's name, to his supposed accomplices, commencing thus:—"Now, as I am a dying man, I have done something which may be of good use to the public. I have left with an honest man, (and, indeed, the only honest man I was ever acquainted with,) the names of all my wicked brethren, the principal places of their abode, with a short account of the crimes they have committed." It then went on to say, that he (Elliston) had "solemnly charged this honest man," that if ever he heard of any rogue being tried for robbery, he should look into the list, and if he found the name there, send the whole paper to government. The thieves, believing the document genuine, were terrified at the threatened disclosure; and the practice of street-robbery was entirely put an end to.

Though despotic and unamiable in the social circle, his powers of conversation are said to have been unrivalled. Tradition has preserved many of his pointed and humorous repartees; and two of his classical puns are especially good. To a lady who, in adjusting her mantua, had accidentally thrown down a Cremona fiddle, he applied, with wonderful readiness, the Virgilian line:—

"Mantua, vae misere nimium vicina Cremonæ!"

Upon another occasion, when an old gentleman had lost his spectacles, he offered him the humorous consolation, that if it rained all night he would certainly recover them in the morning:—

"Nocte pluit tota—redeunt spectacula mane."

Many of his caustic remarks have been treasured up, and their plain good sense is worth attending to. For example: "The reason why so few marriages are happy is, because young ladies take more time in making nets than making cages." What he might have been had he been moderately considerate to others, had his imagination been purer, and his disposition gentler, it is impossible to say; as it is, we confess, we have traced his life with little pleasure, and regard his memory with little of the reverence which is due to genius.

DOROTHEA.

ENGRAVED BY GOODYEAR AFTER A PAINTING BY MIDDLETON.

THE subject of this plate is familiar to all our readers, for who among them has not enjoyed the beauties of that gem of Spanish literature, the Don Quixote of Cervantes? A work which has an European celebrity, and one that has been translated into all the languages of the continent, must ever be a fertile source from which the painter may select with the certainty of having the story of his picture generally understood, and every probability of its awakening pleasing associations in the minds of the beholders. The present engraving, however, has no occasion to lean upon the merits of the work which has suggested its execution. It is a beautiful embodiment of the author's description, and its merits, in an artistic point of view, are sufficient to render it worthy of a place in our journal, totally independent of its connexion with the Spanish romance in which its heroine forms so pleasing a feature. We cannot, however, consent to wholly divorce our plate from its attendant story, and shall therefore conclude our brief notice with an extract from Smollett's witty, although occasionally coarse translation of the passage which the painter has chosen to illustrate:—

"They had not gone twenty paces, when behind the fragment of a rock they perceived a boy sitting under an ash-tree, in the habit of a peasant, whose face, as he stooped, in order to wash his feet in a brook that murmured by him, they could not then survey. Their approach they managed with softness and silence, while his whole attention was employed in bathing his legs, that seemed two crystal pillars, which had been produced among the pebbles in the rill. They were surprised at the whiteness and beauty of his feet, which they could not believe had been formed to tread the clouds, and follow the cattle or plough, as his dress would have seemed to intimate; and the curate, who went foremost, finding himself still unperceived by the youth, made signs to the rest to crouch down, or hide themselves behind a neighbouring rock. This being done, all three stood gazing attentively at the apparition, which was clad in a double-skirted grey jacket, girt about the middle with a white napkin, and wore breeches and hose of the same cloth, with a grey hunting-cap upon his head, the hose being pulled up to the middle of his leg, which actually seemed of white alabaster. Having washed his delicate feet, he wiped them with a handkerchief, which he took out of his cap, and in so doing, lifted up his head, showing to the by-standers a face of such exquisite beauty, that Cardenio said in a whisper, to the curate, "Since that is not Lucinda, it can be no earthly, but some celestial being!" The youth taking off his cap, and shaking his head, a large quantity of hair, that Apollo himself might envy, flowed down upon his shoulders, and discovered to the spectators that the supposed peasant was no other than a woman, the most delicate and handsome that the curate and barber had ever beheld; or even Cardenio, had he not seen and been acquainted with Lucinda, who alone, as he afterwards owned, could contend with her in beauty."

FOOTPRINTS OF THE CREATOR.¹

ALL the world has heard of the "Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," a pleasing, popularly-written, superficial book, just fitted to captivate the imagination of the sciolist, and turn the head of the smatterer. The writer, though extremely ingenious, is by no means original; he only revives the theory of De Maillet, Lamarck, and Oken, respecting the development of plants and animals; but as the work possesses the merit of great simplicity and freedom from technicalities, no one is surprised to hear of its rapid sale, and translation into other languages. Founding on the now exploded nebular hypothesis, that the earth has arisen out of agglomerated fire mist, whirled into spherical shape by the action of opposing currents, and gradually consolidated and cooled to its present density and temperature, the author of the "Vestiges" attempts to show that the various ranks of life, animal and vegetable, instead of being created in their present forms, have been developed by purely natural laws,—from the infusorial point quickened by electricity, to the thinking and morally-responsible being Man; so that just as without a miracle the acorn becomes an oak by an inherent principle of self-development, in like manner the earth, during its earliest ages, has been pregnant with every form of being, and has needed the fiat of no immediately creative power. Fear this, ye magnates of the earth, that boast of your ancestral honours, and luxuriate beneath the shade of your proud old family tree! Your great-great-grandfathers, and equally great-grandmothers, were all monkeys,—as genuine apes as ever pelted each other with the cocoa-nuts of Cuba, or chattered amid the palm-leaves of Ceylon. Their sires, again, were happy kangaroos, leaping merrily about upon the green slopes of the Eocene period; these, in their turn, were the descendants of a fortunate turbot, that had been cast ashore in some pre-adamite storm, and which, in the desperation of its efforts to accommodate itself to its new quarters, had flounced its fins into four as fine punchy little legs as ever waddled beneath a quadruped. And so, back your genealogy must go, through oysters, crabs, zoophytes, and medusæ, till at the root of your family-tree lies a poor little infusorial point, which found itself all of a sudden startled into life one fine morning, by a smart electric shock. Nor will the supporters of the development hypothesis accuse us of unfairness in this representation of their views. "There are two kinds of generation in the world," says Oken, one of the ablest advocates of the theory,—“the creation proper, and the propagation that is sequent thereupon, or the generatio originaria and secundaria. Consequently, no organism has been created of larger size than an infusorial point. No organism is, or ever has been created, which is not microscopic. Whatever is larger, has not been created, but developed. Man has not been created, but developed." Such are the doctrines circulated in the pages of the "Vestiges." Nor is there positive atheism involved in the belief of them. "God might as certainly," remarks Mr. Miller, "have originated the species by a law of development, as he maintains it by a law of development; the existence of a First Great Cause is as compatible with the one scheme as with the other . . . There are, however, beliefs, in no degree less important to the moralist or the Christian than even the being of a God, which seem wholly incompatible with the development hypothesis." These beliefs are, the immortality of the soul, and the immediate agency of God in creation,—both of which must be abandoned, on the theory of De Maillet and the "Vestiges."

The opponents of revelation have of late years shifted their ground. In a speculative age, they challenged its champions to meet them in the field of metaphysics; and it was with the weapons of abstract argument that the battle of the evidences was fought and won. But now-a-days, the world has become greatly more matter-of-fact; the age is a physical, not a metaphysical age, and it is a physical, rather than a metaphysical rationalism, that they now seek to establish; so that, driven from their old entrenchments, they call upon us to follow them to the broad field of Nature, and do battle with the weapons of scientific fact. Nor has the Bible ought to fear from the contest; the more thoroughly both are investigated, the more beautifully will the book of nature be seen to harmonize with the book of revelation. The only "opposition" is from "science falsely so called;" and future discoveries will, we doubt not, confirm what the past has established,—that Scripture and science are (to use a favourite phrase of Dr. Chalmers) "not conflicting, but conspiring forces, and that a sound philosophy is ever at one with a sound faith." The great telescope of Lord Rosse has left the Bible untouched, but it has swept away the nebular hypothesis on which the author of the "Vestiges" founds so much; and now that his geological principles are weighed in the balances of the stony science, they are found wanting.

The individual who in the present instance has applied the touchstone of physical fact to the fictions of the "Vestiges," is Mr. Hugh Miller, already well known in the world of literature and science, whose charming little treatise on the Old Red Sandstone has earned for him the well-merited title of "the Poet of Geology," and of whom Dr. Buckland said, at a meeting of the British Association, that "if it pleased Providence to spare his useful life, he, if any one, would certainly render the science attractive and popular, and do equal service to theology and geology."—(23d Sept. 1840.) The title of the work is, "Footprints (Lat. vestigia) of the Creator," in which classical scholars at least will, no doubt, recognise at once a happy allusion and a pointed contrast to the "Vestiges of Creation." Nor do we know of any man so peculiarly fitted for testing the speculations of the "Vestiges," as the author of the "Footprints." Being a geologist of Nature's own teaching, his philosophy is purely inductive, and he himself is, perhaps, less indebted to mere theory than any man of equal standing in the scientific world. "Without guide or vocabulary," says he (Old Red Sandstone, p. 10), "I had to grope my way as I best might, and find out all the wonders of geology for myself. But so slow was the process, and so much was I a seeker in the dark, that the facts contained in these few sentences (the first principles of the science) were the patient gatherings of years." We might have searched half the world over before getting one so eminently qualified to test the development hypothesis as he, the rudiments of whose geological education had been gotten thus direct from Nature's own lips,—the self-taught naturalist of Cromarty.

During a visit to the Orkneys, about two years ago, while engaged in examining the fossiliferous deposits of Scotland, Mr. Miller discovered in the most ancient portion—indeed, at the very base—of the Old Red Sandstone, about one hundred yards above the granite, a singular bone, in shape like a large roofing-nail. This curious fossil, the oldest vertebrate organism as yet discovered in Orkney, measured $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches in length, $2\frac{1}{4}$ inches across the head, while the thickness of the stem was about 3-10ths of an inch. "This nail-like bone formed a characteristic portion of the Asterolepis,—so far as is yet known, the most gigantic ganoid fish of the Old Red Sandstone; and, judging from the place of this fragment, apparently one of the first." (Footprints, p. 7.) This discovery "showed me," continues he, "how unsafe it is for the geologist to base positive conclusions on merely negative data. Founding on the fact, that of many hundred ichthyolites of the Lower Old Red Sandstone, which I had disinterred and examined, all were of comparatively small size, while in the Upper Old Red many are of great mass and bulk, I had inferred that vertebrate life had been restricted to minuter forms at the commencement than at the close of the system. It had begun, I had ventured to state in the earlier editions of a little work on the 'Old Red Sandstone,' with an age of dwarfs, and had ended with an age of giants. And now here, at the very base of the system, unaccompanied by aught to establish the contemporary existence of its dwarfs,—which appear, however, in an overlying bed about one hundred feet higher up,—was there unequivocal proof of one of the most colossal of its giants."—P. 8.

A few days after this discovery, Mr. Miller extended his researches for several miles along the shores of the Loch of Stennis, a lake about fourteen miles in circumference, which gives admission to the sea by a narrow strait, and is divided into an upper and lower sheet of water by two long promontories, that jut out from opposite sides, and nearly meet in the middle, so that "the lower division of the lake is salt in its nether reaches, and brackish in its upper ones; while the higher division is merely brackish in its nether reaches, and fresh enough in its upper ones to be potable." The fauna and flora of the lake are, therefore, of a mixed character, the marine and the lacustrine not unfrequently encroaching on each other's territories, and becoming subject to certain peculiarities in consequence; but though mingling with one another in the brackish tracts, both fauna and flora still retain their distinctions, the marine fish growing flabby and unwholesome, but never developed into the lacustrine, and the lacustrine flora becoming stunted and scanty, but never degenerating into the marine. These two striking facts,—the discovery of the fragment of Asterolepis at the base of the Old Red Sandstone, and the "curiously-mixed, semi-marine, semi-lacustrine vegetation of the Loch of Stennis,"—furnish Mr. Miller with a text, on which he grounds his magnificent refutation of the development hypothesis.

If the theory of Oken and the "Vestiges" be true, what ought to be the geological evidence regarding it?

"The reply seems obvious. In the first place, the earlier fossils ought to be very small in size; in the second, very low in organization. In cutting into the stony womb of nature, in order to determine what it contained, mayhap, millions of ages ago, we must expect, if the development theory be true, to look upon mere embryos and fetuses. And if we find, instead, the full-grown and the mature, then must we hold that the testimony of geology is not only not in accordance with the theory, but in positive opposition to it. Such, palpably, is the principle on which, in this matter, we ought to decide. What are the facts? The oldest organism yet discovered in the most ancient geological system in Scotland, in which vertebrate remains occur, seems to be the Asterolepis of Stromness. It is up to this time the most ancient Scotch witness of the great class of fishes that can in this case be brought into court; nay, it is, in all probability, the oldest ganoid witness the world has yet produced; for there appears no certain trace of this order of fishes in the great Silurian system which lies underneath, and in which, so far as geologists yet know, organic existence first began. How, then, on the two relevant points,—bulk and organization,—does it answer to the demands of the development hypothesis? Was it a mere fœtus of the finny tribe, of minute size and imperfect embryotic faculty? Or was it of at least the ordinary bulk, and, for its class, of the average organization?"—Pp. 22, 23.

The reply to these questions occupies three elaborately-written chapters, across which the author advises his non-geological readers to take a leap, springing from the latter half of the third chapter, and alighting on the sixth. In the third chapter, Mr. Miller gives the recent history of the Asterolepis, which had long puzzled naturalists, but of which Agassiz at length inferred, that it "was not, as had been at first supposed, a cuirassed fish" of the Cephalaspian (shield-headed) order, "but a strongly-helmed fish of the Celacanth (or hollow-spine) family;" that it was, in all probability, a broad, flat-headed animal; and that, should its head or jaw at any time be discovered, it would be found to belong to the Dendrodic, or tree-toothed genus of fishes. These points were all confirmed by Mr. Miller, by means of specimens received from Mr. Robert Dick, of Thurso, "one of those working-men of Scotland of active curiosity and well-developed intellect, that give character and standing to the rest."

In his next chapter, our author discusses the cerebral development of the earlier vertebrata, and sums up a most skilfully-conducted inquiry, by concluding, that while the placoid heads of the Silurian system were mere cartilaginous boxes, the succeeding system, to which the Asterolepis belonged, saw external plates of bone added to the internal cartilage,—“the homologues, apparently, of the opercular, maxillary, frontal, and occipital bones in the osseous fishes of a long posterior period,—fishes that were not ushered upon the scene until after the appearance of the reptile in its highest forms, and of even the marsupial quadruped.”

We have next a description of the structure, bulk, and aspect of the Asterolepis. Its head was covered with osseous plates, its body with bony scales, fretted with star-like tubercles,—whence its name. It must have been carnivorous in its habits, and, like the sharks and rays, possessed the spiral disposition of intestine. The size, too, of the creature, must have been very great. The fish to which the Stomion bone belonged, was as bulky as a large porpoise, or from eight to ten feet in length. Yet this is small, in comparison of others; for that to which one of the Russian specimens of Professor Asmus belonged, must have measured from eighteen to twenty-three feet long!

“Thus, in the not unimportant circumstance of size, the most ancient ganoids yet known, instead of taking their places, agreeably to the demands of the development hypothesis, among the sprats, sticklebacks, and minnows of their class, took their place among its huge basking sharks, gigantic sturgeons, and bulky sword-fishes. They were giants, not dwarfs. Instead of being, as the development hypothesis would require, a fish low in its organization, the Asterolepis seems to have ranged on the level of the highest ichthyic-reptilian families ever called into existence.”—Pp. 104, 105.

Old, however, beyond calculation, as the Asterolepis must have been, there are other organisms more ancient still. The defensive spine of the onchus, discovered in 1847, by the geologists of the Government survey, in the Bala limestone, proves that vertebrate animals existed even in the hoary Cambrian rocks, below the Lower Silurian system. Of this important fact, Mr. Miller makes effective use in his sixth chapter. The author of the “Vestiges” declares that the earliest system contained no fish, and that crustacea and molluscs were the only tenants of the Lower Silurian seas. “I fix my opponents down,” says he, “to the consideration of this fact,” i. e. that of the absence of fishes from the earliest fossiliferous formations. “And I, in return,” replies the author of the “Footprints,” “fix you down to the consideration of the antagonist fact that fishes were not absent from the earliest fossiliferous formations. From none of the great geological formations were fishes absent,— not even from the formations of the Cambrian division.”

Mr. Miller next considers the organization and bulk of the Silurian fishes. The author of the “Vestiges,” taking advantage of the circumstance that the spines discovered in the Wenlock Shale by Professor Phillips, were of microscopic minuteness, regarded “the little creatures to which they belonged as the foetal embryos of their class,—the tokens of Nature’s first and half-abortive efforts to make fish out of the lower animals.” But Mr. Miller clearly shows that the species to which they belonged must have been of considerable size. “The assertors of the development hypothesis appeal to the geological evidence as altogether on their side in the case; and straightway a few witnesses enter court. But lo, among the expected dwarfs, there appear individuals of more than the average bulk and stature.”—P. 120.

Still, the question of organization remains. The writer of the “Vestiges,” finding that the earlier fishes were all cartilaginous,—that their tails were heterocercal (finned on one side only), “an admitted feature of the salmon in an embryotic state,”—and presuming that the maxillary and intermaxillary bones, because simple, were rudimental, and that the mouth was placed on the under side of the head,—concluded that the Silurian placoids were not, as had been affirmed by an accomplished geologist, “the highest types of their class,” but “a separate series of that class, generally inferior in the leading features of organization, though stretching farther, both upward and downward, than the other series, when details of organization are regarded.” In opposition to this view, Mr. Miller holds that the standing of animals must be, and actually is, determined, not by the amount of bone, but by the development of brain (a principle, by the way, employed by the author of the “Vestiges” himself, when it happens to suit his theory); and he proves, from the large brains of the Silurian organisms, that they must have possessed a high standing among fishes; while he regards the gradually-diminishing vertebræ of the heterocercal tail as an evidence of more perfect organization than the abruptly-terminating vertebral column of the homocercal one. Our author also shows that the occipital frame-work of the Silurian placoids bears at least as close an analogy to the skulls of the higher animals as those of the osseous fishes; that simplicity of jaw is no evidence of a rudimental condition; and that the mouths of the most ancient placoids did not open under their heads.

In a beautiful and original chapter on the History and Progress of Degradation, our author shows that, judged by the test of what he calls “homological symmetry of organization,” the earliest fishes were of a higher type than their successors; that monstrosity, through (1) defect, (2) redundancy, and (3) displacement of parts, is met with, not during the first, but during the subsequent periods of Paleozoic existence.

“It would be an easy matter for an ingenious theorist, not much disposed to distinguish between the minor and the master laws of organized being, to get up quite as unexceptionable a theory of degradation as of development. The one-eyed, one-legged Chelsea-pensioner, who had a child, unborn at the time, laid to his charge, agreed to recognise his relationship to the little creature, if, on its coming into the world, it was found to have a green patch over its eye, and a wooden leg. And in order to construct a hypothesis of progressive degradation, the theodist has but to take for granted the transmission to other generations of defects and compensating redundancies at once as extreme and accidental as the loss of eyes or limbs, and the acquisition of timber legs or green patches."—Pp. 165, 166.

We wish our space would allow us to present to our readers the beautiful close of the tenth chapter, and enable them to follow us through Mr. Miller's examination of the Lamarckian hypothesis of the origin of plants and its consequences, and his able refutation of the theory respecting the transmutation of a marine into a terrestrial flora. We should like, too, to have entertained them with that triumphant display of humour in which our author ridicules the idea that "superposition is parental relation," and proves that, although the fish precedes the reptile, the reptile precedes the bird, the bird precedes the mammiferous quadruped and the quadrumana, and these precede man,—yet precedence implied no parentage,—that the reptiles and fishes, though the predecessors, were by no means the progenitors of beasts and man.

The genealogy of the development hypothesis is next traced back to the wild dream of De Maillet, and is clearly proved to have existed, in all its perfection, long before geology had any existence as a science. Lamarck, again, though he became comparatively early in life a skilful botanist and conchologist, yet published his development hypothesis in 1802, before he became at all skilled as a zoologist, and certainly long ere he became a geologist, "for a geologist he never became." And Oken himself, the most distinguished supporter of the theory, curiously enough confesses that he wrote the first edition of his Physio-Philosophy in a kind of inspiration. Such is the parentage, wild and fanciful as the responses of an ancient Pythoness, of which the theory of the "Vestiges" is the worthy offspring.

"Give me your facts," said the Frenchman, "that I may accommodate them to my theory." And no one can look at the progress of the Lamarckian hypothesis, with reference to the dates when, and the men by whom it was promulgated, without recognising in it one of perhaps the most striking embodiments of the Frenchman's principle which the world ever saw. It is not the illiberal religionist that rejects and casts it off,—it is the inductive philosopher. Science addresses its assertors in the language of the possessed to the sons of Soveva the Jew; "The astronomer I know, and the geologist I know; but who are ye?"—P. 272.

The concluding chapter of the work, on "the bearing of Final Causes on Geologic History," is, perhaps, one of the finest pieces of writing and thinking in the language: it reminds us of that magnificent burst of genius, the 17th chapter of the same author's "First Impressions of England and its People." There are two intensely interesting, yet profoundly difficult questions, on which Mr. Miller enters with at once the unshrinking courage and the genuine modesty of a philosopher. On what principle are we to account for the extinction of inferior existences, and the postponement of the higher races? And,—how explain the obvious degradation of organic existences, even under the moral dynasty of man?

In dealing with the former of these questions, our author shows that nations and species bear the stamp of mortality as well as individuals; he then adds,—

"We cannot yet aspire 'to the height of this great argument;' but, from the little which we can now see, as if 'in a glass darkly,' enough appears to

'Assert eternal Providence,

And justify the ways of God to man.'

The history of the four great monarchies of the world was typified, in the prophetic dream of the ancient Babylonish king, by a colossal image, 'terrible in its form and brightness,' of which the 'head was pure gold,' the 'breast and arms of silver,' the 'belly and thighs of brass,' 'and the legs and feet' of iron, and of 'iron mingled with clay.' The vision, in which it formed the central object, was appropriately that of a puissant monarch; and the image itself typified the merely human monarchies of the earth. It would require a widely different figure to symbolize the great monarchies of creation. And yet revelation does furnish such a figure. It is that which was witnessed by the captive prophet beside 'the river Chebar,' when 'the heavens were opened, and he saw the visions of God.' In that chariot of Deity, glowing in fire and amber, with its complex wheels, 'so high that they were dreadful,' set round about with eyes, there were living creatures, of whose four faces three were brute and one human; and high over all sat the Son of man. It would almost seem as if, in this sublime vision,—in which, with features distinct enough to impress the imagination, there mingle the elements of an awful incomprehensibility, and which even the genius of Raffaele has failed adequately to portray,—the history of all the past and of all the future had been symbolized. In the order of Providence intimated in the geologic record the brute faces, as in the vision, outnumber the human; the human dynasty is one, and the dynasties of the inferior animals are three; and yet who can doubt that they all equally compose parts of a well-ordered and perfect whole, as the four faces formed but one cherub; that they have been moving onward to a definite goal, in the unity of one grand harmonious design,—now 'lifted up high' over the comprehension of earth,—now let down to its humble level; and that the Creator of all has been ever seated over them on the throne of his providence,—a 'likeness in the appearance of a man,'—embodying the perfection of his nature in his workings, and determining the end from the beginning?"—Pp. 281—283.

After stating the curious fact that the order adopted by Cuvier, in his arrangement of the four great classes of vertebrate animals, is also that in which they occur in order of time,—the smaller-brained organisms appearing first, the larger afterwards,—Mr. Miller accounts for the postponement of the higher orders of creation, by showing that, in the earlier ages of existence, "a partially-consolidated planet, tempested by frequent earthquakes, of such terrible potency, that those of the historic ages would be but mere ripples of the earth's surface in comparison, could be no proper home for a creature" so high in the scale of being as man.

"The fish or reptile,—animals of a limited range of instinct, exceedingly tenacious of life in most of their varieties, oviparous, prolific, and whose young, immediately on their escape from the egg, can provide for themselves, might enjoy existence in such circumstances, to the full extent of their narrow capacities; and when sudden death fell upon them,—though their remains, scattered over wide areas, continue to exhibit that distortion of posture incident to violent dissolution, which seems to speak of terror and suffering,—we may safely conclude there was but little real suffering in the case: they were happy up to a certain point, and unconscious for ever after. Fishes and reptiles were the proper inhabitants of our planet during the ages of the earth-tempests; and when, under the operation of the chemical laws, these had become less frequent and terrible, the higher mammals were introduced. . . . But what could man have done on the globe at a time when such outbursts were comparatively common occurrences? . . . The reasoning brain would have been wholly at fault in a scene of things in which it could neither foresee the exterminating calamity while yet distant, nor control it when it had come; and so the reasoning brain was not produced until the scene had undergone a slow but thorough process of change, during which, at each progressive stage, it had furnished a platform for higher, and still higher life. When the coniferæ could flourish on the land, and fishes subsist in the seas, fishes and cone-bearing plants were created; when the earth became a fit habitat for reptiles and birds, reptiles and birds were produced; with the dawn of a more stable and mature state of things, the sagacious quadruped was ushered in; and, last of all, when man's house was fully prepared for him,—when the data on which it is his nature to reason and calculate had become fixed and certain,—the reasoning, calculating brain was moulded by the creative finger, and man became a living soul."—Pp. 286—289.

It is a striking circumstance, that no sooner had the earth become sufficiently consolidated to form a habitation for the mammiferous quadrupeds, than, "with a few exceptions, the reptiles appear in greatly-diminished proportions." This, as Mr Miller proves, was wisely and well arranged, for "a world which, after it had become a home of the higher herbivorous and more powerful carnivorous animals, continued to retain the gigantic reptiles of the earlier ages, would be a world of horrid exterminating war, and altogether rather a place of torment than a scene of intermediate character, in which, though it sometimes echoes the groans of suffering nature, life is, in the main, enjoyment. No sooner, therefore, was the reptile removed from his place in the fore-front of creation, and creatures of a higher order introduced into the consolidating and fast-ripening planet, of which he had been so long the monarch, than his bulk shrank, and his strength lessened, and he assumed a humility of form and aspect at once in keeping with his reduced circumstances, and compatible with the general welfare."—Pp. 296, 297.

The second question is more difficult than the first. "There hangs a mystery greatly more profound over the fact of the degradation, than over the reduction and diminution of classes." It is an unquestionable fact, that the several dynasties of animated being began with the symmetrical, and deteriorated into the monstrous. Of this fact Mr. Miller confesses that he can offer no explanation, but says,—

"Though I can assign neither reason nor cause for the fact, I cannot avoid the conclusion that it is associated with certain other great facts in the moral government of the universe, by those threads of analogical connexion which run through the entire tissue of creation and providence, and impart to it that character of unity which speaks of the single producing mind. The first idea of every religion on earth which has arisen out of what may be termed the spiritual instincts of man's nature, is that of a future state; the second idea is, that in this state men shall exist in two separate classes,—the one in advance of their present condition, the other far in the rear of it. It is on these two great beliefs that conscience everywhere finds the fulcrum from which it acts upon the conduct; and it is, we find, wholly inoperative as a force without them. And in that one religion among men that, instead of retiring, lifts the pale ghosts of the others, before the light of civilization, brightens and expands in its beams, and in favour of whose claims as a revelation from God the highest philosophy has declared, we find these two master ideas occupying a still more prominent place than in any of those indigenous religions that spring up in the human mind of themselves. The special lesson which the adorable Saviour, during his ministry on earth, oftenest enforced, and to which all the others bore reference, was the lesson of a final separation of mankind into two great divisions,—a division of God-like men, of whose high standing and full orb'd happiness man, in the present scene of things, can form no adequate conception; and a division of men finally lost, and doomed to unutterable misery and hopeless degradation. There is not in all revelation a single doctrine which we shall find oftener, or more clearly enforced, than that there shall continue to exist, throughout the endless cycles of the future, a race of degraded men and of degraded angels.

"Now, it is truly wonderful how thoroughly, in its general scope, the revealed pieces on to the geologic record. We know, as geologists, that the dynasty of the fish was succeeded by that of the reptile,—that the dynasty of the reptile was succeeded by that of the mammiferous quadruped,—and that the dynasty of the mammiferous quadruped was succeeded by that of man as man now exists,—a creature of mixed character, and subject, in all conditions, to wide alternations of enjoyment and suffering. We know farther,—so far, at least, as we have yet succeeded in deciphering the record,—that the several dynasties were introduced, not in their lower, but in their higher forms;—that, in short, in the imposing programme of creation, it was arranged, as a general rule, that in each of the great divisions of the procession, the magnates should walk first. We recognise yet farther the fact of degradation specially exemplified in the fish and the reptile. And then, passing on to the revealed record, we learn that the dynasty of man in the mixed state and character is not the final one, but that there is to be yet another creation, or more properly re-creation, known theologically as the Resurrection, which shall be connected, in its physical components, by bonds of mysterious paternity, with the dynasty which now reigns, and be bound to it mentally by the chain of identity, conscious and actual; but which, in all that constitutes superiority, shall be as vastly its superior as the dynasty of responsible man is superior to even the lowest of the preliminary dynasties. We are farther taught, that at the commencement of this last of the dynasties, there will be a re-creation of not only elevated, but also of degraded beings,—a re-creation of the lost. We are taught yet farther, that though the present dynasty be that of a lapsed race, which at their first introduction were placed on higher ground than that on which they now stand, and sank by their own act, it was yet part of the original design, from the beginning of all things, that they should occupy the existing platform; and that redemption is thus no after-thought, rendered necessary by the fall, but, on the contrary, part of a general scheme for which provision had been made from the beginning; so that the Divine Man, through whom the work of restoration has been effected, was in reality, in reference to the purposes of the Eternal, what he is designated in the remarkable text, 'the Lamb slain from the foundations of the world.' Slain from the foundations of the world! Could the assertors of the stony science ask for language more express? By piecing the two records together,—that revealed in Scripture, and that revealed in the rocks,—records which, however widely geologists may mistake the one, or commentators misunderstand the other, have emanated from the same great Author,—we learn that, in slow and solemn majesty has period succeeded period, each, in succession, ushering in a higher and yet higher scene of existence,—that fish, reptiles, mammiferous quadrupeds, have reigned in turn,—that responsible man, 'made in the image of God,' and with dominion over all creatures, ultimately entered into a world ripened for his reception; but farther, that this passing scene, in which he forms the prominent figure, is not the final one in the long series, but merely the last of the preliminary scenes; and that that period to which the bygone ages, incalculable in amount, with all their well-proportioned gradations of being, form the imposing vestibule, shall have perfection for its occupant, and eternity for its duration. I know not how it may appear to others; but for my own part, I cannot avoid thinking that there would be a lack of proportion in the series of being, were the period of perfect and glorified humanity abruptly connected, without the introduction of an intermediate creation of responsible imperfection, with that of the dying irresponsible brute. That scene of things in which God became man, and suffered, seems, as it no doubt is, a necessary link in the chain."—Pp. 300—303.

"I am aware," continues he, "that I stand on the confines of a mystery which man, since the first introduction of sin into the world till now, has 'vainly aspired to comprehend.' But I have no new reading of the enigma to offer. I know not why it is that moral evil exists in the universe of the All-wise and the All-Powerful; nor through what occult law of Deity it is that perfection should come through suffering."

What, then, is the race which shall succeed the lapsed and degraded family of man? Or where is the analogue to those creative acts which more than compensated for the deteriorating process of former ages by ushering still higher forms of existence into the world? It cannot consist in a simple repetition of the past; creation has ceased with man, for that latest workmanship of the Divine fingers has been placed under a moral government, of which the most necessary condition is, that its subjects shall be identical in a world of probation, and in a world of reward. The mere provision of a higher order of beings as the successors of the human race will not serve the end of moral government. "The work analogous in its end and object to those acts of creation which gave to our planet its successive dynasties of higher and yet higher existences, is the work of REDEMPTION. It is the elevatory process of the present time,—the only possible provision for that final act of re-creation 'to everlasting life' which shall usher in the terminal dynasty."

We hail with sincere pleasure this noble vindication of the truth against the "oppositions of science falsely so called." When we state that it has been appointed as one of the text-books at Oxford during the present session, our readers will understand the place which the work occupies in the estimation of the highest authorities. We rejoice to see that it has already reached its third edition; and right glad should we be to hear that its author had consented to throw it, in both a literary and financial sense, into a still more popular form. Mr. Miller has written, and rightly, for scientific readers in the first instance, knowing that by them, and according to their verdict, the development question must be virtually decided. Still, he should bear in mind that the "Vestiges" are chiefly formidable from their great simplicity and cheapness:—the copy which lies before us "cost, when new, but half-a-crown;" and it can find its way, not only to the hand, but to the understanding of the already too credulous, or rather too incredulous mechanic. Now, as we have seen from the Reports of the British Association, that Mr. Miller can write so as to astonish a Murchison, and excite the good-humoured envy of a Buckland, and as we see, by the work before us, that he can achieve the next to impossible feat of making a sober and patient reply to an opponent even more fascinating than the romantic theory he seeks to demolish, we feel assured that, preserving all its graphic excellence, he could so free it from technicalities, as to reach the comprehension of the dullest, and arouse the interest of the youngest. While, by compression of type, reduction of size, and, if need be, for economy's sake, divesting it of some of those very beautiful illustrations which now adorn it, he could so reduce the cost, as to send a "People's edition" wherever that of the "Vestiges" has found its way, and thus give to the antidote a circulation as wide as that of the poison.

But whether he accept our suggestion or not, we will say,—Long may the hand of Hugh Miller be spared to wield the hammer, and to guide the pen, and greater still be the services he shall yet render to Theology and Geology!

HESPEROS; OR, TRAVELS IN THE WEST.¹

APART from the race of students proper, who read books carefully and systematically, upon the principle of pursuing "noble ends by noble means," the readers of books belong, in general, to one of these two classes,—those who read for the sake of picking up useful information, novel facts, or new ideas; and those who read for the sake of amusement. It is the members of both these classes whom we now address on the subject of "Hesperos." Ye lovers of literary amusement! the book concerns you.—Ye seekers of useful information! the book is in your line, also. In short, to say as much about these two volumes as can well be said in one word, we can safely assert that "Hesperos" is a very readable book; that the "reading faculty," be it never so feeble, is not likely to break down under it. Now, to write a readable book about the United States, in these days, deluged as the world has been, for the last twenty years, by an uninterrupted shower of volumes on the subject, demands more than a scribbling facility. Mrs. Houston has much more than this. As an authoress her most conspicuous quality is good sense;—added to this, she has good powers of observation, a very fair descriptive talent, and (for the most part,) good taste. Her manner of viewing things, without being startlingly original, is marked by enough of individuality to make it attractive, and her style of writing, though not always scrupulously correct, and never remarkable for artistic perfection, is always that of a gentlewoman, and is pleasant and agreeable in an uncommon degree. She always writes like a lady. To those persons who have a dislike to the slipshod wailing-woman's English, in vogue among so many artificers in light literature at the present day, it may be a recommendation to mention this little fact concerning "Hesperos."

With regard to the matter in this book, it will be sufficient to say, briefly, that it is very much the same as that to be found in most Travels in America that do not dive into the deep waters of political and metaphysical philosophy, or soar into the cloud-land of speculation concerning the future destiny of the young giant. Mrs. Houston keeps generally on the surface, and skims over it gracefully and skilfully enough; always carrying her readers along with her. She devotes a chapter or so to the discussion of the Slavery Question; and without saying any thing new on the subject, from her faculty of seeing two or three sides to a question, (a faculty we should like to see more general,) she contrives to make the reader believe that she is a sensible woman;—that the "beneficent whip" is not such a very contemptible figure of speech after all; and that "Slavery," "Slave Protection Service," and "Immediate Abolition," are terms signifying terrible things, not to be settled and disposed of in a paragraph or a meeting, however "monstrous" or well meant. The evil that man hath wrought on this earth, takes time to undo, in exact proportion to the time occupied in the doing of it.

In "Hesperos" we are taken to Boston and Philadelphia, and New York and Albany; to Niagara and Trenton Falls; afterwards to the Southern States and Texas, including a voyage down the Mississippi and another up it. The descriptions of places and persons are effective, and the observations on manners and morals are kindly, though occasionally spiced with satire. We will now select such passages as will serve to give a fair idea of the tone and style of the work.

Our authoress notices the strong involuntary reverence for rank and title, so prevalent in America. While in New York she goes to see the Museum, opposite the Astor House, and after saying that, at present, it does not contain many remarkable things, she proceeds thus:—

"Near the door of the room there hangs, in a most conspicuous place, and framed and glazed, a common official announcement, emanating from the Lord Chamberlain's office. It is an object of interest here, solely because 'Victoria R.' is written upon it by the hand of the Queen of England.

"This reminds me of a description which a New England gentleman once gave me of his sensations, when, several years before, and during a visit which he made to England, he was presented by the American minister to William the Fourth. The Yankee was a plain-spoken, independent individual, the last man in the world (as I should have imagined) who would have been awed by such a ceremony. The undue veneration for mere rank, however, 'came out strong' in his case; for, in describing the ceremony, which he did in a most racy manner, he finished by saying—'Well, it's a truth, if I never say another word, that my hair stood on end like candles, and that I hadn't a dry thread about me.' This was at the moment of presentation, when, by his own account, his feelings were wound up to a positively painful state of excitement and fear."

Elsewhere in the book Mrs. Houston tells us of a pretty Creole lady whom she met, with her children, on one of the steamers on the Mississippi, who evinced great solicitude concerning the habits and manners of Queen Victoria:—

"She asked me innumerable questions about England, but more especially as regarded the Queen—questions which, I should imagine, no one but her Majesty herself could be qualified to answer. I gave her one piece of information with which she seemed very much struck; it was on the subject of the great simplicity of dress habitual to the royal children. I verily believe that my astonished companion had previously figured to herself that the little creatures were dragged about in ermine, velvet and jewels. I was amused by her expressing her conviction that were this 'interesting fact' generally promulgated in the United States, the extreme finery of the children here would be greatly modified."

It may, at first, raise a smile to read such things of a people who are so furiously republican, so in love with equality, that they will look up to no one, reverence no one, call no man master or superior. But, a little reflection will show that this love of English rank, this awe in the presence of English royalty, is but the reverse of the medal; the reaction from the unnatural excess of the contrary feeling fostered by the laws and institutions of the country; and that both are essential characteristics of extreme youth. Yes, Jonathan is very young, very green; it is a vigorous, healthy greenness, however; and there is no bitterness in our spirits when we laugh at his truculent assertion, that he is "as good as you," or "as the best;" and at his dazzled awe-struck gaze at the lion and the unicorn, and the hand-writing of one calling herself Majesty by the grace of God and not by the will of the people, though it be truly by their will too that she does so. What there is of romance connected with the past, mingles with England's ancient institutions; and no true-born American would wish to sweep away the long line of her sceptred kings from his memory, any more than he would sweep away Magna Charta, or the Declaration of Independence. The most offensive form which American irreverence takes, is that of childish insubordination. "Honour to father and mother," may be found in the catechism of the American child, but it is rarely to be found in his manners or conduct. We have heard of a free and enlightened citizen of eight years of age, sitting cross-legged, in a rocking-chair, in his mother's drawing-room, and favouring a mixed circle of visitors with his opinion upon every social and political subject spoken of, unchecked by his mother; not even thought of by her, as anything approaching to a nuisance—an unlovely and pitiable object. The self-reliance and forwardness of the American child appear to greater advantage out of the cities. Take the following, par exemple :—

"I have seen a little fellow of ten years old, sent off alone and at night, in a high carriage, with a pair of horses to drive, and a difficult commission to execute some thirty miles off. No one (not even his mother) seemed to think the undertaking a dangerous one, and as to the necessity of any grown-up person being sent to take care of the youthful charioteer, they would have laughed at the idea. He was the son of our host, and the smartest little Yankee I ever saw. It was some time before I became aware that smart in Yankee-English means clever; and that the term clever is never applied in this part of the world, except to good, well-meaning people, who are rather to be pitied for being just that and nothing more."

The next quotation is an act of justice to the Americans, on the part of the authoress :—

"The intercourse of the Americans with their own countrymen is characterized by a remarkable absence of affectation, and by great kindness and courtesy of manner. Whoever an American may happen to meet, and however ignorant he may be of his position, or his antecedents, his address, if he does address him, is invariably and uniformly polite. In England, we are far too apt to utter in our most inmost hearts, the admirable speech of the Spanish satirist: 'Let me know who you are, that I may measure my civilities according to your deserts.' Here a man is equally civil to the President of the country, and to the Irish gentleman, who acts as his servant."

We like the following anecdote; though it seems as if we had heard it before :—

"The absurdity of the people called helps, is very great. The 'help,' American born, is not often met with; but they may always be recognised by their extremely independent, not to say impertinent, air, their showy dress and familiar conversation. The help has high wages, without which she would not remain an hour in the house; and she stipulates for one or two entire holidays in the week, in default of which privilege she declines to engage herself. An English lady once told me that she had heard a 'help' announce the arrival of a servant about to be hired into the house, in the following terms, the person she addressed being a fellow-servant: 'Amelia, tell the woman in the parlour that there's a lady here waiting to speak to her.'"

Mrs. Houston's remarks upon the women of America are well worthy attention, because they are evidently made without malice, and with a very large share of good sense, good taste, and acute perception, as basis for the satire. In no country have women, especially young ladies, so much liberty of word and action, and so much of independent existence. They have, there, as in European countries, many of the intellectual and moral attributes of the men; consequently, we find all travellers agree in saying, that the American ladies are fearless, spirited, perfectly self-satisfied, busy, talkative, worldly, cheerful, free and easy. They are slender, elegantly formed, and beautiful, as regards feature and complexion; yet they seem to want that nameless charm which is essential to European notions of female beauty, and which lies somewhere in the opposites of that hardness and want of deference to others which characterise the delicate-looking Americans. We have no doubt that a few years will see great changes in their manners. In the mean time, as a help towards reforming those trifling habits which mar the effect of their great natural gifts, we would advise a careful study of such observations as the following from good-natured and competent judges :—

"The Ladies' Saloon was very fully occupied all the time we were in the Hotel. [The Pavilion Hotel, Boston]. It was a large well-proportioned apartment, with a good many rocking-chairs sprinkled about, on which the fair occupants sat, and swung themselves for hours together, after the manner of restless and uneasy parrots in their huge brazen rings. The young ladies looked just as désœuvrés, and were quite as noisy, and very nearly as gaudy. I scarcely ever did more than look at them on my way to my own apartment, and I invariably saw them on the same chairs, and in the same attitudes, doing nothing, and, apparently thinking as little. Some of them were very pretty and delicate-looking, and, moreover, would have been well-dressed, if they could have contented themselves with fewer colours. If I could summon up a wish about them, it would be that they would pitch their voices in a lower key, and, if possible, not speak through their noses. Why is it that throughout 'the whole of this vast continent,' the nasal twang should invariably prevail? I have given up trying to account for this peculiarity, and greatly fear I shall go to my grave without being enlightened on this interesting branch of physiology. I have heard that the same manner of speaking prevails in New Holland, in quite as remarkable a degree."

Farther on, in speaking of some New York ladies on board a steamer, Mrs. Houston says :—

"Many of these were distinguished and unexceptionable in dress, manners, and appearance; ladies of whose ladyhood it would be impossible to doubt. But let them do anything but speak, anything but drawl forth their words and scream out their surprise, and say 'what!' and 'ay!' and 'ha aw!' in a lengthened tone of which it would be impossible to convey an adequate idea. This is a great pity, for the American ladies are often agreeable and almost always well read; indeed, I have every reason to think they are as superior to us in general knowledge and erudition, as they are in acuteness of observation. All these good gifts are, however, marred by a want of softness of manner, and by a deficiency of those 'good gifts which grace a gentlewoman.' The 'guessing' and 'expecting' are, also, by no means confined to the gentlemen, and the frequent use of those favourite verbs would, in my opinion, spoil the charm of any conversation."

We do not quite like the tone of the assertion that "the American ladies are often agreeable;" it is indeed a dreadfully cool style of "damning with faint praise." We fancy the Americans themselves are likely to laugh at it as the insolent condescension of a Britisher. Neither can we digest, as fact, Mrs. Houston's opinion that the American ladies are "always well read." There is proof enough in favour of the contrary supposition to be found in "Hesperos" itself. They are introduced into society in childhood, in early girlhood they spend half their days in running about the streets, visiting, and (as other travellers tell us) hurrying from one lecture to another; which is not a mode of study calculated to make young ladies well read, and scarcely even moderately informed on any subject. Their physical constitution is not strong; and added to that, from the united evils of eating every day unwholesome food and eating it at a rail-road velocity, they are early subject to dyspepsia, in some form or other; finally, they marry very early; before English girls are out of the school-room. From these considerations, we are inclined to doubt that the American ladies are, on the whole, superior in mental cultivation to English or French women. Of the New York ladies, in general, Mrs. Houston speaks thus:—

"A great deal has been said of the beauties which are to be met with in Broadway; indeed, I have heard it asserted even by Englishmen, that there are more beautiful faces to be seen during a walk through that street than in any other place in the world. One reason for this may be that there are more female faces to be seen; for it is only in American cities that you can see the principal street literally thronged with ladies; and it would indeed be strange if among all these numbers many were not to be found possessed of a sufficient degree of attraction to justify these encomiums. In Broadway, during the fashionable period of the day, ladies, in parties of two and three, may be met with every second, and as their complexions are generally good, and their dress, at least, not deficient in showiness, their tout ensemble is often sufficiently attractive. The total absence of all appearance of shyness in these perambulating ladies may also partly account for some of the admiration that has been so liberally bestowed upon them; but, whatever the cause, they certainly arrogate to themselves the palm of beauty, and I have not often heard their claim to it disputed. It is, however, equally true that the reign of their charms is as short as it is brilliant. In America it would be considered absurd to talk of a lady possessing a single attraction after thirty; so accustomed are they in this country to witness the early decline of youth and loveliness. During their daily promenades, the New York ladies are rarely attended by a gentleman, and never by a servant. It is perhaps to this remarkable independence of character and habits, that they are indebted for the perfect self-possession and total absence of shyness which must be obvious to every one. To many, this would destroy the effect of half the charms they possess; not so, I imagine, with their own countrymen, for I have heard them boast of this very characteristic as a proof of the perfect freedom from prejudice on the part of the ladies of their country, and also of their conviction that there was no reason for them to be 'ashamed of themselves.' The dress of the New York ladies is generally overdone, gaudy and inappropriate; it is also costly and extravagant to the greatest degree, and to spend a large proportion of their husband's hard-earned gains in the purchase of Parisian finery seems to be one of their great pleasures. The price of every article of dress is nearly treble what it is in either London or Paris; and when it is taken into consideration that they dress much more than it is the custom to do in either of the above capitals, the tremendous drain upon the dollars may be in some degree appreciated. Such feathers as I have seen in Broadway!—pink, blue, and red, floating high in the air, on the winds of a cold November day. And then the satin gowns, of light and conspicuous colours, and the splendid velvets of every hue, and all this to walk in one of the dirtiest main streets in the world; the object of their promenade (always excepting the primary one of seeing and being seen) being, in all probability, to cheapen groceries in a hookster's store."

Our authoress's admiration of the Baltimore ladies is also qualified:—

"Baltimore is celebrated all over the union for the beauty of its women; indeed, there is a common saying of the Kentuckians, that the greatest boast of one of these gentlemen is 'to have the surest rifle in his hand, the best horse in his stable, and a Maryland gal for his wife.' I conclude that the half-horse half-alligator inhabitants of old Kentuck do not object to some of the little peculiarities of the Baltimore young ladies; or, at least, to some of the habits that we noticed among many of those we had the pleasure of seeing at meal-times. I have every wish to make allowances for the singularity of some of their customs, and perhaps it may be partly owing to the melancholy fact, that the number of prongs to the forks (even in the best hotels) is generally limited to two, that the fair Americans make such an undue use of their knives at dinner-time. To a stranger accustomed to the greater luxury of silver forks, of wider and more useful dimensions, it is deemed not consistent with feminine grace, to seize a large, coarse knife, and thrust it into the mouth, with peradventure a huge oyster at the end of it. It matters not that the hand is small and delicate, and the mouth one of the most beautiful in the world; that they are so, only serves to render the atrocity of the deed more apparent and striking. I cannot altogether justify my American beauties when they lean both their elbows on the dining table, and gnaw a great lump of bread, which is held firmly in the little white hand, the appendage of one of the aforesaid elbows: and lastly, it is impossible quite to approve of their system of helping themselves to a public dish, with a spoon, just come off particular service. 'Well! I guess I'm tired some!' said one of these pretty young ladies, throwing herself almost at full length in a lounging chair. It was immediately after dinner, and she seemed fatigued with the exertions of the repast. 'Well! I guess I'm tired some!' A—arnt you?" addressing herself to another damsel, in a sky-blue silk dress, with the very prettiest foot I ever saw, but who had just startled me by seating herself with a heavy flump, and with a yawn most audible and expressive. 'Well, I expect I am!' was the reply, 'I feel like sleeping and can't say that I am not quite bowled out.' Oh that yawn, and that dreadful nasal twang! I felt, then, how almost impossible it was to admire either the nose or the lips, from which issued such sounds of 'dreadful note.'"

Mrs. Houston visited Washington during the time of Congress—with express view, it appears, of hearing the debates occasionally, and of forming some opinion as to the manner of conducting public business there. Of the general appearance of the Lower House, she speaks as follows; with more to the same effect:—

"There is a great sameness both in the features and countenances of the Americans, and a sharp look is common to all; moreover, though a few were remarkably smart, (I use the word here as applied to their costume, and not to their mental qualifications,) the majority were clothed in the inevitable black silk waistcoat, which I have every where noticed, and put their thumbs (when they were not whittling) into the pockets of the said waistcoats just as usual. The noise is generally so overpowering that it is hardly possible to hear a word that proceeds from the mouth, or more properly speaking the nose, of the orator who flatters himself that he is addressing the House. It not unfrequently happens that two or three members rise at once, and in their zeal to hear themselves talk, almost come to blows for the possession of the floor, whilst the noises and cries made by the honourable members are wonderful in the extreme. From one part of the House the crowing of a dozen cocks enlivens the assembly, while in another the loud braying of as many donkeys, or the 'gobble gobble' of some angry turkey-cocks, is imitated to the life by the representatives of this great People. A paper war is sometimes carried on by means of pellets hastily formed of official reports, or the newspapers of the day, and thrown dexterously at the heads of drowsy or thoughtful members; and as each of them is provided with a thing called, I believe, a spittoon—and also with a whittling knife, there is, on the whole, no dearth of employment.

"The Hall is covered with a rich carpet, once new and clean, and the members are accommodated with comfortable arm-chairs; and in addition to these luxuries, they each receive the sum of eight-dollars a day for their services, besides having their travelling expenses paid to and from the seat of government. After the description I have given you, you will at once perceive that it is neither the most talented, the most respectable, nor the wealthiest citizens who find their way into the Lower House. The truth is, that few of those belonging to the above classes are willing to submit to the necessary degradation entailed upon the candidates for such questionable honours; and, moreover, it would seem that the people themselves prefer representatives whose habits and sentiments are somewhat on an equality with their own.

"The style of eloquence which prevails in the Lower House may easily be imagined. Each member represents thirty thousand of his fellow citizens, and considers himself bound to make a certain number of speeches, both in honour of his constituency, and also as a means of ensuring his own re-election. The speeches of any individual member display generally a rare indifference to the matter in debate and also to the party to which the orator may happen to belong; for he considers that he has fulfilled his duty when he has spoken one hour about his own district, and enabled his constituents to read his speech in the newspapers."

The last part of the above observations, is, we fancy, of more general applicability than our authoress seems to suppose; and the following anecdote, which aptly enough illustrates her statement, might, with a slight variation of phraseology, have been related of many a member of a Lower and Honourable House on this side the Atlantic. Indeed, it may strike some of our readers, as it certainly does us, that some members of representative houses never open their lips at all, in the way of making a speech, except to "talk Bunkum;"—although it may be that they do the thing more gracefully, concealing the fact more carefully, than their whittling, tobacco-chewing, nasal-twangling cousins at Washington.

"It is recorded of a very long-winded gentleman, who had been boring the House till the patience of every member was exhausted, that when a friend gently hinted to him that his hour had expired, and moreover that he was not speaking on the subject before the House,—he replied with great ingenuitiveness:—"Well, I guess I arn't addressing the House at all.—I am talking to Bunkum—I am."—Now, Bunkum was the name of the district of which this single-minded gentleman was the representative, and the expression of 'talking Bunkum' has now passed into a common saying in the United States."

Of the Upper House Mrs. Houston has better things to report. According to her showing it is a highly respectable body, worthy to have a hand in making laws for a great country, even though that country be in every way the "greatest in the world," as it believes itself to be.

Our authoress gives Mrs. Trollope full credit for having, by her strictures on the domestic manners of the Americans, done much towards promoting the improvement which has taken place since her memorable book was written. She even thinks that if Mrs. Trollope were to visit America again she would be well received there.

We have said enough about "Hesperos," and quoted enough from it, to give our readers some insight into the nature of the work; and can only add that every portion of these pages is to the full as attractive as the matter we have transferred to our own. As Mrs. Houston tells a story well, we think we cannot do better than give the following, by way of conclusion to these remarks, and as a comment upon the grand anomaly of the Land of Liberty.

"Every one knows,—or, at least, ought to know,—the story of Boyer, the ex-Prince of Hayti. In case, however, you should be among the latter, I repeat it for your edification. Boyer had been making a lengthened stay in Paris, where he had been received as a gentleman and a man of education. He had been a frequent guest at the Tuileries and had been received on familiar terms at the houses of the foreign ministers. But why recapitulate where he had been, and what description of reception he had met with?—He was received as a gentleman,—what more can I say!—and enjoyed himself in the best society in Paris.

"An unlucky fancy, however, seized upon Boyer; which was no other than to vary the pleasant monotony of his life by a visit to the United States. The idea was no sooner conceived than acted upon; and he and his sable suite took passage across the Atlantic and in due time arrived at New York. In communion with every one else who visits this country, he repaired to the 'City of Hotels' the Astor House. When, lo! to his astonishment and dismay, he found the doors of the establishment closed against him and his. They did not take in Niggers! The poor Prince next tried to gain admittance to two other hotels, with equally ill success. There was no house in the free city for the black man. At last a despised liquor shop was pointed out to him, whose owner earned a wretched livelihood by affording nightly shelter to these condemned specimens of the human race; and there the man who was in civilized Europe a prince, and what is a far more distinguished title—a gentleman, was glad to lay his head. At the theatre similar slights and indignities were offered to him. Neither pit nor boxes opened to receive him; and the next day, indignant and disgusted at the manner in which he had been treated, Boyer and his suite took their departure; and, shaking from off his feet the dust of the great republican city, declared that he must go elsewhere if he hoped to find freedom, for that there it was not."

QUEEN ELIZABETH, the morrow of her coronation, went to the chapel: and in the great chamber, Sir John Rainsforth, (a knight that had the liberty of a buffoon,) set on by wiser men, besought the queen aloud—"That now this good time, when prisoners were delivered, four prisoners, amongst the rest, might likewise have their liberty who were like enough to be kept still in hold." The queen asked, "Who they were?" and he said, "Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, who had long been imprisoned in the Latin tongue, and now he desired they might go abroad among the people in English." The queen answered, with a grave countenance, "It were good, Rainsforth, they were spoken with themselves, to know of them whether they would be set at liberty."

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE LATE THOMAS CAMPBELL:

BY ONE OF HIS PERSONAL FRIENDS.

"Oft let me range these gloomy aisles alone;
Sad luxury! to vulgar minds unknown;
Along the walls, where speaking marbles show
What worthies form the hallow'd dust below;
Proud names, who once the reins of empire held;
In arms who triumph'd, or in arts excell'd;
Chiefs graced with scars, and prodigal of blood;
Stern patriots, who for sacred freedom stood;
Just men, by whom impartial laws were given;
And saints, who taught and led the way to heaven!"

WE HAVE just returned from a visit to POETS' CORNER. How solemn and impressive was the scene! The morning service had not yet commenced. The solemnity was increased by the profound stillness; but every tomb, bust, and cenotaph, seemed to address us in words that, without striking the ear, passed at once to the heart. Beneath us were the ashes of heroes, statesmen, poets, and philosophers—of men whose names stand forth as landmarks in our national history—each, with his deeds emblazoned on its page, showing to future aspirants by what labours in her cause he had earned the gratitude of his country, the love and admiration of his fellow-citizens, the honour of "civic crowns," and the meed of immortality.

"Peace, love!—the cherubim that join
Their spread wings o'er Devotion's shrine—
Prayers sound in vain and temples shine
Where ye are not.
The heart alone can make divine
Religion's spot!"

After a brief survey of the sculptured trophies that encrust the walls, or rise in breathing effigies from their pedestals, we turned to a small, black, lozenge-shaped marble, in the pavement, inscribed with the name of THOMAS CAMPBELL, in brass letters, and placed over the Poet's remains by his executors. At the sight of this—the brief memorial of a poet whom we had long known, loved and admired—we felt as if riveted to the spot: we lost sight of the finished sculptures, the laboured inscriptions, the classic elegance, the pathetic eulogies, which had thus far engrossed our attention, and felt all our thoughts concentrated on that little spot in the hallowed pavement. How many of his pure and lofty strains now rushed upon the memory! and, in accordance with the time and place, what could be more appropriate than these lines?—

"Daughter of Faith! awake, arise, illumine
The dread unknown—the chaos of the tomb!
Melt and diapel, ye spectre doubts that roll
Cimmerian darkness o'er the parting soul.—
The strife is o'er, the pangs of nature close,
And life's last rapture triumphs o'er his woes.
Hark! as the spirit eyes, with eagle gaze,
The noon of Heaven, undazzled by the blaze,
On heavenly wings, that waft her to the sky,
Float the sweet tones of star-born melody:
Wild as that hallow'd anthem sent to hail
Bethlehem's shepherds in the lonely vale,

When Jordan hush'd his waves, and midnight still Watch'd on the holy towers of Zion Hill."

Campbell, as it now appears from a passage in his "Life and Letters,"⁽¹⁾ had in early life a strong presentiment that his dust would one day find a resting-place with that of the glorious dead in POETS' CORNER. Writing to an accomplished friend, whose correspondence occupied a large portion of his time and heart, he expresses a hope that something much better than his previous poems would yet pass from his hands before being "carried to his place in Westminster Abbey." To this, however, he never alluded but in a playful way; and in another case, when it was gravely proposed to him to bequeath his mortal remains for interment in the Glasgow "Necropolis," he facetiously declined the honour, on the ground of a prior engagement; and hoped the party who solicited this favour, would be in no hurry to disturb the virgin soil for his accommodation. Latterly, however, the subject of dissolution, as we can well remember, was never treated with levity: during the last two years he spent in London, he adverted to it as the Rubicon, over which he had to pass to the shores of immortality. But—

"What is the bigot's torch, the tyrant's chain?
I smile at death, if heaven-ward hope remain!"

Campbell, as we have reason to believe, paid a solitary visit to this "Corner" of the Abbey, on the very eve of his departure to Boulogne. By what train of feelings he was led to the sacred spot, may be easily imagined. He was at the time, as we learn from his own letters, neither well in health nor easy in mind. He had, in fact, a heavy load upon his spirits, a "forecast of death," which nothing could remove; and as the physical malady increased, so did the mental suffering. But with this we have at present nothing to do. It is sufficient to say, that to part with friends—few, but strongly attached, and whose society had become more and more necessary, as the lengthened shadows, and the darkening path, foreboded the close of his pilgrimage—occasioned a severe mental struggle, which, although he made a manly effort to conceal it, shook his attenuated frame, and saddened all his prospects. Could he have been rescued at that moment from the ill-advised and fatal project of expatriating himself, the black, funereal tablet, on which we now read his name, might for some years, at least, have waited for its fatal record. But the die was thrown; he had ventured his life upon the cast; and, anticipating the too probable result, he repaired to the Abbey to take a last twilight view of the sepulchral trophies and tablets, under which so many of those whom he had known in their lives, or revered in their writings, had mingled their honoured dust. The hour chosen for this act of homage, was in the stillness of a summer evening, when the vesper chimes had died away; when silence, such as we now found it, pervaded the scene; and when the slanting rays that shone through the western window threw a gleam of evanescent warmth and life into the cold marble, which so profusely adorns the nave and aisles. How long he lingered among these trophies, or on what particular bust or statue he dwelt with melancholy interest, we need not inquire. A considerable number of those to whom monuments have been decreed within the last twenty years, were personal friends of the Poet; and of these, no doubt, each had a parting glance, as he threaded the long-drawn aisles, crossed the chancel, and then returned to the south transept. Here, as usual, he paused before the bust of Goldsmith, whose sweet and polished numbers it had been his earliest ambition to emulate!—

“In what new region, to the just assign’d,
What new employments please th’ unbodied mind?
A winged Virtue, through th’ etherial sky,
From world to world unwearied does he fly!”

The next day the Poet took hasty leave of one or two friends, and started for Boulogne; which was destined to prove as ungenial to his mind and taste, as the scene of the Tristia was to the Roman poet in his exile. But as this portion of his life’s history is already before the public, we turn to the brighter side of the page; and, looking back through the long vista of scenes still familiar to the mind’s eye, endeavour to collect a few detached features of that intellectual portrait, which it has been found so difficult to paint.

In his social moments, and in the society of kindred spirits, Campbell was the delight of his circle. His happiness was never so great as when it arose from the consciousness of having promoted the interests, and added to the happiness, of others. He was a stranger to that selfishness which narrows the circle of benevolence, and withers the kindly sympathies that should unite men as members of the same brotherhood—heirs of the same hope. He never deserted the unfortunate: on the contrary, he sought them in their obscurest retreats, and never left them without some expression of practical benevolence. The consciousness of having inflicted pain by any word or sentence unadvisedly written or spoken, caused him more pain than it did to the person against whom it was directed. Strongly impulsive in feelings, he spoke often hastily, but always reflected at leisure; and, like most men who do so, frequently regretted in our hearing that the force of reason was borne down by the stronger current of his feelings. If the topic to be discussed were of sufficient weight and importance, his opinion was delivered with force and perspicuity, but rarely with that coolness which marks the practised and deliberate orator. In stating a question, such as that of “Classical Education”—a favourite subject—he always appeared to advantage, always fixed the attention of his hearers; but, in replying to objections, he was apt to become excited; and instead of refuting his antagonist, was hurried into expressions of contempt for the argument, which, although from their pointed wit they gained him momentary applause, did not raise him in the estimation of those who think profoundly, and speak soberly and advisedly. Whenever he was sure of a patient hearing, and where he was pleased with his hearers, he seldom failed to make a most favourable impression. In presence of the “Senate of his native University,” which comprised in its members an epitome of all that is eminent in the walks of acquired science, or mental cultivation, he pronounced an inaugural discourse that will long be remembered, and quoted, as a specimen of ornate and manly eloquence which has been rarely equalled, never surpassed, by any of the master spirits who have spoken from the Rector’s chair.

Of his few surviving friends some may, no doubt, remember the passionate eloquence with which he so frequently urged his appeals in favour of the Polish refugees: and none, we will venture to say, can ever forget the consummate skill, indefatigable zeal, and lucid arrangement with which he suggested, planned, supported, and almost perfected the scheme of a London University. The honour of having originated this great national seminary was all his own; but, like other illustrious benefactors of mankind, feeble and contemptible efforts have been made to strip him of this well-merited honour, and to crown the ‘lieutenant,’ if we may so express it, ‘with those very laurels which were won, and should have been worn, by his general.’ But we leave this question in abler hands, and in the earnest hope that whenever a monument is raised to the founder of the London University, it will be inscribed with the name of Thomas Campbell. Palmas qui meruit ferat.

Thinking of this and other wrongs, not less flagrant though less familiar, which private pique or the virulence of party feeling have sought to inflict upon the poet’s memory, it was some consolation to observe the site chosen for erecting to his memory the splendid statue lately exhibited at the Royal Academy. This classic production is from the chisel of Mr. Marshall, who in executing a monument to the genius of Campbell, has added new testimony to his own. The site is on the east side, exactly opposite that of Addison, whose classic statue, long a principal ornament of the “Corner,” is soon to be confronted by that of a truly kindred, and no less moral poet. The pedestal is to be formed of a solid block of Carinthian marble, a votive offering from the “Polish exiles to the poet of Freedom,” the most intrepid defender of their cause. It is much to be regretted, however, that, owing to the suspicious vigilance of a northern government, the accomplishment of this design is indefinitely postponed; but a substitute for the prohibited offering is already found, and on that basis the statue of Campbell will very shortly be erected. So far, the country will have done its duty.

Here we were joined by a Scottish friend, who took a deep interest in the subject

“And have his old friends,” we inquired, “come promptly forward? Have the subscriptions poured liberally in?”

“Neither promptly nor liberally,” was the reply.

“But surely his native city—with its professors, merchants, citizens—has set a noble example.”

“Yes,” he added, “three small subscriptions from two family relations and an old pupil.”

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing more;" and he handed us the list.

"But Edinburgh, the modern Athens, where the poet was so fêted, flattered, almost idolized,—surely Edinburgh has made herself prominent in the subscription?"

"Yes. Lord Jeffrey has promised five pounds, and we are encouraged to hope that the subscriptions collected between John o' Groat's and the guid town of Berwick on Tweed, for the 'Campbell Monument,' may amount at last to the braw sum o' fifty pounds."

This was a rather humiliating fact, but as love to the man does not necessarily extend to his monument, we must look to England for the nine hundred and fifty pounds to make good the thousand, and thus far we have not looked in vain.

"And what has Ireland done—I mean his admirers in that country, for he certainly had many, and deservedly."

"Why, in point of subscriptions," said our friend, "it must I fear be 'Erin go bragh,' that is, let 'Erin be scot-free;' and thus far indeed she has maintained her freedom from subscription."

To you, then, "Ye mariners of England," shall we look for a long pull and a strong pull in our endeavour to raise a monument to the poet, whose genius raises a monument to you."

Alas! half-pay leads to half-measures; hands that would have gladly held out their contributions, must be content, in these piping times of peace, to lift the wine-cup in silence to his memory, as he himself raised it to "the gallant, good Riou," singing in his trumpet-toned lyric—

"Brave hearts! to Britain's pride
Once so faithful and so true;
On the deck of fame who died
With the gallant good Riou;¹
Soft sigh the winds of heaven o'er their grave!
While the billow mournful rolls,
And the mermaid's song condoles,
Singing—Glory to the souls
Of the Brave!"²
